Mīr Dāmād's many works on Islamic philosophy include Taqwīm al-īmān ("Calendar of Faith," a treatise on creation and God's knowledge). He also wrote poetry under the pseudonym of Ishraq. As a measure of his stature, he was given the title al-mu'allim al-thālith (i.e., "third teacher"—the first two being Aristotle and AL-FĀRĀBĪ). His work was continued by his pupil MULLĀ ṢADRĀ, who became a prominent Muslim philosopher of the 17th century.

MISHNAH \məsh-'nä, 'mish-nə\, philosophical law code of JUDAISM, arranged by topics in a strict logical order dictated by the principles of natural history, that came to closure in the Land of Israel about 200 CE. The Mishnah comprises 62 tractates, divided by topics among 6 divisions, as follows: ZERA'IM (Agriculture); MO'ED (Appointed Times); NASHIM (Women); NEZIQIN (Damages); QODASHIM (Holy Things); and TOHOROT (Purity).

In volume, the sixth division, on purity, covers approximately a quarter of the entire document. Topics of interest to the PRIESTHOOD and the Temple, such as priestly fees, conduct of the cult on holy days, conduct of the cult on ordinary days, management and upkeep of the Temple, and the rules of cultic cleanness, predominate in the first, second, fifth, and sixth divisions. Rules governing the social order form the bulk of the third and fourth. Of these tractates, only 'Eduyyot (in Damages) is organized along other than topical lines, as a collection of sayings on diverse subjects attributed to particular authorities. The Mishnah as printed today always includes Abot (Sayings of the Sages), but that tractate reached closure about a generation later than the Mishnah.

The stress throughout the Mishnah on the priestly CASTE and the Temple cult point to the document's principal concern, which centered upon sanctification, understood as the correct arrangement of all things, each in its proper category and each called by its rightful name, just as at the creation as portrayed in the Priestly Source and just as with the cult itself as set forth in Leviticus. Further, the thousands of rules and cases (with sages' disputes thereon) that comprise the document upon close reading turn out to express in concrete language abstract principles of hierarchical classification. These define the document's method and mark it as a work of a philosophical character. Not only so, but a variety of specific, recurrent concerns—for example, the relationships of being to becoming, actual to potential, the principles of economics, and those of politics—correspond point by point to comparable ones in Greco-Roman philosophy, particularly in Aristotle's tradition. This stress on proper order and right rule and the formulation of a philosophy, politics, and economics within the principles of natural history set forth by Aristotle explains why the Mishnah makes a statement to be classified as philosophy, concerning the order of the natural world in its correspondence with the supernatural world.

The Mishnah's system focused upon the holiness of the life of Israel, the people, a holiness that had formerly centered on the Temple. The logically consequent question was, "What is the meaning of sanctity, and how shall Israel attain, or give evidence of, sanctification?" The answer to this question derived from the original creation, the end of the Temple directing attention to the beginning of the natural world that the Temple had embodied. For the meaning of sanctity the framers therefore turned to that first act of sanctification, the one in creation. Sanctification came about when, all things in array, in place, each with its proper name, God blessed and sanctified the seventh day on the eve of the first SABBATH. Therefore, to receive the blessing and to be made holy, all things in nature and society must be set in right array. Given the condition of Israel, the people, in its land during the aftermath of the catastrophic war against Rome led by BAR KOKHBA in 132–135 CE, putting things in order was no easy task. The condition of society corresponded to the critical question that obsessed the system builders.

To show how the Mishnah takes its place within the TORAH of Sinai, its authorities portrayed it as the result of a process of memorization and oral transmission from Sinai. The principal figures in the span from ancient times to their own day thus take their positions on a list of the sages in that chain of tradition: "Moses received Torah at Sinai and handed it on to JOSHUA," and the list of links in the chain ends with such well-known sages of the Mishnah as HILLEL and Shammai, founders of influential houses, or schools, of legal study such as GAMALIEL I, his son Simeon ben Gamaliel, and Yohanan ben Zakkai and his disciples and continuators, Eliezer and Joshua, and so to the framers of the Mishnah itself. The Mishnah therefore is represented as the recapitulation of ORAL TRADITIONS of Sinai, ultimately given permanent form in that document and its supplement, the TOSEFTA.

MISHNE TORAH \məsh-'ne-tō-'rä\, extensive commentary on the TALMUD, composed in the 12th century by MOSES MAIMONIDES. In 14 volumes it deals with ethical conduct, civil laws, torts, marriage and divorce, and gifts to the poor.

Maimonides attempted to make the Mishne Torah accessible to as many readers as possible and intended it to combine religious law and philosophy in a way that would teach as well as prescribe conduct. Readers are encouraged to probe into the rationale underlying the laws. Like the Talmud that is its base, the Mishne Torah contains instruction in secular subjects, such as physics, astronomy, dietetics, and psychology.

MISSION, in CHRISTIANITY, organized effort for the propagation of the Christian faith.

During the early years, Christianity expanded through the communities of the Jewish dispersion. PAUL, the prototype of all missionaries, undertook a series of journeys to evangelize much of Asia Minor and the chief Greek cities and was also active in Rome. Because of his work and that of other missionaries, the new religion spread rapidly along the trade routes of the Roman Empire. By about 500 CE the population of the Roman Empire was predominantly Christian.

The advance of Christianity slowed after 500 as the Roman Empire, with which it had become identified, began to disintegrate. In the 7th and 8th centuries, Arab invasions established ISLAM as the dominant religion in about half the area in which Christianity had been dominant. During this time, however, Celtic and British missionaries spread Christianity in western and northern Europe, while missionaries of the Greek church in Constantinople worked in eastern Europe and Russia. From about 950 to 1350 the conversion of Europe and Russia was completed. Missions to Islamic areas and to the Orient were begun.

The ROMAN CATHOLIC church, reformed and revitalized after the COUNCIL OF TRENT (1545–63), sent missionaries into the newly discovered and conquered territories of three Catholic empires: Spain, Portugal, and France. As a result, Christianity was established in Central and South America, in the Caribbean, and in the Philippines. JESUITS established missions in Japan, China, and India. Central direction to the whole vast enterprise was provided by the establishment at Rome in 1622 of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith. A radical new direction was given to the missions by the SECOND VATICAN COUNCIL (1962–65): missions were to be directed only to non-Christians; and, although the aim of conversion was not disavowed, the main approach was to be through dialogue.

The Protestant churches did not undertake foreign missions until the Protestant nations acquired colonies from the 16th to the 19th century. A great upsurge of Protestant mission activity developed in the 19th and early 20th centuries, and most denominations established official organizations for missions. Early missionary activities of the various denominations were often very competitive and even disruptive, but eventually a cooperative spirit developed that helped lead to the ecumenical movement. By the mid-20th century, as former colonies won independence, the new states sharply restricted mission activities, often forbidding such efforts as conversions and permitting only nonproselytizing educational and medical service.

MITHRA \mē-'trā, -'thrā; 'mith-rə\, also spelled Mithras, Sanskrit Mitra, in ancient Indo-Iranian mythology, god of light and protector of OATHS, whose cult spread from India in the east to as far west as Spain, Great Britain, and Germany. The first written mention of the Vedic MITRA dates to 1400 BCE. His worship spread to Persia and, after the defeat of the Persians by Alexander the Great, throughout the Hellenic world. In the 3rd and 4th centuries CE, the cult of Mithra, carried and supported by the soldiers of the Roman Empire, was the chief rival to early CHRISTIANITY. In 307 Diocletian consecrated a temple on the Danube River to Mithra, "Protector of the Empire."

MITHRAISM \'mith-rə-, -i-zəm, -rā-\, worship of MITHRA, the Iranian god of the sun, justice, contract, and war in pre-Zoroastrian Iran. After the acceptance of CHRISTIANITY by the emperor CONSTANTINE in the early 4th century, Mithraism rapidly declined.

Before ZOROASTER (6th century BCE or earlier), the Iranians had a polytheistic religion, and Mithra was the most important of their gods. He was the god of contract and mutual obligation, and in some Indian Vedic texts the god MITRA

(the Indo-Aryan cognate of Mithra) appears as a common noun meaning both "friend" and "contract." In short, Mithra, called the Mediator, may signify any kind of communication between people and whatever establishes good relations between them. Mithra was also the god of the sun that beholds everything, and, hence, was invoked in OATHS. The Greeks and Romans considered Mithra a sun god. He was the god of mutual obligation between the king and his warriors, and, hence, the god of war. He was also the god of justice, which was guaranteed by the king.

The most important Mithraic ceremony was the sacrifice of a bull. In an Indian text Mitra reluctantly participates in the sacrifice of a god named Soma, who often appears in the shape of a white bull or of the moon. On the Roman monuments, Mithra sacrifices the white bull, who is then transformed into the moon. In the Achaemenid period, however, Zoroastrian abhorrence of sacrifice had come to predominate, and the sacrifice of the bull is never mentioned.

The worship of Mithra in Persia disappears after Alexander the Great conquered the Persian Empire about 330 BCE, but the kings and nobles of the border region between the Greco-Roman and the Iranian world still worshiped him, as did the kings of Commagene (southeast of Turkey). From 136 CE onward, there are hundreds of dedicatory inscriptions to Mithra in the Roman Empire. Roman Mithraism seems to have been encouraged by the emperors, especially Commodus (180–192), Septimius Severus (193–211), and Caracalla (211–217). Most adherents of Mithra known from inscriptions are soldiers, officials in the service of the emperor, imperial slaves, and freedmen.

In 307 CE, in a dedication from Carnuntum (at the Danube, near Vienna), Diocletian and his colleagues dedicated an altar to Mithra, as the patron of their empire (fautori imperii sui). But after 312, when the Christian convert Constantine ascended the throne, the dedications to Mithra ceased, even though there was no immediate public interdiction of Mithraic ceremonies.

Mithraic mythology is not known but may be reconstructed along the following lines. The sun god sent his messenger, the raven, to Mithra and ordered him to sacrifice the bull. Mithra executed the order reluctantly; in many reliefs he is seen turning aside his face in sorrow. But at the very moment of the death of the bull, it was metamorphosed into the moon; the cloak of Mithra was transformed into the sky and stars; from the tail of the bull and from his blood sprang the first ears of grain and the grape; from the genitals of the animal ran the holy seed into a mixing bowl. Every creature on earth was shaped with an admixture of the holy seed. With the bull's death and the creation of the world, the struggle between GOOD AND EVIL began. The four elements (air, fire, earth, and water) came into being, and from them all things were created. After the sacrifice, Mithra and the sun god banqueted together. Then Mithra mounted the chariot of the sun god and drove with him across the ocean, through the air to the end of the world.

MITNAGGED \,mēt-nä-'ged\ (Hebrew: Opponent), plural Mitnaggedim \,mēt-nä-gə-'dēm\, member of a group of tradition-minded Jews who vigorously opposed the 18th-century Hasidic movement (see HASIDISM). Under the leadership of ELIJAH BEN SOLOMON, called the Vilna Gaon, the Mitnaggedim excommunicated all Hasidic groups from Orthodox Jewish communities, accusing them of espousing PANTHEISM and severely criticizing them for establishing independent SYNAGOGUES with Sephardic liturgy. The Mitnaggedim were further incensed that Hasidic religious leaders (zaddikim) were looked upon as mediators between man and God and that undue emphasis on religious emotionalism undermined the traditional authority of the RABBIS by downgrading serious study of the TORAH. The controversy subsided in the 19th century.

MITRA \'mi-trə\, in the pantheon of Vedic HINDUISM, one of the gods in the category of Ādityas, or sovereign principles of the universe.

Mitra represents friendship, integrity, harmony, and all else that is important in the successful maintenance of order in human existence. He is usually paired with the god VARUNA, the guardian of the cosmic order, whose powers he complements. As spirit of the day he is sometimes attributed with solar characteristics.

MITZVAH \mēts-'vā, 'mits-və\ (Hebrew: "commandment"), plural mitzvot, any commandment, ordinance, law, or statute contained in the TORAH and, for that reason, to be observed by all practicing Jews.

The TALMUD mentions 613 mitzvahs, 248 mandatory (mitzwot 'ase) and 365 prohibitive (mitzwot lo ta'ase). Many more have been added on the authority of outstanding rabbinical leaders, such as reciting the HALLEL (specific psalms) at prescribed times, reading the Book of Esther on PURIM, and lighting candles on certain festivals. Not all mitzvahs are of equal importance; CIRCUMCISION, for instance, is a direct response to a divine command, while the wearing of a skullcap (yarmulke) in public is not. In a broader context, all good deeds are the fulfillment of mitzvahs, for such actions express God's will.

MJOLLNIR \'myəl-nir, 'myöl-\, Old Norse Mjöllnir, in GERMANIC RELIGION, the hammer of the god THOR and the symbol of his power. Thor used the hammer, forged by dwarfs, as a weapon and as an instrument to hallow people and things. Mjöllnir was stolen by the giant THRYM, who asked as ransom the hand of the goddess FREYJA. When Freyja refused to go to Thrym, Thor masqueraded as her and succeeded in grabbing the hammer, which had been brought out to consecrate him as Thrym's bride. Thor then slaughtered Thrym and the other giants with the hammer.

MLECCHA \'mlā-chə, mə-'lā-\ (Sanskrit: "babbling"), people of foreign extraction. In ancient India, the term was used by the ARYANS to indicate the uncouth and incomprehensible speech of foreigners; it later extended to their unfamiliar behavior. As a mleccha, any foreigner stood completely outside the CASTE system and the ritual ambience. Thus, historically, contact with them was viewed by caste Hindus as polluting.

MNEMOSYNE \ni-'mä-sə,-nē, -zə-\, in GREEK RELIGION, goddess of memory. She was the daughter of OURANUS and GAIA and, according to Hesiod, the mother (by ZEUS) of the nine MUSES. After the Olympians defeated the TITANS, they asked Zeus to create divinities who were capable of celebrating their victory. Zeus then went to Pieria and slept with Mnemosyne nine consecutive nights, after which she gave birth to the Muses.

MNEVIS \'mne-vis\, also called Menuis \'men-wis\, in ancient EGYPTIAN RELIGION, sacred bull deity worshiped at HELIOPOLIS. As one of several sacred bulls in Egypt, he was most closely associated with the sun god Re-Atum. Although not attested until later, the cult of Mnevis probably dated to the 1st dynasty (c. 2925–c. 2775 BCE), if not earlier. The Mnevis bull was either black or piebald in color, and in sculptures and paintings he was represented with a solar disc between his horns.

MOABITE \'mō-ə,-bit\, member of a West-Semitic people who lived in the highlands east of the Dead Sea (now in west-central Jordan) and flourished in the 9th century BCE. The Moabites' culture is dated from about the late 14th century BCE to 582 BCE, when, according to the Jewish historian FLAVIUS JOSEPHUS (1st century CE), they were conquered by the Babylonians. The Moabite language differed only dialectally from Hebrew, and Moabite culture and religion (centered around the god CHEMOSH) were very closely related to those of the Israelites.

In OLD TESTAMENT accounts (e.g., GENESIS 19:30–38), the Moabites' ancestral founder was Moab, a son of Lot, who was a nephew of ABRAHAM. The Moabites were in conflict with the Israelites from the 13th century. King SAUL of Israel in the 11th century fought against the Moabites (1 Samuel 14:47), who later granted asylum to the family of the young rebel and future king DAVID (1 Samuel 22:3–4). David in turn fought against the Moabites and forced them to pay tribute (2 Samuel 8:2). David's great-grandmother, Ruth, was a Moabite (Ruth 4:17–22), and his son SOLOMON obtained Moabite princesses for his harem (1 Kings 11:1–8) and erected near Jerusalem a shrine dedicated to Chemosh.

King Omri of Israel (reigned c. 884–c. 872 BCE), who is mentioned in 1 Kings 16:23–28, reconquered Moabite lands that had been lost since Solomon's death in 922 BCE. Omri's reconquest is known from the Moabite Stone, a stela that the Moabite king Mesha (fl. c. 870 BCE) erected about 40 years later in the city of Dibon (modern Dhiban, Jordan). The stone's text of 34 lines, written in a Canaanite alphabet similar to contemporary Hebrew, ascribes the renewed Israelite domination over Moab to the anger of Chemosh. Mesha then describes his own successful rebellion against Israel, which probably occurred during the reign of Omri's successor, AHAB. Moab was a tributary of Assyria by the late 8th century BCE, and after their conquest by the Babylonians the Moabites disappeared from history.

MODERNISM, ROMAN CATHOLIC movement in the last decade of the 19th century and first decade of the 20th that sought to interpret Catholic teaching in the light of 19th-century philosophical, historical, and psychological theories and called for freedom of conscience.

Influenced by non-Catholic biblical scholars, Modernists contended that the writers of the Old and the New Testaments were conditioned by their times and that there had been an evolution in the history of biblical religion. Modernism reflected a reaction against the increasing centralization of church authority in the POPE and the papal bureaucracy.

In France the movement was associated with Alfred Firmin Loisy, who was dismissed in 1893 from his teaching post at the Institut Catholique in Paris for his views on the OLD TESTAMENT. These views, expressed in La Religion d'Israël (1900; "The Religion of Israel"), and his theories on the Gospels in Études évangéliques (1902; "Studies in the Gospels") were condemned by the archbishop of Paris. In England George Tyrrell, an Irish-born JESUIT priest, was dismissed from his teaching post and from the Jesuits for his views on PAPAL INFALLIBILITY and for a doctrine that minimized the intellectual element of revelation, thus contradicting the teachings of the FIRST VATICAN COUNCIL (1869–70). In Italy and Germany modernist writings meshed with the desire for reform of church institutions.

The reaction of Rome included the suspension or EXCOMMUNICATION of certain priests and scholars associated with the movement, the placement of written works on the INDEX OF FORBIDDEN BOOKS, the establishment in 1903 by Pope LEO XIII of the Pontifical Biblical Commission to monitor the work of SCRIPTURE scholars, and the condemnation of Modernism in the papal ENCYCLICAL Pascendi Dominici Gregis (1907) and in the decree Lamentabili Sane Exitu of the Roman Curia's Holy Office. In order to ensure enforcement, the priest-scholar Umberto Benigni organized an unofficial group of censors who would report on those thought to be teaching condemned doctrine. This group, known as Integralists (or Sodalitium Pianum, "Sodality of Pius"), employed overzealous and clandestine methods that ultimately hindered the combating of Modernism. In 1908 PIUS X admitted that Modernism was a dead issue, but in 1910, at the urging of Benigni, he decreed that teachers in seminaries and clerics before their ORDINATION must take an OATH denouncing Modernism.

MODERNIZATION, term used to describe changes in a society usually resulting from industrialization, economic growth, social mobility, literacy, national unification, and broadening of the franchise.

In the works of Sir Henry Maine, Ferdinand Tönnies, and MAX WEBER, modernization is understood as a process based on rational choice, self-interest, and the concept of individualism. They view modernization as necessarily involving the increased prevalence of rationality (i.e., means-end reasoning), secularization, and the decline of religion. Religious belief and practice are often viewed as the opposite of, or an obstacle to, modernization. Critical evaluations of the concept have led many scholars to challenge its inherent evolutionary assumptions, while others have objected to its apparent Western or Eurocentric bias. The rise of modern religious movements also seems to undermine the assumption that modernization leads to secularization.

MO'ED \mō-'ād\ (Hebrew: "Festival"), second of the six major divisions, or orders (SEDARIM), of the MISHNAH, which was completed early in the 3rd century CE by JUDAH HA-NASI. Mo'ed deals with the observance of religious holidays and consists of 12 tractates: Shabbat ("Sabbath"), Erubin ("Blendings"), Pesaḥim ("Paschal Lambs"), Sheqalim ("Shekels"), Yoma ("The Day"; i.e., YOM KIPPUR), Sukka ("Booth"), Betza ("Egg"), Rosh Hashanah ("New Year"), Ta'anit ("Fast"), Megilla ("Scroll"), Mo'ed qatan ("Minor Festival"), and Ḥagiga ("Festival Offering").

MOGGALIPUTTATIṢṢA \'mō-gə-lē-,pū-tə-'ti-sə\, president of the third Buddhist council (c. 250 BCE) and author of the Kathāvattu ("Points of Controversy"). The Kathāvattu is a series of questions from a non-THERAVĀDA point of view, together with a set of refutations; the first chapter debates the existence of the soul. Moggaliputtatissa is credited with ordaining AŚOKA's son Mahinda into the SANGHA (community of believers) and with organizing Buddhist missions sent to regions adjacent to India following the third council. He is said to have died at the age of 80 in the 26th year of Aśoka's reign.

MOGILA, PETER \mə-'gē-lə\, Romanian Petru Movilă, Ukrainian Petro Mohyla (b. Dec. 21, 1596, Moldavia [now in Romania]—d. Dec. 22, 1646, Kiev, Pol. [now in Ukraine]), Moldavian Orthodox monk, theologian, METROPOLITAN of Kiev, and author of The Orthodox Confession of Faith (1640).

Mogila migrated to the Polish Ukraine and was educated in JESUIT schools in Poland. He entered the Monastery of the Caves at Kiev in 1625 and was made its superior in 1627. Elected metropolitan of Kiev in 1633, he sought to improve the education of his clergy and laity at a time when ROMAN CATHOLIC and PROTESTANT missionaries were active among the Orthodox of Poland and Ukraine. In the same year he turned the theological college of the Kiev monastery into a school of humanities and theology and enlisted a Western-trained faculty for it. The academy became the source of a theological revival in the Russian Orthodox church, and its influence was felt until the late 19th century. Mogila also obtained the Polish king's acknowledgment of the rights of the Orthodox church in Polish territory.

To bring order to Orthodox theology in its controversy with the Roman and Protestant churches, Mogila composed The Orthodox Profession of Faith. It was approved by the four Eastern PATRIARCHS and by the SYNOD of Jerusalem in 1672. It remains one of the primary outlines of EASTERN ORTHODOXY.

MOHAMMED, WARITH DEEN, original name Wallace D. Muhammad (b. Oct. 30, 1933, Detroit, Michigan, U.S.), American religious leader, son and successor of ELIJAH MUHAMMAD as head of the NATION OF ISLAM.

As a boy, Mohammed received religious training in the tradition of the Nation. Although he had registered as a conscientious objector with the Selective Service, he refused, at his father's insistence, to accept alternative service, and in 1961 he was sentenced to prison for draft evasion. Although devoted to his father, Mohammed gradually moved toward orthodox ISLAM. He left the Nation in 1963 over theological differences. He rejoined the following year but was excommunicated in 1969 and in 1971. Rejoining in 1974, he became leader of the movement when his father died in 1975. Mohammed reformulated the Nation's teachings, rejecting the beliefs that white people were "blue-eyed devils" and that Elijah Muhammad was a prophet. Mohammed changed the organization's name to the World Community of al-Islam in the West in 1976, then to the American Muslim Mission in 1978, and finally to the Muslim American Society in 1985; he changed his own name to Warith Deen Mohammed. In 1981 a dissident minority led by LOUIS FARRAKHAN split from Mohammed and reestablished the Nation of Islam according to the precepts of Elijah Muhammad. Relations between Mohammed and Farrakhan improved in the early 21st century.

MOKOŠ \ˈmō-kōsh, mō-ˈkōsh\, also spelled Mokosh, goddess of life-giving in ancient Slavic mythology. She is the only female deity in the Old Kievan pantheon of 980 CE; she has survived in East Slavic folk beliefs as Mokoša, or Mokuša. A tall woman with a large head and long arms, she spins flax and wool at night and shears sheep. Her name is connected with spinning, plaiting, and moisture.

MOKṢA \ˈmōk-shə\, also spelled moksha, also called mukti, or apavarga (Sanskrit: "release"), in HINDUISM and JAINISM, the ultimate spiritual goal, consisting of the individual soul's release from the bonds of transmigration. The soul remains trapped in a chain of rebirths (SAMŚĀRA) until it reaches enlightenment, which allows it release. Most schools consider mokṣa to be the highest purpose in life.

MOLCHO, SOLOMON \ˈmōl-kō\, original name Diogo Pires \ˈpē-rish\ (b. c. 1500, Portugal—d. 1532, Mantua [Italy]), martyr who announced the MESSIAH.

Born to Marrano parents (Iberian Jews forced to become Christians), Pires was royal secretary in a high court of justice when an Arabian adventurer, DAVID REUBENI, arrived in Portugal. Pires became possessed by mystic visions and was convinced that Reubeni was an augur of the Jewish messiah. Reubeni, claiming to be the brother of an Arabian Jewish king, had asked the Portuguese king to arm a Jewish army that would drive the Turks out of Palestine.

Pires circumcised himself, took the name Solomon Molcho, and approached Reubeni but was rebuffed. Molcho then went to Salonika, Tur., where he joined some Qabbalists, preached that the messiah would arise in 1540, and published several sermons. After a stay in Palestine, he went to Rome (1529), where he accurately predicted a flood in the city (1530) and an earthquake in Portugal (1531).

In the meantime, Reubeni also had come to Rome. In 1532 he and Molcho went to Regensburg, Ger., to persuade Emperor Charles V to arm the Marranos against the Turks. Instead, Charles turned them over to the INQUISITION in Mantua. Forced to choose between returning to CHRISTIANITY and death, Molcho chose the latter and was burned at the stake. Reubeni died in prison, probably by poisoning.

MOLINOS, MIGUEL DE \mō-ˈlē-nōs\ (b. June 29, 1628, Muniesa, Spain—d. Dec. 28, 1696, Rome, Papal States [Italy]), Spanish priest condemned for advocating an extreme form of QUIETISM.

Ordained in 1652, Molinos was sent to Rome in 1663. In 1675 he published his Spiritual Guide, which taught that Christian perfection is achieved by contemplation and divine assistance. Molinos believed that humans must banish their wills so that God's will can work in them.

The Guide caused a sensation. In 1685, at the height of Molinos' influence and when his friend Innocent XI was pope, Molinos was arrested by the papal police, tried, and sentenced to life imprisonment for HERESY. Some 20,000 of his letters were examined, and he and numerous witnesses were interrogated, resulting in the condemnation (1687) by Innocent of 68 propositions embodying Molinos' doctrine.

MOLOCH \ˈmō-lōk, -lāk; ˈmä-lək\, also spelled Molech \ˈmō-lek, -lek\, Middle Eastern deity, mentioned in the OLD TESTAMENT, to whom child sacrifices were made. The name derives from combining the consonants of the Hebrew melech ("king") with the vowels of boshet ("shame"), the latter often being used in the Old Testament as a variant name for the god BAAL.

The laws given to Moses stated, "You shall not give any of your children to devote them by fire to Moloch, and so profane the name of your God" (Leviticus 18:21). Later, kings AHAZ (2 Kings 16:3) and MANASSEH (2 Kings 21:6) worshipped Moloch at Topheth, outside the walls of Jerusalem. This site flourished under Manasseh's son King Amon but was destroyed during the reign of JOSIAH, the reformer. "And he defiled Topheth, which is in the valley of the sons of Hinnom, that no one might burn his son or his daughter as an offering to Moloch" (2 Kings 23:10).

Scholars now debate whether the Hebrews initiated their children to Moloch by fire or whether the law is a prohibition against the possibility that they might do so. Some archaeologists and historians question the existence of a cult of Moloch, believing this deity to be a creation of the Old Testament authors.

MONARCHIANISM \mō-ˈnär-kē-ə-,ni-zəm, mə-\, Christian HERESY that developed during the 2nd and 3rd centuries. It opposed the doctrine of an independent, personal subsistence of the LOGOS, affirmed the sole deity of God the Father, and thus represented the extreme monotheistic view. Though it regarded Christ as Redeemer, it clung to the numerical unity of the Deity. Two types of Monarchianism developed: the Dynamic (or Adoptionist; see ADOPTIONISM) and the Modalistic (or Sabellian).

Dynamic Monarchianism held that Christ was merely human, miraculously conceived, but constituted the Son of God simply by the degree in which he had been filled with divine wisdom and power. This view was taught at Rome about the end of the 2nd century by Theodotus, who was excommunicated by Pope Victor, and taught somewhat later by Artemon, who was excommunicated by Pope Zephyrinus. About 260 it was again taught by Paul of Samosata. It is the belief of many modern Unitarians.

Modalistic Monarchianism maintained that the names Father and Son were only different designations of the same subject, the one God, who "with reference to the relations in which He had previously stood to the world is called the Father, but in reference to His appearance in humanity is called the Son." It was taught by Praxeas, a priest from Asia Minor, in Rome c. 206 and was opposed by TERTULLIAN in the tract Adversus Praxean (c. 213), an important contribution to the doctrine of the TRINITY.

MONASTICISM, institutionalized religious movement whose members attempt to practice works that are above and beyond those required of both the laity and the leadership of their religions. Generally celibate and universally ascetic, the monastic individual separates himself or herself from general society either by living as a HERMIT or anchorite (religious recluse) or by joining a society of others who profess similar intentions. Although first applied to Christian groups, the term monasticism is now used to denote similar, though not identical, practices in such religions as BUDDHISM, HINDUISM, JAINISM, and TAOISM.

Christian monasticism. The earliest Christian monastic communities were founded in the deserts of Egypt. The tradition of the Desert Fathers is best represented by the hermit ST. ANTHONY OF EGYPT (c. 250–355?), who organized his followers into primitive monastic communities early in the 4th century. These Egyptian monks and holy women led lives of extreme ASCETICISM, renouncing family ties, sexual relations, and possessions and practicing continual prayer. The goal of this way of life was the achievement of personal salvation or union with God through a constant spiritual battle with temptation. ST. BASIL THE GREAT (c. 329–379), with his sister Macrina the Younger (327–379), founded two communities on their family estate in Cappadocia, one for men and one for women. Basil espoused a less severe, though still strict, ascetic life in a community headed by an ABBESS or ABBOT, dedicated to service to society rather than complete withdrawal from it.

Monasticism spread quickly throughout the Byzantine Empire in the 4th through the 7th century and was established in Kiev in 1050 and in Moscow by 1354. Organized monastic life was slower to move westward into Europe. When it did arrive in the West in the 5th century, it was adopted in a modified form by ST. AUGUSTINE of Hippo and others as a way of life for the clerics of the bishop's household and the orders of female virgins. Egyptian ascetic discipline was followed more closely by numerous individual ascetics and hermits in Gaul, where it found a focus and leader in ST. MARTIN, bishop of Tours (c. 316–397). From his monastic complex of Marmoutier, evangelists went out in every direction. In particular, Gallic monasticism took root in Ireland, where it developed a high literary culture and colonized the western isles and the Celtic fringe of Britain.

The greatest legislator of Latin monasticism was ST. BENEDICT of Nursia (c. 480–c. 547), who composed a rule for his monks at Monte Cassino in Italy which sets forth the pre-eminence of the cenobitic form of monasticism, the authority of the abbot, moderation of ascetic practices, and the importance of the divine office (services of prayers and HYMNS) scheduled throughout the day and night. BENEDICTINE monks and nuns, as those who followed St. Benedict's rule came to be called, made three vows upon entrance into the monastery: obedience, stability within that monastery, and conversio, a change of habit. Traditionally understood as part of conversio are the vows of poverty and chastity. The rule gradually supplanted other rules.

Throughout the Middle Ages monasticism played vital roles in society: the propagation of CHRISTIANITY, the development of the authority of the Roman bishop, and the conservation and augmentation of learning. In its most prosperous years monasticism was a powerful economic and cultural force. Upon the founding of the MENDICANT orders (DOMINICANS and FRANCISCANS) and the flowering of the universities in the 13th century, traditional monasticism began to decline in cultural importance. A revival of interest in monasticism in the 19th century led to the establishment of numerous Roman Catholic, Eastern Orthodox, Anglican, and some Protestant communities, as well as ecumenical groups such as the Taizé community in France.

Eastern religions. In the Eastern religions the earliest type of monk was probably the solitary or hermit. Śramaṇas (Sanskrit: "recluse") may already have existed before c. 1500 BCE in some of the earliest proto-Dravidian or pre-Aryan settlements in India. In early Hindu times (c. 600–200 BCE) there were hermits who lived in groups (ASHRAMS) although they did not lead a strictly organized communal life. In Jainism, perhaps the first religion that can properly be said to have had an organized monastic life, monasticism seems to have evolved from the communities of ashrams. MAHĀVĪRA, its reputed founder, organized his followers into groups of monks and nuns, who were fully professed, and laity, who saw to their needs and kept a less rigorous rule. Later the Jains split into two sects, and one of these, the DIGAMBARAS, disallowed nuns.

In Buddhism the ascetic community is called the SAN-GHA. Buddhists generally observe a moderate rule, avoiding the two extremes of self-indulgence and self-immolation. Like the Jains, the Buddhists ignore CASTE distinctions. Originally monks and laity were closely associated, a tradition which has continued in the THERAVĀDA Buddhist countries of Southeast Asia. The number of Buddhist nuns has never been large; indeed, the BUDDHA GOTAMA is said to have been very reluctant to allow women to form communities, but many joined them anyway. They lived apart from the monks and were always considered inferior to them. The ZEN Buddhist movement attempted a return to the original austerity of early monastic communities, stressing frugality of diet, simplicity of dress, and the duty of monastics to work as well as to meditate. See also CENOBITIC MONASTICISM; IDIORRHYTHMIC MONASTICISM.

MONGKUT \,mŏŋ-'küt\, also called Phrachomkiao \,prä-'kôm-'klau\, posthumous name Rama IV \'rä-'mä\ (b. Oct. 18, 1804, Bangkok, Siam [now Thailand]—d. Oct. 15, 1868, Bangkok), king of Siam (1851–68) who opened his country to Western influence and initiated reforms and modern development.

Mongkut's father, King Rama II, died in 1824, and when his half brother was selected to reign as King Phranangkiao (Rama III) Mongkut became a Buddhist monk. He became an accomplished scholar and ABBOT of a Bangkok monastery, which he made a center of intellectual discourse. The reformed BUDDHISM that Mongkut developed gradually grew into the Thammayut order, which to the present day is at the intellectual center of Thai Buddhism.

Mongkut succeeded to the throne when King Rama III died in 1851 and set about establishing closer relations with the West. Thai concessions staved off Western imperial pressure for another generation and brought rapid economic development, but Siam had to concede extraterritoriality and limits on its taxing and tariff policies. Mongkut's shrewd foreign policy, coupled with his tolerance and open-mindedness, proved far more effective in dealing with Western imperialists than the xenophobia and isolationism of some of his neighboring rulers. For a time the royal household employed an English governess, Anna Leonowens, whose published reminiscences made Mongkut the model for the king in a 20th-century musical comedy, The King and I.

In his own reign Mongkut was unable to achieve fundamental internal reforms, but he took pains to ensure the liberal education of his sons, who in the next generation would begin the MODERNIZATION of Siam.

MONK, man who separates himself from society and lives either alone (a HERMIT or anchorite) or in an organized community in order to devote himself full-time to religious life. See MONASTICISM.

MONO NO AWARE \'mō-nō-nō-'ä-wä-,re\ (Japanese: "sensitivity to the sadness of things"), a phrase coined in the late 18th century by MOTOORI NORINAGA. Norinaga felt the phrase summed up the essence of Japanese art and literature, expressing a touching intimation of transience.

MONOPHYSITE \mə-'nä-fə-,sīt\, in CHRISTIANITY, one who believed that JESUS CHRIST'S nature is single and "theanthropic," that is, divine and human, rather than manifesting two distinct natures, divine and human in one person, as asserted at the COUNCIL OF CHALCEDON in 451. In the development of Christian doctrine during the 4th, 5th, and 6th centuries, several divergent traditions had arisen. Chalcedon adopted a decree declaring that Christ was to be "acknowledged in two natures, without being mixed, transmuted, divided, or separated." This formulation was directed in part against the NESTORIAN doctrine that the two natures in Christ had remained separate and in part against the position of the monk Eutyches, who taught that, after the INCARNATION, Christ had only one nature and that, therefore, the humanity of the incarnate Christ was not of the same substance as that of other men. Political and ecclesiastical rivalries as well as theology played a role in the decision of Chalcedon to depose and excommunicate the PATRIARCH of Alexandria, Dioscorus (d. 454). The church that supported Dioscorus and insisted that his teaching was consistent with the orthodox doctrine of ST. CYRIL of Alexandria was labeled Monophysite. Most modern scholars agree that Severus as well as Dioscorus probably diverged from what was defined as orthodoxy more in their emphasis upon the intimacy of the union between divine and human in Christ than in any denial that the humanity of Christ and that of humanity are consubstantial.

In modern times, those churches usually classified as Monophysite (the Armenian Apostolic, Coptic Orthodox, Ethiopian Orthodox, and Syrian Orthodox) are generally accepted by ROMAN CATHOLICISM, EASTERN ORTHODOXY, and PROTESTANTISM as essentially orthodox in their doctrine of the person of Jesus Christ, and various joint memoranda of agreement to that effect have been issued.

MONOTHEISM, belief in the existence of one god, or in the oneness of God. As such, monotheism is distinguished from POLYTHEISM, the belief in the existence of many gods, and from ATHEISM, or the belief that there is no god. Monotheism characterizes the traditions of JUDAISM, CHRISTIANITY, and ISLAM.

In the three great monotheistic religions, the essence and character of God are believed to be unique and fundamentally different from those of gods found in other religions. God is viewed as the creator of the world and of humanity. Moreover, he has not abandoned his creation but continues to lead it through his power and wisdom. God has created not only the natural world but also the ethical order to which humanity ought to conform. God is holy and is the source of the highest good. Such a monotheistic belief system results in the rejection of all other belief systems as false religions, and this rejection partly explains the exceptionally aggressive or intolerant stance of monotheistic religions throughout history.

Evidence in Hebrew SCRIPTURES indicates that the ancient Israelites practiced monolatry (i.e., the worship of one god without denying the existence of other gods). However, Israel's rejection of other gods makes it more appropriate to label the developed religion of Israel as monotheistic, and thus also the hellenistic and RABBINIC JUDAISM that developed from it. Islamic monotheism is more literal and uncompromising than that of any other religion. ALLĀH is confessed as being one, eternal, unbegotten, unequaled, and beyond partnership of any kind.

The Trinitarian creed of Christianity, on the other hand, sets it apart from the two other traditions. The Christian BIBLE invokes the name of the Father, Son, and HOLY SPIRIT in triadic liturgical formulas; from this the early church, in reflecting upon the reality of God as related to Jesus, developed a theological language about the TRINITY, speaking of three Persons that are one in substance.

MONSIGNOR, Italian monsignore, title of honor in the ROMAN CATHOLIC church, borne by persons of ecclesiastical rank. All those who bear the title of monsignor belong to the "papal family" and are entitled to be present in the Cappella Pontificia (when the pope celebrates solemn MASS). The ecclesiastics who have a right to the title of monsignor include PATRIARCHS, archbishops, and bishops.

MONT \ˈmɒnt\, also spelled Montu, Monthu \ˈmɒn-tü\, or Mentu \ˈmen-tü\, in ancient EGYPTIAN RELIGION, god of the 4th Upper Egyptian nome (province), whose original capital of HERMONTIS (modern Armant) was replaced by Thebes during the 11th dynasty (2081–1939 BCE). Mont was a god of war. In addition to falcons, a bull was his sacred animal; from the 30th dynasty (380–343 BCE), this bull, the BUCHIS bull, received an elaborate cult. Mont was represented as a man with a falcon's head, wearing a crown of two plumes with a double uraeus (rearing cobra) on his forehead. He had important temple complexes at Karnak in Thebes and at Hermonthis, Al-Ṭūd, and Al-Mādamūd.

MONTANISM \ˈmæn-tə-ni-zəm\, also called Cataphrygian heresy, or New Prophecy, a heretical movement founded by the prophet MONTANUS that arose in the Christian church in Phrygia, Asia Minor, in the 2nd century. Subsequently it flourished for a time in the West. The chief sources for the history of the movement are EUSEBIUS' Historia ecclesiastica (Ecclesiastical History), the writings of TERTULLIAN and EPIPHANIUS, and inscriptions, particularly those in central Phrygia.

The essential principle of Montanism was that the Paraclete, the Spirit of truth, was manifesting himself to the world through Montanus and the prophets associated with him. This did not seem at first to deny the doctrines of the church or to attack the authority of the bishops. But Montanists induced a kind of ecstatic intensity and a state of passivity and then maintained that the words they spoke were the voice of the Spirit. It became clear that the claim of Montanus to have the final revelation of the HOLY SPIRIT implied that something could be added to the teaching of JESUS CHRIST and the APOSTLES and that, therefore, the church had to accept a fuller revelation.

Another important aspect of Montanism was the expectation of the SECOND COMING of Christ, which was believed to be imminent. The Montanists believed the heavenly Jerusalem was soon to descend on the earth in a plain between the two villages of Pepuza and Tymion in Phrygia. The prophets and many followers went there to await the arrival of Christ, and many Christian communities were almost abandoned.

In addition to prophetic enthusiasm, Montanism taught a legalistic moral rigorism. The time of fasting was lengthened, followers were forbidden to flee martyrdom, marriage was discouraged, and second marriages prohibited.

After the bishops of Asia Minor excommunicated the Montanists, probably c. 177, Montanism became a separate sect with its seat of government at Pepuza. It maintained the ordinary Christian ministry but added to it higher orders of PATRIARCHS and associates who were probably successors of the first Montanist prophets. It continued in the East until severe legislation against Montanism by EMPEROR JUSTINIAN I (reigned 527–565) essentially destroyed it, but remnants evidently survived into the 9th century.

The earliest record of any knowledge of Montanism in the West dates from 177, and 25 years later there was a group of Montanists in Rome. It was in Carthage in Africa, however, that the sect became important. There, its most illustrious convert was Tertullian, who became interested in Montanism c. 206 and finally left the CATHOLIC church in 212–213. He primarily supported the moral rigorism of the movement against what he considered the moral laxity of the Catholic bishops. Montanism had almost died out in the 5th and 6th centuries, although some evidence indicates that it survived into the 9th century.

MONTANUS \mæn-ˈtā-nəs\ (fl. 2nd century), founder of MONTANISM, a heretical movement of CHRISTIANITY in Asia Minor and North Africa from the 2nd to the 9th centuries.

Little is known about Montanus. Before his conversion to Christianity, he apparently was a priest of the cult of CYBELE. According to the 4th-century church historian EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA, Montanus c. 172–173 began prophesying in the region of Phrygia, now in central Turkey. He became the leader of a group of illuminati (“the enlightened”), including the prophetesses Priscilla (or Prisca) and Maximilla. Convinced that the end of the world was at hand, Montanus laid down a rigoristic morality to purify Christians and detach them from their material desires. Official criticism of Montanus and his movement emphasized the new prophecy's unorthodox expression and neglect of the bishops' divinely appointed rule.

MOODY, DWIGHT L(YMAN) \ˈmü-dē\ (b. Feb. 5, 1837, East Northfield, Mass., U.S.—d. Dec. 22, 1899, Northfield, Mass.), prominent American evangelist who set the pattern for later evangelism in large cities.

Moody left his mother's farm at 17 to work in Boston and there was converted to fundamentalist evangelicalism. In 1856 he moved to Chicago, where he worked with the Young Men's Christian Association (YMCA; 1861–73), was president of the Chicago YMCA, founded the Moody Church, and worked among the poor.

In 1870 he met Ira D. Sankey, a HYMN writer, and with him became noted for contributing to the growth of the “gospel hymn.” They made extended evangelical tours in Great Britain (1873–75, 1881–84). Moody deplored divisive sectarian doctrines, “higher criticism” of the BIBLE, the SOCIAL GOSPEL movement, and the theory of evolution. Instead he emphasized a literal interpretation of the Bible and looked toward the premillennial SECOND COMING.

Moody ardently supported various charities but felt that social problems could be solved only by divine regeneration. As well as conducting revivals, he directed annual Bible conferences at Northfield, Mass., where he founded a seminary for girls in 1879. In 1889 he founded the Chicago Bible Institute (now the Moody Bible Institute).

MOON, SUN MYUNG \ˈmün\ (b. Jan. 6, 1920, Kwangju Sangsa Ri, P'yongan-puk province, Korea), evangelist who in 1954 founded the Holy Spirit Association for the Unification of World Christianity, better known as the UNIFICATION CHURCH.

In his book The Divine Principle (1952), which is the basic SCRIPTURE of the church, Moon wrote that at the age of 16 he had a vision of JESUS CHRIST in which he was told to carry out Christ's unfinished task. Moon believed that God chose him to save mankind from SATANISM, and he regarded communists as Satan's representatives.

Moon began to preach his doctrines in Korea in 1946. Two years later he was excommunicated by the PRESBYTERIAN church, and shortly thereafter he was imprisoned by North Korean authorities. In 1950 he escaped—or was released—and fled to South Korea, where he founded what was to become the Unification Church. He built his Korean and Japanese enterprises, which included factories that produced armaments, paint, machinery, and ginseng tea, into a multimillion-dollar empire, and in the early 1970s he began full-scale missionary operations in the United States. As young disciples—popularly called Moonies—were drawn into the movement, Moon incurred widespread hostility from their parents, who believed that their children had been unfairly indoctrinated. Other controversies also mounted over the movement's fund-raising techniques, as well as over immigration issues and tax manipulation.

In 1973 Moon and his wife moved their headquarters to Tarrytown, N.Y., operating from there an international network of businesses. In 1981 the Unification Church's bid for U.S. tax-exempt status as a religious organization was denied when an appellate court ruled that the church's primary purpose was political. In 1982 Moon was convicted of tax evasion, sentenced to prison, and fined $25,000. Moon was released in 1985 and returned to Korea in 1988. The church experienced a resurgence in the 1990s, and he was active in Korea, the United States, Eastern Europe, and Russia. In the early 1990s, he undertook a 17-city tour of the United States.

MOON WORSHIP, adoration or veneration of the moon, a deity in the moon, or a personification or symbol of the moon. The cyclical process of disappearance and appearance of the moon is the basis of the widespread association of the moon with the land of the dead, the place to which souls ascend after death, and the power of rebirth.

The mythology of the moon emphasizes especially those periods when it disappears—the three days of darkness in the lunar cycle and eclipses. Both are usually interpreted as the result of battles between some monster who devours or slays the moon and who subsequently regurgitates or revives it. The interregnum is interpreted as an evil period necessitating strict TABOOS against beginning any new or creative period (e.g., planting or sexual intercourse). In some areas loud noises are part of a ritual activity designed to scare off the moon's assailant.

In hunting cultures the moon is frequently regarded as male and, particularly in regard to women, is understood as a preeminently evil or dangerous figure. In agricultural traditions the moon is usually regarded as female and is the benevolent ruler of the cyclical vegetative process.

MOORISH SCIENCE TEMPLE OF AMERICA, religious sect founded by Timothy Drew in Newark, N.J., in 1913. He was believed by his followers to have been ordained Prophet Noble Drew Ali by ALLĀH. A Holy Koran, the sacred text, was created out of his study of Oriental philosophy. The prophet's central teaching was that all Africans were of Moorish, and thus Muslim, origins. He advocated a return to ISLAM as the only means of redemption from racial oppression. Many of the sect's formal practices were derived from Muslim observance, and the group was a forerunner of the Black Muslim movement. Drew died mysteriously during a period of internal strife, and the sect lost its impetus.

MORALITY AND RELIGION, doctrine or system that defines conformity to ideals of right human conduct. Moral principles often have religious justification, but moral judgment is frequently understood to apply to any area of human conduct; for instance, the ROMAN CATHOLIC church not only prohibits contraception for its members, but by declaring it contrary to "the natural law" the church declares contraception to be universally wrong.

Because of their intimate relation to one another, the religious and the moral have often been conflated. The problem has been intensified by many attempts to interpret religion as essentially morality or merely as an incentive for doing one's duty. Immanuel Kant argued in the Critique of Practical Reason (1788) that the existence of God, though not directly provable, is a necessary postulate of the moral life. To take seriously the awareness of a categorical imperative to act rightly is to commit oneself to work for an ideal state of affairs in which perfect goodness and happiness coincide. But as apportioning of happiness to virtue is beyond human power, a divinity capable of bringing it about must be assumed.

Other Christian thinkers, particularly during the 19th and early 20th centuries, have developed the theme that to accept the absolute demands of ethical obligation is to presuppose that this is a morally structured universe; and that this in turn implies a personal God whose commands are reflected in the human conscience. It cannot be proved that this is such a universe, it is said, but it is inevitably assumed in acknowledging the claims of morality.

The basic criticism of all attempts to trace ethical obligation to a transcendent divine source has been that it is possible to account for morality without going beyond the human realm. It is argued that communal life requires agreed codes of behavior, which become internalized in the process of socialization as moral laws; and the natural affection that develops among humans produces the more occasional sense of a call to heroic self-sacrifice on behalf of others. It seems, then, that the moral arguments for divine existence do not rise to the level of strict proofs.

MORAL RE-ARMAMENT: see OXFORD MOVEMENT.

MORAVIAN CHURCH, Protestant Christian denomination founded in the 18th century but tracing its origin to the UNITAS FRATRUM ("Unity of Brethren") of the 15th-century HUSSITE movement in Bohemia and Moravia.

During the 16th and 17th centuries the Bohemian Brethren movement survived suppression by the COUNTER-REFORMATION and proscription by the Peace of Westphalia (1648) through the efforts of loyal adherents. The development of German PIETISM in the late 17th century increased the unrest among underground Protestants in nearby Moravia and Bohemia. A group of families adhering to the tradition of the Bohemian Brethren fled Moravia in 1722 and settled on Count Nikolaus Ludwig von Zinzendorf's estate in Saxony, where they founded Herrnhut. The village attracted a stream of exiles from Bohemia and Moravia, as well as Pietists from Germany and beyond.

With the count's help Herrnhut became the mother community of what came to be called the Moravian church and the center for a network of societies on the established Pietist pattern, working for the nurture of spiritual life within the state churches, mostly Lutheran, but also including some Reformed churches. This latter phase of Moravianism in Europe came to be known as the "diaspora," and its members far outnumbered those who belonged to the Moravian church as a denomination. The first diaspora evangelists began their itinerations in 1727, and the first foreign missionaries left Herrnhut to work among African slaves in the West Indies in 1732. Within two decades MISSIONS to Greenland, Suriname, South Africa, Algiers, and among the Native Americans followed.

Herrnhut developed a unique type of community in which civic and church life were integrated into a theocratic society, a prototype for about 20 settlements in Europe and America, including those in Bethlehem, Pa., and Salem [now Winston-Salem], N.C.). Fellowship groups, daily worship featuring both singing and instrumental music, boarding schools, and concentration on foreign missions and diaspora evangelism characterized these exclusive Moravian villages. They supported themselves and their projects by handicraft industries.

Each of the regional administrative units of the worldwide Moravian church is self-governing through its provincial synod with administration by a provincial elders' conference. All are linked by a general synod of elected representatives, meeting every 10 years, which is authoritative in all matters of doctrine and constitution common to the whole church.

The Moravian church adheres to its original principle of the BIBLE as the only rule of faith and practice, subscribing to both the Apostles' and NICENE CREEDS. Worship is liturgical and follows the traditional church year. German chorales figure prominently in the HYMNS used. Strongly Christocentric, the Moravian church places emphasis upon the sufferings of Christ during HOLY WEEK.

MORE, SIR THOMAS \ˈmōr, ˈmɒr/, also called Saint Thomas More (b. Feb. 7, 1477, London, Eng.—d. July 6, 1535, London; canonized May 19, 1935; feast day June 22), humanist and statesman, chancellor of England (1529–32), who was beheaded for refusing to accept King Henry VIII as head of the Church of England. He is recognized as a saint by the ROMAN CATHOLIC church.

MORMON, a member of any of several denominations and sects, the largest of which is the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS, that trace their origins to a religion founded by JOSEPH SMITH in the United States about 1830. The religion these churches practice is often referred to as Mormonism.

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, the principal formal body embracing Mormonism, had more than 12,000,000 members in the early 21st century; it is headquartered in Salt Lake City, Utah. The next-largest Mormon denomination, the Community of Christ (formerly the REORGANIZED CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER DAY SAINTS), had a membership exceeding 250,000 in the early 21st century; it is headquartered in Independence, Mo.

Mormons accept the BIBLE "as far as it is translated correctly." In addition they accept Smith's BOOK OF MORMON, which is largely similar in style and themes to the OLD TES-TAMENT. Smith's other revealed scriptures were later incorporated into the Pearl of Great Price, together with his translation of papyri that he declared to be the Book of Abraham and the Book of Moses. Doctrines and Covenants is a selection of revelations to Smith and one given to BRIGHAM YOUNG.

Mormon doctrine diverges from orthodox CHRISTIANITY, particularly in affirming that God has evolved from man and that men might evolve into gods, that the persons of the TRINITY are distinct beings, and that human souls have preexisted. JUSTIFICATION is by faith and obedience to the ordinances of the church, repentance, BAPTISM by immersion, and laying on of hands for the spirit gifts (including PROPHECY, revelation, and speaking in tongues).

The Mormons believe that faithful members of the church will inherit eternal life as gods, and even those who had rejected God's law would live in glory. Additionally, they believe that the return of Christ to earth will lead to the first RESURRECTION and the MILLENNIUM, the main activity of which will be "temple work," especially baptism on behalf of the dead. After the millennium and second resurrection, the Earth will become a celestial sphere and all people will be assigned to the eternal kingdoms.

Mormons eliminate most distinctions between the PRIESTHOOD and laity. At the age of 12, all worthy males become deacons in the AARONIC PRIESTHOOD; they become teachers when 14 years old and priests at the age of 16. About two years later they may enter the MELCHIZEDEK PRIESTHOOD as elders and may be called upon for 18 months of missionary work. A Mormon man may afterward become a "seventy" (a member of a larger priesthood quorum composed of 70 members) and ultimately a HIGH PRIEST in the church's First Quorum of Seventy.

Adult baptism, signifying repentance and obedience, has acquired additional importance as a ritual that may be undertaken by a proxy for the salvation of those who died without knowledge of the truth. The Mormons' interest in genealogy proceeds from their concern to save dead ancestors. Baptism for the dead, endowment, and sealing (which may also be undertaken by proxy for the dead) are secret but essential ceremonies. At endowment, the person is ritually washed, anointed with oil, and dressed in temple garments. Initiates witness a dramatic performance of the story of creation, learn secret passwords and grips, and receive a secret name. The sealing ceremony, which was of special importance in the period when Mormons practiced polygamy, seals men and women in marriage for eternity. Despite prohibitions (on alcohol, tobacco, tea, and coffee) and a vigorous work ethic, Mormonism is not ascetic; recreation, sport, and education are positive values.

In the main Mormon body, the First Presidency (church president and two councillors), the Council of the Twelve, the First Quorum of Seventy, and the presiding bishop and two councillors (who control the Aaronic priesthood) constitute the General Authorities of the church. They are "sustained in office" by the regular and now ritualized vote of confidence of the semiannual General Conference, which is open to all Mormons.

The Community of Christ holds firmly to the Book of Mormon but rejects the following: the evolutionary conceptions of deity and the POLYTHEISM implicit in it, the new covenant of celestial marriage, baptism on behalf of the dead, polygamy, and tithing. The Book of Abraham is not accepted as of divine origin. The church's presidents continue to be lineal descendants of Smith, beginning with Joseph Smith (1832–1914).

MORMON, BOOK OF, work accepted as holy SCRIPTURE, in addition to the BIBLE, in the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS and other Mormon churches. First published in 1830 in Palmyra, N.Y., Mormons hold that it is a divinely inspired work revealed to and translated by the founder of their religion, JOSEPH SMITH.

The Book of Mormon relates the history of a group of Hebrews who migrated from Jerusalem to America about 600 BCE, led by a prophet, Lehi. They eventually split into two groups. One group, the Lamanites, forgot their beliefs and were the ancestors of the American Indians. The other group, the Nephites, developed culturally and built great cities but were eventually destroyed by the Lamanites about 400 CE. Before this occurred, however, JESUS had appeared and taught the Nephites (after his ASCENSION). The history and teachings were abridged and written on golden plates by the prophet Mormon. His son, Moroni, made additions and buried the plates in the ground, where they remained about 1,400 years, until Moroni, a resurrected being or ANGEL, delivered them to Joseph Smith; subsequently Smith returned them to Moroni.

MORPHEUS \ˈmôr-fē-əs, -fyūs\, in Greco-Roman mythology, one of the sons of HYPNOS (Somnus), the god of sleep. Morpheus sends human shapes (Greek morphai) of all kinds to the dreamer, while his brothers Phobetor (or Icelus) and Phantasus send the forms of animals and inanimate things, respectively.

MORTUARY TEMPLE, in ancient Egypt, place of worship of a deceased king and the depository for food and objects offered to the dead monarch. In the Old and Middle Kingdoms (c. 2575–c. 2130 BCE; and 1938–c. 1600? BCE) the mortuary temple usually adjoined the PYRAMID and had an open, pillared court, storerooms, five elongated shrines, and a chapel containing a false door and an offering table. In the chapel, priests performed the daily funerary rites and presented the offerings to the dead king's KA (protective spirit). In the New Kingdom (1539–1075 BCE) the kings were buried in rock-cut tombs, but separate mortuary temples continued to be built nearby.

MOSES \ˈmō-zəz, -zəs\, Hebrew Moshe (fl. 14th–13th century BCE), Hebrew prophet, teacher, and leader who delivered his people from Egyptian slavery and founded the religious community known as ISRAEL, based on a COVENANT relationship with God. As the vehicle and interpreter of the Covenant, including the TEN COMMANDMENTS, he exerted a lasting influence on the religious life, moral concerns, and social ethics of Western civilization.

According to the biblical account in EXODUS and Numbers, Moses, a Hebrew foundling adopted and reared in the Egyptian court, somehow learned that he was a Hebrew and killed an Egyptian taskmaster who was beating a Hebrew slave. He fled to Midian (mostly in northwest Arabia), where he became the shepherd and eventually the son-in-law of a MIDIANITE priest, JETHRO. While tending his flocks he saw a burning bush that remained unconsumed and heard there a call from the God—YAHWEH—of ABRAHAM, ISAAC, and JACOB to deliver his people, the Hebrews, from their bondage in Egypt. Because Moses was a stammerer, his brother AARON was to be his spokesman, but Moses would be Yahweh's representative.

Ramses II (reigned 1279–13 BCE) was probably the pharaoh of Egypt at the time. He rejected the demand of this unknown God and responded by increasing the oppression of the Hebrews. The biblical text states that Moses used plagues sent by Yahweh to bend Ramses' will. Whether the Hebrews were finally permitted to leave Egypt or simply fled is not clear; according to the biblical account, the pharaoh's forces pursued them eastward to the Sea of Reeds, a papyrus lake (not the Red Sea), which the Hebrews crossed safely but in which the Egyptians were engulfed. Moses then led the people to MOUNT SINAI (Horeb) at the southern tip of the Sinai Peninsula. Yahweh appeared to Moses there in a terrific storm, out of which came the Covenant between Yahweh and the people of Israel, including the Ten Commandments; and Moses began issuing ordinances for specific situations, instituting a system of judges and hearings of civil cases.

After leaving Mount Sinai and continuing the journey toward CANAAN Moses faced increasing resistance and frustration and once got so angry at the people that, according to tradition, Yahweh accounted it a lack of faith and denied him entrance into Canaan. As his last official act, Moses renewed the Sinai Covenant with the survivors of the wanderings and then climbed Mount Pisgah to look over the land that he would not enter. The Hebrews never saw him again, and the circumstances of his death and burial remain shrouded in mystery.

Tradition states that Moses wrote the whole PENTATEUCH, but this is untenable. Moses did formulate the Decalogue, mediate the Covenant, and begin the process of rendering and codifying interpretations of the Covenant's stipulations. In a general sense, therefore, the first five books of the Hebrew BIBLE can be described as Mosaic. Without him there would have been no Israel and no collection known as the TORAH.

MOSES DE LEÓN \ˈmō-sās-thā-lā-ˈōn\, original name Moses ben Shem Tov (b. 1250, León [Spain]—d. 1305, Arevalo), Jewish Qabbalist and presumably the author of the SEFER HA-ZOHAR ("Book of Splendor"), the most important work of Jewish mysticism; its influence among Jews once rivaled that of the OLD TESTAMENT and the TALMUD.

Until 1290 Moses de León lived in Guadalajara (the Spanish center of adherents of the QABBALAH). He then traveled a great deal and finally settled in Ávila. On a trip to Valladolid, he met a Palestinian Qabbalist, Isaac ben Samuel of Acre; to him Moses confided that he possessed the centuries-old, original manuscript of the Zohar, which was ascribed to the 2nd-century Palestinian rabbinic teacher SIMEON BEN YOHAÏ. He promised to show it to Isaac, but unfortunately, Moses died before he could fulfill his promise, and Isaac subsequently heard rumors that Moses' wife had denied the existence of this manuscript, claiming rather that Moses himself was the author of the Zohar.

The Zohar is primarily a series of mystical commentaries on the PENTATEUCH, in manner much like the traditional Midrashim, or homilies based on SCRIPTURE. Against the backdrop of an imaginary Palestine, Simeon ben Yohai and his disciples carry on a series of dialogues. In them, it is revealed that God manifested himself in a series of 10 descending emanations, or SEFIROT (e.g., "love" of God, "beauty" of God, and "kingdom" of God). In addition to the influence of NEOPLATONISM, the Zohar also shows evidence of the influence of JOSEPH GIKATILLA, a medieval Spanish Qabbalist thought to have been a friend of Moses de León. Gikatilla's work Ginnat egoz ("Nut Orchard") provides some of the Zohar's key terminology.

MOSQUE, Arabic Masjid, or Jāmi', any house or open area of prayer in ISLAM. The two main types of mosques include the masjid jāmi', or "collective mosque," a large state-controlled mosque that is the center of community worship and the site of Friday prayer services, and smaller mosques operated by various groups within society.

The first mosques were modeled on the place of worship of the Prophet MUHAMMAD—the courtyard of his house at MEDINA—and were simply plots of ground marked out as sacred. Subsequently the building remained essentially an open space, generally roofed over, with a MINARET sometimes attached to it. Within, the miḥrāb, a semicircular niche reserved for the prayer leader (IMAM), points to the QIBLA, the direction of Mecca; the minbar, a seat at the top of steps placed at the right of the miḥrāb, is used by the preacher (khaṭīb) as a pulpit. Occasionally there also is a maqṣūra, a box or wooden screen near the miḥrāb, which was originally designed to shield a worshiping ruler from assassins. Mats or carpets cover the floor, where the ritual prayer (ṢALĀT) is performed by rows of worshipers, who bow and prostrate themselves under the imam's guidance. Professional chanters (QURRĀ') may chant the QUR'AN according to prescribed systems, but no music or singing is allowed. Statues and pictures are also proscribed.

Outside the mosque stands the minaret (ma'dhana), originally any elevated place but now usually a tower; it is used by the MUEZZIN ("crier") to proclaim the call to worship (ADHĀN) five times each day. A place for ABLUTION, containing running water, is usually attached to the mosque.

Since the time of the Prophet, mosques have served multiple functions—political, social, and educational, as well as religious. This multifunctionality assumed architectural expression in the great mosques of urban centers. The Ottoman Süleymaniye Mosque in Istanbul, for example, comprises a complex of prayer places, religious colleges (MADRASAS), preparatory schools, a hospital and medical school, a Sufi lodge, a hostel, public bath and fountains, kitchens, residential quarters for employees, bazaar, imperial mausoleums, and a cemetery.

MOT \ˈmōt\ (akin to Hebrew met, "death"), ancient West Semitic god of death and decay; he was the favorite son of the god EL, and the most prominent enemy of the god BAAL. Mot was the god of sterility and the master of all barren places. Traditionally, Mot and Baal (a god of springs, sky, and fertility) were perpetually engaged in a struggle in which Baal was annually vanquished and slain. Mot, however, was also annually killed by Baal's sister ANATH, who thus aided Baal's return.

MOTHER GODDESS, any of a variety of feminine deities and maternal symbols of creativity, birth, fertility, sexual union, nurturing, and the cycle of growth. There is no culture that has not employed some maternal symbolism in depicting its deities.

Mother goddesses should be distinguished from the EARTH MOTHER, with which they have often been confused. Unlike the mother goddess, the Earth Mother is a cosmogonic figure, with a role in the creation of the universe. In contrast, mother goddesses are individual, possess distinct characters, are young, are not cosmogonic, and are highly sexual. Although the male plays a relatively less important role, mother goddesses are usually part of a divine pair, and their mythology narrates the vicissitudes of the goddess and her (frequently human) consort.

The essential moments in the myth of most mother goddesses are her disappearance and reappearance and the celebration of her divine marriage. Her disappearance has cosmic implications. Sexuality and growth decline. Her reappearance, choice of a male partner, and intercourse with him restore and guarantee fertility, after which the male consort is frequently set aside or sent to the underworld to be replaced the next year.

The other major form of the mother goddess emphasizes her maternity. She is the protector and nourisher of a divine child and, by extension, of all humanity. This form occurs more frequently in iconography—a full-breasted (or many-breasted) figure holding a child—than in myth.

MOTOORI NORINAGA \mō-tō-'ō-rē-nō-rē-'nā-gā\ (b. June 21, 1730, Matsuzaka, Japan—d. Nov. 5, 1801, Matsuzaka), eminent scholar in SHINTŌ and Japanese classics.

Trained as a physician, Motoori came under the influence of the National Learning (KOKUGAKU) movement, which emphasized the importance of Japan's own literature. He applied careful philological methods to the study of the Koji-ki, The Tale of Genji, and other classical literature and stressed mono no aware ("sensitiveness to beauty") as the central concept of Japanese literature. Motoori's study of Japanese classics provided the theoretical foundation of the modern Shintō revival. Rejecting Buddhist and Confucian influence on the interpretation of Shintō, he instead traced Shintō to ancient Japanese myths and traditions. Motoori also reaffirmed the concept of musubi (the mysterious power of all creation and growth), which has become one of the main tenets of modern Shintō.

Motoori's 49-volume commentary on the Koji-ki (Koji-ki-den), completed in 1798, is incorporated in the Moto-ori Norinaga Zenshū, 12 vol. (1926–27; "Complete Works of Motoori Norinaga").

MO-TZU \ˈmō-ˈdzə\, Pinyin Mozi, original name Mo Ti, Latin Micius \ˈmi-shē-əs, -shəs\ (b. 470? BCE, China—d. 391?, China), Chinese philosopher whose fundamental doctrine of universal love challenged CONFUCIANISM for several centuries and became the basis of a religious movement known as Mohism.

Born a few years after Confucius' death, Mo-tzu was raised in a period when China was divided into small, constantly warring, feudal states. He thus confronted the problem that faced all thinkers in 5th-century BCE China: how to bring political and social order out of chaos.

According to tradition, Mo-tzu was originally a follower of the teachings of CONFUCIUS until he became convinced that Confucianism laid too much emphasis on a burdensome code of rituals and too little on religious teaching. Mo-tzu was drawn to the common people and looked back to a life of primitive simplicity and straightforwardness in human relations.

The Mo-tzu, the principal work left by Mo-tzu and his followers, contains the essence of his political, ethical, and religious teachings. The gist of it lies in 10 major tenets: exaltation of the virtuous, identification with the superior, universal love, condemnation of offensive war, economy of expenditures, simplicity in funerals, will of heaven, on ghosts, denunciation of music as a wasteful activity, and antifatalism.

The cornerstone of Mo-tzu's system was universal love. If the world is in chaos, he said, it is owing to human selfishness and partiality, and the prescribed cure is that "partiality should be replaced by universality," for, "when everyone regards the states and cities of others as he regards his own, no one will attack the others' state or seize the others' cities." The same principle was to be applied to the welfare of the family and of the individual. The peace of the world and the happiness of humanity lie in the practice of universal love. Mo-tzu demonstrated that this principle had in it both utilitarian justification and divine sanction. He spoke of "universal love and mutual profit" in one breath, and he was convinced that this principle was both the way of humans and the way of God.

Mo-tzu's stand on religion makes him exceptional among Chinese philosophers. His call to the people was for them to return to the faith of their ancestors. The system of Mo-tzu, with its gospel of universal love and the ascetic discipline as exemplified by his own life, soon after the master's death, was embodied in an organized church with a succession of Elder Masters and a considerable body of devotees. The religion prospered for several generations before completely disappearing.

The teachings of Mo-tzu, however, continued to be held in high respect for several centuries. Down to the early 2nd century BCE, writers referred to Confucianism and Mohism in one breath as the two leading schools of thought. But from that time, Mohism suddenly disappeared from the intellectual scene.

MOURNING, formal demonstration of grief at the death of a person. Mourning rites, which are of varying duration and rationale, usually weigh more heavily on women than on men. Mourners may deny themselves certain amusement, ornaments, or food. They may practice sexual continence or keep vigil over the body of the deceased. Changes in garb, such as the wearing of black clothing, and alterations in hairstyle may distinguish mourners, but such evidences of mourning have declined in many societies.

MU-CH'I \ˈmü-ˈchē\ (d. later half of 13th century), Chinese painter associated with the Ch'an school. Although Chinese sources ignore his religious activity and affiliation and denounce the quality of his paintings, according to Japanese sources Mu-ch'i was a disciple of the Ch'an master Wu-chun. In addition, Japanese ZEN monks who visited China during Mu-ch'i's lifetime regarded his work highly, and he soon acquired a great reputation abroad. In his painting, iconographic and realistic elements or motifs are stripped away and nature itself is made the object of focus, on par with more traditional religious figures that are being depicted. Elements from the natural world or animals are taken to be signs for ultimate reality on the same level as Buddhas or bodhisattvas. Nature is portrayed not as the mere backdrop in which divinities or other ICONS appear, but rather is the essential basis out of which they grow. Elements of the mundane or grotesque, another feature of his and other Zen paintings, are also treated as signs of true reality, a consequence of the Zen equation of the non-duality of SAMŚARA and NIRVANA.

MUDANG \ˈmü-ˈdäŋ\, in Korean shamanism, priestess who effects cures, tells fortunes, soothes spirits of the dead, and repulses evil.

The principal occasion for the performance of a mudang is the KUT, a trance ritual in which singing and dancing are used to invite happiness and repel evil. The kut usually comprises 12 kōri (procedures), each of which is addressed to such specific gods or spirits as the god of childbirth, the goddesses in control of specific diseases, one's patron spirit, or the protector god of households. Before the kut begins, an altar is set on the floor and offerings are made. As the ritual progresses, the mudang goes into a trance during which the god is said to arrive, to be placated, and then to communicate a message to the client through the mudang.

Hereditary mudang, especially in former times, formed a separate religious group of low social standing and seldom married into families on a higher social level. Daughters of such figures became either mudang after proper training, or kisaeng, waitresses at Korean drinking houses. Sons usually became singers of p'ansori, the one-man opera of Korea, or musicians accompanying rituals.

MUDOR ŠUAN \mü-ˈdōr-shü-ˈän, -syü-ˈän\, ceremony of the Udmurts (Votyaks), a FINNO-UGRIC people living in the Republic of Udmurtiya in west-central Russia. The ceremony was held to consecrate a new family or clan shrine (kuala) and a sacred container (VORŠUD) kept on a shelf within the shrine. Mudor itself means "ground," thus, the ceremony was the blessing of a new site taken over by people breaking off from the ancestral lineage when it expanded past a critical point. The main ceremony of the mudor šuan, or mudor "wedding," consisted of taking ashes from the hearth of the ancestral shrine with a formula such as “I am taking the lesser and leaving the greater” and transferring them to the shrine in a new location, which would then stand in a subordinate position in relation to the greater ancestral kuala.

MUDRĀ \mü-’drä\ (Sanskrit: “seal,” “mark,” or “gesture”), in BUDDHISM and HINDUISM, a symbolic gesture of the hands and fingers used either in ceremonies and dance or in sculpture and painting. Mudrās used in ceremony and dance are numerous and complex (the hasta-mudrās of Hindu classical dance can express about 500 different meanings, involving the hands, fingers, wrists, elbows, and shoulders, all in movement).

In ceremonies, especially in Buddhism, a mudrā acts as a visual affirmation of a mystical or magical vow or utterance. A mudrā often accompanies the MANTRA, an uttered formula or prayer. Although pictorial mudrās are used most commonly in portraying the BUDDHA, they can also appear in representations of lesser personages. The añjali (“reverence”) mudrā, for example, which has the suppliant or worshiper joining his two hands before him, palm to palm, slightly cupped, in a gesture of respectful adoration, would appear only in representations of deities or persons other than the Buddha.

The hundreds of mudrās of Hindu and other related Asian dances are described in technical manuals, but, in practice, performers usually limit their gestures or “phrases” (sequences of mudrās) to those familiar and meaningful to their audiences. The selection may differ from region to region.

MUEZZIN \mü-’e-zin, myü-\, Arabic mu’adhhdhin, in ISLAM, the official who proclaims the call to prayer (ADHĀN) on Friday for the public worship and the call to the daily prayer (ṢALĀT) five times a day, at dawn, noon, mid-afternoon, sunset, and nightfall. The muezzin stands either at the door or side of a small mosque or on the MINARET (manāra) of a large one. He faces each of the four directions in turn: east, west, north, and south. To each direction he cries: “Allāh is most great. I testify that there is no God but ALLĀH. I testify that MUHAMMAD is the prophet of Allāh. Come to prayer. Come to salvation. Allāh is most great. There is no God but Allāh.” The Shi’ite muezzin adds, “Come to the best work,” after “Come to salvation.” Many mosques have installed recordings of the call to prayer, and amplifiers have displaced the muezzin.

MUFTI \’mɒf-tē, ’müf-\, Arabic muftī, an Islamic legal authority who gives a formal legal opinion (fatwā) in answer to an inquiry by a private individual or judge. A fatwā usually requires knowledge of the QUR’AN and HADITH, as well as knowledge of EXEGESIS and collected precedents, and might be a pronouncement on some problematic legal matter. Under the Ottoman Empire, the mufti of Constantinople, the SHAYKH al-Islam, ranked as Islam’s foremost legal authority, theoretically presiding over the whole judicial and theological hierarchy. The development of civil codes in most Islamic countries, however, has tended to restrict the authority of mufti to cases involving personal status, such as inheritance, marriage, and divorce. In Iran, however, the Shi’ite equivalent to the mufti, the mujtahid, has achieved political and religious predominance in the wake of the 1978–79 revolution. See also FIQH; IJTIHĀD; KHOMEINI, RUHOLLAH MUSAVI.

MUHAMMAD \mü-’kām-mād, Angl mō-’ha-məd, mü-, -’hä-\, in full Abū al-Qāsim Muhammad ibn ‘Abd Allāh ibn ‘Abd al-Muṭṭalib ibn Hāshim, also known as the Messenger of God (Rasūl Allāh), or the Prophet (al-Nabī) (b. c. 570, Mecca, Arabia [Saudi Arabia]—d. June 8, 632, Medina), founder of the religion of ISLAM and of the Muslim community. Although biographical statements occur in the QUR’AN, most of what is known about his life comes from the HADITH, hagiographies (especially Ibn Ishāq’s mid-8th-century Sira, later edited by Ibn Hishām), and Muslim histories (such as AL-ṬABARĪ’s Kitāb al-rusul wa’l-mulūk, 9th–10th century). The life, teachings, and miracles of the Prophet have been the subjects of Muslim devotion and reflection for centuries.

Early life. Muhammad was born after the death of his father, ‘Abd Allāh, and was placed in the care of his mother, his paternal grandfather, and, after their deaths, his paternal uncle Abū Ṭālib. During his early life in MECCA his merchant activities resulted in his marriage in about 595 to the wealthy widow Khadija, who bore him at least two sons, who died young, and four daughters, of whom the best known was FĀṬĪMA, the wife of his cousin ‘ALĪ. Until Khadija’s death in 619, Muhammad took no other wife.

Prophetic call and early religious activity. Mecca, inhabited by the tribe of QURAYSH, to which Muhammad’s Hāshim clan belonged, was a prosperous mercantile center formed around a SANCTUARY, the KA’BA (Kaaba). The great merchants of Mecca had obtained monopoly control of the trade into and out of the city. Most of the city's wealth was in a few hands, and as a result tribal solidarity was breaking up. About 610, as he reflected on such matters in the mountains outside Mecca, Muhammad had a vision of a majestic being (later identified with the angel GABRIEL) and heard a voice saying to him, "You are the Messenger of God." This marked the beginning of his career as prophet. From this time, at frequent intervals until his death, he received messages that he believed came directly from God or through Gabriel. About 650 they were collected and written in the Qur'an. In Muhammad's later experiences of receiving messages there was normally no vision. Most revelations were auditory, which he rendered with his voice into a "recitation" (qur'ān) of God's word.

In about 613 Muhammad began preaching publicly. The people of Mecca at the time worshiped many gods. Some regarded ALLĀH as a HIGH GOD who stood above lesser deities. The earliest passages of the Qur'an emphasize the goodness and power of God as seen in nature and in the prosperity of the Meccans and call on the latter to be grateful and to worship "the Lord of the Ka'ba." Gratitude is to be expressed in generosity and avoidance of miserliness.

The emigration from Mecca to Medina. Although Muhammad's preaching was basically religious, there was explicit in it a critique of the beliefs, conduct, and attitudes of the rich merchants of Mecca. Attempts were made to get him to soften his criticism, and commercial pressure was brought to bear on his supporters. About 619, with the deaths of Khadija and Abū Ṭālib, Muhammad lost the protection of his clan. This meant that he could be attacked and thus could no longer propagate his religion in Mecca.

In 620 Muhammad began negotiations with clans in Yathrib (later called MEDINA, an abbreviation for Madinat al-Nabī, "The City of the Prophet"), and with some of his followers he emigrated there, arriving on Sept. 24, 622. This is the celebrated HĪJRA (Latin Hegira), which may be rendered "emigration," though the basic meaning is the severing of KINSHIP ties. It is the traditional starting point of Islamic history. The Islamic Era (AH or Anno Hegirae) begins on the first day of the Arabic year in which the Hijra took place—July 16, 622, in the Western calendar.

The Prophet in Medina. After he rejoined his followers in Medina, Muhammad set out to solidify his status. He constructed a new house for his wives and for himself that was to become the focal point of communal life and the chief mosque. As a holy man, he outlined the conditions by which he hoped to fashion a united community (umma) out of disparate and contending groups: Muslim emigrants (muhājirūn) from Mecca, Muslim helpers (anṣār) from Medina, Medinan Jews, and PAGAN Arabs. In a series of agreements, known collectively as the CONSTITUTION OF MEDINA, he formalized his role as an arbitrator of disputes and as prophet. It was during Muhammad's years at Medina that most of the Qur'an's rules concerning worship, family relations, and society were revealed.

Although Muhammad first sought to align himself and his followers with Jewish tribes of Medina and with their religion, relations between the two groups soon became increasingly strained. According to Muslim sources, Jews rejected Muhammad's claims to prophethood and seem to have joined with his opponents in alliances to defeat him.

A few emigrants from Mecca, with the approval of Muhammad, set out in normal Arab fashion on razzias (ghazawāt, "raids") in the hope of intercepting Meccan caravans passing near Medina on their way to Syria. In 624 the raids led to military conflict with Mecca. On March 15, 624, near a place called Badr, there was a battle in which at least 45 Meccans were killed, while only 14 Muslims died. To Muhammad this was a divine vindication of his prophethood, and the victory of Badr greatly strengthened him. After an indecisive battle in 625, in April 627 a great confederacy of 10,000 men moved against Medina, but the army withdrew after a two-week siege. After an abortive treaty, in 629 the Meccans formally submitted and were promised a general amnesty. Though Muhammad did not insist on their becoming Muslims, many soon did so.

Ever since the Hijra, Muhammad had been forming alliances with nomadic tribes. When he was strong enough to offer protection, he made it a condition of alliance that the tribe should become Muslim. Muhammad was soon militarily the strongest man in Arabia. He benefited from the defeat of the Persian Empire by the Byzantine (Christian) Empire (627–628), for, in the Yemen and in places on the Persian Gulf, minorities that had relied on Persian support against Byzantium now turned to Muhammad. By this time in Medina he had also repelled all serious challenges to his control; Jews had either been expelled or exterminated. Jews in settlements north of Medina capitulated to him and assumed what would later be called dhimmi (protected) status, as did Christians in other parts of Arabia.

In 632, after performing one last PILGRIMAGE to Mecca, Muhammad fell ill in Medina and died in the arms of his wife 'A'isha, the daughter of his friend Abu Bakr. Since no arrangement had been made for his succession, the Prophet's death provoked a major crisis among his followers. The dispute over the leadership of the Muslim community resulted in the most important schism in the history of Islam: the one between Sunni Muslims, led by the CALIPH, and SHĪ'ITE Muslims, led by the IMAM. Majoritarian religious doctrine precluded the appearance of another prophet.

Muhammad's legacy. After his death Muhammad's remains were interred in 'A'isha's quarters, next to the prayer area of his mosque. It was not long before caliphs began to expand the site and add new, more permanent architectural features. The mosque-tomb in Medina was to become the second most sacred site for Muslims, and pilgrimage there, though not a duty like the HAJJ, is considered a highly laudatory undertaking. According to one Hadith, Muhammad once proclaimed, "Whoever visits my tomb (or house) will win my intercession." In addition to being based on Muhammad's Hijra to Medina, the Islamic calendar commemorates several other events in his life. The month of RAMADĀN memorializes the revelation of the Qur'an, and the last lunar month is identified with the performance of Muhammad's final hajj. Moreover, the anniversaries of Muhammad's birth/death (MAWLID al-nabī) in the third lunar month and heavenly ascension (al-isrā' wa'l-mi'rāj) in the seventh lunar month became very popular religious holidays in most Muslim communities.

Muhammad's prophetic calling is a belief that Muslims are required to acknowledge in the SHAHĀDA (creed, testimony), and it constitutes one of the principle subjects of theological discourse. He is esteemed as an exemplary holy man whose words and deeds are remembered in the Hadith, which form the basis of the SUNNA, one of the roots of Islamic law (FIQH) and customary Muslim practice. Indeed, jurists regarded him as the foremost lawgiver, and philosophers saw in him the fulfillment of the ideal of Plato's philosopher-king. For Sufis (see SUFISM) Muhammad was the ascetic and visionary par excellence, the ancestral founder of their myriad orders. More recently he has been seen by some as the first unifier of the Arab peoples and the model for armed resistance against Western imperialism.

MUHAMMAD, ELIJAH \mō-'ha-məd, mü-\, original name Elijah Poole (b. Oct. 7, 1897, Sandersville, Ga., U.S.—d. Feb. 25, 1975, Chicago, Ill.), leader of the African-American separatist religious movement that is known as the NATION OF ISLAM (sometimes also called the Black Muslims).

The son of sharecroppers and former slaves, Muhammad moved to Detroit in 1923 where, around 1930, he became assistant minister to the founder of the movement, WAL-LACE D. FARD, at Temple No. 1. When Fard disappeared in 1934 Muhammad succeeded him as its head, proclaiming himself to be “the Prophet of God” and “Minister of ISLAM.” Because of dissension within the Detroit temple, he moved to Chicago, where he established Temple No. 2. During World War II he advised followers to avoid the draft, as a result of which he was charged with violating the Selective Service Act and was jailed (1942–46).

Muhammad's program called for the establishment of a separate nation for African-Americans and the adoption of a religion based on the worship of ALLĀH and on the belief that African-Americans are his chosen people. Muhammad became known especially for his flamboyant rhetoric directed at white people, whom he called “blue-eyed devils.” In his later years, however, he moderated his tone and stressed self-help among African-Americans rather than confrontation between the races. Another group, retaining both the name and the founding principles of Elijah Muhammad's original Nation of Islam, was later established under the leadership of LOUIS FARRAKHAN.

MUHAMMAD AL-MAHDĪ AL-HUJJA \mü-'kām-mäd-ül-mä-'dē-ül-kü-'jä\, also called Muhammad al-Muntazar (Arabic: “The Anticipated”), Hidden Imam, al-Qā'im (“He Who Arises”), or Twelfth Imam (b. c. 868, Sāmarrā [now in Iraq]—disappeared 878), 12th and last IMAM, venerated by the ITHNĀ 'ASHARIYA, or Twelvers, the main body of SHĪ'ITE Muslims. It is believed that Muhammad al-Mahdī al-Hujja has been concealed by God (a doctrine known as GHAYBA, or occultation) and that he will reappear in time as the MAHDĪ, or messianic deliverer. According to Shi'ite accounts he was the son of the Eleventh Imam, Hasan al-'Askarī, and a Byzantine slave. His occultation is commemorated by a cave shrine in Samarra known as Hujrat al-Ghayba (“Chamber of Occultation”), built in the 13th century. It is believed that upon his reappearance, when ISLAM is in decline and chaos prevails, he will win a decisive victory over evil and inaugurate a new messianic age. At that time, Islam will become the only religion, and the world will be filled with justice and prosperity.

MUHAMMADIYA \mü-'hā-mä-'dē-ə\, socioreligious organization in Indonesia, established in 1912 by proponents of purist ISLAM (santri) at Jogjakarta (now in Indonesia), aimed at adapting Islam to modern Indonesian life. The organization was chiefly inspired by an Egyptian reform movement, led by MUHAMMAD 'ABDUH, that had tried to bring the Muslim faith into harmony with modern rational thought. The Muhammadiyah advocated the abolition of all customs deemed superstitious, mostly relics of pre-Islamic times, and the loosening of the stiff traditional bonds that tended to strangle modern cultural life. To achieve these aims, the Muhammadiyah established schools along modern lines, where Western subjects (including Dutch) as well as religion were taught. It set up orphanages, hospitals, and other social services. By the 1920s the Muhammadiyah was the dominant force in Indonesian Islam and the most effective organization in the country, claiming millions of members. It also promoted active participation of women in some areas of public life, but under the structures of modesty and segregation of the sexes.

The Muhammadiyah was willing to cooperate with the Dutch colonial government, and its schools were qualified to receive government financial assistance. It was therefore criticized by radical Indonesian nationalists, who had adopted a noncooperation policy toward the Dutch authorities. The membership of the Muhammadiyah increased steadily, however, and by 1937 there were 913 branches, although more than half of them were in the outer islands. The Muhammadiyah was paralyzed by the Japanese occupation during World War II. It is still composed of several million members and must be counted as the predominant expression of reformist Islam in Indonesia.

MUĤĀSIBĪ, AL- \ül-mü-'kä-sē-'bē\ (Arabic: “He Who Examines [His Conscience]”), in full Abū 'Abd Allāh al-Ḥarīth ibn Asad al-'Anazī al-Muĥāsibī (b. c. 781, Basra, Iraq—d. 857, Baghdad), eminent Sufi mystic and theologian renowned for his psychological refinement of pietistic devotion. His main work was al-Ri'āya li-ḥuqūq Allah (“Minding the Rights of God”), in which he acknowledges ASCETICISM to be valuable as an act of supererogation but always to be tempered by duties to God.

Al-Muĥāsibī apparently grew up in Baghdad in a prosperous home. From Basra he had brought the otherworldly spirituality of the Sufi theologian AL-ḤASAN AL-BAṢRĪ.

Muslim asceticism had developed some specific features: nightly recitals of the QUR'AN, restrictions concerning the kind and quantity of food one should eat, and a special attire consisting of woolen clothing. These habits had been adapted from the lifestyle of Christian monks. But whereas Christian monks used to live in seclusion, a Muslim ascetic felt obliged to remain an active member of his community. Thus, al-Muĥāsibī came to realize that although the practice of outward asceticism could serve to suppress the normal SINS of passion, it could also become a vehicle for vices like hypocrisy and pride. The proper instrument for tempering the inner and outer duties toward God is reason, primarily the method of muĥāsaba, the anticipation of the LAST JUDGMENT through constant self-examination; this tended to stifle every attempt at ecstatic exaltation.

Al-Muĥāsibī propagated his ideas in didactic conversations, which he would record immediately afterward; his books still preserve this dialogical structure. His influence on posterity was immense, especially through his pupil Junayd. During his lifetime, however, he was regarded with suspicion, and his last years were embittered by persecution. He had joined a group of theologians who, led by ‘Abd Allāh ibn Kullāb (died 855), criticized the doctrines of the rationalist Mu‘tazilī school dominant at that time. The Mu‘tazilī, in stressing the unity of God, tended to reduce his attributes to mere nominal aspects; al-Muḥāsibī, in order to preserve their individual value, accentuated much more their independent status. And whereas the Mu‘tazilī held the attribute of God’s speech to be created, realized in temporal revelations like that of the Qur’an, al-Muḥāsibī believed that it was also uncreated if seen under the aspect of the eternal Word of God.

In 850–851, the CALIPH of Baghdad, al-Mutawakkil, put an end to the pro-Mu‘tazilī policy of his predecessors and, two years later, prohibited rationalist theology altogether. Al-Muḥāsibī’s theological position was now viewed as treasonous by his opponents, for they considered the use of any rational theological method as HERESY, regardless of the doctrine it supported. He was consequently forced to give up his public teaching and appears to have immigrated to Kūfa. Later on he was allowed to return to Baghdad. Yet the boycott persisted: when he died there in 857, only four people attended his funeral.

MUJĀHADA \mü-‘ja-hā-dā\ (Arabic: “striving”), in SUFISM, struggle with the carnal self; the word is related to JIHAD (“struggle”), which is often understood as “holy war.” The Sufis refer to mujāhada as al-jihād al-akbar (“the greater war”) in contrast to al-jihād al-aṣghar (“the minor war”), which is waged against unbelievers. It is one of the major duties that a Sufi must perform throughout his mystical journey toward union with God.

All acts of penance and austerity, such as prolonged fasts and abstinence from the comforts of life, have become part of the mujāhada practice. The purpose of mujāhada is to conquer the temptations of the self in order to purify one’s soul and bring one’s soul to a state of readiness to receive the divine light. It has been listed in Sufi treatises as a stage (maqām) on the way to mystical enlightenment since the 11th century.

MUKAMMAS, DAVID AL- \äl-mü-‘kām-mäs\, in full David Abū Sulaymān ibn Marwān ar-Raqqī al-Mukammas, also called David ha-Bavli \hä-‘bäv-lē\ (fl. 900, Raqqah, Syria), Syrian philosopher and polemicist, regarded as the father of medieval Jewish philosophy.

After converting to CHRISTIANITY, al-Mukammas became disillusioned with its doctrines and wrote two polemics faulting Christianity for the impurity of its monotheism; he also attacked ISLAM, maintaining that the style of the QUR’AN did not prove its divine origin. It is not entirely clear whether al-Mukammas returned fully to JUDAISM.

Al-Mukammas was the first Jewish thinker to introduce the methods of kalam (Arab religious philosophy) into Judaism and the first Jew to mention Aristotle in his writings; he cited Greek and Arab authorities, but he never quoted the BIBLE. Among the subjects presented in his ‘Ish-rūn maqālāt (“Twenty Treatises”) are a proof of God’s existence and his creation of the world, a discussion of the reality of science, the substantial and accidental composition of the world, the utility of PROPHECY and prophets, and the signs of true prophets and prophecy. Al-Mukammas also wrote on Jewish sects.

MŪLAMADHYAMAKAKĀRIKĀ \‘mü-lə-mäd-‘yə-mə-kə-‘kä-ri-kä\ (Sanskrit: “Fundamentals of the Middle Way”), Buddhist text by NĀGĀRJUNA, the exponent of the MĀDHYAMIKA school of MAHĀYĀNA Buddhism, that combines stringent logic and religious vision in a lucid presentation of the doctrine of ultimate “emptiness.”

Nāgārjuna makes use of the classifications and analyses of the THERAVĀDA Abhidhamma, or scholastic, literature; he takes them to their logical extremes and thus reduces to ontological nothingness the various elements, states, and faculties dealt with in Abhidhamma texts. The Mūlamadhyamakakārikā develops the doctrine that nothing, not even the Buddha or NIRVANA, is real in itself.

MULLĀ \‘mə-lə, ‘mü-\ (Persian), Arabic mawlā \‘maü-lä\, English mullah, a Muslim title generally denoting “lord”; it is used in the Islamic world as an honorific attached to the name of a king, SULTAN, noble, scholar, or religious leader. The term appears in the QUR’AN in reference to ALLĀH, the “Lord” or “Master,” and thus came to be applied to earthly lords to whom religious sanctity was attributed.

During the era of the early Islamic conquests, however, the term was used in an opposite sense, to designate “freedmen” or “clients”—i.e., non-Arab converts to ISLAM who held subordinate status vis-à-vis Arab followers of MUHAMMAD and the first CALIPHS. Originating from the conquered peoples of the Near East, these converts served in government and the military, but they also participated in revolts against caliphal authorities. They were instrumental to the ‘Abbāsīd revolution which brought about the demise of the Umayyad dynasty in 750. A number of leading Islamic scholars were of mullā heritage, such as AL-ḤASAN AL-BAṢRĪ (d. 728), ABŪ ḤANĪFAH (d. 767), and AL-BUKHARĪ (d. 870).

Subsequently, the most common application of the title mullā has been to religious leaders, teachers in religious schools, those versed in the canon law, leaders of prayer in the mosques (IMAMS), or reciters of the Qur’an (QURRĀ). Normally the men called by the title have had some training in a MADRASA, or religious school. The word is often used to designate the entire class that upholds the traditional interpretation of Islam, especially in Iran. There it acquired derisive connotations in secularist circles during the 20th century.

MULLĀ ṢADRĀ \möl-‘lā-sa-‘drä\, also called Ṣadr al-Dīn al-Shīrāzī (b. c. 1571, Shīrāz, Iran—d. 1640, Basra, Iraq), philosopher who led the Iranian cultural renaissance in the 17th century. The foremost representative of the illuminationist, or Ishrāqī, school of philosopher-mystics, he is commonly regarded as the greatest Iranian philosopher.

A scion of a notable Shīrāzī family, Mullā Ṣadrā completed his education at Iṣfahān, then the leading cultural and intellectual center of Iran, where he studied under MĪR DĀMĀD. He produced several works, the most famous of which was his Asfār (“Journeys”) containing the bulk of his philosophy, which was influenced by a personal MYSTICISM bordering on the ascetic that he experienced during a 15-year retreat at Kahak, a village near QOM, Iran.

Expounding his theory of nature, Mullā Ṣadrā argued that the entire universe—except God and his knowledge—was originated both eternally as well as temporally. Nature, he asserted, is the substance of all things and is the cause for all movement. Thus, nature is permanent and furnishes the continuing link between the eternal and the originated.

Toward the end of his life, Mullā Ṣadrā returned to Shīrāz to teach. His teachings, however, were considered heretical by the orthodox Shī‘ite theologians, who persecuted him, though his powerful family connections permitted him to continue to write. He died on a PILGRIMAGE to Arabia.

MÜLLER, (FRIEDRICH) MAX \ˈmʉ-lər, ˈmyü-\ (b. Dec. 6, 1823, Dessau, duchy of Anhalt [Germany]—d. Oct. 28, 1900, Oxford, Eng.), German Orientalist and language scholar whose works stimulated widespread interest in the study of linguistics, MYTHOLOGY, and religion.

Müller is the son of the noted German poet Wilhelm Müller. Originally a student of Sanskrit, he turned to comparative language studies, and about 1845 he began studying the AVESTA, the Zoroastrian SCRIPTURE written in Old Iranian. This led him to COMPARATIVE RELIGION and to the editing of the ṚG VEDA, which was published after he had settled at the University of Oxford (1849–75). There he was appointed deputy professor of modern languages (1850) and professor of comparative philology (1868).

Müller's exploration of mythology also led him further into comparative religion and to the publication of The Sacred Books of the East (1879–1904), begun in 1875. Of the 51 volumes (including indexes) of translations of major Oriental, non-Christian scriptures, all but 3 appeared under his superintendence during his lifetime. In his later years, Müller also wrote on Indian philosophy and encouraged the search for Oriental manuscripts and inscriptions.

MUMMY, body embalmed or treated for burial with preservatives after the manner of the ancient Egyptians. The process varied from age to age in Egypt, but it always involved removing the internal organs (though in a late period they were replaced, after treatment), treating the body with resin, and wrapping it in linen bandages. Among the many other peoples who practiced mummification were the people living along the Torres Strait, between Papua New Guinea and Australia, and the INCAS of South America.

MUNMYO \ˈmün-ˈmyō\ (Korean: “culture shrines”), in Korean tradition, religious, educational, and cultic institutions devoted to the spirit of CONFUCIUS and his disciples. First established in Korea during the Three Kingdoms period (57 BCE–668 CE) in emulation of Han dynasty Chinese practices, these shrines became focal points for the cultural and political unification of the Korean state. In the Koryo period (918–1392), Korean scholars were added to the ranks of Chinese Confucian disciples seen in the shrines, a tradition that eventually led to the installation of the spirit tablets of 18 exemplary Korean scholars. In the modern period various Confucian groups continue to honor the ancient rituals at culture shrines throughout Korea.

MÜNTZER, THOMAS \ˈmʉnt-sər, ˈmünt-\, Müntzer also spelled Münzer, or Monczer, Latin Thomas Monetaarius (b. sometime before 1490, Stolberg, Thuringia [Germany]—d. May 27, 1525, Mühlhausen), leading German radical Reformer during the Protestant REFORMATION, and the leader of the abortive Peasants' Revolt in Thuringia in 1524–25.

Müntzer's name appears in the 1506 register of the University of Leipzig, and in 1512 he attended the University of Frankfurt an der Oder, later earning the academic ranks of master of arts and bachelor of theology. Müntzer became a specialist in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew and an accomplished scholar of ancient and humanistic literature—particularly the Old and New Testaments. He was an assistant teacher in Halle (Saale) in 1513 and a clergyman as well as a teacher in Aschersleben in 1514 and 1515.

From 1516 to 1517 Müntzer worked as a prior at Frohse monastery at Aschersleben; in 1517–18 he taught at the Braunschweig Martineum (city secondary school) until, in 1518, he was attracted to MARTIN LUTHER and his ideas of reform. After occasional participation in debates between Luther and the German theologian JOHANN ECK in Leipzig, he pursued intensive literary studies at the monastery of Beuditz at Weissenfels (1519–20). There, under the influence of MYSTICISM, he came to see the work inaugurated by Luther as a revolution.

In Zwickau (1520–21) Müntzer prospered as a pastor in the socially tense condition that existed between the upper classes and early miners' guilds. In this work he sided with the common people, who seemed to him to be the executors of the divine law and will on earth. He increasingly adopted the sectarian view that true authority lay in the inner light given by God, rather than in the BIBLE, a view taught by Nikolaus Storch, a leader of a radical group known as the “Zwickau prophets.” In 1522 at Nordhausen, in a struggle against Luther's supporters, his theological differences with them became more pronounced. Believing that teachings came from the spirit, Müntzer placed them in opposition to the Lutheran doctrines of JUSTIFICATION by faith alone and of the exclusive authority of SCRIPTURE. The revolutionary aspect of Müntzer's theology lay in the link he made between his concept of the inevitable conquest of the anti-Christian earthly government and the thesis that the common people themselves, as the instruments of God, would have to execute this change.

Before EASTER of 1523, Müntzer found employment as pastor of a Saxon community in Allstedt, near the Mansfeld mining area. Built upon the idea of “Christian unification” and also as a self-defense organization, the Allstedt alliance originated in 1524 and remained the center of his doctrine until the fall of 1524, when he left Allstedt.

In Mühlhausen he organized the working classes into a group called the “Eternal Covenant of God.” After another expulsion he went to Nürnberg, where his main political writings were published. He then went on to Hegau and Klettgau, the area where the Peasants' Revolt (an abortive revolt in 1524–25 against the nobles over rising taxes, deflation, and other grievances) was beginning, and stayed through the winter in Griessen.

His experience with the rising insurrection impelled him to go back to Mühlhausen, which became the center of the middle German revolt (after the overthrow of the governing council and the formation of what the insurgents called an “eternal council” in March 1525). Following Müntzer's dogmatic program, the common people triumphed in April–May 1525 over the religious and civil authorities. Cities and even some of the lesser nobility joined the alliance. Müntzer and his followers lent determination and consistency to the revolt. They were not, however, capable of overcoming the local and regional narrow-mindedness of the people. In the Battle of Frankenhausen, May 15, 1525, they were defeated by the superior strength of the princes.

During the rebellion, Müntzer tried to relate the battle of the peasants, tradesmen, and commoners about immediate concerns with that of the liberation of all Christendom and adapted himself to the various groups' everyday concerns. The collapse of the revolt seemed to him the judgment of God on the as yet unpurified people but not synonymous with the defeat of his idea of a new society. Müntzer was taken prisoner and tortured and on May 27, at the princes' camp at Mühlhausen, was tried and executed.

MURJĪ'A \ˈmür-jē-ə\, one of the earliest Islamic groups to believe in the postponement (irjā') of judgment on committees of serious SINS, recognizing that God alone could decide whether or not a Muslim had lost his faith.

The Murji'a flourished during the turbulent period that began with the murder of 'UTHMĀN (third CALIPH) in 656 CE, and ended with the assassination of 'ALĪ (fourth caliph) in 661 CE and the subsequent establishment of the Umayyad dynasty (ruled until 750 CE). The Muslim community was divided into hostile factions, divided on the issue of the relationship of islām and īmān, or works and faith. The most militant were the KHĀRIJITES, who held the view that serious sinners should be ousted from the community and that JIHAD ("holy war") should be declared on them. This led the adherents of the sect to revolt against the Umayyads, whom they regarded as corrupt and unlawful rulers.

The Murji'a took the opposite stand, asserting that no one who once professed ISLAM could be declared kāfir (infidel), mortal sins notwithstanding. Revolt against a Muslim ruler, therefore, could not be justified under any circumstances. To the Murji'a external actions and utterances did not necessarily reflect an individual's inner beliefs. Some of their extremists, such as Jahm ibn Ṣafwān (d. 746), regarded faith as purely an inward conviction, thus allowing a Muslim outwardly to profess other religions and remain a Muslim, since only God could determine the true nature of his faith. The Murji'a remained neutral in the disputes that divided the Muslim world and called for passive resistance rather than armed revolt against unjust rulers; they regarded their tolerance of the Umayyads as based only on religious grounds and on recognition of the importance of law and order. See also KALĀM.

MURRAY, JOHN COURTNEY \ˈmər-ē\ (b. Sept. 12, 1904, New York, N.Y., U.S.—d. Aug. 16, 1967, New York City), JESUIT (Society of Jesus) theologian known for his influential thought on church-state relations.

Murray was educated at a Jesuit high school in Manhattan and entered their novitiate in 1920. After study at Boston College, where he took his M.A., he attended Woodstock College (later the Woodstock Theological Center of Georgetown University). He was ordained in 1933. After study in Rome he became a member of the faculty of Woodstock College in 1936, a position he held until his death.

In the late 1940s Murray began to grapple with the problem of how the beliefs of a pluralistic, democratic society such as that of the United States could be integrated into the teachings of the ROMAN CATHOLIC church. Murray was an outspoken opponent of censorship on the part of the Vatican, and, indeed, was opposed to any effort by the church to bring about change within states by means other than moral persuasion. Many of his writings on these topics first appeared in Theological Studies, a quarterly journal published by Woodstock College, of which Murray became editor in 1941. By the mid-1950s he was forbidden by the Jesuit order to write on topics pertaining to religious freedom and issues of CHURCH AND STATE without first having it approved by the head of the order in Rome.

In 1958, John F. Kennedy, a Roman Catholic, won reelection to the U.S. Senate in a landslide victory and would later enter the race for the U.S. presidency at a time when faithful Roman Catholics were expected to work toward changing the constitution of any country that did not have ROMAN CATHOLICISM as the established religion. Murray became a defender of the U.S. constitution, arguing that democracy and pluralism were not only good for the state and its citizens, but good for the church as well. The American political system, Murray argued, freed the church of the need to placate rulers of states and accorded the church and its members a new-found dignity. Murray's 1960 book on this topic, We Hold These Truths, laid the groundwork for many changes in the way that church-state relations were viewed, by Catholics and non-Catholics alike.

By 1965 the Catholic hierarchy had changed its mind about Murray; he was invited to serve at the SECOND VATICAN COUNCIL and is credited as the chief author of that council's Declaration on Religious Liberty. In 1966 he was made director of the John La Farge Institute, affiliated with the Jesuit weekly America. There he began holding seminars including Roman Catholic, Protestant, and Jewish theologians, aimed at stimulating ecumenical dialogue.

MURUGAN \ˈmür-ü-gən\, also spelled Murukan, chief deity of the ancient Tamils of South India, later identified in part with the Hindu god SKANDA. He is described as joining his fierce mother, Korravai (later associated with DURGA), in cannibal feasts on the battlefield, a practice that may explain his association with the North Indian war god Skanda. His weapon was the trident or spear, and his banner carried the emblem of a wild fowl. The Tirumukurārūppatai, a "guide to the worship of the god Murugañ," is a description of the chief shrines of the god that the worshiper is encouraged to visit; it was probably written prior to the 7th century CE. Murugañ is identified with the hilly tracts of South India, the terrain associated with clandestine love in the Tamil poetic tradition.

MUSAR \ˈmü,-sär\, a religious movement among Orthodox Jews of Lithuania during the 19th century that emphasized personal piety as a necessary complement to intellectual studies of the TORAH and TALMUD. RABBI Israel Salanter initiated the movement as head of the YESHIVA at Vilnius. The Musar literature that Salanter and others collected and reprinted was used to foster peace of mind, humility, tolerance, thoughtful consideration of others, self-examination, and purity of mind. Yeshivas throughout the world have since made Musar readings part of their curriculum.

MUSE, Greek Mousa, or Moisa, in GREEK RELIGION and mythology, any of a group of sister goddesses of ancient origin, the chief center of whose cult was Mount Helicon in Boeotia, Greece. Allegedly they came from Pieria in Macedonia, but this attribution may be a misunderstanding, the real Pieria being somewhere in Greece. Very little is known of their cult, but they had a festival every four years at Thespie, near Helicon, and a contest (Museia), presumably in singing and playing. They probably were originally the patron goddesses of poets (who in early times were also musicians, providing their own accompaniments), although later their range was extended to include all liberal arts and sciences—hence, their connection with such institutions as the Museum (Mouseion, seat of the Muses) at Alexandria, Egypt. Their father was ZEUS, and their mother was MNEMOSYNE. There were nine Muses as early as Homer's Odyssey (c. 700 BCE), and Homer invokes either a Muse or the Muses collectively. To begin with, they were probably one of those vague collections of deities that are characteristic of certain, probably early, strata of Greek religion.

Differentiation can be seen in Hesiod, who mentioned CLIO, EUTERPE, THALIA, MELPOMENE, TERPSICHORE, ERATO, POLYMNIA (Polyhymnia), OURANIA, and CALLIOPE, who was their chief. Although Hesiod's list became canonical in later times, it was not the only one; at both DELPHI and Sicily there were three Muses, one of whom in the latter place bore the name Polymatheia ("Much Learning"). A common but by no means a definitive list is the following:

- Calliope: Muse of heroic or epic poetry (often shown holding a writing tablet).
 Clio: Muse of history (often holding a scroll).
 Erato: Muse of lyric and love poetry (often playing a lyre).
 Euterpe: Muse of music or flutes (often playing flutes).
 Melpomene: Muse of tragedy (often holding a tragic mask).
 Polymnia: Muse of sacred poetry or of the mimic art (often shown with a pensive look).
 Terpsichore: Muse of dancing and choral song (often shown dancing and holding a lyre).
 Thalia: Muse of comedy (often holding a comic mask).
 Ourania: Muse of astronomy (often holding a globe).

The Muses are often spoken of as unmarried, but they are repeatedly referred to as the mothers of famous sons, such as ORPHEUS, Rhesus, EUMOLPUS, and others connected somehow either with poetry and song or with Thrace and its neighborhood, or both. All their myths are secondary, and hence there is no consistency in these minor tales—Terpsichore, for example, is named as the mother of several different men by various authors and Orpheus generally is called the son of Calliope but occasionally of Polymnia.

MUSHĀHADA \mü-ˈsha-hā-də\ (Arabic: “witnessing,” or “viewing”), also called shuhūd (“witnesses”), in SUFISM, the vision of God obtained by the illuminated heart of the seeker of truth. Through mushāhada, the Sufi acquires yaqīn (real certainty), which cannot be achieved by the intellect or transmitted to those who do not travel the Sufi path. The Sufi has to pass various ritual stages (MAQĀM) before he can attain the state of mushāhada, which is eventually given to him only by the GRACE of God, bestowed upon whom he pleases. Mushāhada, therefore, cannot be reached through good works or MUJĀHADA (struggle with the carnal self).

Mushāhada is the goal of every Sufi who aspires to the ultimate vision of God; its opposite, hijāb (veiling of the divine face), is the most severe punishment that a Sufi can imagine. Mushāhada has been listed in Sufi treatises as a stage (maqām) on the way to mystical enlightenment since the 11th century.

MUSLIM BROTHERHOOD, Arabic al-Ikhwān al-Muslimūn, religio-political organization founded in 1928 at Ismāʿīliyyā, Egypt, by ḤASAN AL-BANNĀʾ. It advocated a return to the QURʾAN and the HADITH as guidelines for a healthy, modern Islamic society. The brotherhood spread rapidly throughout Egypt, the Sudan, Syria, Palestine, Lebanon, and North Africa.

After 1938 the Muslim Brotherhood began to demand purity of the Islamic world and rejected westernization, secularization, and MODERNIZATION. The brotherhood organized a terrorist arm, and when the Egyptian government seemed to weaken in the mid-1940s, the brotherhood posed a threat to the monarchy and the ruling Wafd Party. An attempt to assassinate Egyptian president Gamāl ʿAbd al-Nāṣir in Alexandria on Oct. 26, 1954, led to the Muslim Brotherhood’s forcible suppression. Six of its leaders were tried and executed for treason, and many others were imprisoned.

In the 1970s the Muslim Brotherhood experienced a renewal as part of the general upsurge of religious activity in Islamic countries in the aftermath of the 1967 Arab-Israeli war and government crackdowns on leftists. An uprising by the Muslim Brotherhood in the Syrian city of Ḥamāh in February 1982 was crushed by the government of Ḥafiz al-Asad at a cost of thousands of lives. The brotherhood revived in Egypt and Jordan in the same period, and beginning in the late 1980s it emerged to compete in legislative elections in those countries.

MUSLIM CALENDAR, also called Islamic calendar, dating system used in the Muslim world (except Turkey, which uses the Gregorian calendar) and based on a year of 12 months, each month beginning approximately at the time of the new moon. (The Iranian Muslim calendar, however, is based on a solar year.) The months are alternately 30 and 29 days long except for the 12th, Dhu al-Hijjah, the length of which is varied in a 30-year cycle intended to keep the calendar in step with the true phases of the Moon. In 11 years of this cycle, Dhu al-Hijjah has 30 days, and in the other 19 years it has 29. Thus the year has either 354 or 355 days. No months are intercalated, so that the named months do not remain in the same seasons but retrogress through the entire solar, or seasonal, year (of about 365.25 days) every 32.5 solar years.

MUSLIM IBN AL-ḤAJJĀJ \müs-ˈlēm-i-bən-äl-kāj-ˈjāj\, in full Abū al-Ḥusayn Muslim ibn al-Ḥajjāj al-Qushayrī (b. c. 817, Nishāpūr, Iran—d. 875, Naṣrābād), scholar who was one of the chief authorities on the HADITH.

Muslim traveled widely; his great work, the Ṣaḥīḥ (“The Genuine”), is said to have been compiled from about 300,000 traditions, which he collected in Arabia, Egypt, Syria, and Iraq; it has become one of the six canonical collections of Hadith. Muslim was careful to give a full account of the ISNĀDS (links in the chain of transmission) for each tradition and to record textual variations. The collection, organized topically, also includes a survey on early Islamic theology and a discussion of the QURʾAN.

MUSPELHEIM \ˈmüs-pel-ˌhäm\, Old Norse Múspell \ˈmüs-pel\, in GERMANIC RELIGION, a hot, bright, glowing land in the south, guarded by Surt, the fire GIANT. In the beginning, according to one tradition, the warm air from this region melted the ice of the opposite region, NIFLHEIM, thus giving form to YMRIR (Aurgelmir), the father of the destructive giants. Sparks from Múspellheim became the sun, moon, and stars. At the doom of the gods (RAGNARÖK), the sons of Múspellheim, led by Surt, will destroy the world by fire.

MUT \ˈmüt\, in EGYPTIAN RELIGION, a sky goddess. Mut may have originated either in the Nile River delta or in Middle Egypt. During the 18th dynasty (1539–1292 BCE),

Mut, wearing the double crown and vulture’s head on her forehead, bronze statuette, c. 650–350 BCE

By courtesy of the Oriental Institute, the University of Chicago

she became the companion of the god AMON at Thebes, forming the Theban triad with him and with the youthful god KHONS, who was said to be Mut's son. The name Mut means "mother," and her role was that of an older woman among the gods. She was associated with the uraeus (rearing cobra), lionesses, and royal crowns. She was also identified with other goddesses, principally BASTET and SEKHMET.

At Thebes the principal festival of Mut was her "navigation" on the distinctive horseshoe-shaped lake, or Isheru, that surrounded her temple complex at Karnak. Mut was usually represented as a woman wearing the double crown (of Upper and Lower Egypt) worn by the king and by the god ATUM. She was also sometimes depicted with the head of a lioness.

MUT'Ā \mūt-à\ (Arabic: "pleasure"), in Islamic law, a temporary marriage that is contracted often verbally, for a limited or fixed period and involves the payment of money to the female partner. Partners who engage in mut'a must do so freely and must predetermine the compensation and duration of the contract. The woman, therefore, has no claim for maintenance, and the two do not inherit from one another unless there is a previous agreement on these matters. Any children from a mut'a union go with the father. No extension of the mut'a is permitted, but cohabitation may be resumed if a new agreement is reached with new compensation. All Muslim legal schools agree that mut'a was recognized and practiced in MUHAMMAD's time. Most SUNNI Muslims, however, think the practice to have been forbidden by 'Umar I, the second CALIPH, and thus to have been abrogated. In consequence, Sunni leaders have denounced mut'a as simple prostitution. The Twelver SHI'ITES, in contrast, consider mut'a to be still valid and defend it as a guard against prostitution or license in circumstances in which regular marriage is impossible. Encouraged by religious leaders in Iran, it is typically practiced at PILGRIMAGE centers, such as QOM and MASHHAD.

MU'TAZILA \mü-'tä-zi-lə\ (Arabic: "Those Who Withdraw," or "Stand Apart"), English Mutazilites \-,līts\, in ISLAM, political or religious neutralists; by the 10th century the term came to refer specifically to an Islamic school of speculative theology that flourished in Basra and Baghdad.

The name first appears in early Islamic history in the dispute over 'Alī's leadership of the Muslim community after the murder of the third CALIPH, 'UTHMĀN (656). Those who would neither condemn nor sanction 'ALĪ or his opponents but took a middle position were termed the Mu'tazila.

The theological school is traced to WĀSIL IBN 'ATĀ' (699–749), a student of AL-ḤASAN AL-BAṢRĪ, who by stating that a grave sinner could be classed neither as believer nor unbeliever but was in an intermediate position, withdrew (i'tazala, hence the name Mu'tazila) from his teacher's circle. (The same story is told of 'Amr ibn 'Ubayd [d. 762].) Maligned as free thinkers and heretics, the Mu'tazila, in the 8th century CE, were the first Muslims to use the categories and methods of Hellenistic philosophy to derive their three major and distinctive dogmatic points. (See KALĀM.)

First, they stressed the absolute unity or oneness (tawḥīd) of God; thus the QUR'AN could not be the word of God (the majority view), as God has no separable parts, and so had to be created and was not coeternal with God. Under the 'Abbāsid caliph al-Ma'mūn, this doctrine of the created Qur'an was proclaimed (827) as the state dogma, and in 833, a MIḤNA or tribunal was instituted to try those who disputed the doctrine (notably the theologian AḤMAD IBN ḤAN-BAL); the Mu'tazilī position was finally abandoned by the caliphate under al-Mutawakkil c. 849. The justice ('adl) of God is their second principle: God desires only the best for humans, but through FREE WILL they choose between GOOD AND EVIL and thus become ultimately responsible for their actions. So in the third doctrine, the threat and the promise (al-wa'd wa al-wa'id), or paradise and hell, God's justice becomes a matter of logical necessity: God must reward the good (as promised) and must punish the evil (as threatened).

Among the most important Mu'tazilī theologians were Abū al-Hudhayl al-'Allāf (d. c. 841) and al-Nazzām (d. 846) in Basra and Bishr ibn al-Mu'tamir (d. 825) in Baghdad. Mu'tazilī beliefs were disavowed by the SUNNI Muslims, but the SHI'ITES accepted their premises.

MUTILATION, RITUAL, intentional modification of the living human body for religious, aesthetic, or social reasons. See BODY MODIFICATIONS AND MUTILATIONS.

MUWAHHĪDŪN \mü,-wā-hi-'dün\ (Arabic: "Unitarians"), also called Wahhābīs \wā-'ha-bēz\, members of the Muslim puritan movement founded by MUHAMMAD IBN 'ABD AL-WAHHĀB in the 18th century in Najd, central Arabia, and adopted in 1744 by the Sa'ūdī family.

The political fortunes of the WAHHĀBĪS were immediately allied to those of the Sa'ūdī dynasty. By the end of the 18th century, they had brought all of Najd under their control, attacked KARBALĀ', Iraq, a holy city of the SHI'ITE branch of ISLAM, and occupied MECCA and MEDINA in western Arabia. The Ottoman SULTAN brought an end to the first Wahhābī empire in 1818 with the assistance of MUHAMMAD 'ALĪ (1769–1849) of Egypt, but the movement revived under the leadership of the Sa'ūdī Fayṣal I. The empire was then somewhat restored until once again destroyed at the end of the 19th century by the Rashīdiya of northern Arabia. The activities of Ibn Sa'ūd in the 20th century eventually led to the creation of the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia in 1932 and assured Wahhābī dominance on the Arabian Peninsula.

The Wahhābī call themselves al-Muwahhīdūn, a name derived from their emphasis on the absolute oneness of God (tawḥīd). They deny all acts implying POLYTHEISM, such as visiting tombs and venerating saints, and advocate a return to the original teachings of Islam as incorporated in the QUR'AN and HADITH, with condemnation of all innovations (bid'a). Wahhābī theology and jurisprudence, based, respectively, on the teachings of IBN TAYMĪYA and on the legal school of AḤMAD IBN ḤANBAL, stress literal belief in the Qur'an and Hadith and the establishment of a Muslim state based only on Islamic law. Their interpretation of Islam has been increasingly influential on an international level at the end of the 20th century owing to the wealth and influence of Saudi Arabia.

MYRMIDON \mər-mə,-dän, -dən\, in Greek mythology, any of the inhabitants of Phthiotis in Thessaly.

According to some authorities, the Myrmidons later crossed over from Thessaly to Aegina. Their name was traditionally derived from one of two sources: a supposed ancestor, son of ZEUS and Eurymedusa, the daughter of King Myrmidon of Thessaly, who was seduced by Zeus in the form of an ant (Greek myrmēx); or the re-peopling of Aegina (after all its inhabitants had died of a plague) with ants changed into men by Zeus at the prayer of AEACUS, king of the island. As the followers of the hero ACHILLES, their name came to be applied in modern times to subordinates who carry out orders implacably.

MYSTERY RELIGIONS

ecret cults of the Greco-Roman world that offered to individuals a way to feel RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCES not provided by the official public religions are termed mystery religions. They originated in tribal ceremonies that were performed by peoples in many parts of the world. But, whereas in these tribal communities almost every member of the clan or the village was initiated, initiation in Greece became a matter of personal choice. The mystery religions reached their peak of popularity in the first three centuries CE.

Etymologically, the word mystery is derived from the Greek verb myein ("to close"), referring to the lips and the eyes. Mysteries were always secret cults into which a person had to be initiated (taken in). The initiate was called mystēs, the introducing person mystagōgos (leader of the mystēs). The leaders of the cults included the hierophantēs ("revealer of holy things") and the dadouchos ("torch-bearer"). The constitutive features of a mystery society were common meals, dances, and ceremonies, especially initiation rites. These common experiences strengthened the bonds of each cult.

HISTORY

Eleusinian. The most important SANCTUARY of DEMETER, the goddess of grain, and her daughter Kore (PERSEPHONE) was in the city of Eleusis in Attica, between Athens and Megara. Famous religious festivals—known as the Greater and the Lesser Eleusinian Mysteries—were enacted in this city. At first, the cult of Demeter was probably local and initiation was tribal rather than personal. By participating in the mysteries, a man would become a full member of the civic body. When Eleusis was annexed to the Athenian territory about 600 BCE, however, every Athenian was admitted to the Mysteries, and soon the rites were open to every Greek. Thus the ceremonies received an "international" character, under which each person had to decide for himself whether or not he wanted to be initiated. Although the doctrine of the Eleusinian rites is not clear, it is likely that the initiates expected to enjoy a special status in the afterworld after their death.

Orphic. Besides community initiations, there were ceremonies for individual persons of deeper religious longing. Such persons were called Orphics after OR-PHEUS, the Greek hero with superhuman musical skills who was supposedly the author of sacred writings; these writings were called the Orphic rhapsodies, and they dealt with such subjects as purification and the afterlife. It is possible to reconstruct a common pattern for these initiations of individuals, although an Orphic "church" never existed, and the doctrines of the many small communities of individualists varied on a broad scale.

Many Orphics believed that there was a divine part in man—his soul—but it was wrapped up in the body, and man's task was to liberate the soul from the body. This could be achieved by living an Orphic life, which included abstinence from meat, wine, and sexual intercourse. After death the soul would be judged. If a man had lived a righteous life, his soul would be sent to the meadows of the blessed in ELYSIUM; but, if he had committed misdeeds, his soul would be punished in various ways. Following a period of reward or punishment, the soul would be incarnated in a new body. Only a soul that had lived a pious life three times could be liberated from the cycle. One text states that members of the Orphic community would assemble at night in a clubhouse and hold their services by the light of torches. Their rite consisted of a bloodless sacrifice and included the use of incense, prayer, and hymns.

Isis. The national religions of the peoples of the Greek Middle East also began to spread, in their Hellenized versions. A faintly exotic flavor surrounded these religions and made them particularly attractive to the Greeks and Romans. The most popular of the Middle Eastern mysteries was the cult of ISIS. It was already in vogue at Rome in the time of the emperor Augustus, at the beginning of the Christian era. The religion of Isis became widespread in Italy during the 1st and 2nd centuries CE. To a certain extent, the expansion of JUDAISM and CHRISTIANITY over the Roman world coincided with the expansion of the Egyptian cults.

Cults from Asia Minor. By 200 BCE the GREAT MOTHER OF THE GODS (Magna Mater) and her consort ATTIS were introduced into the Roman pantheon and were considered as Roman gods. Their cult seems to have been encouraged especially under Emperor Claudius about 50 CE. The mysteries symbolized, through her relationship to Attis, the relations of Mother Earth to her children and were intended to impress upon the mystēs the subjective certainty of having been united in a special way with the goddess. There was a strong element of hope for an afterlife in this cult. The Persian god MITHRA (Mithras), the god of light, was introduced much later, probably not before the 2nd century. The cult of Mithra was concerned with the origin of life from a sacred bull that was caught and then sacrificed by Mithra.

From Syria came the worship of several deities, of which JUPITER Heliopolitanus (the local god of Heliopolis; modern Ba'labakk, Lebanon) and JUPITER DOLICHENUS (the local god of Doliche in Commagene; modern Dülük, Turkey) were the most important. ADONIS (a god of vegetation) of Byblos (in modern Lebanon) had long been familiar to the Greeks and was often considered to be closely related to OSIRIS; the myths and rituals of the two gods were similar. Adonis' female partner was ATARGATIS (ASTARTE), whom the Greeks identified with APHRODITE.

The height of Syrian influence was in the 3rd century CE when SOL, the Syrian sun god, was on the verge of becoming the chief god of the Roman Empire. He was introduced into Rome by the emperor Elagabalus (Heliogabalus) in about 220 CE, and by about 240 CE PYTHIAN GAMES (i.e., festivals of the sun god APOLLO) were instituted in many cities of the empire. The emperor Aurelian (270–275) elevated Sol to the highest rank among the gods. Sanctuaries of Sol and the gods of other planets (septizonium) were constructed, and 50 years later the cult of Sol had a strong influence on the emperor Constantine's understanding of Christianity.

The different mystery religions were not exclusive of one another, but they appealed to different sociological groups. Isis was worshiped by lower-middle-class people in the seaports and trading towns. The followers of the Great Mother in Italy were principally craftsmen. Mithra was the god of soldiers and of imperial officials and freedmen. There were no special societies for slaves; but they were usually admitted to the societies, and, during the time of the festival, all men were considered equal.

A period of preparation preceded the initiation in each of the mysteries. In the Isis religion, for example, a period of 11 days of fasting, including abstinence from meat, wine, and sexual activity, was required before the ceremony. The candidates were segregated from the common folk in special apartments in the holy precinct of the community center; they were called “the chastely living ones” (hagneuontes).

In all the mystery religions the candidates swore an OATH of secrecy. Before initiation, confession was expected. The candidate sometimes told at length the story of the faults of his life up to the point of his BAPTISM, which was commonly a part of the initiation ceremony, and the community of devotees listened to the confession. It was believed that the rite of baptism would wash away all the candidate’s misdeeds.

The baptism could be either by water or by fire, and the rites often included actions that had an exotic flavor. Sulfur torches were used during the baptism ceremony; they were dipped into water and then—contrary to the expectations of the observers—burned when drawn out of the water. In a dark room a script would suddenly become visible on a wall that had been prepared accordingly. Instructions still exist for producing a nimbus effect—the appearance of light around the head of a priest. The priest’s head was shaved and prepared with a protective ointment; then a circular metal receptacle for alcohol was fixed on his head; it was set aflame in a dark room and would shine for some seconds. In the Isis mysteries, the initiation was sometimes accomplished by means of a “sacred marriage” (HIEROS GAMOS).

Seasonal festivals. The religions of Demeter and of Isis and the Great Mother had something of an ecclesiastical year. The seasonal festivals were inherited from old ceremonies that had been closely associated with the sowing and reaping of grain and with the production of wine. The dates varied greatly according to the geographic conditions and the emphasis of the seasonal rites in the country in which the mysteries had originated.

The festivals of the Isis religion were connected with the three Egyptian seasons caused by the cycle of the Nile River (inundation, sowing, and reaping). About July 19, when the whole country was almost desiccated by the heat and the drought, the high waters of the new flood miraculously arrived from Ethiopia. On that day, just before sunrise, Sirius (the Dog Star, or the star of Isis) would make its first appearance of the season on the horizon. This was the sacred New Year’s Day for the Egyptians, and the festival of the Nile flood was their greatest festival. There were, in addition, the festivals of sowing and reaping. In Roman times, important Isis festivals were held on December 25, January 6, and March 5. The March festival was a spring festival that celebrated the beginning of the seafaring season. A ship was carried on a cart (carrus navalis) through the city. It was followed by a procession of choruses, candidates, mystai in bright clothes wearing masks, and priests carrying the insignia of the goddess. The ship was let into the sea, and the participants returned to the temple, where initiation ceremonies, banquets, and dances were held.

that were the subject of later Christian theological discussions were already eagerly debated in the mystery religions. In a Hermetic treatise, for example, the existence of God was proved from the evident order of the world. This argument, which had first been formulated by ZOROASTER, was expressed in the form of questions: Who could have created the heavens and the stars, the sun and the moon, except God? Who could have made wind, water, fire, and earth (the elements), the seasons of the year, the crops, the animals, and man, except God?

Passionate debates were held about the question of whether man was subject to blind fate. For many Greeks and Romans, ASTROLOGY was the only sensible method of studying man's life and fortune. While the mystery religions admitted that the stars ruled the world and that the planets had evil influences, the highest god of the religion (e.g., SARAPIS in the Isis Mysteries) stood far above the stars and was their master. A man who decided to become a servant of this god stepped out of the circle of determination and entered into the sphere of liberty. The god could suspend determination, because he ruled over the stars, and he could save his servant from illness and prolong his life, even against the will of fate. In the Isis Mysteries there was a theology of GRACE foreshadowing Christian doctrine.

In many of the mystery cults, there was a marked tendency toward henotheism—the worship of one god without denying the existence of other gods. Thus, Isis was the essence of all goddesses; Sarapis was the name uniting the gods ZEUS, PLUTO, DIONYSUS, ASCLEPIUS, HELIOS, and the Jewish god YHWH (YAHWEH). In the religion of Sol, an elaborate syncretistic theology was developed to show that all known gods of all nations were nothing but provisional names for the sun god.

MYSTERY RELIGIONS AND CHRISTIANITY

Christianity originated during the time of the Roman Empire, which was also the time at which the mysteries reached their height of popularity. This was by no means an accident. The parallel development was fostered by the new conditions prevailing in the Roman Empire, in which the old political units were dissolved, and the whole civilized world was ruled by one monarch. People were free to move from one country to another and became cosmopolitan. The ideas of mined by astronomy. The greatest festival was held on December 24–25, at the time of the winter solstice. Because from this date the length of the day began to increase, it was regarded as the day of the rebirth of the god and of the renovation of life.

THEOLOGY

One of the central subjects in mystery writings was cosmogony—the theory of the origin or creation of the world. In the Hermetic treatises, in the Chaldean Oracles, and in the little known writings of MITHRAISM, the COSMOGONY was modeled after Plato's Timaeus, and it always dealt with the creation of the soul and with the soul's subsequent fate.

Many of the questions

Greek philosophy penetrated everywhere in this society. Thus, under identical conditions, new forms of religious communities sprang from similar roots. The mystery religions and Christianity had many similar features—e.g., a time of preparation before initiation and periods of fasting; baptism and banquets; vigils and early-morning ceremonies; PILGRIMAGES and new names for the initiates. The purity demanded in the worship of Sol and in the Chaldean fire rites was similar to Christian standards. In the Christian congregations of the first two centuries, the variety of rites and creeds was almost as great as in the mystery communities; few of the early Christian congregations could have been called orthodox according to later standards. The date of CHRISTMAS was purposely fixed on December 25 to push into the background the great festival of the sun god, and EPIPHANY on January 6 to supplant an Egyptian festival of the same day. The EASTER ceremonies rivaled the pre-Christian spring festivals. The religious art of the Christians continued the traditional art of the preceding generations. The Christian representations of the MADONNA and child are clearly the continuation of the representations of Isis and her son suckling her breast. The statue of the Good Shepherd carrying his lost sheep and the pastoral themes on Christian sarcophagi were also taken over from the craftsmanship of other religious traditions (see ART AND RELIGION).

In theology the differences between early Christians, Gnostics, and non-Christian Hermetists were slight. In the large library discovered at Naj' Hammādī, in upper Egypt, in 1945, HERMETIC WRITINGS were found side-by-side with Christian Gnostic texts. The doctrine of the soul taught in Gnostic communities was almost identical to that taught in the mysteries: the soul emanated from the Father, fell into the body, and had to return to its former home. The Greeks interpreted the national religions of the Greek Middle East chiefly in terms of Plato's philosophical and religious concepts. Interpretation in Platonic concepts was also the means by which the Judeo-Christian set of creeds was thoroughly assimilated to Greek ideas by the early Christian thinkers CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA and ORIGEN. Thus, the religions had a common conceptual framework.

The similarity of the religious vocabulary is also great. Greek life was characterized by such things as democratic institutions, seafaring, gymnasium and athletic games, theater, and philosophy. The mystery religions adopted many expressions from these domains: they spoke of the assembly (ekklēsia) of the mystai; the voyage of life; the ship, the anchor, and the port of religion; and the wreath of the initiate; life was a stage and man the actor. The Christians took over the entire terminology; but many words were strangely twisted in order to fit into the Christian world: the service of the state (leitourgia) became the ritual, or liturgy, of the church; the decree of the assembly and the opinions of the philosophers (dogma) became the fixed doctrine of Christianity; the correct opinion (orthē doxa) about things became orthodoxy.

There are also differences between Christianity and the mysteries. Mystery religions, as a rule, can be traced back to tribal origins, Christianity to a single person. The holy stories of the mysteries were myths, whereas the GOSPELS of the NEW TESTAMENT relate historical events. The essential features of Christianity were fixed once and for all in a book; the mystery doctrines, however, always remained in a much greater state of fluidity. The theology of the mysteries was developed to a far lesser degree than the Christian theology. The cult of rulers in the manner of the imperial mysteries was impossible in Jewish and Christian worship.

The mysteries declined quickly when the emperor CONSTANTINE raised Christianity to the status of the state religion. After a short period of toleration, the other religions were prohibited. The property of the pagan gods was confiscated and the temples destroyed, and the gold of the temple treasuries was used to mint coins. To show the beginning of a new era, the capital city of the empire was transferred to the new Christian city of Constantinople. Only remnants of the mystery doctrines, amalgamated with Platonism, were transmitted by a few philosophers and individualists to the religious thinkers of the Byzantine Empire. The mystery religions survived to exert some influence on the thinkers of the Middle Ages and the philosophers of the Italian Renaissance.

MYSTICISM, in general, a spiritual quest for hidden truth or wisdom, the goal of which is union with the divine or sacred (the transcendent realm). Forms of mysticism are found in all major world religions, by analogy in the shamanic and other ecstatic practices of nonliterate cultures, and in secular experience.

The goal of mysticism is union with the divine or sacred. The path to that union is usually developed by following four stages: purgation (of bodily desires), purification (of the will), illumination (of the mind), and unification (of one's will or being with the divine). If "the object of man's existence is to be a Man, that is, to re-establish the harmony which originally belonged between him and the divinized state before the separation took place which disturbed the equilibrium" (The Life and Doctrine of Paracelsus), mysticism will always be a part of the way of return to the source of being, a way of counteracting the experience of alienation.

Mysticism's apparent denial, or self-negation, is part of a psychological process or strategy that does not really deny the person. Indeed, many forms of mysticism satisfy the claims of rationality, ecstasy, and righteousness. There is obviously something nonmental, paradoxical, and unpredictable about the mystical phenomenon, but it is not, therefore, irrational or antirational or "religion without thought." Rather, as ZEN Buddhist masters say, it is knowledge of the most adequate kind, only it cannot be expressed in words. If there is a mystery about mystical experience, it is something it shares with life and consciousness. Mysticism, a form of living in depth, indicates that in humans there is a meeting ground of various levels of reality; we are more than one-dimensional. Despite the interaction and correspondence between levels—"What is below is like what is above; what is above is like what is below" (Tabula Smaragdina, "Emerald Tablet," a work on alchemy attributed to Hermes Trismegistos; see HERMETIC WRITINGS)—they are not to be equated or confused. At once a praxis (technique) and a gnosis (esoteric knowledge, see GNOSTICISM), mysticism consists of a way or discipline.

The relationship of the religion of faith to mysticism ("personal religion raised to the highest power") is ambiguous, a mixture of respect and misgivings. Though mysticism may be associated with religion, it need not be. The mystic often represents a type that the structured and hierarchical religious institution (i.e., the established church) does not and cannot produce and does not know what to do with if and when one appears. As William Ralph Inge, an English theologian, commented, "institutionalism and mysticism have been uneasy bedfellows." Although mysticism has been the core of Hinduism and Buddhism, it has been little more than a minor element—and, frequently, a disturbing one—in Judaism, Christianity, and Islam. As the 15th- to 16th-century Italian political philosopher Machiavelli had noted of the 13th-century Christian monastic leaders ST. FRANCIS and ST. DOMINIC, they had saved religion but destroyed the church.

Paradigmatic pronouncements in regard to mysticism pose problems of their own. The classic Indian formula—"that thou art," tat tvam asi (Chandogya Upanishad, 6.9)—is hedged around with the profoundest ambiguity. The difficulty reappears in the thought of the medieval Christian mystic MEISTER ECKHART, who had the church raising questions for such unguarded statements as "The knower and the known are one. God and I, we are one in knowledge" and "There is no distinction between us."

Mysticism may be defined as the belief in a third kind of knowledge, the other two being sense knowledge and knowledge by inference. This same view was held by the 3rd-century-CE Greek philosopher Plotinus. But the pattern misses the other dominant quality of mystical experience—love or union through love. The medieval, theistic view of mysticism (as of religious life) was that it was "a stretching out of the soul into God through the urge of love, an experimental knowledge of God through unifying love."

Certain forms of mysticism, however, would seem to strive toward a naked encounter with the Whole or All, without and beyond symbols. Of this kind of direct apprehension of the absolute, introverted mysticism offers examples from different times and traditions. Instead of looking out, the gaze turns inward, toward the unchanging, the undifferentiated "One without a second." The process by which this state is attained is by a blotting out or suppression of all physical sensations—indeed, of the entire empirical content of consciousness. Cittavrttinirodha ("the holding or stopping of the mind stuff") was how the 2nd-century-BCE Indian mystic Patañjali described it.

Such undifferentiated unity or union between the individual and the supreme self is unacceptable to certain traditions and temperaments. The Jewish philosopher MARTIN BUBER emphasized an "I-Thou" relationship: "All real living is meeting," and one Thou cannot become It. But even his own "unforgettable experience" of union he would explain as "illusory." With a wider range, a British scholar, R.C. Zaehner, has tried to establish different kinds, or types, of mysticism: of isolation, the separation of spirit and matter, eternity from time; pantheistic, or "pan-enhenic," in which the soul is the universe—all creaturely existence is one; the theistic, in which the soul feels identified with God; and the beatific, with its hope of deification when "the perishable puts on the imperishable."

Mystical experience, which is centred in a seeking for unity, admits of wide variations but falls into recognizable types: mild and extreme, extroverted and introverted, and theistic and nontheistic. Another well-known typology—corresponding to the faculties of thinking, willing, and feeling—employs the Indian formula, the respective ways of knowledge (JÑANA), works (KARMA), and devotion (BHAKTI). Claims have been made on behalf of each, though many mystics have tried to accord to each its place and also to arrive at a synthesis, as in the BHAGAVAD GĪTĀ. Depending on the powers of discrimination, the intellectual or the contemplative type tries to reach the Highest, the One, or the Godhead behind God. In its approach toward the supreme identity it tends to be chary of multiplicity, "to deny the world that it may find reality." Plotinus was "ashamed of being in the body." In the 17th century, Spinoza's non-denominational concept of intellectual love of God revealed a sense of aloofness or isolation reminiscent of the ancient Hindus.

Another type of mysticism is that defined by love and devotion. A theistic attitude, or devotional mysticism, depends upon mutual attraction. In the words of a Sufi (see SUFISM) poet, "I sought Him for thirty years, I thought that it was I who desired Him, but no, it was He who desired me." The path of devotion includes the rituals of prayer, worship, and adoration, which—if done with sincerity, inwardness, and understanding—can bring some of the most rewarding treasures of the religious life, including ecstasy (or SAMADHI). There is a paradox and a danger here: the paradox of avoiding the loss of personality, the danger of self-indulgence.

Also, in an unpurified medium, the experiences may and do give rise to erotic feelings, a fact observed and duly warned against by the Christian CHURCH FATHERS and other leaders of other faiths as well. (Zen Buddhism, for instance, avoids both the overly personal and erotic suggestions.) Sometimes the distinction between eros (Greek: "erotic love") or KAMA (Sanskrit: "sexual love") and AGAPE (Greek: "a higher love") or prema (Sanskrit: "higher love") can be thin. In the Indian tradition the Vaiṣṇava and Tantric experiments were, in their apparently different ways, bold and honest attempts at sublimation, though some of these experiments were failures. (See VAISNAVISM.)

The same fate is likely to overtake the use of pharmacological aids to visionary experience—practices that are by no means new and occur in traditions as disparate as ZORASTRIANISM and NATIVE AMERICAN RELIGIONS. A yogic writer, Patañjali, speaks of the use of ausadhi (a medicinal herb) as a means to yogic experience, and the VEDAS and TANTRAS refer to wine as part of worship and the initiatory rites. The Greek Mysteries (religions of salvation) sometimes used sedatives and stimulants. Primarily meant to remove ethical, social, and mental inhibitions and to open up the subconscious no less than the subliminal, these techniques, as a rule, were frowned upon, even though those who took the help of such artificial aids had undergone prior training and discipline. (See MYSTERY RELIGION.)

All of the major religious traditions have some form of mystical thought and practice. For some traditions mysticism forms a core piece of the religion, whereas, in the major Western monotheistic traditions, mystic thought and practice has tended to be at the periphery of those traditions.

HINDUISM is often predisposed to mystical interpretation. As the highest ideal of Hindu religious practice, ascetic MOKṢA ("release") has received the most attention. At least in part, YOGA represents the rise within traditional Hinduism of a special mystical technique that was intended to make possible for the select few a high degree of mystical insight originally predicated of the many. The techniques of Yoga, including the physical discipline of HATHA YOGA, were combined with traditional Hindu doctrines about the absorption of the individual soul in the All. Other forms of Hindu mysticism are more personal, relating the devotee to a particular deity of the Hindu pantheon, while still others stress the passivity of faith as trust and surrender to the grace and power of KRISHNA or RĀMA.

Common to the various traditions of BUDDHISM is an emphasis upon meditation and contemplation as means of moving toward NIRVANA, but each of the Buddhist traditions sets its own distinctive interpretation on that goal. Of special interest in any discussion of Buddhist mysticism are VAJRAYĀNA and Zen. Practitioners of Vajrayāna, or Tantric Buddhism, in Tibet combine Yogic discipline with an absolutistic philosophy and highly symbolic language to cultivate mystical ECSTASY.

Sufism, a mystical form of worship in ISLAM, often expresses itself in the metaphors of intoxication and of the love between bride and bridegroom—language that is not easy to reconcile with the stress of the QUR'AN upon the sovereignty and transcendence of ALLĀH. At the same time, mysticism made the reality of the divine accessible to those who found the God of the Qur'an austere and distant.

The foundations for Jewish mysticism were laid in the visions of the biblical prophets and the apocalyptic imagery of postbiblical JUDAISM. The most characteristic and profound theme of mystical Judaism is the QABBALĀH, which reached its climax in the SEFER HA-ZOHAR near the end of the 13th century. This "Book of Splendor" described the power and inner life of God and set forth the principles and commandments by means of which the true believer could regain the DEVEQUT ("adherence to God") that had been destroyed by humans' fall from pristine purity. Subsequent Jewish mysticism continued to build upon the Sefer ha-Zohar. The Hasidic form in particular had far-reaching effects upon the piety and practice of the common people; in the form it took in the thought of MARTIN BUBER, it shaped both Christian and secular thought as well.

The mystical aspects of CHRISTIANITY have been manifested most clearly in a recurring pattern of movements. In the religion of PAUL and JOHN, "Christ-mysticism," frequently spontaneous and unsought, is fundamental. The Desert Fathers of the 3rd and 4th centuries established an eremitic tradition of conscious preparation and practice for mystical enlightenment. AUGUSTINE'S account of the divine Light of being drew upon Neoplatonic themes and imagery that would figure strongly in the literature of subsequent mystics, perhaps culminating in Meister Eckhart (d. 1327/28?), who emphasized the reality of the ideal world, in which all things are eternally present as elements in the being of God. Mysticism flourished in the 14th century both within the church and in numerous heresies, a dichotomy that was to characterize several later periods. In general, Protestant mystics explicitly recognize that which is implied in Roman Catholic teaching: that the divine Light or Spark is a universal principle.

MYTH AND RITUAL SCHOOL, in the academic STUDY OF RELIGIONS, an analytic method that was especially important in the 1930s, particularly in the interpretation of Middle Eastern mythology. The scholars of this school, who were mainly located in Britain and the Scandinavian countries, contended that any myth functions, or at one time functioned, as the "explanation" of a ritual.

The Myth and Ritual School held that the enuma elish, the Babylonian creation epic, was a mythic drama re-enacted every year at the spring festival, at which time the foundation of the world is ritually renewed; the myth was, it was argued, expressing in language that which the ritual was enacting through action. The king, as the personified god, played the main role in the overall cultural pattern. The English branch of this school concentrated on anthropological and FOLKLORE studies. The Scandinavian branch (the "Uppsala School") concentrated on Semitic philological, cultural, and history-of-religions studies. It is represented in the latter part of the 20th century by Swedish historians of religion who have theorized that, for the entire ancient Middle East, certain cult patterns existed and that behind those cult patterns lay the sacred-king ideology.

Members of this school have had difficulty accounting for myths which lack a ritual context, and this method of interpretation fell out of favor in the latter half of the 20th century. The Myth-Ritual orientation, however, has persevered in some areas, and the study of sacrifice by Walter Burkert entitled Homo Necans: The Anthropology of Ancient Greek Sacrificial Ritual and Myth (1983) has been particularly influential. The most influential statement of the Myth and Ritual School's position is to be found in Myth and Ritual (1933), edited by the English biblical scholar and Orientalist Samuel Hooke; another influential work is Jane Harrison's Themis (1922). The most prominent critique of the theory is Joseph Fontenrose's The Ritual Theory of Myth (1966).

MYTHOLOGY

The body of symbolic narratives that constitute mythology are usually of unknown origin and at least partly traditional. They ostensibly relate actual events and are especially associated with RELIGIOUS BELIEF. Mythology is distinguished from symbolic behavior (cult, ritual) and symbolic places or objects (temples, ICONS). Myths are specific accounts of gods or superhuman beings involved in extraordinary events or circumstances in a time that is unspecified but which is understood as existing apart from ordinary human experience. The term mythology denotes both the study of myth and the body of myths belonging to a particular religious tradition.

While the outline of myths from a past period or from a society other than one's own can usually be seen quite clearly, to recognize the myths that are dominant in one's own time and society is always difficult. This is hardly surprising, because a myth has its authority not by proving itself but by presenting itself. In this sense the authority of a myth indeed "goes without saying," and the myth can be outlined in detail only when its authority is no longer unquestioned but has been overcome in some manner by another, more comprehensive myth.

The word myth derives from the Greek mythos, which has a range of meanings from "word," through "saying" and "story," to "fiction"; the unquestioned validity of mythos can be contrasted with logos, the word whose validity or truth can be argued and demonstrated. Because myths narrate fantastic events with no attempt at proof, it is sometimes assumed that they are simply stories with no factual basis, and the word has become a synonym for falsehood or, at best, misconception. In the STUDY OF RELIGION, however, it is important to distinguish between myths and stories that are merely untrue.

RELATION OF MYTHS TO OTHER NARRATIVE FORMS

In Western culture there are a number of literary or narrative genres that scholars have related in different ways to myths. Examples are fables, fairy tales, folktales, sagas, epics, legends, and etiologic tales (which refer to causes or explain why a thing is the way it is). Another form of tale, the PARABLE, differs from myth in its purpose and character. Even in the West, however, there is no agreed definition of any of these genres, and some scholars question whether multiplying categories of narrative is helpful at all, as opposed to working with a very general concept such as the traditional tale. Non-Western cultures apply classifications that are different both from the Western categories and from one another. Most, however, make a basic distinction between “true” and “fictitious” narratives, with “true” ones corresponding to what in the West would be called myths.

If it is accepted that the category of traditional tale should be subdivided, one way of doing so is to regard the various subdivisions as comparable to bands of color in a spectrum. Within this figurative spectrum, there will be similarities and analogies between myth and folktale or between myth and legend or between fairy tale and folktale. In the section that follows, it is assumed that useful distinctions can be drawn between different categories. It should, however, be remembered throughout that these classifications are far from rigid and that, in many cases, a given tale might be plausibly assigned to more than one category.

Fables. The word fable derives from the Latin word fabula, which originally meant about the same as the Greek mythos; like mythos, it came to mean a fictitious or untrue story. Myths, in contrast, are not presented as fictitious or untrue.

Fables, like some myths, feature personified animals or natural objects as characters. Unlike myths, however, fables almost always end with an explicit moral message, and this highlights the characteristic feature of fables—namely, that they are instructive tales that teach morals about human social behavior. Myths, by contrast, tend to lack this directly didactic aspect, and the sacred narratives that they embody are often hard to translate into direct prescriptions for action in everyday human terms. Another difference between fables and myths relates to a feature of the narratives that they present. The context of a typical fable will be unspecific as to time and space; e.g., “A fox and a goose met at a pool.” A typical myth, on the other hand, will be likely to identify by name the god or hero concerned in a given exploit and to specify details of geography and genealogy; e.g., “Oedipus was the son of Laius, the king of Thebes.”

Fairy tales. The term fairy tale is normally used to refer to stories (directed above all at an audience of children) about an individual, almost always young, who confronts strange or magical events. Like myths, fairy tales present extraordinary beings and events. Like fables, but unlike myths, fairy tales tend to be placed in a setting that is geographically and temporally vague.

Folktales. There is much disagreement among scholars as to how to define the folktale; consequently, there is disagreement about the relation between folktale and myth. Some scholars regard myths as one type of folktale, while the particular characteristic of myth is that its narratives deal with sacred events that happened “in the beginning.” Others either consider folktale a subdivision of myth or regard the two categories as distinct but overlapping. Examples of folktale motifs are encounters between ordinary human beings and supernatural adversaries such as witches, GIANTS, or ogres; contests to win a bride; the “simple” person outwitting a clever foe; and attempts to overcome a wicked stepmother or jealous sisters. But these typical folktale themes occur also in stories normally classified as myths, and there must always be a strong element of arbitrariness in assigning a motif to a particular category.

Sagas and epics. The word saga is often used in a generalized and loose way to refer to any extended narrative re-creation of historical events. The word saga is Old Norse and means “what is said,” and the sagas belong to a narrative type confined to a particular time and place. Epic, meanwhile, is similar to saga in that both narrative forms look back to an age of heroic endeavor, but it differs from saga in that epics are almost always composed in verse. Epics characteristically incorporate mythical events and persons, and myth is thus a prime source of the material on which epic draws.

Legends. In common usage the word legend usually characterizes a traditional tale thought to have a historical basis, as in the legends of King Arthur or Robin Hood. In this view, a distinction may be drawn between myth (which refers to the supernatural and the sacred) and legend (which is grounded in historical fact). But the distinction between myth and legend must be used with care: because of the assumed link between legend and historical fact, there may be a tendency to refer to narratives that correspond to one's own beliefs as legends, while exactly comparable stories from other traditions may be classified as myths.

Parables. The term myth is not normally applied to narratives that have as their explicit purpose the illustration of a doctrine or standard of conduct. Instead, the term parable, or illustrative tale, is used. Parables have a more subservient function than myths. They may clarify something to an individual or a group but do not take on the revelatory character of myth.

Etiologic tales. Etiologic tales are very close to myth, and some scholars regard them as merely a particular type of myth. An etiologic tale explains the origin of a custom, state of affairs, or natural feature in the human or divine world. The etiologic theme often seems to be added to a mythical narrative as an afterthought. In other words, the etiology is not the distinctive characteristic of myth.

APPROACHES TO THE STUDY OF MYTH AND MYTHOLOGY

The project of interpreting myths has a history thousands of years long. The growth of philosophy in ancient Greece promoted the allegorical interpretation of myth—i.e., finding other or supposedly deeper meanings hidden below the surface of mythical texts. Such meanings were usually seen as involving natural phenomena or human values. Related to this was a tendency toward rationalism—the scrutiny of myths in such a way as to make sense of the statements contained in them without taking literally their references to gods, monsters, or the supernatural. Of special and long-lasting influence in the history of the interpretation of myth was EUHEMERISM (named after EUHEMERUS, a Greek writer who flourished about 300 BCE), according to which certain gods were originally great people venerated because of their benefactions to mankind.

The CHURCH FATHERS of early CHRISTIANITY adopted an attitude of modified Euhemerism, according to which classical mythology was to be explained in terms of mere men who had been raised to superhuman status because of their deeds. By this means, Christians were able to incorporate myths from the culturally authoritative pre-Christian past into a Christian framework while defusing their religious significance—the gods became ordinary humans.

In early 18th-century Italy, Giambattista Vico made the first clear case for the role of the human creative imagination in the formation of distinct myths at successive cultural stages, but his work had no influence in his own century. Instead, the notion that pre-Christian myths were distortions of the biblical revelation (first expressed in the Renaissance) continued to find favor. Nevertheless, Enlightenment philosophy, reports from voyages of discovery, and missionary reports (especially the Jesuits' accounts of North American Indians) contributed to scholarship and fostered greater objectivity. In the 18th century the French scholar Bernhard Le Bovier de Fontenelle compared Greek and American Indian myths and suggested that there was a universal human predisposition toward mythology. He attributed the absurdities (as he saw them) of myths to the fact that the stories grew up among an earlier, more primitive human society.

In the late 18th century artists and intellectuals came increasingly to emphasize the role of the emotions in human life and, correspondingly, to play down the importance of reason (which had been regarded as supremely important by thinkers of the Enlightenment). Those involved in the new movement were known as Romantics. The Romantic movement had profound implications for the study of myth. Myths—both the stories from Greek and Roman antiquity and contemporary folktales—were regarded by the Romantics as repositories of experience far more vital and powerful than those obtainable from what was felt to be the artificial art and poetry of the civilization of contemporary Europe. For the German philosopher Johann Gottfried von Herder, ancient myths were the natural expressions of the concerns that would have confronted the ancients; and those concerns were the very ones that, according to Herder, still confronted the Volck—e.g., ordinary people—in his own day.

Since the Romantic movement, all study of myth has been comparative, although comparative attempts were made earlier. The prevalence of the comparative approach has meant that since the 19th century even the most specialized studies have made generalizations about more than one tradition or at the very least have had to take comparative works by others into account. Indeed, for there to be any philosophical inquiry into the nature and function of myth at all, there must exist a body of data about myths across a range of societies. Such data would not exist without a comparative approach.

MAX MÜLLER, a German Orientalist, was a critical figure in the modern study of mythology. In his view, the mythology of the original Indo-European peoples had consisted of allegorical stories about the workings of nature, in particular such features as the sky, the Sun, and the dawn. In the course of time, though, these original meanings had been lost (through, in Müller's notorious phrasing, a "disease of language"), so that the myths no longer told in a "rationally intelligible" way of phenomena in the natural world but instead appeared to describe the "irrational" activities of gods, heroes, NYMPHS, and others. One of the problems with this view is, of course, that it fails to account for the fact that those who tell such stories do so long after their supposed meanings had been forgotten, in the manifest belief that the stories refer, not to nature, but precisely to gods, heroes, and other beings.

Interest in myth was greatly stimulated in Germany by Friedrich von Schelling's philosophy of mythology, which argued that myth was a form of expression, characteristic of a particular stage in human development, through which humans imagine the Absolute (for Schelling an all-embracing unity in which all differences are reconciled). Scholarly interest in myth has continued throughout the 20th century. Many scholars have adopted a psychological approach because of interest aroused by the theories of SIGMUND FREUD. Subsequently, new approaches in sociology and anthropology have continued to encourage the study of myth.

One important school of thought within anthropological circles approached myth from the standpoint of FUNCTIONALISM. Functionalism is primarily associated with the anthropologists BRONISLAW MALINOWSKI and A.R. Radcliffe-Brown. Both ask not what the origin of any given social behavior may be but how it contributes to maintaining the system of which it is a part. In this view, in all types of society, every aspect of life—every custom, belief, or idea—makes its own special contribution to the continued effective working of the whole society. Functionalism has had a wide appeal to anthropologists in Britain and the United States, especially as an interpretation of myth as integrated with other aspects of society and as supporting existing social relationships.

The structuralist study of myth has been equally important. Structuralist approaches to myth are based on the analogy of myth to language. Just as a language is composed of significant oppositions (e.g., between phonemes, the constituent sounds of the language), so myths are formed out of significant oppositions between certain terms and categories. Structuralist analysis aims at uncovering what it sees as the logic of myth. It is argued that supposedly primitive thought is logically consistent but that the terms of this logic are not those with which modern Western culture is familiar. Instead they are terms related to items of the everyday world in which the "primitive" culture exists. This logic is usually based on empirical categories (e.g., raw/cooked, upstream/downstream, bush/village) or empirical objects (e.g., buffalo, river, gold, eagle). Some structuralists, such as the French anthropologist Claude Lévi-Strauss, have emphasized the presence of the same logical patterns in myths throughout the world.

NABU \ˈnä-ˌbū\, Hebrew Nebo \ˈne-bō\, major god in the Assyro-Babylonian pantheon. He was patron of the art of writing and a god of vegetation. Nabu's symbols were the clay tablet and the stylus, the instruments held to be proper to him who inscribed the fates assigned to humans by the gods. In the OLD TESTAMENT, the worship of Nebo is denounced by ISAIAH (46:1).

Samsudītana, the last king of the 1st dynasty of Babylon (reigned 1625–1595 BCE), introduced a statue of Nabu into ESAGILA, the temple of MARDUK, the city god of Babylon. Not until the 1st millennium BCE, however, did the relationship between Marduk and Nabu and their relative positions in theology and popular devotion become clear. Marduk, the father of Nabu, took precedence over him, at least theoretically, in Babylonia. But in popular devotion it was Nabu—who knows all and sees all—who was chief, especially during the centuries immediately preceding the fall of Babylon. He had a chapel named Ezida in his father's temple Esagila, where at the New Year feast he was installed alongside Marduk. In his own holy city, Borsippa, he was supreme.

NĀGA \ˈnä-gə\ (Sanskrit: “serpent”), in Hindu and Buddhist mythology, member of a class of semidivine beings considered to be a strong, handsome race who can assume either human or serpentine form. The nāgas live in an underground kingdom called Nāga-loka, or Pātāla-loka, which is filled with resplendent palaces, beautifully ornamented with precious gems. BRAHMĀ, it is said, relegated the nāgas to the nether regions when they became too populous on earth and commanded them to bite only the truly evil or those destined to die prematurely. They are also associated with rivers, lakes, seas, and wells and are regarded as guardians of treasure. Three notable nāgas are Śeṣa (or Ananta), who in the VAIṢṆAVA myth of creation supports Vishnu-Nārāyaṇa as he lies on the cosmic ocean and on whom the created world rests; Vāsuki, who was used as a churning rope to churn the cosmic MILK-OCEAN; and Takṣaka, the tribal chief of the snakes. In modern HINDUISM the birth of the serpents is celebrated on Nāga-pañcamī in the month of Śrāvaṇa (July–August).

The female nāgas (or nāgīs), according to tradition, are serpent princesses of striking beauty, and the dynasties of Manipur in northeastern India, the Pallavas in southern India, and the ruling family of Funan (ancient Indochina) traced their origin to the union of a man and a nāgī.

In BUDDHISM, nāgas are often represented as door guardians or as minor deities. The snake king Mucilinda, who sheltered the BUDDHA from rain for seven days while he was deep in meditation, is beautifully depicted in the 9th–13th century Mon-Khmer Buddhas of Thailand and Cambodia. In JAINISM, the Jain savior (TĪRTHANĀRĀ PĀRŚVANĀTHA) is always shown with a canopy of snake hoods above his head.

NĀGĀRJUNA \nä-ˈgär-jü-nə\ (b. c. 150 CE—d. c. 250), Indian Buddhist monk-philosopher and founder of the MĀDHYAMIKA school. He is recognized as a patriarch by several later Buddhist schools.

The earliest account of Nāgārjuna's life is in Chinese, supplied about 405 CE by a renowned Buddhist translator, KUMĀRAJĪVA. It agrees with later Chinese and Tibetan accounts that Nāgārjuna was born in South India into a BRAHMIN family. The stories of his boyhood indicate that he had an extraordinary intellectual capacity and underwent a spiritual conversion to MAHĀYĀNA BUDDHISM. According to Kumārajīva's account, Nāgārjuna mastered some Mahāyāna verses of great profundity in a short time and then propagated the truth (DHARMA) in India, successfully defeating many opponents in scholastic philosophical debates. Traditional accounts also suggest that he lived to an old age and then decided to end his life.

The fact that various texts ascribe different religious qualities to Nāgārjuna and give dates for his life that range over 500 years suggests that the references may pertain to several persons and may include some imaginary accounts. Nonetheless, some elements of Nāgārjuna's biographies are supported by historical materials. Scholarship now indicates that Nāgārjuna could have lived as early as 50 CE and as late as 280. His dates are usually given as 150–250.

Besides the verses of Mādhyamika analysis, there are a large number of Tantric and medical works attributed by Tibetan tradition to a “Nāgārjuna.” There are also references in late Indian materials to a great SIDHA, or sorcerer, by the name of Nāgārjuna, who acquired his magical power through Tantric practices. Closely allied stories tell of a powerful alchemist who, among other accomplishments, discovered the elixir of immortality. The reports of a great sorcerer, however, are generally not accepted outside the Tibetan tradition as applying to the 2nd-century philosopher.

Something of the Mādhyamika philosopher's life and attitude can be gleaned from Nāgārjuna's writings. His critical analytic verses and his didactic treatises, letters, and hymns indicate his deep concern to practice “nonattachment” in engagement with people. Through rigorous logical argumentation, as found in the Mādhyamika Kārikā, he criticized both Buddhist and Hindu views on existence. Most of his polemics, however, were directed toward the explanations of existence offered by the Buddhist schools of Sthaviravāda (THERAVĀDA) and SARVĀSTIVĀDA. Nāgārjuna's position is closely allied to, and probably dependent on, that found in the early Mahāyāna literature known as the Prajñāpāramitā-sūtras (“Perfection of Wisdom Verses”), in which the notion of śūnyatā (EMPTINESS) is an important term for the wayfarer on the path to enlightenment and becomes the distinguishing term in the Mādhyamika school. Nāgārjuna's clarification of the term śūnyatā is regarded by Buddhists as an intellectual and spiritual achievement of the highest order.

NAGUAL \nä-'gwäl, also spelled nahual \nä-'wäl, personal GUARDIAN SPIRIT believed by some Meso-American Indians to reside in an animal, in some areas the animal into which certain powerful men can transform themselves to do harm; thus, the word derives from the complex Nahuatl word nahualli (meaning a being who can transform into another).

The person who is to receive his nagual traditionally goes to an isolated spot and sleeps there; the animal that appears in his dreams or that confronts him when he awakens will then be his particular nagual. Many modern Meso-American Indians believe that the first creature to cross over the ashes spread before a newborn baby becomes that child's nagual. In some areas it is believed that only the most powerful leaders possess naguals.

NAĤMANIDES \näk-'mä-nə-'dēz, original name Moses ben Nahman, also called NaĤamani, or, by acronym, Ramban \räm-'bän\ (b. c. 1194, Gerona, Catalonia—d. 1270, Acre, Palestine), Spanish scholar, RABBI, philosopher, poet, physician, and Qabbalist.

NaĤmanides earned his livelihood as a physician and served as rabbi at Gerona and as chief rabbi of Catalonia. As one of the leading rabbinical scholars in Spain, he was summoned by King James I of Aragon and forced to participate in a public disputation with Christians; although victorious in his arguments, he was forced to flee from Spain (1263), and he settled at Acre in Palestine. There he reorganized the Jewish settlement and began his most celebrated scholarly work, a commentary on the PENTATEUCH.

NaĤmanides' HALAKHIC works are considered classics of rabbinical literature. His commentaries on the TALMUD greatly influenced the course of subsequent Jewish rabbinical scholarship in Spain.

NAIAD \nä-'äd, 'nä-, -äd\ (Greek Naias, from naien, "to flow"), in Greek MYTHOLOGY, one of the NYMPHS of flowing water—springs, rivers, fountains, lakes. The Naiads were represented as beautiful, lighthearted, and beneficent. Like the other classes of nymphs, they were extremely long-lived but not immortal.

NAJAF \nä-'jäf, also called an-Najaf \än-, city, capital of al-Najaf muhāfaza (governorate), central Iraq. One of Iraq's two holy cities (the other is KARBALĀ'), Najaf lies on a ridge just west of the Euphrates River, about 120 miles south of Baghdad. The CALIPH Hārūn ar-Rashīd is reputed to have founded it in 791 CE; its growth occurred mostly after the 10th century. In the city's center is the mosque containing the tomb of 'ALĪ ibn Abī Ṭālib (c. 600–661), cousin and son-in-law of MUHAMMAD, fourth Muslim caliph, and, through a rift with other early Muslim leaders, the spiritual founder of SHĪ'ITE Islam; Najaf is therefore one of Shi'ism's greatest shrine cities. At the turn of the 20th century it had about 19 Shi'ite MADRASAS (religious colleges) where students from many Shi'ite communities studied with leading religious scholars. Najaf's population is predominantly Arab, but there is a sizeable Persian presence also. Najaf has long been a hotbed of Shi'ite resistance against the SUNNI rulers in Baghdad, and in the 20th century this resistance has been a source of tension between the Sunni government of Iraq and the Shi'ites in Iran. In the aftermath of the 1991 Persian Gulf War, large sections of the city were destroyed by Iraqi government forces who had mobilized to quell a widespread Shi'ite revolt. The operations of the madrasas there have been severely curtailed, and the number of students and teachers had dwindled considerably as a result.

NAKAE TŌJU \nä-'kä,-e-'tō-'jū, original personal name Gen, pseudonym Mokken \mök-'ken\ (b. April 21, 1608, Ōmi province, Japan—d. Oct. 11, 1648, Ōmi province), NEO-CONFUCIAN scholar who established in Japan the Idealist (HSIN-HSŪEH) thought of the Chinese philosopher WANG YANG-MING.

Nakae, a retainer to his feudal lord, was originally a follower of the teachings of the Chinese Neo-Confucian CHU HSI, whose doctrines had become a part of the official ideology of the Japanese government. In 1634 he returned home to devote himself to teaching and study, eventually abandoning his adherence to the Chu Hsi school of thought and becoming a propagator of the philosophy of Wang Yang-ming. He subsequently attracted many distinguished disciples and became known as the sage of Ōmi province.

Both Wang and Nakae believed that the unifying principle (LI) of the universe exists in the human mind and not in the external world and that the true Way could be discovered through intuition and self-reflection, rejecting Chu Hsi's idea that it could be found through empirical investigation. Convinced that a concept can be fully understood only when acted upon, Nakae emphasized practice rather than abstract learning. This emphasis on individual action made Nakae's philosophy popular among the zealous Japanese reformers and patriots of the 19th and 20th centuries.

NĀLANDA \nä-'lən-də, celebrated Buddhist monastic center, often spoken of as a university, southwest of Bihār city in northern Bihār state, India. The monasteries were founded in the Gupta period (5th century CE). The powerful 7th-century ruler of Kanauj (Kannauj), Harṣavardhana, is reported to have contributed to them. Nālanda continued to flourish as a center of learning under the Pāla dynasty (8th–12th century), and it became a center of religious sculpture in stone and bronze. Nālanda was probably sacked during Muslim raids in Bihār (c. 1200) and never recovered.

According to pilgrims' accounts, from Gupta times the monasteries of Nālanda were surrounded by a high wall. Excavations have revealed a row of 10 monasteries of the traditional Indian design—oblong brick structures with cells opening onto four sides of a courtyard, with a main entrance on one side and a shrine facing the entrance across the courtyard. In front of the monasteries stood a row of STUPAS in brick and plaster. The complex is referred to on seals discovered there as Mahāvihāra ("Great Monastery").

NĀM \ˈnām\ (Sanskrit: "name," specifically, "name of God"), which, as a kind of MANTRA, is to be recited or sung in certain Hindu devotional sects as the principal form of worship. According to theologians, God is identical with his name as revealed in the SCRIPTURES, which thus has great power. The repetition or recitation of God's name (nama-japa) is said to possess such salvific potential that its very sound, even apart from the reciter's intention, can produce results. One Hindu text says: "The utterance of the Lord's Name completely destroys all SIN, even when it is due to the Name being associated with something else or is done jocularly, as a result of involuntary sound, or in derision."

Devotees of KRISHNA recommend the repetition of the "mantra of the sixteen Names": "Hare Ram Hare Ram Ram Ram Hare Hare, Hare Krishna Hare Krishna Krishna Krishna Hare Hare." Saivites and Śāktas have produced their own versions of such mantras, and there are many versions of litanies, called sahasranamas, in which the thousand names of God are given. In general, repetition of the name of God serves as a form of devotional activity that is available to all, regardless of gender or CASTE.

The repetition of the divine name also plays a central role in SIKHISM. The nām there serves as shorthand for the total being and nature of the One God. It is through the Name and the Word (sabad) that God reveals himself to humans; salvation comes through hearing and knowing the Word and repeating and meditating upon the Name.

NAMBŪDIRI \nəm-ˈbū-drē\, also spelled Nampūtiri \-ˈpū-trē\, one of the dominant BRAHMIN castes of the southern Indian state of Kerala. Orthodox in the extreme, its members regard themselves as the true repositories of the ancient VEDIC RELIGION and of the traditional Hindu code.

The Nambūdīri caste follows a distinctive marriage alliance with the NĀYARS, an important caste group of lower ritual status. Though the eldest son of a Nambūdīri household customarily marries a Nambūdīri woman, thus observing the typical caste practice of endogamy, the younger sons marry Nāyar women and obey the matrilineal-descent system of the Nāyars. The Nambūdīris place great emphasis on their priestly status and do not normally engage in profitable professions.

There are five subdivisions within the Nambūdīri caste. The members of these different subdivisions act as priests, ritual technicians, or scholars. Some Nambūdīri men devote themselves to a very specialized style of Vedic chanting, while others practice ĀYURVEDIC medicine.

NĀMDEV \ˈnām-ˌthāv-, -ˌdāv\ (b. 1270?, Narasi, India—d. 1350?, Pandharpur, Bahmani), leading poet-saint of the Indian medieval period, who wrote in the Marāṭhi language.

The son of a tailor and thus of low CASTE, Nāmdev married and had five children. As a youth, he was a member of a gang but was overcome with remorse one day on hearing the lamentations of a woman whose husband he had killed. Following a vision of the god VISHNU, Nāmdev turned to a life of devotion and became the foremost exponent of the Vārkarī Panth (the "Pilgrims' Path"). The school is known for its expression of BHAKTI (devotion) and for its freedom from caste restrictions in a religious setting.

Nāmdev wrote a number of abhaṅgas (hymns). Extremely popular in Mahārāshtra and in the Punjab, some of his verses are included in the ĀDI GRANTH. Nāmdev inspired a tradition of devotional poetry that continued in Mahārāshtra for four centuries, culminating in the works of the great devotional poet TUKĀRĀM.

NĀMDHĀRĪ \nām-ˈdār-ē\ (Punjabi: "Bearer of the [Divine] Name"), also called Kūkā \ˈkū-kā\ (from Punjabi kūk, "scream"), in SIKHISM, sect founded by Bālak Singh (1797–1862) and expanded by Rām Singh (1816–85) that emphasizes meditation on the divine name (Sanskrit: nām). Nāmdhārī worship leads to loud ecstatic cries, which gives the adherents the name Kūkās. Nāmdhārīs stress their KHĀLSĀ identity but differ from the mainstream Sikh community in their equal regard for the ĀDI GRANTH and the DASAM GRANTH and in their belief that the lineage of the living GUR-ŪS continued after the 10th Gurū, GOBIND SINGH. The current Gurū is Jagjit Singh. The use of fire in marriage rituals and strict vegetarianism also set Nāmdhārīs apart.

NĀMMĀLVĀR \nām-ˈmāl-vār\, 8th-century-CE South Indian poet-saint, the most important and prolific of the Ālvārs, Vaiṣṇava singers and poets whose works of ecstatic love and personal experience of God, written in the Tamil vernacular, popularized the BHAKTI path.

Nammālvār was born into a low Śūdra caste and is said to have remained in a trance for the first 16 years of his life. Inspired by KRISHNA, he later composed four compilations of hymns or verses believed to contain the essence of the four VEDAS and designed to provide the message of the Vedas in simple, comprehensible terms to the masses. These hymns were compiled into the Tiruvaymoli which is sometimes known as the "Tamil Veda." Nammālvār claims in this work to be merely an instrument through which Krishna speaks about himself. Many of the hymns, however, are about the poet's longing and love for God, often phrased in highly emotional and even ecstatic language. The poet often adopts the persona of one or another of Krishna's erotic lovers. Bhakti here is presented as both a passive surrender to God and an active cultivation of the emotions that will lay the devotee open to God's GRACE and presence.

NĀNAK \ˈnā-nək\ (b. April 15, 1469, Rāi Bhoi dī Talvaṇḍī [now Nankānā Sāhib, Pak.], near Lahore, India—d. 1539, Kartārpur, Punjab), Indian spiritual teacher who was the founder of the SIKH tradition and its first GURŪ.

Nānak was born into a Punjabi Hindu family as the son of a revenue official in the Afghan administration. His CASTE affiliation was Khatri. He probably received his early education at the village mosque as well as the HINDU temple. He married while in his teens and had two sons. In the early 1490s he moved to Sultānpur, a district headquarters, and gained employment as a storekeeper.

Sultānpur provided Nānak with a rich setting for interacting with Muslim nobles and interpreters of the ISLAMIC law. The town was between Lahore and Delhi, on the main road that Muslims traveled to and from the Middle East. Hindu pilgrims from all over India visiting the ancient temples in Kashmir and the Himalayan foothills also had to pass through Sultānpur. Toward the end of the 1490s, Nānak had a powerful spiritual experience, which resulted in his leaving his job and family and beginning a phase of travel that lasted 20 years or so.

In the early 1520s, Nānak acquired a piece of rich agricultural land and established a town named Kartārpur ("City of God"). As his followers and their families joined him, the Sikh community was founded. At Kartārpur, Nānak became Gurū Nānak, their central teaching authority. He helped create the institutional structure of this nascent community, and at the time of his death he nominated AN GAD, one of his followers, as his successor.

Gurū Nānak composed about 400 hymns, which provide a clear statement of his teachings. These teachings celebrate the unity and uniqueness of God, who is the true lord of the universe (Sachā Pātishāh). They explain that the world came into being as a result of the divine command (hukam) and that God maintains the course of human history and individual destinies by means of the twin principles of justice (niān) and grace (na-dar). God's concern for his creation goes hand in hand with human responsibility. Nānak's hymns state the way human beings should live in this God-created world so as to attain liberation, which is achieved through meditating on the divine name (nām) and cultivating a relationship of love (bhau) for and fear (bhai) of the creator. In its mystical ascent, the human soul rises through the stages of duty (dharam), knowledge (giān), humility (saram), and grace (karam). Nonetheless, Gurū Nānak sets forth a view of spirituality that rejects ASCETICISM of any kind and instead mandates fulfillment of the mundane obligations of social life. Liberation is attained by living actively, connecting to family and community, and being guided by a strict code of ethical conduct (achār) that is built on the values of hard work, charity, and service to humanity.

As the Sikh community expanded, so also did the image of its founder. By the turn of the 17th century, the Janam Sakhī ("Life Story") literature presented a fully miraculous image of Gurū Nānak, one that has continued to serve as a source of inspiration for Sikhs.

NANDĪ \ˈnən-dē\, bull VAHANA (mount) of the HINDU god SHIVA. Some scholars suggest that the bull was originally the zoomorphic form of Shiva, but from the 1st century CE onward, he is identified as the god's vehicle.

Every Shiva temple has a figure of a white, humped bull reclining on a raised platform and facing the entrance door of the shrine, where Nandī acts both as guardian and as faithful devotee. Nandī occasionally is depicted in sculpture as a bull-faced dwarf figure and is known also in a wholly anthropomorphic form, called Nandikeśvara or Adhikāranandī; here he shares with Shiva such iconographic features as the third eye, crescent moon in the matted locks, and four arms, two holding a battle-ax and an antelope. The respect shown the bull in modern India is due to his association with Shiva. In sacred Hindu cities such as VARANASI, certain bulls are given the freedom to roam the streets. They are considered to belong to the lord and are branded on the flank with the trident insignia of Shiva.

NANNA \ˈnän-nä\, Sumerian god of the moon. See SIN.

NANSHE \ˈnän-,shā\, also spelled Nanšē, or Nazi \ˈnä-zē\, in Mesopotamian religion, Sumerian city goddess of Nina (modern Surghul, Iraq) in the southeastern part of the Lagash region of Mesopotamia. According to tradition, Nanshe's father, Enki (Akkadian: EA), organized the universe and placed her in charge of fish and fishing. Nanshe was also described as a divine soothsayer and dream interpreter. Although at times overshadowed by her sister Inanna (Akkadian: ISHTAR), Nanshe was, nevertheless, important in her own geographic area, and many rulers of Lagash record that they were chosen by her.

NAPHTALI \ˈnaf-tə-,lī\, one of the 12 tribes that in biblical times constituted the people of Israel who later became the Jewish people. The tribe was named after the younger of two sons born to JACOB and Bilhah, a maidservant of Jacob's second wife, Rachel.

The tribe of Naphtali occupied a region northwest of the Sea of Galilee (Joshua 19:32–39). In 734 BCE the Naphtalites were conquered by the Assyrian king Tiglath-pileser III (2 Kings 15:29); deported into slavery and gradually assimilated by other peoples, the tribe of Naphtali lost its identity and thus became known in Jewish legend as one of the TEN LOST TRIBES OF ISRAEL.

NAQSHBANDĪYA \ˌnäksh-bän-ˈdē-ə\, fraternity of SUFI mystics found in India, China, the Central Asian republics, and Malaysia. It claims a lineage extending back to Abū Bakr, the first CALIPH. Bahā' ad-Dīn (d. 1384), founder of the order at Bukhara, Turkistan, was called al-naqshband, "the painter," because of the impression of God that the repetition of his prescribed ritual prayer (DHIKR) should leave upon the heart, and so his followers became known as Naqshbandīya. The order has no mass support, for its litanies are subdued and emphasize repetition of the dhikr to oneself. Through the reforming zeal of Aḥmad Sirhindī (1564–1624), the Naqshbandīya were given new life in India in the 17th century and played a vital role in the reform of Muslim life in the 18th and 19th centuries.

NARASIMHA \nə-rə-'sīm-hə, -'sīn-\ (Sanskrit: "Man-Lion"), fourth of the 10 AVATARS (incarnations) of the Hindu god VISHNU. The DEMON Hiraṇyakaśipu, twin brother of the demon overthrown by Vishnu in his previous incarnation as VARĀHA (the boar), obtained a boon from BRAHMĀ that he could not be killed by man or beast, from inside or outside, or by day or by night, and that no weapon could harm him. Thus, feeling secure, he began to trouble heaven and earth. His son, Prahlāda, on the other hand, was a devotee of Vishnu. One day the demon challenged Prahlāda and, kicking a stone pillar, asked: "If your god is omnipresent, is he in this pillar also?" Vishnu emerged from the pillar in the form of a man-lion and slew the demon at dusk on the threshold of the house, disemboweling him with his claws.

NARCISSUS \när-'sī-səs\, in Greek mythology, son of the river god Cephissus and the NYMPH Leiriope; he was distinguished for his beauty. His mother was told that he would have a long life, provided he never looked upon his own features. But his rejection of the love of the nymph ECHO or of his lover Ameinias drew upon him the vengeance of the gods. He fell in love with his own reflection in the waters of a spring and pined away (or killed himself); the flower that bears his name sprang up where he died. According to another source, Narcissus, to console himself for the death of his beloved twin sister, sat gazing into the spring to recall her features.

NASHIM \nä-'shēm\ (Hebrew: "Women"), third of the six major divisions, or orders (sedarim), of the MISHNAH, which was given its final form early in the 3rd century CE by JUDAH HA-NASI. Nashim principally covers aspects of married life. Its seven tractates (treatises) are: Yevamot ("Levirates"; i.e., husband's brothers), Ketubbot ("Marriage Contracts"), Nedarim ("Vows"), Nazir (a "Nazirite"; i.e., a vowed ascetic), Soṭa ("A Woman Suspected of Adultery"), Giṭṭin ("Bills of Divorce"), and Qiddushin ("Marriages"). Both TALMUDS—the YERUSHALMI and the BAVLI—have GEMARA on each of the seven tractates.

NĀSĪR-I KHUSRAW \nä-'ser-ä-kös-'rō\, in full Abū Mu'īn Nāṣir-i Khusraw al-Marvāzī al-Qubādiyānī (b. 1004, Qubādiyān, Merv, Khorāsān—d. c. 1072/77, Yumgān, Badakhshān, Central Asia), poet, theologian, and religious propagandist, one of the greatest writers in Persian literature.

Nāṣir-i Khusraw came from a family of government officials who followed the SHĪ'ITE sect of Islam. In 1045 he went on a pilgrimage to Mecca and continued his journey to Palestine and then to Egypt, which was ruled at that time by the Fāṭimid dynasty. The Fāṭimids headed the Ismā'īlīs, an offshoot of Shi'ism, and their missionaries were engaged in propagating that doctrine throughout the Islamic world. Nāṣir-i Khusraw became such a missionary, though it is not certain whether he became an Ismā'īlī before his trip to the Fāṭimid capital or after. He returned to his homeland in what is now Afghanistan, but his vigorous advocacy of the Ismā'īlī ideology within SUNNI territory forced him to flee to Badakhshān, where he spent the rest of his days, lamenting in his poetry that he was unable to be an active missionary.

Nāṣir-i Khusraw's poetry is of a didactic and devotional character and consists mainly of long odes. His philosophical poetry includes the Rawshana'ināme (Book of Lights). Nāṣir's most celebrated prose work is the Safarnāme (Diary of a Journey Through Syria and Palestine), a diary describing his seven-year journey. He also wrote more than a dozen treatises expounding the doctrines of the Ismā'īlīs, among them the Jāmi' al-ḥikmatayn ("Union of the Two Wisdoms"), in which he attempted to harmonize Ismā'īlī theology and Greek philosophy. In his verse he displays great technical virtuosity, while his prose is remarkable for the richness of its philosophical vocabulary.

NAT \nät\ (Burmese nāt, from Sanskrit nātha, protector, lord), in Myanmar (Burma), any of a group of spirits that are the objects of an extensive, probably pre-Buddhist cult; in Thailand a similar spirit is called phi. Most important of the nats are a group collectively called the "37," made up of spirits of human beings who have died violent deaths. They are capable of protecting the believer when propitiated and of causing harm when offended or ignored.

Other types of nats are nature spirits; hereditary nats, whose annual tribute is an inherited obligation; and village nats, who protect a community from wild animals, bandits, and illness and whose shrine is attached to a tree or pole near the entrance to the village. Most households also hang a coconut from the southeast pillar of the house in honor of Min Maha Giri, the house nat.

Nats are appeased by offerings of food or flowers, which are given on all important occasions. Some special nat festivals honor the Taungbyon brothers—a prominent, rowdy pair of nats said to have been executed in the 11th century—and the king of the "37," Thagya Min, associated by scholars with the Indian god INDRA (known in Myanmar as Sakka).

NĀṬARĀJA \nə-tə-'rā-jə\ (Sanskrit: "Lord of Dance"), the Hindu god SHIVA in his form as the cosmic dancer, represented in most Śaiva (see ŚAIVISM) temples of South India. See photo, SYMBOLISM AND ICONOGRAPHY.

In the most common type of images, Shiva is shown with four arms and flying locks dancing on the figure of a dwarf, Apasmāra (a symbol of human ignorance; apasmāra means "forgetfulness," or "heedlessness"). The back right hand of Shiva holds the ḍamaru (hourglass-shaped drum); the front right hand is in the abhaya mudrā (the "fear-not" gesture, made by holding the palm outward with fingers pointing up); the back left hand carries AGNI (fire) in a vessel or in the palm of the hand; and the front left hand is held across the chest in the gajahasta (elephant-trunk) pose, with wrist limp and fingers pointed downward toward the uplifted left foot. The locks of Shiva's hair stand out in several strands interspersed with the figures of Gaṅgā (the GANGĀ RIVER personified as a goddess), flowers, a skull, and the crescent moon. His figure is encircled by a ring of flames, the prabhāmaṇḍala. This form of dance, the most common representation of Nāṭarāja, is called in classic Sanskrit treatises on dance the bhujamgatrāsa ("trembling of the snake").

In the Nāṭarāja sculpture Shiva is shown as the source of all movement within the cosmos, represented by the arch of flames. The purpose of the dance is to release humans from illusion, and the place where it is said to have been performed, Chidambaram (an important Śaiva center in South India), called the center of the universe, is in reality within the heart. The gestures of the dance represent Shiva's five activities (pañcakṛtya): creation (symbolized by the drum), protection (by the "fear-not" pose of the hand), destruction (by the fire), embodiment (by the foot planted on the ground), and release (by the foot held aloft).

NĀTHA \ˈnā-tə\, religious movement of India whose members strive for immortality by transforming the human body into an imperishable divine body. It combines esoteric traditions drawn from BUDDHISM, ŚAIVISM, and HĀṬHA YOGA. The term is derived from the names of the nine traditional masters, all of which end in the word nātha ("master," "lord"). Texts do not agree on the lists of the nine. All are believed to have successfully transformed their bodies through yogic discipline into indestructible spiritual entities, and, according to popular belief, they reside as DEMIGODS in the HIMALAYAS.

The Nātha sect consists of yogis whose aim is to achieve sahaja, a state of neutrality transcending the duality of human existence through an awakening of the self's inherent identity with absolute reality. This is accomplished through the practice of kāya-sādhana ("cultivation of the body"), with great emphasis placed on control of semen, breath, and thought. Guidance of an accomplished GURU is considered essential. The Nātha yogis share with similar esoteric sects a liking for paradox and enigmatic verse.

NATHDVARA \nät-ˈdvär-ə\, also spelled Nāthdwarā, town, southern Rajasthan state, northwestern India, near Udaipur. Nathdvara receives its name as the "door" (dvāra) or home of KRISHNA in his form as protector (nāth) of Mount Govardhan—Govardhannāth, or for short, Śrī Nāth Jī. Krishna used the mountain to protect his fellow cowherders and their animals, lifting it above their heads as a shield against torrents of rain unleashed by INDRA. Nathdvara's rhythms are generated by those of the temple that houses Śrī Nāth Jī, a life-size image that was relocated from Mount Govardhan, in the Braj region, where it is said to have manifested itself in the year 1479. Śrī Nāth Jī's westward flight, which began in 1669, was caused by fears that the image might be damaged by the Muslim emperor Aurangzeb and was accomplished by the deity's custodians, descendants of the theologian VALLABHA. Nathdvara serves as the most important place of PILGRIMAGE for the Vallabha SAMPRADĀYA and is one of India's wealthiest and best-known shrines.

NĀTH YOGI \ˈnät-ˈyō-gē\, also called Kānphaṭa Yogi \ˈkän-fə-tə\, member of an order of religious ascetics in India that venerates the Hindu deity SHIVA. Nāth Yogis are distinguished by the large earrings they wear in the hollows of their ears (kān-phaṭa, "ear split"). They are sometimes referred to as TANTRIC (Esoteric) ascetics, because of their emphasis on the acquiring of supernatural powers in contrast to more orthodox practices of devotion and meditation. They are followers of GORAKHNĀTH (Goraksanātha, c. 11th century) and are therefore called Goraknāthīs, Nāth Panthīs, or, in the case of ascetics, Nāth Yogis. Their ideology incorporates elements of MYSTICISM, magic, and alchemy absorbed from both Śaivite and Buddhist Esoteric systems, as well as from HĀṬHA YOGA.

NATIONAL COUNCIL OF THE CHURCHES OF CHRIST IN THE U.S.A., also called National Council of Churches, agency of Protestant, Anglican, and Eastern Orthodox denominations that was formed in 1950 in the United States by the merger of 12 national interdenominational agencies. The National Council of Churches is the largest ecumenical body in the United States, with a membership of about 40 million in the late 20th century. Its international counterpart is the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. In the late 20th century, the council's membership was made up of 32 PROTESTANT and EASTERN ORTHODOX churches as full members, with more than 40 other church bodies, including conservative Protestants and ROMAN CATHOLICS, participating in its programs. Headquarters are in New York City.

The council has initiated a revision of the English BIBLE and the publication of religious education, evangelism, and family-life materials; promotes religious and moral values in broadcasting; and coordinates efforts against illiteracy and hunger.

NATIVE AMERICAN CHURCH, also called Peyotism \pā-ˈyō-ti-zəm\, or Peyote Religion, most widespread indigenous religious movement among Native North Americans and one of the most influential forms of Pan-Indianism. The term PEYOTE derives from peyotl, the Nahuatl name for certain species of the cactus genus Lophophora. The plants contain mescaline, an alkaloid drug that has hallucinogenic effects. It was used in Mexico in pre-Columbian times as a medicine and as a means of inducing visions.

From the mid-19th century, use of peyote extended north into the Great Plains of the United States, and it probably first developed into a distinct religion about 1885 among the Kiowa and Comanche of Oklahoma. After 1891 it spread rapidly as far north as Canada and is now practiced among more than 50 tribes. Reports suggest that nearly one-fifth of the Navajo in 1951 practiced the peyote religion (despite strong tribal council opposition) as did one-third of Oklahoma Indians in 1965.

In general, peyotist doctrine consists of belief in one supreme God (the Great Spirit), who deals with men through various spirits, which include the traditional waterbird or THUNDERBIRD spirits that carry prayers to God. In many tribes peyote itself is personified as Peyote Spirit, considered to be either God's equivalent for the Indians to his JESUS CHRIST for the whites, or Jesus himself. Ritually consumed peyote enables the individual to commune with God and the spirits (including those of the departed) in contemplation and vision and so to receive from them spiritual power, guidance, reproof, and healing.

The all-night ceremony is held on Saturday evenings and led by a peyote "chief." The services include prayer, singing, sacramental eating of peyote, water rites, and contemplation; they conclude with a communion breakfast on Sunday morning. The way of life is called the Peyote Road and enjoins brotherly love, family care, self-support through steady work, and avoidance of alcohol.

NATIVE AMERICAN RELIGIONS

beliefs and sacramental practices of the indigenous peoples of North and South America provide a living link to a preliterate past. Until the 1950s it was commonly assumed by the dominant European-derived culture that the religious worlds of the surviving indigenous peoples were little more than curious anachronisms, dying remnants of humankind's childhood. Native traditions lacked sacred texts and fixed doctrines or moral codes and were embedded in societies without wealth, mostly without writing, without recognizable systems of politics or justice or any of the usual indicators of civilization. Today the situation has changed dramatically. Scholars of religion, students of the ecological sciences, and individuals committed to expanding and deepening their own religious lives have turned to these traditions and have encountered a broad expanse of many distinct religious worlds that have struggled to survive and retain the capacity to inspire.

However, the histories of these worlds are also marked by loss. Five hundred years of political, economic, and religious domination have taken their toll. Scholars take notice when complex ceremonies become extinct, but often community members mourn even more the disappearance of small daily rituals and of religious vocabularies and grammars embedded in traditional languages, the erosion of sacred memories that include not only formal sacred narratives but the myriad informal strands that once composed these tightly woven ways of life. Nevertheless, despite the pervasive effects of modern society, from which there is no longer any possibility of geographic, economic, or technological isolation, there are instances of remarkable continuity with the past, as well as remarkably creative adaptation to the present and anticipation of the future.

NORTH AMERICA

First Nations people themselves often claim that their traditional ways of life do not include "religion." They find the term difficult, often impossible, to translate into their own traditional languages. This apparent incongruity arises from differences in COSMOLOGY and epistemology. Western tradition distinguishes religious thought and action as that whose ultimate authority is supernatural, which is to say, beyond, above, or outside both phenomenal nature and human reason. In most indigenous worldviews there is no such antithesis. Plants and animals, clouds and mountains, both carry and embody revelation. Even where native tradition conceives of a realm or world apart from the terrestrial one and not normally visible from it, as in the case of the Iroquois Sky World or the several underworlds of Pueblo cosmologies, the boundaries between these worlds are permeable. The ontological distance between land and sky, or between land and underworld, is short and is traversed in both directions.

Instead of a duality of sacred and profane, indigenous religious traditions seem to conceive only of sacred and more sacred. Mere inert, profane matter is not defined; spirit, power, or something akin, moves in all, though not equally. For native communities, religion in its radical sense of that which binds us together is defined relationally: It is found in the relationship between living humans and other persons, powers, or entities, however these are perceived. These may include departed as well as yet-to-be-born human beings; recognizable beings in the so-called "natural world" of flora and fauna; other visible entities that are not animate by Western standards, such as mountains, springs, lakes, and clouds; and entities that are not normally visible, but are understood to inhabit and affect either this world or some other world contiguous to it—what scholars of religion might denote as "mythic beings."

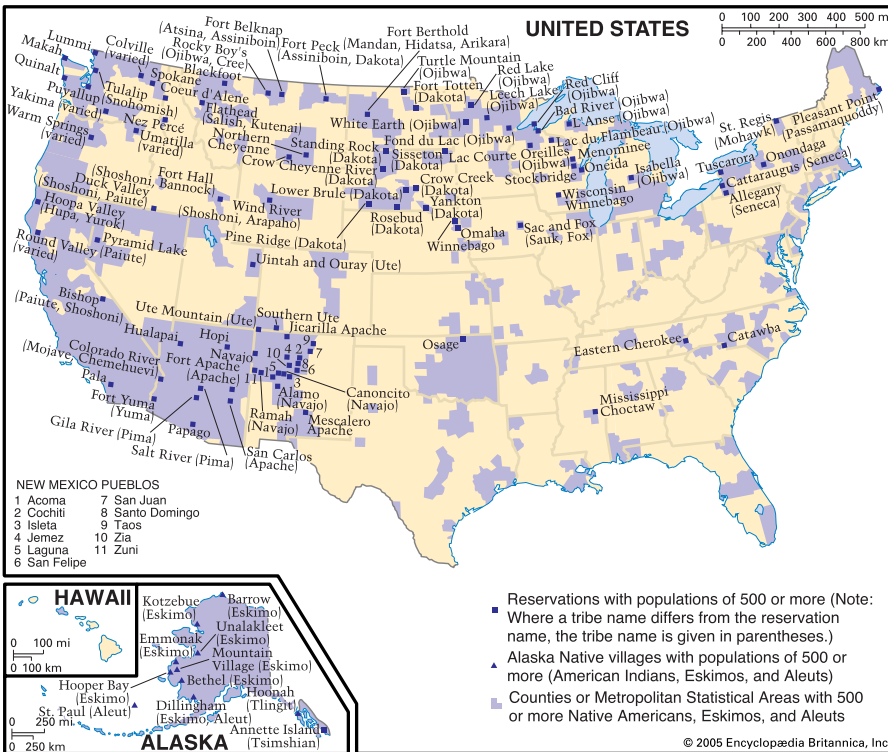

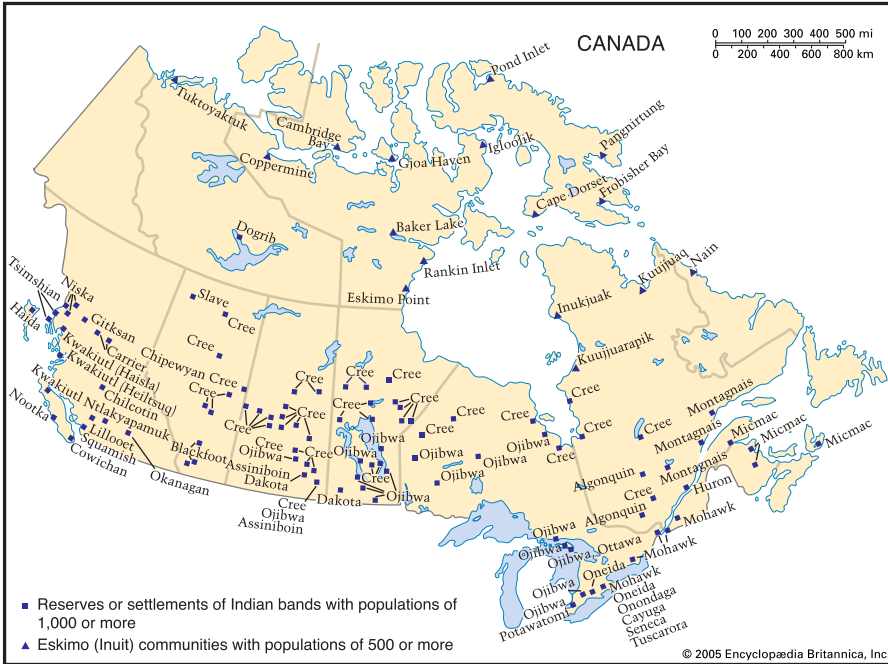

Diversity and common themes. Because religions of this kind are so highly localized, it is impossible to determine exactly how many exist in Native North America now or may have existed at any given time in the past. Distinct languages in North America at the time of the first European contact are often estimated in the vicinity of 300, which linguists have variously grouped into some 30 to 50 families. There is, consequently, great diversity among these traditions. For instance, Iroquois Longhouse elders speak frequently about the Creator's "Original Instructions" to human beings, using male gender references and attributing to this divinity not only the planning and organizing of creation but qualities of goodness, wisdom, and perfection that are reminiscent of the Christian deity. By contrast, the Koyukon universe is notably decentralized. Raven, whom Koyukon narratives credit with the creation of human beings, is only one among many powerful entities in the Koyukon world. He exhibits such human weaknesses as lust and pride, is neither all-knowing nor all-good, and teaches more often by counterexample than by his wisdom (see TRICKSTER).

A similarly sharp contrast is seen in Navajo and Pueblo ritual. Most traditional Navajo ceremonies are enacted on behalf of individuals in response to specific needs. Most Pueblo ceremonial work is communal, both in participation and in perceived benefit, and is scheduled according to natural cycles. Still, the healing benefits of a Navajo sing naturally spread through the families of all those participating, while the communal benefits of Pueblo ceremonial work naturally redound to individuals.

Thus, there is no such thing as a generic "Native American religion." Attempts to understand these religious traditions en masse are bound to produce oversimplification and distortion. Instead, it may be useful to consider a list of broad characteristics that seem to pertain to the religious lives of many indigenous North American communities.

- Religious practices are localized. Place is important. Traditional knowledge includes detailed knowledge, built and maintained through generations of oral communication and memory, about visible and invisible other-than-human inhabitants of a place.
- Access to some kinds of knowledge is restricted. In many traditions, not only actions but words and thoughts are understood to have power in the world. Some knowledge may be considered so powerful and dangerous that a process of instruction and initiation is required for those who will use it.
- Participation is more important than belief. Arguments about doctrinal truth are largely absent from most Native North American religious traditions. Good-hearted participation in the ceremonial and everyday work of the community is the main requirement.

Cultural distribution of Native North Americans

► KINSHIP obligations are central. Cooperation with and devotion to one's kin is a central part of small-scale societies. Teaching proper behavior toward others, which is defined by one's relationship to them, is an essential part of child-rearing. These cultural practices are religious as well, because one will be expected to treat the entire world, one's other-than-human relatives, one's very life, in the same way one has learned to treat one's human relatives.

- ▶ Generosity is a religious act as well as a social one. The value of generosity is perhaps most dramatically figured in the northern practice known in English as Giveaway, or in the Potlatch ceremony of the Northwest Coast peoples. Human beings are taught to give eagerly because in so doing they imitate the generosity of the many other-than-human entities who provide for human sustenance.
- ▶ A community's oral narratives constitute a record of human interaction with other-than-human beings, powers, and entities in a place. In addition to the more solemn genres, such as creation stories and migration narratives, these may include moralistic stories, family histories, instruction meant to teach traditional skills, and many kinds of jokes.
- ▶ Death is a transition. Attitudes and beliefs about death, and ritual responses to it, are among the more heterogeneous aspects of Native American religious life. Many Native American traditions appear to conceive of human beings as complex entities that bind together different kinds of essences, breaths, or spirits. These may undergo divergent outcomes after death. After death some of these essences may be harmful for living people to encounter without ceremonial protection.
- ▶ Joking, clowning, and other forms of entertainment are integral parts of many ceremonial events and settings, either formally or informally. Sometimes such performances are a means of shaming individuals into correcting troublesome behavior, but they may also be employed simply to spread happiness and lighten moods.
- ▶ Significant achievements and life-passages are meant to be shared by relatives and community. Various forms of coming-of-age and initiation ceremonies make up a large portion of the ritual repertoire of many American Indian traditions. These ceremonies provide structures for instruction in traditional knowledge, but more importantly they reintegrate an individual into kin, community, and cosmos when new status is attained.

Historical change. A serious misconception about Native North American religions is that they once existed in a changeless "Golden Age," before the European invasion, and that what happened later can only be described as degeneration. This view owes much to the misgivings of many 19th-century Europeans over the deep changes wrought on their own societies by the Industrial Age. Change, borrowing, and innovation are characteristic of any living religion, but indigenous communities relied on strands of oral communication to maintain both continuity and the memory of change, and Euro-American observers were ill-equipped to notice and record these sources.

At the same time, the changes that visited Native America in the wake of the European invasion were massive, unprecedented, and mostly destructive. Whole languages, and with them ceremonies, narratives, and oral libraries of accumulated knowledge about human and natural history and humor were lost. Even the most earnest and energetic efforts of younger women and men today to rejuvenate traditional ways can seem pale and pathetic to those who remember earlier days. Yet some elders reject this pessimism, citing this story: There was a community where a Snake Dance was once performed, but the ceremony became extinct. Anthropologists expressed alarm, but an elder insisted that people should not be disturbed. "If it was lost it was because we didn't need it any more," he said. "If we really need it back again, the snakes will teach it to us again. It was they who taught it to us in the first place."

Sometimes, however, disruption is so catastrophic that individuals and communities must respond with fresh, powerful visions that transplant the germ of past wisdom into entirely new seedbeds. When it succeeds, such inspiration can meld tradition and innovation in surprisingly effective ways. Two such examples are the NATIVE AMERICAN CHURCH, sometimes known as the Peyote Church, and the GHOST DANCE movement. The Native American Church, based on an ancient ritual of central Mexico but blended with Christian influences and spread in part through the medium of government-run Indian schools, is the only native religious tradition that has become truly portable, spreading from coast to coast. Although the Ghost Dance tradition ended in tragedy in 1890, it was for a time a powerful expression of both hope and despair as the Euro-American conquest of the continent neared completion. It has been revived in recent times.

A third type of response to religious disintegration can be seen in American Indian Christian congregations. In some instances conversion to CHRISTIANITY was enforced, with dire penalties for refusal. In other cases it appears to have been accepted voluntarily, out of devotion to the missionaries and their message. In yet other cases, it was probably accepted for a practical mix of reasons—often conversion meant an increased chance for physical survival, regardless of how sincere it was. Once physical survival and a degree of stability were established, many congregations of Native Christians began to recast their faith and practice to include aspects of traditional views and values. Kinship obligations, sharing of resources, and a general emphasis on community in preference to individualistic approaches to salvation, have been some of these Native Christian adaptations. In some cases traditional language and symbolism have been incorporated into Christian worship as well.

Issues and concerns. Today American Indian traditionalists still believe that the values, knowledge, narrative traditions, and the ritual worlds they were taught, however compromised by historical loss and the demands of modern life, are vital to the inner survival of their communities—their human relatives and their other-than-human relatives as well. While it is undeniable that much has already been irrevocably lost, all but the most pessimistic find much to work toward and fight for in the present. Key issues include the following:

- ▶ Access to, and control of, sacred sites. Many locations used for ceremonial purposes, or considered to be the home of powerful entities, have been disrupted and contaminated by recreational activities and economic exploitation. This has been especially problematic when it occurs on public lands, as in the cases of Devil's Tower in Wyoming, Mt. Shasta in California, and Mt. Graham in Arizona. In the case of Lyng v. Northwest Indian Cemetery Protective Association (1988), the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that the disturbance of religion need not be weighed against economic benefit in determining how public lands are to be used.
- ▶ The survival of traditional Native American languages. Apart from the Native American Church and Native Christian congregations, most American Indian traditionalists believe that ceremonial work and traditional knowledge are authentic and potent only when conducted in traditional languages. Yet most of these languages are eroding rapidly and among persons under 40 are nearly extinct. In ORAL TRADITION societies, it is vital that each generation identify and train individuals to memorize this knowledge and so carry it forward. Wide swaths of this knowledge can disappear with startling speed when there are no young people fluent enough to accomplish this. Some communities are trying urgently to arrest this trend; for others it is already too late.

- ▶ The return of sacred beings taken illegally and held as “objects” in museums. In some cases great harm is thought to have resulted from these ignorant holdings and displays, to the museums and their visitors, as well as to the native people who are the proper caretakers of these beings. It is important to understand that for indigenous traditionalists there are items, such as certain masks, that are alive, extremely powerful, and dangerous when not treated with proper ceremonial care. They are certainly not, as observers of the culture might assume, merely inanimate objects imbued with symbolic significance. The physical remains of deceased Indian persons fall into a different but related category of powerful “objects” not to be removed from their proper places and studied or displayed.
- ▶ The irresponsible use of traditional religious knowledge. There are two issues here: distorted or inaccurate representation of traditional knowledge, and the unsanctioned use of that knowledge, even when it is accurately represented. Scholars and New Age enthusiasts alike are accused of both these kinds of abuse. In native communities the exchange of knowledge, like any other exchange, is meant to be reciprocated. A growing number of anthropologists know this and do their best to honor it, but many still do not. The record is far worse for promoters of New Age imitations of indigenous practice, regardless of whether they have American Indian blood.
- ▶ The corrosive effects of modern economic life upon traditional values and practices. At the close of the 20th century, most citizens of Western nations such as Canada and the United States find that spare time, even time for weekly religious observance, has become scarce. Indigenous traditional knowledge, however, is best learned slowly. There are many young adults in First Nations communities who strongly wish to participate in traditional religious life, but the pressures of job and school make it impossible to devote enough time to learning and practicing the requisite language, natural history, traditional narratives, and ceremonial procedures.

These needs are best being met in communities with strong resolve, where internal divisions have been softened, and where elders and young people are working together. Today many American Indian youth show strong interest in traditional knowledge. Some are learning to use new technology and other skills to develop innovative means for learning and maintaining that knowledge. The results will differ from the traditions known and loved by today’s elders when they were young, but Native North American religious life continues as a viable and ongoing tradition of religious thought and practice.

SOUTH AMERICA

The religious life of indigenous South American peoples is vibrant and varied. Linguists have described as many as 1,500 distinct languages and native cultures in South America. Many peoples have suffered physical and cultural extinction since the first contact with Europeans. Very few surviving communities have been uninfluenced by Christian missionaries. For centuries ROMAN CATHOLICISM was the dominant Christian influence on Native South American peoples. In the 20th century, various forms of Protestant Christianity have taken hold, especially evangelical and Pentecostal.

Nevertheless, indigenous religious ideas and practices have endured, even in communities that have long had involvement with Christian beliefs. In many of these cases Christian views have been creatively absorbed and reframed within native worldviews. In some instances, native myths have borrowed Christian features in order to offer a criticism of Christianity, putting forward Christ-like supernatural heroes who led rebellions against colonial rule and missionary zeal. A sense of the nature and variety of religious life in South America can be conveyed by examining beliefs about creation, practices associated with the calendar and with the initiation of new adults, forms of special religious authority, and prophetic movements responding to the end of the world.

Creation myths. Creation mythologies play a singularly important role in the religious life of many South American tribes. These myths describe the origin of the first world and its fate and sometimes include narratives of the creation and destruction of subsequent worlds. These narratives differ in their details: Some creations are the work of a supreme being, and some involve creation from nothing while others involve creation from a pre-existing substance.

It is important to note that many of these creation myths describe in dramatic ways the exit of the creative beings. They may be driven off, or sent into the sky in the form of stars, or move off into the forest, or take refuge in other levels of the universe, and the manner of their disappearance figures in the ritual celebrations that commemorate it. The myths of multiple world-destruction place a great question mark at the beginning of existence. Why should powerful worlds fall prey to disaster? Why should beings so perfect and powerful suffer destruction? The religious life of many South American peoples places this kind of question at the foundation of RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE. Rather than providing resolving answers to such questions, the myths of multiple destruction install the questions themselves as fundamental.

Calendrical practices. Scenarios of universal catastrophe and destruction mark the passage of time and can thereby lead to the institution of the calendar. The most obvious calendrical marker of time that arises from universal catastrophe and disaster is the procession of stars. South American mythologies consistently join the death of primordial beings (often later known in the form of animals) with cataclysmic destructions of the first worlds and the ascent of the stars into the heavens. For example, the Makiritare of the Orinoco River region in Venezuela tell how the stars, led by Wlaha, were forced to ascend on high when Kuamachi, the evening star, sought to avenge the death of his mother. Kuamachi and his grandfather induced Wlaha and the other stars to climb into Dewaka trees to gather the ripe fruit. When Kuamachi picked the fruit, it fell and broke open. Water spilled out and flooded the forest. With his powerful thought Kuamachi created a canoe in which he and his grandfather escaped. Along the way they created deadly water animals such as the anaconda, the piranha, and the caiman. One by one Kuamachi shot down the stars of heaven from the trees on which they were lodged. They fell into the water and were devoured by the animals. After they were gnawed and gored into different ragged shapes, the survivors ascended into the sky on a ladder of arrows. There the stars took their places and began shining.

Initiation. Ceremonial initiation into adulthood is widely practiced among South American peoples, both for males and females. Many of the religious themes mentioned earlier are present in the initiation rites, for initiation is seen as a kind of new creation, the dawn of a new epoch. Initiation itself is often timed to occur in special moments of powerful change in the calendar. In this way the change in the human individual is aligned with fundamental changes in the cosmos and in society. Thus, in order for this change in the human being to be effective, it must align with the powerful and momentous changes that are occurring in the primordial world.

The Baniwa of the Northwest Amazon region of Brazil seclude girls during their initiation. The girls' bodies are covered with heron down and red paint, and each girl is hidden inside two baskets. The elders deliver dramatic speeches and whip the initiate in order to open her skin. Pepper is touched to her lips, a small hole is made in the dirt floor, and she spits into it. She is introduced to various kinds of food, over which chants are sung. The baskets are opened, the girl steps forth, and she is decorated and paraded around to the accompaniment of chants.

All of these actions commemorate events that occurred in the mythic first world. At that time a formless water serpent named Amaru was the first female being. A band of her female followers stole ritual flutes called Kuai from the males of that age and initiated Amaru by placing her in a basket while they blessed food for her. Insects and worms tried to penetrate the basket, and eventually a small armadillo succeeded in tunneling through the earth into the center of the women's house. The creator, Yaperikuli, led the men through this tunnel, and the resulting union of males and females marked the beginning of fertile life and the origin of species of all kinds. Thus an individual girl's initiation is brought into alignment with this cosmic fertility.

NATIVE AMERICAN RELIGIONS

Cultural distribution of Native South Americans

Male initiations often borrow or allude to a symbolism of female reproduction, by reference to MENSTRUATION in the symbolism or procedure of the rite or by representing the initiation as a new conception and gestation of the initiate. As the generation of new life is at the heart of initiation, the biological and the ritual here intersect in deeply meaningful ways.

Forms of religious authority. Initiations are also used to mark the ascent of individuals into positions of religious authority. Priests, diviners, and spirit mediums play special roles in religious life. The precise kinds of authority exercised by them in the community, however, varies greatly across South America.

Prominent in many parts of South America is the religious specialist in states of ECSTASY, commonly referred to by the term SHAMAN. The shaman is one who learns to control the passage of the soul out of and back into the body. As a general practitioner of the arts of the soul, however, the shaman in South America not only controls the ecstasy of his or her own soul but is devoted also to the knowledge and care of the souls of others.

The length of shamanic training varies widely from one South American culture to another. Among the Arecuna and Taulipang, Cariban groups of Venezuela and Brazil, the shamanic novitiate was reported to last from ten to twenty years. In other traditions, by contrast, knowledge might be transmitted to the novice in relatively brief but intense periods of ecstasy. The types of knowledge imparted may include the use of different forms of fire (such as ritual fires, or sparks struck from special elements, or the light contained in bright crystals), the use of musical instruments, the mastery of primordial sounds (which have the power to recreate the bodies of suffering patients, or to reorder the seasons in order to overcome drought or famine), esoteric languages, and sacred songs.

This education usually takes place under the direction of a master. That master may be a human shaman who is accomplished and practiced, or the master may be a supernatural being. Among the Makiritare of Venezuela, the sacred songs (Ademi) were taught to shamans at the beginning of time by sadashe (masters of animals and prototypes of the contemporary animal species), who cut down the tree of life, survived the subsequent flood, cleared the first garden, and celebrated the first new harvest festival. In order to preserve their power, the Ademi must be repeated in the exact phonetic pattern in which the sadashe first revealed them.

The shaman's rattle is a most sacred instrument in South America. Through its sounds, its structural features, its contents, and its connection to shamanic ecstasy, the rattle embodies the sum total of the sacred forces of the cosmos. The rattle's various parts may symbolize the structures of the world. The original of the shaman's rattle of the Warao (of the Orinoco Delta in Venezuela) was brought back to earth after the primordial mythic shaman ascended to the heavenly realm to visit the spirit of the south, from whom the rattle is a gift. The handle is the vertical path that rises into the heavenly vault. The heavenly realm is represented by the great head-gourd of the rattle that contains spirits. Joining the handle to the head represents the joining of male and female elements in the universe, an act of fertilization that gives the sounds of the instrument creative power. Safeguarding the rattle and playing it properly during ritual fulfils the destiny of the human spirit: to sustain the order of existence.

Shamanic performances are generally theatrical. The shaman's cure is miraculous, something to see. It is a deliberate exhibition of normally invisible powers and it aims to astonish spectators and compel them to admire what is real and, therefore, life-giving.

Prophetic movements and eschatology. Religious ideas and practices associated with the end of the world abound in South America (compare MILLENNIALISM). Eschatological movements have swept across South America since the time of European contact and, most probably, long before that. Many of the movements of resistance to colonialism have taken the form of messianic revolts led by millennial prophets and saviors. Among various Guaraní groups in Paraguay, shamans led groups on messianic PILGRIMAGES, seeking to find the Land Without Evil. The very existence of the Land Without Evil offered the Guaraní hope, security, and courage in the face of the hunger, sickness, and death that followed the Conquest. As these eschatological groups succumbed to failure, they concluded that, on their paths to paradise, they had been overtaken by Peqó-Achy, the weight of accumulating imperfections that blot out the light of the sun and weigh humans down so that they are incapable of ecstatic flight into the Land Without Evil.

South American propensities for eschatological thinking and behavior have recognized common ground in some of the eschatological thinking of Christianity, especially of Christian sects that emphasize this aspect of their tradition. There is no doubt that the religious life of South American Indians continues creatively to absorb and reinterpret elements in the world of contemporary experience.

NATURALISM, skeptical view of the origin and development of religion, which holds that whatever exists can be satisfactorily explained in natural terms. To explain something in natural terms is to explain it on scientific lines; naturalism is in fact a proclamation of the final competence of science. Within this view, the scientific account of a set of happenings takes precedence over any other. Scientific language is basically causal, and naturalism holds that causal explanations are fundamental.

One prominent example of the naturalistic explanation of religion is found in modern psychoanalysis. In the matter of the origins and development of religion, many have argued that there is a close connection between MYSTICISM and hallucination, between hysteria and ecstatic institutionalized inspiration as, for example, in Pentecostal churches. Religious people, according to such views, often have personality weaknesses and are psychologically disturbed. SIGMUND FREUD maintained that inner conflicts—often the result of repression, particularly in relation to sex—become expressed in peculiarities of behavior and mood, especially in the vivid imagery of dreams that erupt from the unconscious area of one's personality. By comparing the symbolism of dreams and mythology, Freud held that belief in God—in particular, the father image—merely perpetuates in fantasy what the individual must in actual fact overcome as part of his growth to maturity, thus giving RELIGIOUS BELIEF a treatment that not only made belief in God unnecessary but positively unhelpful.

Naturalism has been criticized on the grounds that one must be careful not to indulge in the genetic fallacy: no account of the origin and development of anything, of religion in particular, is necessarily a reliable analysis of what that particular phenomenon is now; a single explanation of the origin and development of a phenomenon as complex and variegated as religion is difficult to describe and maintain. Moreover, origin theories are founded on conjecture.

Compare SUPERNATURALISM; see also FUNCTIONALISM.

NATURAL RELIGION, attempt to establish religious truths by rational argument and without reliance upon alleged revelations; its two traditional topics are the existence of God and the immortality of the soul. In the medieval period, ST. THOMAS AQUINAS distinguished natural religion, or that kind of religious truth discoverable by unaided reason, from revealed religion, or religion resting upon divine truth, which he identified exclusively with CHRISTIANITY. Certain trends in 18th-century RATIONALISM, however, reversed the force of the argument by advocating a Christianity to be founded upon intellectual inquiry (i.e., NATURAL THEOLOGY; see also DEISM).

Examples of occurrence of such a "natural piety" can also be found in religions other than Christianity. The spread of technology has gradually alienated many Hindus and Buddhists from their traditional beliefs, but Hindus have continued to treasure their spiritual ideology, which may well give to technological development its needed direction and wider setting. BUDDHISM in Japan, and perhaps elsewhere in the East, is still valued in the 20th century insofar as it supplies a local religious dimension to a society whose public and industrial life has been increasingly Westernized. Thus, an attitude has arisen that is sympathetic to the broad claims of religion but has been critical, if not disdainful, of theological dogma and rivalries.

NATURAL THEOLOGY, name given to discourse about God and the world that does not make reference to revelation. In natural theology are generally included the "proofs" of the existence of God, discussions about the immortality of the soul, and discussions about God's providential control of the world.

NAUS \ˈnəʊs\, Catalan navetas (from Greek: "ship"), Bronze Age grave found in the Balearic Isles. The naus was built of blocks of stone in the shape of an overturned boat.

NAVARĀTRI \,nə-və-ˈrā-trē\ (Sanskrit: "Nine Nights"), in HINDUISM, a nine-day festival occurring during the month of Āśvina (September–October). It usually ends with the festival of dassera (from Sanskrit daśaharā, an old epithet of the GAṄGĀ [Ganges] River, meaning "removal of the 10 sins"), celebrated on the 10th day.

Among followers of the goddess DURGĀ, DURGĀ-PŪJĀ ("Durgā Worship") is celebrated during this period. Special images of Durgā commemorating her victory over the buffalo-headed DEMON Mahiṣāsura are worshiped daily, and on the 10th day (dassera) the images are taken in procession to nearby rivers or reservoirs for immersion in water. In addition to family feasting and visiting, the pūjā, or ritual, days are also celebrated with public concerts, recitations, plays, and fairs.

In other parts of India, dassera is associated with the victory of the god RĀMA over the demon-king RĀVANA. In North India the Rām LĪLĀ ("Play of Rāma") is the highlight of the festival. On successive nights different episodes of the epic poem the RĀMĀYAṆA are dramatized; the pageant climaxes with the burning of huge effigies of the demons.

NĀYANĀR \ˈnā-yə-,nār\, also spelled Nāyanmār (Tamil and Sanskrit: "Lords," "Masters"), sixty-three Tamil poet-saints of the 7th and 8th centuries CE who composed devotional hymns in honor of the Hindu god SHIVA. The images of all the poets, but especially Nānacampantar, Appar, and Cuntaramūrṭti (often referred to as Mūvar, or "the Three"), are worshiped in South Indian Śaiva temples as saints. The hymns of the Mūvar were collected in the 10th century by Nampiyāṅṭār Nampi as the Tēvāram and set to Dravidian music for incorporation into the services of South Indian temples.

NĀYAR \ˈnā-yər\, also spelled Nair, Hindu CASTE of the Indian state of Kerala that dominated high-status positions in the region's small, feudal kingdoms prior to the British conquest. During British rule, Nāyars became prominent in politics, government service, medicine, education, and law.

Unlike most Hindus, Nāyars traditionally were matrilineal. Their family unit, the members of which owned property jointly, included brothers and sisters, the latter's children, and their daughters' children. The oldest man was legal head of the group.

Between the 16th and 18th centuries, Nāyars in the central kingdoms of Calicut, Walluvanad, Palghat, and Cochin had highly unusual marriage customs. Before puberty a girl ritually married another Nāyar or a NAMBŪDIRI. The husband could visit her (but was not obliged to); in some cases ritual divorce immediately followed. After puberty a woman could receive a number of visiting husbands of her own caste or a higher one. Nāyar men might visit as many women of appropriate rank as they chose. Women were maintained by their matrilineal groups, and fathers had no rights or obligations in regard to their children.

Nāyar plural marital unions gradually died out in the 19th century. Laws passed in the 1930s enforced monogamy, permitted division of the matrilineal estate among male and female members, and gave children full rights of maintenance and inheritance from the father.

NAZARENE, CHURCH OF THE, American Protestant church, product of several mergers stemming from the 19th-century HOLINESS MOVEMENT. The first occurred in 1907, uniting the Church of the Nazarene (organized in California in 1895) with the Association of Pentecostal Churches of America (with origins in the northeastern states from 1886 to 1896) to form the Pentecostal Church of the Nazarene. In 1908 the Holiness CHURCH OF CHRIST (with origins in the southwestern states from 1894 to 1905) joined the denomination. Later mergers brought in other groups. The term pentecostal was dropped from the name of the church in 1919.

The church government is similar to that of the Methodists, but local congregations have more autonomy. In worship there is emphasis on simplicity and revivalistic evangelism. In doctrine the church stands in the tradition of Arminian METHODISM, emphasizing God's GRACE, and regards its unique mission to be the promotion of entire sanctification, which enables a person to live a sinless life, as a work of grace subsequent to conversion.

NAZIRITE \ˈnɑ-zə-rīt\ (from Hebrew nazar, "to consecrate oneself to"), in JUDAISM, an Israelite man or woman who takes a special vow to desist from wine or strong drink and from grapes; to refrain from cutting the hair; and to avoid contracting corpse-uncleanness (Numbers 6:1–21). If the Nazirite should contract corpse-uncleanness during the spell, the days already observed are null, and the vow takes effect afresh. At the end of the specified time of the vow, he or she brings offerings of meat, oil, bread, and wine. Then the head is shaved, and the hair is put on the fire under the peace offering that the Nazirite has brought. If the Nazirite does not specify the length of the vow, it is for 30 days (Mishnah tractate Nazir 1:3). If one undertakes a Nazirite vow "like that of SAMSON," it is a vow for life. GENTILES are not subject to the Nazirite vow. Women and slaves are subject to the Nazirite vow. A master forces his slave to be subject to a Nazirite vow, but a husband does not force his wife to be subject to a Nazirite vow (Mishnah tractate Nazir 9:1). The rabbinic sages treat the Nazirite vow as they treat vows in general, as a mark of inferior character or conscience, in this case, a sign of pride.

NEBI'IM \nə-vē-'ēm\, English The Prophets, second division of the Hebrew BIBLE, or OLD TESTAMENT, the other two being the TORAH and the KETUBIM. In the Hebrew canon the prophets are divided into (1) the Former Prophets (Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings) and (2) the Latter Prophets (Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the Twelve, or Minor, Prophets: Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi). This canon was fixed by a council of RABBIS at Jabneh (Jamnia), now in Israel, c. 100 CE.

The Protestant canon calls the Former Prophets the Historical Books and subdivides two of them into 1 and 2 Samuel and 1 and 2 Kings. The Prophets in the Protestant canon include Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel from the Hebrew Latter Prophets. The Minor Prophets (The Twelve) are treated as 12 separate books; thus the Protestant canon has 17 prophetic books. The Roman Catholics accept the book of Baruch, including as its 6th chapter the Letter of Jeremiah, both considered apocryphal by Jews and Protestants.

NECHUNG ORACLE \ˈnə-jūŋ, -chūŋ\, oracle-priest of Tibet who, until the conquest of Tibet in 1959 by the People's Republic of China, was consulted on all important occasions. The Nechung oracle was the chief medium of Pe-har, a popular folk divinity incorporated into BUDDHISM, and resided at the Nechung (Gnas-chung-lcog) monastery near Drepung ('Bras-spungs), the center of the Pe-har cult. The oracle is said to have first been appointed government adviser during the time of the fifth DALAI LAMA (1617–82). He was required to journey to Lhasa once a year, during the New Year festivities, to prophesy the year's coming events, and was consulted whenever a search was conducted for a new Dalai Lama.

NECROMANCY, communication with the dead, usually in order to obtain insight into the future or to accomplish some task. Such activity was current in ancient times among the Assyrians, Babylonians, Egyptians, Greeks, Romans, and Etruscans.

Its practitioners were skilled magicians who used a consecrated circle in some desolate spot, often a graveyard, to protect themselves from the anger of the spirits of the dead. In the event of a premature or violent death, the corpse was thought to retain some measure of unused vitality, and so the use of parts of corpses as ingredients of charms came to be an important technique of WITCHCRAFT. Necromancy was especially popular in the European Middle Ages and Renaissance, although it came to be associated with black magic and was condemned by the Church.

NECROPOLIS \nə-'krä-pə-ləs, ne-\ (Greek: "city of the dead"), extensive and elaborate burial place of an ancient city. In the Mediterranean world, they were customarily outside the city proper and often consisted of a number of cemeteries used at different times over a period of several centuries. The locations of these cemeteries were varied. In Egypt many, such as western Thebes, were situated across the Nile River opposite the cities, but in Greece and Rome a necropolis often lined the roads leading out of town. One of the most famous necropolises was discovered in the 1940s under the central nave of St. Peter's BASILICA in Rome.

NEFERTEM \ˈne-fər-tem\, also spelled Nefertum \-tüm\, or Nefertemu \-te-mü\, in ancient EGYPTIAN RELIGION, youthful god associated with the lotus flower. Nefertem was mentioned in the PYRAMID TEXTS (c. 2350 BCE), but he became more prominent during the New Kingdom (1539–c. 1075 BCE) and later. As a lotus he was believed to have emerged from the primeval waters, and he was connected with the sun god because lotus flowers open in the sun. He also had a warlike aspect and could be depicted as a lion.

NEHEMIAH \nē-ə-'mī-ə, nē-hə-\, also spelled Nehemias \-mī-əs\ (fl. 5th century BCE), Jewish leader who supervised the rebuilding of Jerusalem in the mid-5th century BCE. He also instituted extensive moral and liturgical reforms.

Nehemiah was the cupbearer to the Persian King Artaxerxes I (Nehemiah 1:1b) at a time when JUDAH in Palestine had been partly repopulated by Jews released from their exile in Babylonia. The Temple at Jerusalem had been rebuilt, but the Jewish community there was dispirited and defenseless against its neighbors (Nehemiah 1:3). Nehemiah obtained permission from Artaxerxes to journey to Palestine to help rebuild its ruined structures. He was provided with an escort and with documents that guaranteed the assistance of Judah's Persian officials (Nehemiah 2:1–10). So about 444 BCE Nehemiah journeyed to Jerusalem, and in the space of 52 days the Jews under his direction succeeded in rebuilding the city's walls (Nehemiah 6:15).

Nehemiah then apparently served as governor of the district of Judea for 12 years (Nehemiah 8:9), during which he undertook various religious and economic reforms before returning to Persia. On a second visit he strengthened the observance of the SABBATH and ended the custom of Jewish men marrying foreign-born wives (Nehemiah 13:4–27). Nehemiah's reconstructive work in Palestine was subsequently continued by the religious leader EZRA.

Nehemiah's story is told in the Book of Nehemiah, part of which seems to be based upon his memoirs. The book itself, however, was compiled by a later, anonymous writer who apparently also compiled the books of Ezra and the Chronicles.

NEILAH \nə-ē-'lā, nə-'ē-lə\, Hebrew ne'ila, or ne'ilah, in JUDAISM, most sacred of the yearly liturgy and the last of the five YOM KIPPUR services. When the SHOFAR (ritual ram's horn) sounds at the close of the neilah, the SYNAGOGUE service ends and the daylong fast marking Yom Kippur is over.

In ancient times the neilah was prayed each day before sunset, when the gates of the Temple were closed. The neilah was also recited on public fast days. Modern Jews view the neilah as the symbolic closing of the gates of heaven when God's final judgment is passed on man.

NEITH \'nēt\, also spelled Neit, ancient Egyptian goddess who was the patroness of the city of Sais in the Nile River delta. Neith was worshiped as early as predynastic times (c. 3000 BCE), and several queens of the 1st dynasty (c. 2925–2775 BCE) were named after her. She also became an important goddess in the capital city of Memphis. Neith was usually depicted as a woman wearing the red crown associated with Lower Egypt, holding crossed arrows and a bow. In mythology she was the mother of the crocodile god SEBEK, and later of RE.

NEKHBT \'nek-,bet\, in EGYPTIAN RELIGION, vulture goddess who was the protector of Upper Egypt and especially its rulers.

Nekhbet was frequently portrayed as spreading her wings over the pharaoh while grasping in her claw the cartouche symbol or other emblems. She was sometimes depicted suckling the pharaoh. She also appeared as a woman, often with a vulture's head, wearing a white crown. The center of Nekhbet's cult was al-Kāb (Greek: Eileithyiaspolis), but her principal epithet made her the goddess of Hierakonpolis (or Nekhen), the ancient town on the west bank of the Nile River.

NEMEAN GAMES \'nē-mē-ən, ni-'mē-\, in ancient Greece, athletic and musical competitions held in honor of ZEUS, in July, at the great Temple of Zeus at Nemea, in Argolis. They occurred biennially, in the same years as the ISTHMIAN GAMES, i.e., in the second and fourth years of each Olympiad. Their origin was attributed to such legendary figures as HERACLES and Adrastus of Argos. Winners in the competitions were awarded a wreath of fresh wild celery. After 573 BCE the games were open to all Greeks, and the Nemea became one of the great panhellenic festivals.

NEMESIS \'ne-mə-sis\, in GREEK RELIGION, probably two different divine conceptions, the first an Attic goddess and the second an abstraction of indignant disapproval, later personified. Nemesis the goddess was worshiped in Attica and was very similar to ARTEMIS. In post-Homeric mythology, she was pursued by ZEUS, who eventually turned himself into a swan and caught her in the form of a goose. Nemesis then laid an egg from which HELEN was hatched.

Nemesis the abstraction was also worshiped, at least in later times. She signified particularly the disapproval of the gods at human presumption, and her first altar was said to have been erected in Bœotia by Adrastus, leader of the SEVEN AGAINST THEBES. In Rome, especially, her cult was very popular, particularly among soldiers, by whom she was worshiped as patroness of the drill ground.

NEO-CONFUCIANISM \,nē-ō-kən-'fyū-shə-,ni-zəm\, in Japan, official guiding philosophy of the Tokugawa period (1603–1867). The tradition, introduced into Japan from China by ZEN Buddhists in the medieval period, held that harmony was maintained by a relationship of justice between a benevolent superior and an obedient subordinate.

Neo-Confucianism contributed to the development of the BUSHIDŌ ("Way of the Warrior"). The emphasis of Neo-Confucianism on the study of CHINESE CLASSICS led to a renewed interest in the Japanese classics and a revival of SHINTŌ studies (as Fukko, or Reform, Shintō). Most significantly, Neo-Confucianism encouraged scholars to concern themselves with the practical side of human affairs—law, economics, and politics.

Three main traditions of Neo-Confucian studies developed in Japan. The SHUSHIGAKU, based on the thought of the Chinese philosopher CHU HSI, became the cornerstone of education, teaching as cardinal virtues FILIAL PIETY, loyalty, obedience, and a sense of indebtedness to one's superiors. The Ōyomeigaku centered upon the teachings of the Chinese philosopher WANG YANG-MING, who held self-knowledge to be the highest form of learning and placed great emphasis on intuitive perception of truth. The KOGAKU school attempted to revive the original thought of CONFUCIUS and MENCIUS, which it felt had been distorted by the other Japanese Neo-Confucian schools.

NEO-PAGANISM \,nē-ō-'pā-gə-,ni-zəm\, any of several spiritual movements that attempt to revive the ancient polytheistic religions of Europe and the Middle East. Neo-Paganism differs from ritual magic and modern WITCHCRAFT by striving to revive authentic pantheons and rituals of ancient cultures, though often in deliberately eclectic and re-

Nekhbet hovering over Menkauhor; in the Louvre, Paris

Alinari—Art Resource

constructionist ways, and by a particularly CONTEMPLATIVE and celebrative attitude. Typically Neo-Pagans have deep environmental and ecological concerns and therefore center their rituals, holy days, and religious motifs around the changes of the seasons and the personification of nature as full of divine life.

Modern Neo-Paganism has roots in 19th-century ROMANTICISM and activities inspired by it, such as the British Order of DRUIDS. Sometimes associated with extreme nationalism, Neo-Pagan groups and sentiments were known in Europe before World War II; but contemporary Neo-Paganism is for the most part a product of the 1960s. Influenced by the works of the psychiatrist Carl Jung and the writer Robert Graves, Neo-Paganists are more interested in nature and archetypal psychology than in nationalist politics.

Neo-Paganism in the postwar decades has flourished particularly in the United States, the United Kingdom, and Scandinavia. Some of the major Neo-Pagan groups are the Church of All Worlds, the largest of the PAGAN movements, which centers on the worship of an earth-mother goddess; Feraferia, based on ancient GREEK RELIGION and also centered on goddess worship; Pagan Way, a nature religion centered on goddess worship and the seasons; the Reformed Druids of North America; the Church of the Eternal Source, which has revived ancient Egyptian religion; and the Viking Brotherhood, which celebrates Norse rites. Beginning in the late 1970s, some feminists became interested in witchcraft and Neo-Paganism as a means of celebrating feminine aspects of the divine.

NEOPLATONISM \,nē-ō-ˈplā-tə-,ni-zəm\, last school of Greek philosophy, given its definitive shape in the 3rd century CE by Plotinus. Neoplatonism had a strong influence on the development of early Christian theology. The ancient philosophers who are generally classified as Neoplatonists called themselves simple “Platonists,” as did the philosophers of the Renaissance and the 17th century whose ideas derive from ancient Neoplatonism.

NEOPTOLEMUS \,nē-āp-ˈtā-lə-məs\, in Greek mythology, the son of ACHILLES and Deidamia, daughter of King Lycomedes of Scyros; he was sometimes called Pyrrhus. In the last year of the Trojan War, ODYSSEUS brought him to Troy after the Trojan seer HELENUS had declared that the city could not be captured without the aid of a descendant of AEACUS, who had helped to build its walls; Neoptolemus was Aeacus’ great-grandson. He fought bravely and took part in the capture of Troy but committed the SACRILEGE of slaying the aged king PRIAM at an altar. By ANDROMACHE, Priam’s daughter-in-law, he was the father of Molossus, ancestor of the Molossian kings. He later married Hermione but shortly thereafter was murdered at DELPHI.

NEPTUNE \ˈnep-ˌtūn, -ˌtyūn\, Latin Neptunus \nep-ˈtū-nūs\, in ROMAN RELIGION, originally god of freshwater; by 399 BCE he was identified with the Greek POSEIDON and thus became a deity of the sea. His female counterpart, Salacia, was perhaps originally a goddess of springwater, subsequently equated with the Greek AMPHITRITE.

Neptune’s festival (Neptunalia) took place in the heat of the summer (July 23), and its purpose was probably the propitiation of the freshwater deity. Neptune had a temple in the Circus Flaminius at Rome; one of its features was a sculptured group of marine deities headed by Poseidon and THETIS. In art Neptune appears as the Greek Poseidon, whose attributes are the trident and the dolphin.

NEREID \ˈnir-ē-əd\, in GREEK RELIGION, any of the daughters (numbering 50 or 100) of the sea god NEREUS and of Doris, daughter of OCEANUS. The Nereids were depicted as young girls, inhabiting both salt- and freshwater, and as benign toward humanity. They were popular figures in Greek literature. The best known of the Nereids were AMPHITRITE, consort of POSEIDON; THETIS, wife of PELEUS and mother of the hero ACHILLES; and Galatea, a Sicilian figure loved by the CYCLOPS POLYPHEMUS.

NEREUS \ˈnir-ē-əs\, in GREEK RELIGION, sea god called by Homer “Old Man of the Sea,” noted for his wisdom, his gift of PROPHECY, and his ability to change his shape at will. He was the son of Pontus, a personification of the sea, and GAEA. The NEREIDS were his daughters by the Oceanid Doris, and he lived with them in the depths of the sea, particularly in the Aegean. APHRODITE, the goddess of love, was his pupil. HERACLES, in his quest for the golden apples of the HESPERIDES, obtained directions from Nereus by wrestling with him in his many forms. Nereus is frequently depicted in vase paintings as a dignified spectator.

NERGAL \ˈner-ˌgäl\, in MESOPOTAMIAN RELIGION, secondary god of the Sumero-Akkadian pantheon. He was identified with Irra, the god of scorched earth and war, and related to or identified with MESLAMTAEA, He Who Comes Forth from Meslam. The city of Cuthah (modern Tall Ibrāhim, in south-central Iraq) was the chief center of his cult.

The Nergal’s other sphere of power was the UNDERWORLD, of which he became king. According to one text, Nergal, escorted by DEMONS, descended to the underworld where the goddess ERESHKIGAL (or Allatum) was queen. He threatened to cut off her head, but she saved herself by becoming his wife, and Nergal obtained kingship over the underworld.

NERTHUS \ˈner-thūs\, in GERMANIC RELIGION, goddess known from a report of her given by the Roman historian Tacitus, who in his Germania (98 CE) refers to her as Terra Mater, or Mother Earth, and says that she was worshiped by seven tribes (among whom were the Angles, who later invaded Britannia). Her worship centered on a temple in a sacred grove on an island in the Baltic Sea. She was believed to enjoy coming among her people, riding in a chariot pulled by cows. Her presence was discerned by her priest, and while she was among them her people lived in peace, with no war or fighting and much rejoicing. When she returned to her temple, she and her chariot were washed in a sacred lake by slaves, who were then drowned in the lake.

NESTOR \ˈnes-tər, -tôr\, in Greek mythology, king of Pylos (Navarino) in Elis. All of his brothers were slain by HERACLES, but Nestor escaped. In the Iliad he is about 70 years old; his role is largely to incite the warriors to battle and to tell stories of his early exploits. In the Odyssey he entertains TELEMACHUS.

NESTORIAN \ne-'stōr-ē-ən\, member of a Christian sect originating in Asia Minor and Syria out of the condemnation of NESTORIUS and his teachings by the COUNCILS OF EPHEBUS (431 CE) and CHALCEDON (451 CE). Nestorians stressed the independence of the divine and human natures of Christ and were perceived by their opponents as suggesting that Christ was, in effect, two persons loosely united. Today they are represented by the Church of the East, or Persian Church, usually referred to in the West as the Assyrian, or Nestorian, Church. Most of its members—numbering about 170,000—live in Iraq, Syria, and Iran.

CHRISTIANITY in Persia faced intermittent persecution until the Persian Church in 424 formally proclaimed its full independence of Christian churches elsewhere, thereby freeing itself of suspicions about foreign links. Under the influence of Barsumas, the METROPOLITAN of Nisibis, the Persian Church acknowledged THEODORE OF MOPSUESTIA (d. 428/429), the chief Nestorian theological authority, as guardian of right faith, in February 486. This position was reaffirmed under the PATRIARCH Babai (497–502), and since that time the church has been Nestorian.

When supporters of Nestorius gathered at the theological school of Edessa, it was closed by imperial order in 489, and a vigorous Nestorian remnant migrated to Persia. The Persian Church's intellectual center then became the new school in Nisibis, which carried on the venerable traditions of Edessa. By the end of the 5th century there were seven metropolitan provinces in Persia and several bishoprics in Arabia and India. The church survived a period of SCHISM (c. 521–c. 537/539) and persecution (540–545) through the leadership of the patriarch Mar Aba I (reigned 540–552), a convert from ZOROASTRIANISM.

After the Arab conquest of Persia (637), the caliphate recognized the Church of the East as a MILLET, or separate religious community, and granted it legal protection. For more than three centuries the church prospered under the caliphate, but it became worldly and lost leadership in the cultural sphere. By the end of the 10th century there were 15 metropolitan provinces in the caliphate and 5 abroad, including India and China. Nestorians also spread to Egypt. In China a Nestorian community flourished from the 7th to the 10th century. In Central Asia certain Tatar tribes were almost entirely converted, Christian expansion reaching almost to Lake Baikal in eastern Siberia. Western travelers to the Mongol realm found Nestorian Christians well established there, even at the court of the Great Khan. When during the 14th century the Church of the East was virtually exterminated by the raids of the Turkic leader Timur, Nestorian communities lingered on in a few towns in Iraq but were concentrated mainly in Kurdistan.

In 1551 a number of Nestorians reunited with Rome and were called Chaldeans, the original Nestorians having been termed Assyrians. The Nestorian Church in India, part of the group known as the Christians of St. Thomas, allied itself with Rome (1599), then split, half of its membership transferring allegiance to the Syrian Jacobite (MONOPHYSITE) patriarch of Antioch (1653). In 1898 in Urmia, Iran, a group of Nestorians, headed by a bishop, were received in the communion of the Russian Orthodox church.

NESTORIUS \ne-'stōr-ē-əs\ (b. late 4th century CE, Germania, Syria Euphratensis, Asia Minor [now Maras, Turkey]—d. c. 451, Panopolis, Egypt), early bishop of Constantinople whose views on the nature and person of Christ led to the calling of the Council of Ephesus in 431 and to Nestorianism.

Nestorius was born of Persian parents. He studied at Antioch (now in Turkey), probably as the pupil of THEODORE OF MOPSUESTIA. He became a monk at the nearby Monastery of St. Euprepius and, after being ordained a priest, acquired a great reputation for ASCETICISM, orthodoxy, and eloquence. Owing to this reputation, Nestorius was nominated by the Eastern Roman emperor Theodosius II to become bishop of Constantinople in 428. He immediately set to work extirpating heretics of every sort, showing leniency only to Pelagians (see PELAGIANISM).

A crisis developed when Nestorius' domestic chaplain, Anastasius, on Nov. 22, 428, preached a sermon in which he objected to the title THEOTOKOS ("God-Bearer") as applied to MARY. Nestorius, who had already expressed doubts on the subject, supported Anastasius and began a series of addresses arguing that Mary was not Theotokos. Nestorius considered that, unless carefully qualified, the term Theotokos as applied to Mary compromised Christ's full humanity. To many people it seemed that Nestorius himself was denying the divinity of Christ and regarding him as a mere man who had been adopted by God as his son (an early HERESY, of which Nestorius was not guilty). In the resulting controversy, Nestorius' opponents found an ally in CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA; though Cyril sincerely believed that Nestorius was undermining the purity of the faith, he also was eager to belittle the rival see of Constantinople.

In August 430 Pope Celestine I held a church council in Rome which decided that correct Christology required the use of the term Theotokos and requested Nestorius to disown his errors. When Cyril, who had been authorized to execute the sentence upon Nestorius, produced a string of provocative ANATHEMAS for him to subscribe to or face EXCOMMUNICATION, Nestorius and his allies persuaded the emperor Theodosius to convene a general church council. When the council met at Ephesus in 431, however, Nestorius' teaching was condemned and he himself was deposed from his see. Theodosius was induced to ratify these decisions, and Nestorius was exiled to his former monastery near Antioch. After 435, he was transferred to the Great Oasis (now the Oasis of Khārijah) in the Libyan Desert and was later removed to Panopolis in Upper Egypt. During his exile, he wrote the Book of Heraclides of Damascus, which he intended as a defense of his teaching and a history of his life. The sole treatise from his pen to have survived, it was discovered in 1895 in a Syriac translation.

Nestorius is regarded as one of the principal heretics in Christology, and the heresy traditionally linked with his name, Nestorianism, was formally condemned at the church COUNCILS OF EPHEBUS (431) and CHALCEDON (451). In the orthodox view, Nestorianism denies the reality of the INCARNATION and represents Christ as a God-inspired man rather than as God-made-man. What Nestorius actually taught was a prosopic union. In Greek prosōpon means the external, undivided presentation, or manifestation, of an individual that can be extended by means of other things. So the Son of God used manhood for his self-manifestation, and manhood was, therefore, included in his prosōpon, so that he was a single object of presentation.

NEW CHURCH, also called Swedenborgians, church organized in the General Conference of the New Church, the General Convention of the New Jerusalem in the U.S.A., and the General Church of the New Jerusalem. Its members are followers of the theology of EMANUEL SWEDENBORG, the 18th-century Swedish scientist, philosopher, and theologian. Swedenborg did not himself found a church, but he believed that his writings would be the basis of a "New Church," which he related to the New Jerusalem mentioned in the biblical Book of Revelation.

Shortly after Swedenborg's death, a group of his followers in England decided to establish a separate church. In 1788 the first building for New Church worship was opened in Great East Cheap, London, and was rapidly followed by others. In 1789 a conference met in the London church, and, except for 1794–1806 and 1809–14, the General Conference of the New Church has met annually. Swedenborg's writings on religion were introduced into the United States in the 1780s. The General Convention of the New Jerusalem in the U.S.A. was founded in 1817 in Philadelphia. Differences of interpretation within the convention led to the formation in 1897 of a separate group, the General Church of the New Jerusalem.

Worship in the Swedenborgian churches is almost always liturgical. Preaching of the SCRIPTURES is based on Swedenborg's teaching that Scripture should be interpreted spiritually. BAPTISM and the Lord's Supper (see EUCHARIST) are the two SACRAMENTS of the church. To the established Christian festivals is added New Church Day (June 19).

Church government in the three New Church groups varies. The British General Conference and the U.S. General Convention annually appoint a general council, which, with a ministerial council, is the controlling authority. The General Church is episcopal. Candidates for the ministry, apart from those trained in Africa for service there, normally pass through a four-year course in one of the two U.S. colleges (in Cambridge, Mass., and Bryn Athyn, Pa.) or in Woodford Green, Essex, Eng., before being ordained.

The three groups have extensive MISSION operations, with emphasis on Africa. New Church societies, generally small, are found in many parts of the world. Australia has its own conference, closely allied to that in Britain. The New Church groups in continental Europe are nearly all assisted from the United States.

NEW FIRE CEREMONY, also called The Binding Up of the Years, in Aztec religion, ritual celebrated every 52 years when the 260-day ritual and 365-day civil calendars returned to the same positions relative to each other. In preparation, all sacred and domestic fires were allowed to burn out. At the climax of the ceremony, priests ignited a new sacred fire on the breast of a sacrificial victim, from which the rest of the people rekindled their hearth fires; the people then began feasting.

NEWMAN, JOHN HENRY \ˈnū-mən, ˈnyū-\ (b. Feb. 21, 1801, London, Eng.—d. Aug. 11, 1890, Birmingham, Warwick), influential churchman and man of letters who led the OXFORD MOVEMENT in the Church of England and later became a cardinal-deacon in the ROMAN CATHOLIC church.

After pursuing his education in an evangelical home and at Trinity College, Oxford, Newman was made a fellow of Oriol College, Oxford, in 1822, vice principal of Alban Hall in 1825, and VICAR of St. Mary's, Oxford, in 1828. Under the influence of the clergyman John Keble and Richard Hurrell Froude, Newman became a convinced high churchman (one who emphasizes the Anglican church's continuation of ancient Christian tradition, particularly as regards the episcopate, PRIESTHOOD, and SACRAMENTS).

When the Oxford Movement began in 1833 Newman was its effective organizer and intellectual leader. The movement was started with the object of stressing the Catholic elements in the English religious tradition and of reforming the Church of England. Newman contributed several books, especially the Lectures on the Prophetic Office of the Church (1837), the classic statement of the Tractarian doctrine of authority; the University Sermons (1843), similarly classical for the theory of religious belief; and above all his Parochial and Plain Sermons (1834–42), which in their published form took the principles of the movement into the country at large.

Newman was soon contending that the Church of England represented true catholicity and that the test of this catholicity (as against Rome upon the one side and what he termed "the popular Protestants" upon the other) lay in the teaching of the ancient and undivided church of the Fathers. In 1838–39 Newman and Keble published Froude's Remains, in which the REFORMATION was violently denounced; in 1841 Newman released his Tract 90, which, in reconciling the THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES with the teaching of the ancient and undivided church, appeared to some to assert that the articles were not incompatible with the doctrines of the COUNCIL OF TRENT.

Newman resigned St. Mary's, Oxford, on Sept. 18, 1843, and preached his last Anglican sermon a week later. He applied the law of historical development to Christian society and tried to show that the early and undivided church had developed rightly into the modern Roman Catholic church and that the Protestant churches represented a break in this development, both in doctrine and in devotion. On Oct. 9, 1845, he was received into the Roman Catholic church, publishing a few weeks later his Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine.

Newman went to Rome to be ordained to the priesthood and after some uncertainties founded the Oratory at Birmingham in 1848. He was suspect among the more rigorous Roman Catholic clergy because of the quasi-liberal spirit that he seemed to have brought with him from Anglicanism, and therefore his early career as a Roman Catholic priest was marked by a series of frustrations; he was helped out of this period by an unwarranted attack from Charles Kingsley upon his moral teaching. Kingsley in effect challenged him to justify the honesty of his life as an Anglican. The resulting history of his religious opinions, Apologia pro Vita Sua (1864; "A Defense of His Life"), was read and approved far beyond the limits of the Roman Catholic church, recaptured the almost national status that he had once held, and assured Newman's stature in the Roman Catholic church. In 1870 he expressed opposition to a definition of PAPAL INFALLIBILITY, though himself a believer in the doctrine. In 1879 Pope LEO XIII made him cardinal-deacon of St. George in Velabro.

NEW MOON, Hebrew Rosh Ḥodesh ("Head of the Month"), start of the Hebrew month, a Jewish festival on which fasting and mourning are not allowed. A blessing is recited on the SABBATH preceding the New Moon, and an abbreviated form of the HALLEL psalms is sung or recited on the New Moon itself.

NEW RELIGIOUS MOVEMENTS

gious Movement (NRM) is the generally accepted term for what is also called (often with pejorative connotations) a "cult." Depending on the scope of one's definition, NRMs can include all new religions that have arisen worldwide over the past several centuries. Others would tend to restrict the use of the term to modern religious movements that display certain characteristic traits and that are largely centered in the United States and Europe but are also sometimes found in non-Western nations such as Japan.

Some of these characteristic traits are: (1) These religions are, by definition, "new" religions; NRMs are innovative religious responses to the conditions of the modern world, despite the fact that most NRMs represent themselves, in one way or another, as rooted in ancient traditions. (2) NRMs are also usually regarded as "countercultural"; that is, they are perceived to be (by others and by themselves) alternatives to the mainstream religions of Western society, especially CHRISTIANITY in its normative forms. It is also frequently the case that NRMs are highly eclectic, pluralistic, and syncretistic; they freely combine doctrines and practices from diverse sources within their belief systems. (3) In most cases the new movement is founded by a charismatic and sometimes highly authoritarian leader who is thought to have extraordinary powers or insights. Many NRMs are tightly organized; in light of their often self-proclaimed "alternative" or "outsider" status vis-à-vis the mainstream, these groups tend to make great demands on the loyalty and commitment of their followers and sometimes come to be all-encompassing substitutes for the family and other conventional social groupings. (4) NRMs have arisen to address specific needs that many people feel they cannot satisfy through more traditional religious organizations or through modern SECULARISM. NRMs are both products of and responses to modernity, pluralism, and the scientific worldview.

THE WEST

NRMs are extremely diverse, both in their historical roots and in their doctrines and practices. The following overview organizes this diversity into categories, but many NRMs could be classified under more than one of these rubrics.

Apocalyptic and millenarian movements. Some NRMs include an apocalyptic or millenarian dimension—the belief that the world as we know it is drawing to an end and that a new (and better) period is about to begin. There are apocalyptic strains in many of the world’s religions, but it is Christian millenarianism in particular that has formed the backdrop for the development of many of the NRMs in the West.

Among the first new religions in the United States were the SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTISTS and the JEHOVAH’S WITNESSES, both the products of millenarian fervor set off in the mid-19th century by WILLIAM MILLER (1782–1849). Miller predicted that Christ would return to earth sometime in 1843 or 1844. When Christ failed to appear, the result was termed the “Great Disappointment.” Nevertheless, many still believed in the prediction, feeling that only Miller’s calculations were faulty. The Seventh-day Adventists, formed under the leadership of prophet and visionary Ellen G. White (1827–1915), and the Jehovah’s Witnesses, founded by CHARLES TAZE RUSSELL (1852–1916), both continue to believe that we are living at the end of time and awaiting Christ’s imminent return.

Another version of millenarianism underlies the New Age Movement that arose in the 1970s and ’80s. The New Age Movement is comprised of an extremely eclectic conglomeration of beliefs and practices ranging from channeling and crystal healing to updated versions of shamanism and a variety of therapies and techniques designed to “transform” the individual into a “higher consciousness.” The movement as a whole optimistically presumes that we have entered, or are on the verge of entering, a “new age” (sometimes referred to as the “Age of Aquarius”) of unprecedented spiritual possibilities.

A darker side of apocalyptic expectations has resulted in mass suicides and tragic conflict with governmental agencies. In the 1970s an ordained Methodist minister named JIM JONES (1931–78) moved his congregation (called the People’s Temple) from the United States to the jungles of Guyana. There he attempted to create a utopian, interracial community united by his personal CHARISMA and based on his unorthodox version of Christianity combined with communism. Jones, an increasingly authoritative and paranoid personality, warned his followers that a devastating thermonuclear war was impending. In 1978, after a group of concerned family members (led by a U.S. congressman) visited the group’s commune, Jones and his followers (913 persons in all) committed what Jones called “revolutionary suicide” rather than submit to what they thought would be an attempt to compromise their community. “Death is a million times preferable to 10 more days of this life,” Jones told his group, and, “If you knew what was ahead of you, you’d be glad to be stepping over tonight.” Similar tragedies, fueled by apocalyptic expectations, befell David Koresh’s Branch Davidians near Waco, Texas, and the Heaven’s Gate group in Rancho Santa Fe, California (see below).

On Aug. 16–17, 1987, ceremonies, such as this gathering at Giza, Egypt, were held worldwide for the Harmonic Convergence, an attempt to harness spiritual energy for peace and enlightenment

The influence of the East. While the religions of India have intrigued the West for millennia, it was only in the 19th century that accurate and relatively comprehensive information regarding the teachings and practices of HINDUISM and BUDDHISM began circulating in Europe and the United States. Certain Indian philosophical doctrines, especially those of monistic VEDĀNTA, began to influence Western thinkers such as Arthur Schopenhauer, Henry David Thoreau, Ralph Waldo Emerson, and Friedrich Nietzsche. Monism is a philosophical system that posits the unity of the universe. For instance, in Hindu monistic beliefs the cosmos is regarded as wholly sacred or as participating in a single divine principle (BRAHMAN, or Being itself). Esoteric groups like the Theosophical Society (see THEOSOPHY; BLAVATSKY, HELENA PETROVNA) and its many offshoots integrated Indian philosophical and religious concepts into a synthesis that also drew on Western MYSTICISM, NEOPLATONISM, QABBALAH, Jewish mysticism, and communication with the spirit world.

By the end of the 19th century the first religious group to be imported from India took root in the United States. VIVEKANANDA (1863–1902) attended the 1893 World's Parliament of Religions in Chicago and shortly thereafter founded the Vedanta Society in New York. Based on the monistic philosophy of one of Hinduism's philosophical schools and on its interpretation as given in the teachings and mystical experiences of Vivekananda's teacher, Ramakrishna (1836–86), the Vedanta Society attracted the attention of many prominent members of the artistic community: the French actress Sarah Bernhardt, the American author and publisher Paul Carus, the English novelist Aldous Huxley, and the Anglo-American novelist and playwright Christopher Isherwood, among others. With centers in India and throughout the world, the Vedanta Society (also known as the Ramakrishna Mission) continues to promote a highly eclectic and tolerant form of religious unity, claiming that all world religions teach fundamentally the same truth, but nevertheless maintaining that Vedānta is uniquely capable of articulating this unified doctrine.

Some 40 years after Vivekananda's journey to the United States another teacher from India, Paramahansa Yogananda (1893–1952), founded the SELF-REALIZATION FELLOWSHIP in Los Angeles and introduced the practice and philosophy of YOGA to Americans. Drawing on traditional Hindu teachings of spiritual, mental, and physical discipline, Yogananda represented yoga in quasi-scientific terms that appealed to his audience, maintaining that other religious teachers (including JESUS and PAUL) had also preached much the same message.

While these precursors paved the way, it was not until the 1960s and '70s that NRMs based on Eastern religions became attractive to large numbers of Americans and Europeans. It was in this period that MAHARISHI MAHESH YOGI (b. 1911?) founded his Spiritual Regeneration Movement with its popularized meditation technique known as TRANSCENDENTAL MEDITATION. The Maharishi won much publicity by attracting to himself and his teachings celebrities such as the American film star Mia Farrow, the American engineer and architect Buckminster Fuller, and the English musical group the Beatles. Transcendental Meditation was also represented as a "scientific" method for obtaining both personal and social peace and harmony; it centered around the repetition of and concentration on an individualized MANTRA imparted to the initiate by the GURU.

Another group that arose in this period of cultural turmoil and change was the International Society for Krishna Consciousness (ISKCON), founded by A.C. Bhaktivedanta (1896–1977) and popularly known as the Hare Krishna movement. Far less accommodating to American cultural and religious predilections, ISKCON is fundamentally a continuation of a Hindu sect, originating in India's medieval period, that emphasizes ecstatic devotion to the god Krishna. Conversion to ISKCON entails not only a shift in RELIGIOUS BELIEF and practice but an entire break with Western culture, symbolized by the adoption of Indian dress and diet and by the shaving of male followers' heads. Such radical signs of alienation from Western culture and values, together with the group's active proselytizing dimension and its internal crises and leadership struggles, engendered much controversy about the Hare Krishnas.

The Rajneesh International Foundation was another highly controversial NRM that originated in India. The group centered around the flamboyant figure of BHAGWAN SHREE RAJNEESH (1931–90), who taught a heavily revised form of Indian spirituality called Tantrism. Known to some as the "sex guru," Rajneesh urged his Western followers to overcome their repressions through a technique he dubbed "dynamic meditation," entailing shouting, screaming, and dancing—and in some cases physical violence and uninhibited (sometimes public) sex. Rajneesh thus adapted and repackaged ancient Tantric techniques for a Western audience more familiar with psychotherapy.

ISKCON and other imports from the East, such as movements representing ZEN Buddhism and the various schools of TIBETAN BUDDHISM, have been introduced into the United States and Europe with little or no alterations to their traditional forms. Their appeal to Westerners may very well lie in their exotic nature and their clear-cut differences from Western religions. Many other Asian traditions, however, have been highly modified by their new contexts. Especially noteworthy is the emphasis many Eastern-based NRMs place on religious UNIVERSALISM (a response to pluralism) and on the "scientific" nature of the spiritual teachings and techniques put forward.

"Scientific" NRMs: UFO groups and Scientology. Many NRMs claim not to be religions at all but rather "scientific truth" that has not yet been acknowledged or discovered by the official scientific community. In the search for authority for new teachings certain NRMs have thus tapped into what is arguably the most powerful form of legitimizing discourse in the modern world: science. While some groups, for example, have claimed scientific authority and proof for yoga and meditation, other NRMs with few or no roots in Asian religions have developed in the West under the umbrella of scientific validity.

One such example is the variety of UFO groups, sometimes called collectively the "contact movement." Drawing on time-honored religious stories of the descent of supernatural beings from the heavens, the UFO groups have modified such notions into what has been called a "technological myth" of the arrival—whether imminent or actual and ongoing—of space aliens on Earth, bringing with them advanced knowledge and spiritual wisdom. Already by the 1950s groups such as Understanding, Inc., founded by Daniel Fry (who claimed to be a contactee), argued that UFOs carried beings who had come to Earth to promote world peace and personal development. The Amalgamated Flying Saucer Clubs of America, led by Gabriel Green, and the Aetherius Society, organized by George King, maintained that space aliens held the key to the salvation both of the planet as a whole and of every individual on Earth.

A more recent and highly publicized UFO group was Heaven's Gate, the creation of Marshall Applewhite, who preferred to call himself "Bo." Applewhite declared that he and his female partner ("Peep") were really representatives from another world, which he referred to as "the evolutionary level above human." Claiming to have come to Earth once before in the figure of Jesus, Applewhite asserted that the "kingdom of heaven" taught by Applewhite/Christ was a real, physical place inhabited by highly evolved beings. Earth was a "garden" in which human beings had been "planted" by these superior space beings; some such "plants" could hope to mature and further evolve into "members of the level above human," but only if they systematically shed all vestiges of their humani-and religious pluralism and an attempt to reclaim and return to their roots, whereas others more eclectically embrace “pagan” traditions from a variety of cultures. Still other such groups, especially those that collectively go under the name Wicca, are in large part religious articulations of sentiments derived from the modern ecology movement and feminism. Wiccan NRMs, mostly but not exclusively composed of women, tend to center around the figure of a goddess and the “female principle” manifest in nature, and, like other Neo-Pagan organizations, they attempt to re-enchant and personalize the natural world that they believe science has objectified.

THE EAST

Eastern NRMs include movements that have appeared in South Asia, East Asia, and Southeast Asia since the mid-19th century. While some of these religious movements have remained small and limited in influence, others have gathered many followers under their banners and have played important roles in the socioeconomic and political development of their respective nations or regions.

While there have always been NRMs developing in Asia, there are important differences between those that developed after the 1840s and those that developed in previous centuries. Post-1850 religious movements reflect the impact of the West and of Western forms of political, economic, and cultural imperialism. From the 19th century onward the newly industrialized and expansionist West advanced into Asia for God, glory, and gold. Western nations, secure in their sense of political, military, economic, and cultural superiority and armed with either an expansionist Protestant evangelical faith or an equally expansionist Catholicism, frequently sent missionaries to act as the initial vanguard. Some areas in South and Southeast Asia—India, Vietnam (along with Laos and Cambodia), Indonesia, Malaysia, and the Philippines—were taken outright and made to fit into evolving European and American colonial networks. Even those areas that were not directly controlled by the West (such as China, Japan, and Korea) felt the influence of the West in the form of imposed unequal treaties or carefully applied military pressure. The NRMs that evolved in this new sociopolitical and cultural environment tended either to be direct reactions to Western imperialism, taking the form of reinvention of an older tradition, or to be spiritual syntheses of Western and Asian belief systems. Each of these new religions was thus designed to serve both as an answer and as an alternative to the spreading Westernization, secularization, individualism, and materialism occurring within Asian cultures.

South Asia: India. In India the 19th-century rise of the ARYA SAMAJ and the Brahma Samaj movements, both of which were reactions to the growing British presence in India and the British challenge to Hindu traditions, paved the way for certain new religious movements. One such movement was Ramakrishna’s Vedānta movement, which sought to make Vedānta philosophy and practice accessible to a Western audience. A second such movement was the Transcendental Meditation movement of Maharishi Mahesh Yogi. A third new religion, with strong ties to the 12th-century BHAKTI movement, was the Hare Krishna movement. Yet another was the cult founded by Bhagwan Shree Rajneesh, who was also known as Acharya Rajneesh and, later, as Osho. (See above.)

East Asia: China and Taiwan. NRMs in China evolved after the first Opium War (1839–42) and were the result of Western imperialism, difficult economic conditions in southern China owing in part to the opium trade and the war over opium, and the cultural impact created by the first generation of Anglo-American Protestant missionaries. The first and foremost of these new religions was the T’ai-p’ing T’ien-kuo (the Heavenly Kingdom of the Great Peace). A mixture of evangelical Christianity, classical quasi-Confucian methods, and various strains derived from the popular tradition, the movement was developed by its charismatic leader, HUNG HSIU-CH’ÜAN, into a religious state that controlled key provinces in southern and central China. T’ai-p’ing T’ien-kuo threatened the stability of the Ch’ing state until the movement was finally put down in 1865.

The period after the 1858 Treaty of Tientsin saw the legalization of the Western Christian missionary enterprise and the spread of many forms of Christian de-nominal messages throughout China. One effect of this tide of cultural and spiritual imperialism was the development of indigenous Protestant sects and denominations. One of these Christian new religions, the CHEN YESSU CHIAO-HUEI (the True Jesus Church), evolved as a result of the Pentecostal charismatic revivals that took place in the United States between 1900 and 1920 (see PENTECOSTALISM). A second independent church was the Ti-fang Huei (Local Church), or THE CHU-HWEI HSUO, founded by Watchman Nee.

Some of the later new religions of China evolved out of forms of sectarian and popular faith that predated the Opium War. One such major new body, which evolved out of the WHITE LOTUS millenarian tradition and the related tradition of moralistic spirit-writing (pai-luan/fu-chi), or shamanistic, sects, is the highly syncretistic I-kuan Tao (the Unity Sect). Another fu-chi sect, the Tzu-hui T'ang (Compassion Sect), began in Taiwan in 1949. Like I-kuan Tao, it has Wang Mu Niang-niang as its major deity.

The new constitution of the People's Republic of China, adopted in 1982, contains religious tolerance clauses, and both older and newer forms of religion have again begun to flourish. House churches—small evangelical and charismatic Christian bodies reminiscent of the True Jesus Church—have begun to sprout up, and the number of those who call themselves Christian has risen markedly. The min-chien (popular) traditions have also made a comeback, with older temples being restored and new ones being built. Much of the growth of the min-chien traditions is due in part to renewed contact with Taiwan and to the moral and financial support of Taiwanese followers of such mainland cults as those of Ma-tsu, the goddess of the sea; Pao-sheng Ta-ti, the god of medicine; KUAN-YIN, the popular goddess of mercy; and Kuang-kung, the martial and judicial god.

The major new religion now found in China is the faith in the semi-mystical powers of ch'i-kung. Ch'i-kung is the classical tradition of both spiritual and physical exercise that is often seen as the basis for the martial arts. In the 1980s and 1990s, ch'i-kung masters developed followings throughout China by demonstrating their powers. The movement spread to Taiwan, where ch'i-kung teachings were integrated into the teachings of syncretistic sects.

Taiwan's postwar experience differs from that of the mainland, and the path of development of its new religions has differed as well. Taiwan was, in turn, a Dutch colony, a Ming loyalist stronghold, a prefecture of China's Fukien province, a province of China, and a Japanese colony before Chinese Nationalists took over the island in 1945. It became the refuge for and a bastion of the Nationalist Party after 1949, and, with considerable American help and a reformed Nationalist regime, it began to develop into an economic success. Its leaders opened the nation to Christian missionaries and to independent Chinese churches, such as the True Jesus Church. The Taiwanese government also supported the mainstream traditions, such as Buddhism and TAOISM, and did little, if anything, to stifle the development of the major popular cults (many from the Fukien province) that had evolved on the island after 1600. The decades from 1949 to the end of the 20th century saw the flowering of a number of syncretistic new religions, such as the socially active, salvationistic Buddhist organization Tsi hi; charismatic Christian churches, such as the True Jesus Church and the New Testament Church; the moralistic, syncretistic sect I-kuan Tao; and a postmodern and highly eclectic millenarian sect, the CHEN TAO (the True Way).

East Asia: Japan. The traumatic political, economic, social, and cultural changes that took place in the years from 1853 to 1889—these being the final years of the Tokugawa Shogunate and the first two decades of the Meiji Restoration—led in turn to the formation of a large number of new religious entities that scholars of Japan have termed the New Religions. Such religions had their roots in SHINTŌ and Buddhism, the two dominant traditions in Japan, as well as in Tokugawa NEO-CONFUCIANISM. If one searches for the basic causes of the dynamic growth of these religions, one finds that, while the older traditions were characterized by extreme formalism and a lack of vitality, the New Religions demonstrate renewal and higher levels of enthusiasm. Like the NRMs of China, Taiwan, Korea, and Southeast Asia, they are characterized by high levels of popular participation and volunteerism, with followers running day-to-day operations and converting new adherents.

The earliest of the Japanese New Religions include TENRIKYŌ and Konkōkyō. The years between the wars saw the development of Getdatsu-kai—a sect that is a syncretistic blend of Shintō, Buddhism, and Confucianism—Ōmoto-kyō, and HITO-NO-MICHI, another Shintō-related sect. The post-war period saw further development of some of these earlier groups—Hito-no-michi, for example, became PL KYŌDAN (Perfect Liberty Church). New cults also appeared, such as TENSHŌ KŌTAI JINGŪ-KYŌ, also known as Odoru Shukyō (the Dancing Religion); Jōhrei, a Christian-based self-help movement; and the radical doomsday religion AUM SHINRIKYŌ. The latter group came to worldwide attention in 1995 when it released nerve gas on the Tokyo subway system, killing 12 people and injuring more than 5,000.

East Asia: Korea. The history of modern Korea has been one of war and division. Long influenced by both the Chinese and the Japanese, Korea became a battleground in the age of imperialism. In the late 19th century Japan entered the ranks of modern militarized and expansionist states, first taking over Taiwan in 1895 and then, in 1910, Korea. Japan ruled Korea with a strong and sometimes brutal hand until 1945. Korea was then divided into two states. In 1950 South Korea was invaded by the communist regime of North Korea. United Nations (largely U.S.) intervention saved the two-state system and allowed for a truce that redefined the borders of the two Koreas, one a communist state and the other a Westernized, quasi-military state. Only from the mid-1980s did South Korea move toward democracy, while North Korea remained a poverty-stricken, family-run dictatorship.

This painful and traumatic history created a fertile environment for the development of Korean NRMs. Meanwhile, since the mid-19th century Korea had been heavily influenced by Christian missionaries, both Catholic and Protestant. The late 19th century saw the development of TAJONG-GYO, or the Tangun Cult, a millenarian movement formulated by Na Chul. The postwar period produced not only a virtual explosion of Christian churches—by 1995 more than 25 percent of South Koreans were Christians—but the development of radical forms of Christianity and quasi-Christianity. David Yonggi Cho's Yoido Full Gospel Church in Seoul is the largest single church in the world, with a membership of over 700,000. It belongs to the ASSEMBLIES OF GOD, a major Pentecostal denomination in the United States. The major quasi-Christian new religion is Sun Myung Moon's UNIFICATION CHURCH. See also CH'ŌNDŌGYO.

Southeast Asia: The Philippines, Vietnam, and Indonesia. The major nations of Southeast Asia also went through periods of dramatic change in the 19th and 20th centuries, experiencing imperialistic conquest, Japanese aggression, and imperial divestiture followed by civil war and sociopolitical turmoil. One result of these dramatic and painful changes was the development of a number of major new cults and religions.

In Vietnam, for example, two major new religions evolved, helping to fuel, in some measure, the political and cultural turmoil the nation experienced. CAO DAI, a syncretistic religion that blended CONFUCIANISM, Taoism, Buddhism, and Christianity, became a military and political force with considerable power during the final years of World War II and over the course of the First Indochina War (1945–54). A second major new religion, Hoa Hoa, was founded by a Buddhist reformer, Huynh Phu So. Blending Confucianism, ANIMISM, and indigenous Vietnamese religious practices, the movement became a political and military presence that, like Cao Dai, was involved in the violent political universe of post-World War II Vietnam.

The Philippines produced its own new religions. These were the RIZALIST CULTS, named after José Rizal, a martyr in the struggle against the Spanish in the years immediately preceding the Spanish-American War. The cults were syncretistic and combined Catholic elements with pre-Spanish Malay and Filipino elements, presenting messages that were millenarian and that gave hope to the poor and oppressed.

Indonesia is the home of SUBUD, a movement founded in 1933 by a Sufi named Muhammad Subuh, also known as Bapak. It spread to the West in the 1950s. Subud is a religion in which the believers open themselves to the power of God, a state which is demonstrated by singing, dancing, shouting, laughter, and feelings of rapture and release. Thus, in form, at least, Subud parallels the charismatic Christian experience that is to be seen in worship patterns of the True Jesus Church and the New Testament Church of Taiwan.

CONCLUSION

NRMs, in all their diversity, represent various responses to some of the challenges of modernity: religious and cultural pluralism, the influence of science and technology, and the secularization of much of modern life. They are also attempts to find new spiritual alternatives to the mainstream religious traditions. While some NRMs have led to tragic ends for their adherents and others have faded away as quickly as they arose, many have provided religious solace to those who feel they cannot obtain it elsewhere and some show signs of enduring and becoming institutionalized. Some of these latter movements will undoubtedly become, over time, part of tomorrow's mainstream religions.

NEW TESTAMENT, second, later, and smaller of the two major divisions of the Christian BIBLE, and the portion that is canonical (authoritative) only to CHRISTIANITY.

Christians see in the New Testament the fulfillment of the promise of the OLD TESTAMENT. It relates and interprets the new COVENANT, represented in the life and death of Jesus, between God and the followers of JESUS CHRIST. Among its 27 books are selected recollections of the life and acts and sayings of Jesus in the four GOSPELS; a historical narrative of the first years of the Christian church in the ACTS OF THE APOSTLES; EPISTLES or letters of advice, instruction, admonition, and exhortation to local groups of Christians—14 of these letters are attributed to PAUL (one of these [Hebrews] probably wrongly so) and 7 by three other authors; and an apocalyptic description of the intervention of God in history, REVELATION TO JOHN. The books are not arranged chronologically in the New Testament. The Epistles of Paul, for example, which address the immediate problems of local churches shortly after Christ's death, are considered to be the earliest texts.

The books of the New Testament were composed not in order to satisfy historical curiosity about the events they recount but to bear witness to a faith in the action of God through these events. A history of the New Testament is made difficult by the relatively short time span covered by its books when compared with the millennium and more of history described by the Old Testament. There is less historical information in the New Testament than in the Old, and many facts about the church in the 1st century therefore must be arrived at by inference from statements in one of the Gospels or Epistles.

NEW THOUGHT, mind-healing movement that originated in the United States in the 19th century, based on religious and metaphysical presuppositions. The diversity of views and styles of life represented in various New Thought groups are difficult to describe because of their variety, and the same reason makes it virtually impossible to determine either membership or adherents. The influence of the various New Thought groups has been spread worldwide through lectures, journals, and books. Many adherents of New Thought consider themselves to be Christian.

Origins. The origins of New Thought may be traced to a dissatisfaction on the part of many persons with scientific EMPIRICISM and their reaction to the religious skepticism of the 17th and 18th centuries. The ROMANTICISM and idealism of the 19th century also influenced the New Thought movement, of which Phineas P. Quimby (1802–66) is usually cited as the earliest proponent. A native of Portland, Maine, Quimby practiced hypnotism and developed his concepts of mental and spiritual healing and health based on the view that illness is a matter of the mind. Quimby's influence may be seen in the writings of MARY BAKER EDDY and CHRISTIAN SCIENCE, although Mrs. Eddy retracted acknowledgment of dependence on him. Quimby's influence was readily acknowledged by others, such as the Methodist and Swedenborgian Warren F. Evans (1817–89).

Teachings and practices. There are elements of New Thought that may be traced to Platonism, particularly its Idealistic stance that the realm of ideas is more real than that of matter; to the teachings of EMANUEL SWEDENBORG, especially the view that the material realm is one of effects whose causes are spiritual and whose purpose is divine; to Hegelianism, especially Hegel's views regarding the external world, mental phenomena, and the nervous organism as the meeting ground of the body and the mind; to Orientalism, involving spiritual teachings of Eastern religions; and, particularly, to the Transcendentalism (a form of Idealism) of the 19th-century American philosopher and poet Ralph Waldo Emerson.

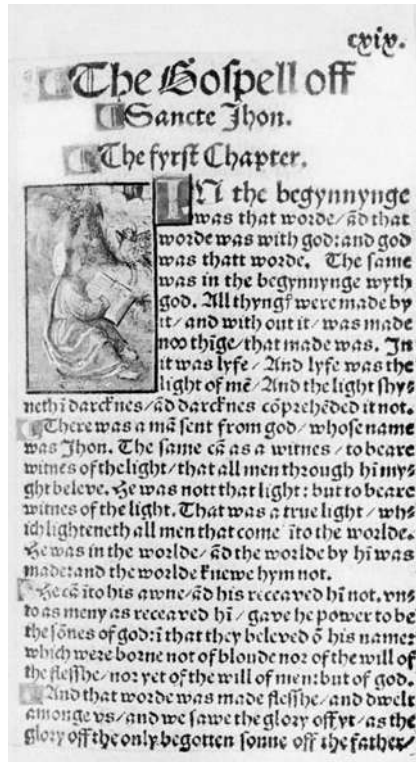

New Thought adherents do not accept Mary Baker Eddy's teaching or any other formulation as the final revelation. Rather, truth is viewed as a matter of continuing revelation, and no one can declare with finality what is the nature of truth. Moreover, New Thought does not oppose medical science, as Mrs. Eddy did, and it is essentially positive and optimistic about life and its outcome.

New Thought principles emphasized the immanence of God, the divine nature of humans, the immediate availability of God's power to humans, the spiritual character of the universe, and the fact that SIN, human disorders, and human disease are basically matters of incorrect thinking. Moreover, according to New Thought, humans can live in oneness with God in love, truth, peace, health, and plenty. Many New Thought groups emphasize Jesus as teacher and healer and proclaim his kingdom as being within a person. Reference to Jesus or the Christ is totally omitted in the principles, however, as revised in 1954. New Thought leaders have increasingly stressed material prosperity as one result of New Thought.

New Thought implies a kind of monism, or view of the oneness of the world, but it also has strong undertones of GnosticisM; that is, though New Thought is open to all, spiritual healing and strength of mind and body are available only to those who have the insights and who have been initiated into the movement at some point. There are no established patterns of worship, although the services often involve explication of New Thought ideas, testimony to healing, and prayer for the sick.

mencement of the New Year. Such festivals, which are among the oldest and most universally observed, generally include rites and ceremonies expressive of mortification, purgation, invigoration, and jubilation over life's renewal. This renewal is the essence of the New Year. It is, to varying degrees of explicitness in world cultures, a remembrance or repetition of the creation of the cosmos on the symbolic anniversary of its creation, in order that the gods, the cosmos, and the community may be strengthened.

The earliest-known record of a New Year's festival dates from about 2000 BCE in Mesopotamia, where the New Year (Akitu) commenced with the new moon nearest the spring equinox (mid-March; Babylonia) or nearest the autumn equinox (mid-September; Assyria). The year began for the Egyptians, Phoenicians, and Persians with the autumn equinox (September 21) and for the Greeks, until the 5th century BCE, with the winter solstice (December 21). By the Roman republican calendar the year began on March 1; after 153 BCE the official date was January 1, and this was confirmed by the Julian calendar (46 BCE).

In the Jewish religious calendar the year begins with the first day of the month of Tishri (September 6–October 5; ROSH HASHANAH). In early medieval times most of Europe regarded March 25 (ANNUNCIATION Day) as the beginning of the year, though for Anglo-Saxon England New Year's Day was December 25. William the Conqueror decreed that the year start on January 1, but, later, England began its year with the rest of Christendom on March 25. January 1 was restored as New Year's Day by the Gregorian calendar (1582), immediately adopted by ROMAN CATHOLIC countries. Other countries slowly followed suit: Scotland, 1660; Germany and Denmark, about 1700; England, 1752; Sweden, 1753; and Russia, 1918.

Most Eastern New Year festivals retain a distinctly religious character. In Dravidian southern India, the Tamil New Year is celebrated at winter solstice with the three-day PONGAL festival, marked by religious PILGRIMAGES and the ritual boiling of new rice. In Bangladesh the New Year is marked by the worship of the GAṄĠĀ (Ganges) River.

Pre-Buddhist indigenous and Hindu influences are prominent in Southeast Asian festivals. In Thailand, Trut, or New Year (March/April), is of a mixed character. Buddhist monks exorcise ghosts from the vicinity and are presented with gifts. Oblations are made to various gods of Hindu origin. As people meet, water is playfully thrown by one on the other. Gambling, usually frowned upon, is permitted for the three-day festival.

Chinese New Year is celebrated officially for a month beginning at the second new moon after the winter solstice, in late January or early February. It is preceded by an expulsion of DEMONS and by theatrical performances. Offerings are made to gods of hearth and wealth and to ancestors. Tibetans observe the New Year in February with feasting, visiting, and a relaxation of monastic discipline.

The celebration of the New Year on January 1–3 is the most popular annual festival in Japan. In some rural districts it continues to be observed according to the lunar-solar calendar on dates varying between January 20 and February 19, and the traditions connected with the festival confirm its original connection with the coming of spring and a time of rebirth. The festival is called Ganjitsu ("Original Day"), signifying the beginning of the new year, and also Shōgatsu ("Standard Month"), referring to the belief that the good or bad fortune met with during the first few days of the new year may be taken as representative of the fortune for the entire coming year. The festival is customarily celebrated with ceremonial housecleaning, feasting, and exchanging visits and gifts.

NEZIQIN \,ne-zē-'kēn\ (Hebrew: "Damages"), fourth of the six major divisions, or orders (SEDARIM), of the MISHNAH, which was given its final form early in the 3rd century CE by JUDAH HA-NASI. Neziqin deals principally with legally adjudicated damages and financial questions. Its 10 tractates are: Bava qamma ("First Gate"), Bava metzi'a ("Middle Gate"), Bava batra ("Last Gate"), SANHEDRIN (the supreme executive and legislative body), Makkot ("Stripes"), Shevu'ot ("Oaths"), 'Eduyyot ("Testimonies"), 'Avoda zara ("Idolatry"), Avot ("Fathers"), and Horayot ("Decisions"). Both TALMUDS—the YERUSHALMI and the BAVLI—have GEMARA on all the tractates except Avot and 'Eduyyot.

NGO VAN CHIEU \ŋō-'vān-jē-'ü, Angl əŋ-'gō-\, also called Ngo Minh Chieu (b. 1878, Binh Tay, Vietnam—d. 1926?, Tay Ninh), founder of the Vietnamese new religious movement CAO DAI.

Ngo Van Chieu graduated from a provincial college in My Tho and entered the French colonial immigration service, where he served until 1902. In 1919, during a SÉANCE, he received a revelation calling him to a religious mission. After a period of study and meditation, he announced the formation of Cao Dai ("High Tower," a Taoist epithet for the supreme deity). Cao Dai was formally established in 1926 by Le Van Trung, a former government official, who became its leader, or "pope." Cao Dai contains elements of CONFUCIANISM, TAOISM, BUDDHISM, and ROMAN CATHOLICISM.

NICAEA, COUNCIL OF (325) \ni-'sē-ə\, first ecumenical council of the Christian church, meeting in ancient Nicaea (now İznik, Turkey). It was called by the emperor CONSTANTINE I, who presided over the opening session and took part in the discussions. He hoped a general council of the church would solve the problem created in the Eastern church by ARIANISM, a HERESY first proposed by ARIUS of Alexandria that posited that JESUS CHRIST is not divine but a created being. Pope Sylvester I did not attend the council but was represented by legates.

The council condemned Arius and, with reluctance on the part of some, incorporated the nonscriptural word homoousios ("of one substance") into a creed (the NICENE CREED) to signify the absolute equality of the Son with the Father. The emperor then exiled Arius, an act that, while manifesting a solidarity of CHURCH AND STATE, underscored the importance of secular patronage in ecclesiastical affairs.

The council failed to establish a uniform date for EASTER. But it issued decrees on many other matters, including the proper method of consecrating bishops, a condemnation of lending money at interest by clerics, and a refusal to allow bishops, priests, and deacons to move from one church to another. It also confirmed the primacy of Alexandria and Jerusalem over other sees in their respective areas.

NICAEA, COUNCIL OF (787), seventh ecumenical council of the Christian church, meeting in Nicaea (now İznik, Turkey). It attempted to resolve the ICONOCLASTIC CONTROVERSY, initiated in 726 when Emperor Leo III issued a decree against the worship of ICONS. The council declared that icons deserved reverence and veneration but not adoration. Convoled by the PATRIARCH Tarasius, it was attended by delegates of Pope Adrian I, who confirmed its decrees. Its authority was challenged in France as late as the 11th century, however, partly because certain doctrinal phrases had been incorrectly translated, though Rome's original verdict was eventually accepted.

NICENE CREED \ˈnī-,sēn, nī-ˈ\, also called Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed, Christian statement of faith that is the only "ecumenical" creed because, with the qualification noted below, it is accepted as authoritative by the ROMAN CATHOLIC, Eastern Orthodox, Anglican, and major Protestant churches.

The development of the Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed has been the subject of scholarly dispute. Most likely it was issued by the COUNCIL OF CONSTANTINOPLE (381). It was probably based on a baptismal creed already in existence, but it was an independent document and not an enlargement of the Creed of Nicaea, which was promulgated at the COUNCIL OF NICAEEA (325).

The so-called FILIOQUE clause (Latin filioque, "and from the son"), inserted after the words "the HOLY SPIRIT . . . who proceeds from the Father," was gradually introduced as part of the creed in the Western church, beginning in the 6th century. It was probably finally accepted by the PAPACY in the 11th century. It has been retained by the Roman Catholic, Anglican, and Protestant churches. The Eastern churches reject it because they consider it theological error and an unauthorized addition to a venerable document.

The Nicene Creed's principal liturgical use is in the EUCHARIST in the West and in both BAPTISM and the Eucharist in the East. A modern English version of the Western text is as follows:

- ◆ We believe in one God,
 the Father, the Almighty, maker of heaven and earth,
 of all that is seen and unseen.
- We believe in one Lord, Jesus Christ,
 the only Son of God,
 eternally begotten of the Father,
 God from God, Light from Light,
 true God from true God, begotten, not made, one in Being with the Father.
- Through him all things were made.
For us men and for our salvation
 he came down from heaven:
by the power of the Holy Spirit he was born of the Virgin Mary, and became man.
- For our sake he was crucified under Pontius Pilate;
 he suffered, died, and was buried.
 On the third day he rose again in fulfillment of the Scriptures;
 he ascended into heaven and is seated on the right hand of the Father.
- He will come again in glory to judge the living and the dead, and his kingdom will have no end.
- We believe in the Holy Spirit, the Lord, the giver of life,
 who proceeds from the Father and the Son.
 With the Father and the Son he is worshiped and glorified.
- He has spoken through the Prophets.
 We believe in one holy catholic and apostolic Church.

We acknowledge one baptism for the forgiveness of sins.

We look for the resurrection of the dead, and the life of the world to come.

Amen. ◆

NICHIREN \ˈnē-chē-,ren\, original name Zennichi, also called Zenshōbō Renchō \zen-ˈshō-,bō-ˈren-,chō\, posthumous name Rishō Daishi (b. March 30, 1222, Kominato, Japan—d. Nov. 14, 1282, Ikegami), militant Japanese Buddhist prophet.

Nichiren entered the Buddhist monastery of Kiyosumidera at the age of 11. BUDDHISM in Japan had become more and more eclectic, and the identity of the various sects was based more on institutional aspects than on doctrinal tenets. Though the monastery of Kiyosumidera officially belonged to the Tendai (T'ien-t'ai) sect, which was centered on the LOTUS SUTRA, the doctrine and practices were quite diverse. The young monk was dissatisfied with this situation and sought to find, through a study of all the major Buddhist schools in Japan, the authentic teaching of the BUDDHA GOTAMA.

By the year 1253 Nichiren had reached a clear conclusion: the true Buddhism was to be found in the Lotus Sutra, and all other Buddhist teachings were only temporary and provisional steps used by the Buddha to lead human beings to full and final truth. Moreover, the Buddha himself had decreed that this final truth was to be conveyed during the age of MAPPŌ (the then-present age of degeneration) and that a teacher would at that time appear to preach this saving message. The central focus of Nichiren's message was the sole and complete efficacy of chanting namu Myōhō rengekyō ("adoration be to the Lotus of the True Law"), which is taken to be the daimoku ("sacred title") of the Lotus Sutra.

During the next three decades Nichiren presented his own message, attacked all other Buddhist schools as false, and contended that Japan could only be saved from the imminent threats of Mongol invasion and internal decadence if his version of Buddhism were adopted and all other versions were banned. Nichiren's militant stance created many enemies in the government and among the Buddhist monks. Twice during his career he was exiled by the government, and on several occasions he was subjected to attacks initiated by monastic rivals.

Nichiren's teachings came to include the claim that he was a reincarnation of the Jōgyō bodhisattva, to whom Sakyamuni (the Buddha Gotama) had entrusted the Lotus Sutra. In his later years he also proclaimed the central importance of the daimandara (Great Mandala) that had been revealed to him—a sacred design that represents the Buddha world depicted in the Lotus Sutra. At its center the daimandara has the daimoku of the Lotus Sutra surrounded by the many names of Sakyamuni.

Nichiren is perhaps the most controversial figure in the history of Japanese Buddhism. He was deeply committed to Japan and believed that its mission was to be the chosen country of Buddhism from which Buddha's salvation was to spread to the entire world. His Buddhism was typically Japanese in its concern with the salvation of society and temporal institutions, not just individuals. Many of the modern Buddhist sects now flourishing in Japan are, in various degrees, based on Nichiren's doctrines.

NICHIREN BUDDHISM \ˈnē-chē-,ren\, school of Japanese BUDDHISM named after its founder, the 13th-century militant prophet and saint NICHIREN. It is one of the largest schools of Japanese Buddhism; by the late 20th century the total membership of its numerous sub-sects was reported to be approximately 30,600,000.

Nichiren believed that the quintessence of the Buddha's teachings was contained in the LOTUS SUTRA. According to Nichiren, the other sects then existing in Japan misunderstood the truth, and he vehemently denounced them and the government that supported them.

Nichiren taught that inasmuch as all men partake of the Buddha nature (TATHĀGATA), all men are manifestations of the eternal. He devised three ways of expressing this concept, known as the sandai-hihō ("three great secret laws"). The first, the honzon, is the chief object of worship in Nichiren temples and is a ritual drawing showing the name of the Lotus Sutra surrounded by the names of divinities mentioned in the sutra. The second great mystery is the daimoku, the "title" of the sutra; Nichiren instituted the devotional practice of chanting the phrase namu Myōhō renge-kyō ("adoration be to the Lotus of the True Law"). The third mystery relates to the kaidan, or place of ORDINATION, which is sacred.

After Nichiren's death the school split into various sub-sects, most notably Nichiren-shū (Nichiren Sect) and Nichiren-shō-shū (True Nichiren Sect). The former, which still controls the main temple, the Kuon-ji, maintained a dominant position among Nichiren Buddhists until the years following World War II, when it was eclipsed by the Nichiren-shō-shū, whose phenomenal growth stemmed from its lay organization, the SŌKA-GAKKAI.

Nichiren-shō-shū traces its line of succession back to one of Nichiren's six disciples, Nikkō, who, according to documents held by the sect, was the prophet's chosen successor. The temple he established in 1290 at the foot of MOUNT FUJI, Daiseki-ji, is still the sect's headquarters. Nichiren-shō-shū differs from the other Nichiren sects in its elevation of the founder, Nichiren, to a rank higher even than that of the BUDDHA GOTAMA.

Among its rival Nichiren sects, Nichiren-shō-shū had only minor influence until the emergence of the Sōka-gakkai lay organization brought it into its present dominant position in Japanese politics. The sect has established branches outside Japan. In the United States the lay organization equivalent to the Sōka-gakkai is called Nichiren-shō-shū of America.

NICHOLAS, SAINT, also called Nicholas of Bari, Nicholas of Myra, Santa Claus (fl. 4th century, Myra, Lycia, Asia Minor [near modern Finike, Turkey]; feast day December 6), one of the most popular saints commemorated in the Eastern and Western Christian churches, and now traditionally associated with the festival of CHRISTMAS.

St. Nicholas, Russian icon of the Novgorod school, c. 1300; in the Hermitage, St. Petersburg

The Bridgeman Art Library

Nicholas' existence is not attested by any historical document, so nothing certain is known of his life except that he was probably bishop of Myra in the 4th century. According to tradition, he was born in the ancient Lycian seaport city of Patara, and, when young, he traveled to Palestine and Egypt. He became bishop of Myra soon after returning to Lycia. He was imprisoned during the Roman emperor Diocletian's persecution of Christians, but he was later released under the rule of Emperor CONSTANTINE the Great, and he subsequently attended the first COUNCIL OF NICAËA (325). After his death he was buried in his church at Myra, and by the 6th century his shrine there had become well known. In 1087 Italian sailors or merchants stole his alleged remains from Myra and took them to Bari, Italy; this removal greatly increased the saint's popularity in Europe, and as a result Bari became one of the most crowded of all PILGRIMAGE centers. His relics remain enshrined in the 11th-century basilica of San Nicola, Bari.

Nicholas' reputation for generosity and kindness gave rise to legends of miracles he performed for the poor and unhappy. He was reputed to have given marriage dowries of gold to three girls whom poverty would otherwise have forced into lives of prostitution, and he restored to life three children who had been chopped up by a butcher and put in a brine tub. In the Middle Ages, devotion to Nicholas extended to all parts of Europe. He became the patron saint of Russia and Greece; of charitable fraternities and guilds; of children, sailors, unmarried girls, merchants, and pawnbrokers; and of such cities as Fribourg, Switz., and Moscow. Thousands of churches throughout Europe were dedicated to him. Nicholas' traditional feast day was the occasion for the ceremonies of the Boy Bishop, a widespread European custom in which a boy was elected bishop and reigned until Holy Innocents' Day (December 28).

After the REFORMATION, Nicholas' cult disappeared in all the Protestant countries of Europe except Holland, where his legend persisted as Sinterklaas (a Dutch variant of the name Saint Nicholas). Dutch colonists took this tradition with them to New Amsterdam (now New York City) in the American colonies in the 17th century. Sinterklaas was adopted by the country's English-speaking majority under the name Santa Claus, and his legend of a kindly old man was united with old Nordic folktales of a magician who punished naughty children and rewarded good children with presents. The resulting image of Santa Claus in the United States crystallized in the 19th century, and he has ever since remained the patron of the gift-giving festival of Christmas. Under various guises Saint Nicholas was transformed into a similar benevolent, gift-giving figure in other countries. In the United Kingdom Santa Claus is known as Father Christmas.

NICHOLAS OF CUSA \ˈni-kə-ləs . . . ˈkü-sə, ˈkyü-\, German Nikolaus von Cusa, Latin Nicolaus Cusanus (b. 1401, Kues, Trier—d. Aug. 11, 1464, Todi, Papal States), CARDINAL of the ROMAN CATHOLIC church, mathematician, scholar, experimental scientist, and influential philosopher who stressed the incomplete nature of man's knowledge of God and of the universe.

At the Council of Basel in 1432 Nicholas gained recognition for his opposition to the candidate put forward by Pope Eugenius IV for the archbishopric of Trier. To his colleagues at the council he dedicated De concordantia catholica (1433; "On Catholic Concordance"), in which he expressed support for the supremacy of the general councils of the church over the authority of the PAPACY. By 1437, however, finding the council unsuccessful in preserving church unity and enacting needed reforms, Nicholas reversed his position and became one of Eugenius' most ardent followers. Ordained a priest about 1440, Cusa was made a cardinal in Brixen (Bressanone), Italy, by Pope Nicholas V and in 1450 was elevated to bishop there. For two years Cusa served as Nicholas' legate to Germany, after which he began to serve full-time as bishop of Brixen.

A model "Renaissance man" in his disciplined and varied learning, Cusa was skilled in theology, mathematics, philosophy, science, and the arts. In De docta ignorantia (1440; "On Learned Ignorance") he described the learned man as one who is aware of his own ignorance. In this and other works he used ideas from geometry to demonstrate his points, as in his comparison of man's search for truth to the task of converting a square into a circle.

Among Cusa's many interests were diagnostic medicine and applied science. He emphasized knowledge through experimentation and anticipated the work of the astronomer Copernicus by discerning a movement in the universe that did not center in the Earth. He also provided the first proof that air has weight. Numerous other developments, including a map of Europe, can also be traced to Cusa. A manuscript collector who recovered a dozen lost comedies by the Roman writer Plautus, he left an extensive library that remains a center of scholarly activity in the hospital he founded and completed at his birthplace in 1458.

NIEBUHR, HELMUT RICHARD \ˈnē-ˌbūr\ (b. Sept. 3, 1894, Wright City, Mo., U.S.—d. July 5, 1962, Greenfield, Mass.), American Protestant theologian and educator who was considered a leading authority on ethics and U.S. church history. He was a foremost advocate of theological existentialism.

The younger brother of the theologian REINHOLD NIEBUHR, Helmut was educated at Elmhurst College in Illinois, Eden Theological Seminary, St. Louis, Mo., Washington University, Yale Divinity School, and Yale University, where he was one of the first students to receive a Ph.D. in religion (1924). Ordained a pastor of the Evangelical and REFORMED CHURCH in 1916, he taught at Eden Theological Seminary (1919–22; 1927–31) and also served as president of Elmhurst College (1924–27). From 1931 he taught theology and Christian ethics at Yale Divinity School.

Influenced by KARL BARTH, SØREN KIERKEGAARD, and Ernst Troeltsch, Niebuhr advocated historical criticism of RELIGIOUS BELIEFS, urging that church teachings be interpreted so as to make them meaningful in contemporary culture. His views on theological existentialism allowed for relative interpretations of revelation and values within the framework of a monotheistic faith. He argued that churches must account for the social context of their existence.

NIEBUHR, REINHOLD (b. June 21, 1892, Wright City, Mo., U.S.—d. June 1, 1971, Stockbridge, Mass.), American theologian who had extensive influence on political thought and whose criticism of the prevailing THEOLOGICAL LIBERALISM of the 1920s significantly affected the intellectual climate within American PROTESTANTISM.

Niebuhr was the son of Gustav Niebuhr, a minister of the Evangelical Synod of North America. Reinhold graduated from his denomination's Elmhurst College, Illinois (1910), and Eden Theological Seminary, St. Louis, Mo. (1913), and completed his theological education at Yale University, receiving a bachelor of divinity degree (1914) and a master of arts (1915). He was ordained to the ministry of the Evangelical Synod in 1915.

Niebuhr served as pastor of Bethel Evangelical Church in Detroit from 1915 to 1928. His experience in Detroit—and especially his exposure to the American automobile industry before labor was protected by unions and by social legislation—caused him to become a radical critic of capitalism and an advocate of socialism. Niebuhr left the pastoral ministry in 1928 to teach at Union Theological Seminary in New York City, where he served as professor of applied CHRISTIANITY (from 1930) and was a great intellectual and personal force until his retirement in 1960.

As a theologian Niebuhr is best known for his "Christian Realism," which emphasized the persistent roots of evil in human life. In his Moral Man and Immoral Society (1932) he stressed the egoism and the pride and hypocrisy of nations and classes. Later he saw these as ultimately the fruit of the insecurity and anxious overdefensiveness of humans in their finiteness; here he located "original SIN." His powerful polemics against liberal beliefs in assured progress and radical utopian hopes were balanced by faith in what he called "indeterminate possibilities" for humanity in history. Though he did much to encourage the revival of the theology of the REFORMATION, with its emphasis on sin and grace—so-called neo-orthodoxy—his salient theological work, The Nature and Destiny of Man, 2 vol. (1941–43), was planned by him as a synthesis both of the insights of the Reformation and of the Renaissance, with its hopefulness about cultural achievements.

Niebuhr's writings also include Faith and History: A Comparison of Christian and Modern Views of History (1949), a theological orientation; The Self and the Dramas of History (1955), probably his profoundest philosophical work; and The Structure of Nations and Empires (1959), his chief systematic discussion of international relations. Four volumes of essays, some of which are essential for understanding Niebuhr's thought and his influence on events, are Christianity and Power Politics (1940); Christian Realism and Political Problems (1953); Pious and Secular America (1958); and Faith and Politics: A Commentary on Religious, Social, and Political Thought in a Technological Age, ed. by Ronald H. Stone (1968). Love and Justice, ed. by D.B. Robertson (1957), is a collection of shorter writings showing Niebuhr's response to events; Children of Light and Children of Darkness: A Vindication of Democracy and a Critique of Its Traditional Defence (1944), is a brief but comprehensive discussion of social ethics.

NIFLHEIM \ˈni-vəl-ˌhäm\, Old Norse Niflheimr \-ˌhā-mər\, in GERMANIC RELIGION, cold, dark, misty world of the dead, ruled by the goddess HEL. In some accounts it was the last of nine worlds, a place into which evil men passed after reaching the region of death (Hel). Situated below one of the roots of the WORLD TREE, YGGDRASIL, Niflheim contained a well, Hvergelmir, from which many rivers flowed. In the Norse creation story, Niðheim was the misty region north of the void (GINNUNGAGAP) in which the world was created.

NIHON SHOKI \nē-'hōŋ-'shō-kē\, also called Nihon-gi \-gē\ (Japanese: “Chronicles of Japan”), text that, with the KŌJIKI, comprises the oldest official history of Japan, covering the period from its mythical origins to 697 CE.

Written in Chinese, it reflected the influence of Chinese civilization in Japan. It was compiled in 720 by order of the imperial court. The first part deals with many Japanese myths and legends and is an important source for SHINTŌ thought. The later chapters, for the period from about the 5th century on, contain records of several of the politically powerful clans as well as of the imperial family. Among the events described are the introduction of BUDDHISM and the Taika reforms of the 7th century.

NIKĀYA \ni-'kā-yə\ (Sanskrit and Pāli: “group,” “class,” or “assemblage”), in BUDDHISM, any of the so-called “Eighteen Schools” of Indian sectarian Buddhism. After the second Buddhist council, at which time the MAHĀSANGHIKAS separated from the Sthaviravādins, a number of Buddhist “schools” or “sects” began to appear over the course of many years. Each of these schools maintained slight (or sometimes greater) differences in doctrine, and each adhered to slightly different monastic codes. This early period of Buddhist history (prior to the formation of MAHĀYĀNA Buddhism) with its proliferation of many different Buddhist sects and divisions of schools is often referred to as the period of “Nikāya Buddhism” or sectarian Buddhism. In addition, in Southeast Asian countries such as Burma and Thailand, Buddhist sects are still called nikāya.

A second meaning of the word nikāya refers not to a group or class of people, but to a group or assemblage of texts. The five major divisions of the SUTTA PIṬAKA of the Pāli canon are called nikāyas: Dīgha Nikāya (containing long suttas), Majjhima Nikāya (containing suttas of middle length), Samyutta Nikāya (containing suttas organized according to content), Aṅguttara Nikāya (containing suttas arranged according to the number of doctrinal items under discussion), and the Khuddaka Nikāya (containing suttas not included in any of the other four nikāyas).

NIKE \nī-kē, 'nē-kā\, in GREEK RELIGION, goddess of victory, daughter of the GIANT Pallas and of the River STYX. As an attribute of both ATHENA and ZEUS, Nike was represented in art as a small figure carried in the hand by those divinities. Athena Nike was always wingless; Nike alone was winged. She also appears carrying a palm branch, wreath, or HERMES staff as the messenger of victory. Nike gradually came to be recognized as a mediator of success between gods and humans.

Among artistic representations of Nike are the sculpture by Paeonius (c. 424 BCE) and the “Nike of Samothrace,” or “Winged Victory.” The latter, discovered in 1863 and now in the Louvre Museum, Paris, was probably erected by Rhodians about 203 BCE to commemorate a sea battle. Excavations have shown that the sculpture was placed alighting on a flagship, which was set in the ground in such a way that it appeared to float.

NIMBĀRKA \nim-'bār-kə\, also called Nimbāditya, or Niyamānanda (fl. 12th or 13th century?, South India), Telugu-speaking BRAHMAN, yogi, philosopher, and prominent astronomer who founded one of the four main devotional sects (or SAMPRADĀYAS) of VAIṢṆAVISM, variously called the Nimbārkas, Nimandī, or Nimāvats, who worshiped KRISHNA and his consort, RĀDHĀ.

Nimbārka probably lived in the 12th or 13th century, judging from similarities between his philosophical and devotional attitudes and those of RĀMĀNUJA (traditionally dated 1017–1137). Both adhered to viśiṣṭādvaita (Sanskrit: “qualified non-dualism”), the belief that the creator-god and the souls he created were distinct but shared in the same substance, and both stressed devotion to Krishna as a means of liberation from the cycle of rebirth. Nimbārka also placed great emphasis on total surrender to the GURU (spiritual preceptor).

The Nimanda sect flourished in the 13th and 14th centuries in eastern India. Its philosophy held that humans were trapped in physical bodies constricted by prakṛti (matter) and that only by surrender to Rādhā-Krishna (not through their own efforts) could they attain liberation from rebirth; then, at death, the physical body would drop away. Thus Nimbārka stressed BHAKTI yoga, or the YOGA of devotion. Most sources concerning the sect were destroyed by Muslims during the reign of the Mughal emperor Aurangzeb (1659–1707).

NIMROD \nim-'räd\, also spelled Nemrod, legendary figure, described in GENESIS 10:8–12 as “the first on earth to be a mighty man. He was a mighty hunter before the Lord.” The beginning of his kingdom is Babel, Erech, and Akkad in the land of Shinar. Elsewhere Assyria is called the land of Nimrod (Micah 5:6), and he is said to have built Nineveh, Calah (modern Nimrūd), Rehoboth-Ir, and Resen.

NINAZU \nē-'nä-zü\, in MESOPOTAMIAN RELIGION, Sumerian deity, city god of Eneḡir, which was located on the Euphrates River between Larsa and Ur in the southern orchard region. Ninazu was also the city god of Eshnunna (modern Tall al-Asmar in eastern Iraq). Ninazu, whose name means “water knower,” was primarily an underworld deity, although the exact nature of his character or functions is not clear. In Eneḡir he was considered the son of ERESHKIGAL, goddess of the netherworld; according to another tradition, however, he was the son of ENLIL (Akkadian BEL) and Ninlil (BELIT). His spouse was Ningirda, a daughter of Enki (EA).

NINETY-FIVE THESES, propositions for debate concerned with the question of INDULGENCES, written (in Latin) by MARTIN LUTHER. Luther was long believed to have posted the theses on the door of the Schlosskirche (Castle Church) in Wittenberg on Oct. 31, 1517, but the historicity of this event has been questioned. Evidence suggests, rather, that Luther wrote to the bishops on Oct. 31, 1517, did not receive an answer, and then circulated the theses among friends and learned acquaintances. In any case, this event came, in the 17th century, to be considered the beginning of the Protestant REFORMATION.

Ordinarily, Luther's theses would have been of interest only to theologians, but the political and religious situation of the time and the fact that the printing press had recently been invented combined to make the theses known throughout Germany within a few weeks. Thus, they became a manifesto that turned a protest about an indulgence scandal into the greatest crisis in the history of the Western Christian church.

Indulgences were the commutation for money of part of the temporal penalty due for sin—i.e., the practical satisfaction that was a part of the SACRAMENT of penance. They were granted on papal authority and made available through accredited agents. Not at any time did they imply that divine forgiveness could be bought or sold or that they availed for those who were impenitent or unconfessed. But during the Middle Ages, as papal financial difficulties grew more complicated, they were resorted to very often, and abuses grew common. Further misunderstanding developed after Pope Sixtus IV extended indulgences to souls in PURGATORY. The often outrageous statements of indulgence sellers were a matter of protest among theologians.

The immediate cause of scandal in Germany in 1517 was the issue of an indulgence that was to pay for the rebuilding of St. Peter's in Rome. But by secret agreement of which most Germans were unaware, half the proceeds of the German sales were to be diverted to meet the huge debt owed to the financial house of Fugger by the archbishop and elector Albert of Mainz, who had incurred the debt in order to pay the Pope for appointing him to high offices. The agent in Germany, the DOMINICAN Johann Tetzel, made extravagant claims for the indulgence he was selling. The sale of this indulgence was forbidden in Wittenberg by the elector Frederick III the Wise, who preferred that the faithful should make their offerings at his own great collection of relics, exhibited in the Church of All Saints. Nevertheless, Wittenberg church members went to Tetzel, and they showed the pardons received from him to Luther. Outraged at what he considered grave theological error, Luther wrote the Ninety-five Theses.

The theses were tentative opinions, about some of which Luther had not decided. In the theses the papal prerogative in this matter was not denied, though by implication papal policy was criticized. The spiritual, inward character of the Christian faith was stressed. The fact was emphasized that money was being collected from poor people and sent to the rich PAPACY in Rome, a point popular with the Germans, who had long resented the money they were forced to contribute to Rome.

Subsequently, the Archbishop of Mainz, alarmed and annoyed, forwarded the documents to Rome in December 1517, with the request that Luther be inhibited. A counter-thesis was prepared by a Dominican theologian and defended before a Dominican audience at Frankfurt in January 1518. When Luther realized the extensive interest his tentative theses had aroused, he prepared a long Latin manuscript with explanations of his Ninety-five Theses, published in the autumn of 1518.

NINGISHZIDA \nin-'gish-zē-dä, 'nin-gish-'zē-dä\, in MESOPOTAMIAN RELIGION, Sumerian deity, city god of Gishbanda, near Ur in the southern orchard region. Although Ningishzida was a power of the netherworld, where he held the office of throne bearer, he seems to have originally been a tree god, for his name apparently means "Lord Productive Tree." In particular, he probably was god of the winding tree roots, since he originally was represented in serpent shape. When pictured in human form, two serpent heads grow from his shoulders in addition to the human head, and he rides on a dragon. He was a son of NINAZU and Ningirda and was the husband of Ninazimua ("Lady Flawlessly Grown Branch").

NINHAR \nin-'här\, also called Ningubla \nin-'gü-blä\, in MESOPOTAMIAN RELIGION, Sumerian deity, city god of Kiabrig, near Ur in the southern herding region. Ninhar was god of the thunder and rainstorms; he was represented in the form of a roaring bull. He was the son of NANNA (Akkadian Sin) and Ningal and the husband of Ninigara ("Lady of Butter and Cream"), goddess of the dairy.

NINHURSAG \nin-'kür-säg\, also spelled Ninhursaga \nin-'kür-sä-gä\ (Sumerian), Akkadian Belit-ili, in MESOPOTAMIAN RELIGION, city goddess of ADAB and of Kish in the northern herding regions; she was the goddess of the stony, rocky ground, the hursag. In particular, she had the power in the foothills and desert to produce wildlife. Especially prominent among her offspring were the onagers (wild asses) of the western desert. She appears in a lament for her son, a young colt, but she also is the Mother of All Children, a mother-goddess figure. Her other names include: Dingirmakh ("Exalted Deity"), Ninmakh ("Exalted Lady"), Aruru ("Dropper," i.e., the one who "loosens" the child in birth), and Nintur ("Lady Birth Giver"). Her husband is the god Shulpae, and among their children were the sons Muluil and Ashshirgi and the daughter Egime. Muluil seems to have been a dying god, like Dumuzi, whose death was lamented in yearly rites.

NINIGI \ˈnē-nē-gē\, in full Ninigi no Mikoto, Japanese SHINTŌ deity, grandson of the sun goddess AMATERASU. Ninigi's descent to earth established the divine origin of the YAMATO clan, the imperial house of Japan.

Amaterasu delegated Ninigi to assume ownership and rule of the central land of the reed plains (Japan) and gave him three signs of his charge: a jewel (symbolizing benevolence), a mirror (purity), and Kusanagi, the "grass-mowing" sword (courage). The jewel, the mirror, and the sword are still the Japanese imperial symbols. On his descent to earth, Ninigi landed on Kyushu. ŌKUNINUSHI no Mikoto, who was already sovereign there, submitted when he was permitted to retain control of religious affairs, with Ninigi supervising political affairs. Today, Ōkuninushi remains an important folk deity, while Ninigi is no longer venerated.

NINSUN \ˈnin-sùn\, in MESOPOTAMIAN RELIGION, Sumerian deity, city goddess of Kullab in the southern herding region. As Ninsun's name, "Lady Wild Cow," indicates, she was originally represented in bovine form and was considered the divine power behind, as well as the embodiment of, all the qualities the herdsman wished for in his cows: she was the "flawless cow" and a "mother of good offspring that loves the offspring." She was, however, also represented in human form and could give birth to human offspring. The Wild Bull Dumuzi (as distinct from Dumuzi the Shepherd) was traditionally her son, whom she lamented in the yearly ritual marking his death. In her role as a mother figure, her other Sumerian counterparts include NINHURSAG (Akkadian: Belit-ili) and Ninlil (BELIT). Ninsun's husband was the legendary hero Lugalbanda.

NINURTA \ni-ˈnūr-tā\, also called Ningirsu \nin-ˈgir-sū\, in MESOPOTAMIAN RELIGION, war god and city god of Girsu (Ṭal'ah, or Telloh) in the Lagash region. Ninurta was a god of thunder and rainstorms. He was also the power in the floods and was god of the plow and of plowing. The storm bird ZU (Anzu), or Imdugud, was considered his chief enemy. One story tells how he reclaimed the Tablet of Destinies, the emblem of his power, from Zu, who had stolen it.

Ninurta was the son of ENLIL (Akkadian: BEL) and Ninlil (BELIT) and was married to BAU, in Nippur called Ninnibru, Queen of Nippur. His major festival, the Gudsisu Festival, marked in Nippur the beginning of the plowing season.

NINUS \ˈnī-nəs\, in Greek mythology, king of Assyria and the eponymous founder of the city of Nineveh, which is sometimes called Ninus. He was said to have been the son of Belos, or BEL, and to have conquered in 17 years all of western Asia with Ariaeus, king of Arabia. During the siege of Bactra he met Semiramis, the wife of one of his officers, Onnes; he then took her from Onnes and married her. The fruit of the marriage was Ninyas—i.e., the Ninevite.

NIOBE \ˈnī-ō-bē\, in Greek mythology, daughter of TANTALUS and wife of King Amphion of Thebes. She is the prototype of the bereaved mother endlessly weeping for her lost children. According to Homer's Iliad, she had six sons and six daughters and boasted of her progenitive superiority to LETO, who had only two children, APOLLO and ARTEMIS. As punishment for her pride, Apollo killed all Niobe's sons, and Artemis killed all her daughters. The bodies lay for nine days unburied because ZEUS had turned all the Thebans to stone, but on the 10th day they were buried by the gods. Niobe went back to her Phrygian home, where she was turned into a rock on Mount Sipylus (Yamanlar Dağı, northeast of Izmir, Turkey), which continues to weep when the snow melts above it. Niobe is the subject of lost tragedies by both Aeschylus and Sophocles, and Ovid tells her story in his Metamorphoses.

NIRAṆKĀRĪ \ni-rāṅ-kār-ē\ (Punjabi: "Followers of the Formless One," i.e., God), religious movement within SIKHISM. Bābā Dayāl (d. 1855), the founder of the movement, emphasized that God is formless, or niraṅkār (hence the name Niraṅkārī). He also stressed the importance of meditation in life.

The movement expanded in northwest Punjab, Bābā Dayāl's native region, under the leadership of his successors Darbārā Singh (1855–70) and Rattā Jī (1870–1909). Its following is drawn primarily from among the urban trading communities. Unlike mainstream Sikhs, but like other groups (e.g., NĀMDHĀRĪ, Radhāsoāmī) closely related to them, Niraṅkārīs accept the authority of a living GURŪ. They do not necessarily stress the Singh identity. Since 1947, the sect's headquarters has been in Chandigarh.

NIRGUṆA \ˈnir-gū-nə\ (Sanskrit: "without qualities"), concept of primary importance in the orthodox Hindu philosophy of VEDĀNTA in the debate over whether the supreme being, BRAHMAN, is to be characterized as without qualities (nirguṇa) or as possessing qualities (SAGUṆA).

The Bṛhadāraṇyaka Upaniṣad defines Brahman as neti neti ("not this! not that!"). The ADVAITA (Nondualist) school of Vedānta therefore argues that Brahman is beyond all polarity and cannot be characterized in the normal terms of human discursive thought. Thus Brahman cannot possess qualities that distinguish it from all other magnitudes, as Brahman is not a magnitude but is all. The scriptural texts that ascribe qualities to Brahman are, according to the Advaita school, merely preparatory aids to meditation. The theistic schools of Vedānta (for example, VIŚIṢṬĀDVAITA), argue that Brahman is possessed of all perfections and that SCRIPTURE denies only the imperfect qualities.

NIRVANA \nir-ˈvā-nə\ (Sanskrit: nirvāṇa "extinction," or "blowing out"), Pāli nibbāna \nib-ˈbā-nə\, in Indian religious thought, supreme goal of the meditation disciplines. In BUDDHISM it signifies the transcendent state of freedom achieved by the extinction of desire and of individual consciousness. The Buddhist analysis of the human situation is that delusions of egocentricity and their resultant desires bind man to a continuous round of rebirths and its consequent suffering (DUKKHA). It is release from these bonds that constitutes enlightenment, or the experience of nirvana. Liberation from rebirth does not imply immediate physical death; the death of an ARHAT or a buddha is usually called the parinirvāṇa, or complete nirvana.

In the THERAVĀDA tradition, nirvana is thought of as tranquillity and peace. In the schools of the MAHĀYĀNA tradition, nirvana is equated with sūnyatā (EMPTINESS), with dharma-kāya (the real and unchanging essence of the buddha), and with dharmadhātu (ultimate reality). Also in the Mahāyāna tradition, the realization of nirvana is deferred by the BODHISATTVA, while he continues, out of compassion, to work for the salvation of others.

NISABA \nē-'sä-bä\, in MESOPOTAMIAN RELIGION, Sumerian deity, city goddess of Eresh on the Euphrates River near Erech in the farming regions; she was goddess of the grasses and seed crops. As goddess of the reeds and provider of the reed stylus used by the scribes, she became the patroness of writing and the scribal arts, particularly of accounting.

NISUS \nī-səs\, in Greek mythology, son of King Pandion of Megara. His name was given to the Megarian port of Nisaea. Nisus had a purple lock of hair with magic power, which, if preserved, guaranteed him life and continued possession of his kingdom. When King MINOS of Crete besieged Megara, Nisus' daughter Scylla fell in love with Minos (or, in some accounts, was bribed): she betrayed her city by cutting off her father's purple lock. Nisus was killed (or killed himself) and became transformed into a sea eagle. Scylla later drowned, possibly at the hand of Minos, and was changed into a sea bird (Greek keiris, Latin ciris), possibly a heron, constantly pursued by the sea eagle Nisus.

NIX \nīks\, also called nixie, or nixy \nīk-sē\, in Germanic MYTHOLOGY, water being, half human, half fish, that lives in an underwater palace and mingles with humans by assuming a variety of physical forms (e.g., that of a fair maiden or an old woman) or by making itself invisible. Nixes are music lovers and excellent dancers, and they have the gift of PROPHECY. Usually malevolent, a nix can easily be propitiated with gifts. In some regions, nixes are said to abduct human children and to lure people into deep water to drown. According to some sources, nixes can marry human beings and bear human children.

NJÖRD \n'yörd, 'nyörth\, Old Norse Njörðr \n'yör-ðr\, in GERMANIC RELIGION, god of the sea and its riches. His aid was invoked in seafaring and in hunting, and he was considered the god of "wealth-bestowal," or prosperity. He was the father of Frey and FREYJA by his sister. Njörð's native tribe, the VANIR, gave him as a hostage to the rival tribe of AESIR, the giantess SKADI choosing him to be her husband. The marriage failed because Njörð preferred to live in Nóatún, his home by the sea, while Skadi was happier in her father's mountain dwelling place. Several traditions hold that Njörð was a divine ruler of the Swedes, and his name appears in numerous Scandinavian place-names.

NOAH, hero of the biblical Flood story in the OLD TESTAMENT book of GENESIS, the originator of vineyard cultivation, and the head of a Semitic genealogical line. A synthesis of at least three BIBLICAL SOURCE traditions, Noah is the image of the righteous man made party to a COVENANT with YAH-

WEH, the God of ISRAEL, in which protection against future catastrophe is assured.

Noah appears in Genesis 5:29 as the son of Lamech and ninth in descent from ADAM. In the story of the Deluge (Genesis 6:11–9:19), he is represented as the PATRIARCH who, because of his blameless piety, was chosen by God to perpetuate the human race after his wicked contemporaries had perished in the Flood. Noah was instructed to build an ARK, and he took into it male and female specimens of all the world's species of animals, from which the stocks might be replenished.

After Noah's survival of the Flood, he built an altar on which he offered burnt sacrifices to God, who then bound himself to a pact never again to curse the earth on man's account. God then set a rainbow in the sky as a visible guarantee of his promise in this covenant. God also renewed his commands given at creation but with two changes: man could now kill animals and eat meat, and the murder of a man would be punished by men.

The story has close affinities with Babylonian traditions of apocalyptic floods; tablet XI of the GILGAMESH epic introduces UTNAPISHTIM, who, like Noah, survived cosmic destruction by heeding divine instruction to build an ark. The Babylonian mythologies are the source of such features of the biblical Flood story as the building and provisioning of the ark, its flotation, and the subsidence of the waters, as well as the part played by the human protagonist.

The narrative concerning Noah in Genesis 9:20–27 belongs to a different cycle apparently unrelated to the Flood story. Three different themes may be traced: first, the passage attributes the beginnings of agriculture, and in particular the cultivation of the vine, to Noah; second, it attempts to provide, in the persons of Noah's three sons, Shem, Ham, and Japheth, ancestors for three of the races of mankind and to account in some degree for their historic relations; and third, Noah's drunkenness and the disrespect it provokes in his son Ham (or CANAAN) result in Noah's laying of a curse on Ham and his descendants. By this censure of Ham, it offers a veiled JUSTIFICATION for the later Israelite conquest and subjugation of the Canaanites.

The symbolic figure of Noah was known in ancient Israel, before the compilation of the PENTATEUCH. Ezekiel (14:14, 20) speaks of him as a prototype of the righteous man who, alone among the Israelites, would be spared God's vengeance. In the NEW TESTAMENT, Jesus uses the story of the Flood that came on a worldly generation of men "in the days of Noah" as an example of BAPTISM, and Noah is depicted as a preacher of repentance.

NOAHIDE LAWS \ˈnō-ə-,kīd\, also called Noachian Laws \nō-ā-kē-ən\, Jewish Talmudic designation for seven laws given to Adam and to NOAH before the revelation to MOSES on Mt. Sinai.

In the TALMUD (Sanh 56–60), the Noahide laws are the minimum requirements of every person's moral duty. Beginning with GENESIS 2:16, the laws derive from expositions of commandments given to the ancestors of humankind, i.e., Adam and Noah, and are therefore universal for all humanity. The resident alien ("Noahide") is one who keeps these laws. Some Jewish sources considered Muslims to be Noahides because of their strict monotheism; the status of Christians was less assured. There is some debate in the rabbinic literature as to whether the Noahide laws, if universally observed by non-Jews, are the penultimate step toward the final stage of humanity, or whether Noahidism together with JUDAISM will constitute the final stage. Maimonides regarded anyone who observed these laws as one "assured of a portion in the world to come" (Maim Yad Melakhim 8:10).

The first five Noahide laws are negative: prohibitions against IDOLATRY, BLASPHEMY, murder, adultery, and robbery; the sixth, positive: the command to establish courts of justice. The last (given to Noah after the flood) forbids eating flesh cut from a living animal (Genesis 9:4). There are similar lists in other Jewish literature: 1) the TOSEFTA (Av Zar 8:6) names four prohibitions in addition to the seven: drinking blood, emasculation, SORcery, and magic; 2) Jubilees 7:20ff. records that Noah gave six commandments to his sons: observe righteousness, cover the shame of the flesh, bless the Creator, honor parents, love your neighbor, abstain from fornication, uncleanness, and all iniquity; 3) Acts 15:20 contains four Mosaic prohibitions to be observed by GENTILE Christians: "to abstain only from things polluted by idols and from fornication and from whatever has been strangled and from blood."

NOAIDE \nō-ī-dē\, in Sami religion, SHAMAN who mediated between the people that he served and the supernatural beings and forces that he either confronted or made use of for the benefit of his clients.

The shamanic practices of the Finno-Ugric peoples have been best preserved among the Khanty (Ostyak) and Mansi (Vogul), as well as the Sami. Basically they consist of the manipulation of the supernatural by a specially trained, usually naturally gifted, person in order to aid people in various troubles, of which illness was the most common. On being asked to help, the noaide performs a dramatic SÉANCE with a traditional sequence of steps, including divinatory procedures, falling into a trance, confrontation of supernatural beings either to fight them or to receive aid from them, and the actual ritual treatment of the patient, in the case of illness. The noaides can perform both GOOD AND EVIL and formerly were much feared owing to their powers, which they also used to political and economic advantage. In Finland the term noita survives mainly in the sense of an evil-working sorcerer, with another term, TIETÄJÄ, applied to the specialist in beneficial mediation with the supernatural.

The word noaide is related to several other terms used by the Finno-Ugric peoples for their religious specialists, including Finnish noita, Mansi nait, and Estonian noit, and these words' origin may be traced back to the common Finno-Ugric period before 2500 BCE.

NONCONFORMIST, also called Dissenter, or Free Churchman, any English Protestant who does not conform to the doctrines or practices of the ESTABLISHED CHURCH of England. The word Nonconformist was first used in the penal acts following the Restoration of the monarchy (1660) and the Act of Uniformity (1662) to describe the conventicles (places of worship) of the congregations that had separated from the Church of England (Separatists). Nonconformists are also called Dissenters (a word first used of the five Dissenting Brethren at the Westminster Assembly of Divines in 1643–47). Because of the movement begun in the late 19th century by which Nonconformists of different denominations joined together in the Free Church Federal Council, they are also called Free Churchmen.

The term Nonconformist is generally applied in England and Wales to all Protestants who have dissented from Anglicanism—Baptists, Congregationalists, PRESBYTERIANS, Methodists, and Unitarians—and also to independent groups such as the QUAKERS, PLYMOUTH BRETHREN, English Moravians, Churches of Christ, and the SALVATION ARMY. In Scotland, where the established church is Presbyterian, members of other churches, including Anglicans, are considered Nonconformists.

NONVIOLENCE, abstention from violence as a matter of ethical principle; such principle may or may not be based in religious conviction. Among religions that have held nonviolence to be at least an ideal are HINDUISM, BUDDHISM, and CHRISTIANITY; JAINISM, by contrast, makes it an absolute principle of behavior (see AHIMSĀ). In the 20th century, nonviolence was the fundamental principle and tactic of MOHANDAS GANDHI'S resistance to British rule in India (see SATYĀGRAHA) and also served as the basis of Martin Luther King, Jr.'s campaign against civil rights abuses in the United States.

Nonviolence may be distinguished from pacifism in that the latter term is more often used in the context of war and the state's demands that citizens support and take part in it, while nonviolence usually suggests private and social behavior. Nevertheless, one committed to nonviolence will likely also be a pacifist, and a pacifist will likely also prefer nonviolent solutions to more local problems, as well.

NORITO \ˈnō-rē-tō\, in Japanese SHINTŌ, words, or prayer, addressed to a deity. The concept of koto-dama states that there is a spiritual power that resides in words: beautiful, correct words bring about good, whereas ugly, coarse language can cause evil. Accordingly, norito are expressed in elegant, classical language. Prayers usually include words of praise for the deities, lists of offerings, and petitions. During the period when STATE SHINTŌ was under state control, the wording of prayers recited at public shrines was determined by the government. At present, the chief priest of a shrine pronounces the norito on behalf of the worshippers, and the contents and wordings of the prayer may vary.

NORN \ˈnɔrm\, in Germanic MYTHOLOGY, group of supernatural beings, usually represented as three maidens who spun or wove the fate of humans. Some sources name them Urd, Verdandi, and Skuld, perhaps meaning “past,” “present,” and “future.” They were depicted as living by YGGDRASILL, the WORLD TREE, under Urd’s well and were linked with both GOOD AND EVIL. Being frequently attendant at births, they were sometimes associated with midwifery. The name Norn appears only in Scandinavian sources, but the cult of Nornlike beings occurs in several European FOLKLORES.

NŌRŪZ \nō-ˈrüz\, also spelled Nō Rūz, or Nō-Rūz (Persian: “New Day”), NEW YEAR FESTIVAL often associated with ZOROASTRIANISM AND PARSISM, celebrated in many countries, including Iran, Iraq, India, and Afghanistan. It usually begins on March 21 (the first day of the new year in many of these countries).

Among the PARSIS, during the Nōrūz five liturgies are performed: the Āfringān, prayers of love or praise; the Bāj, prayers honoring YAZATAS (“ones worthy of worship”) or FRAVASHIS (“preexistent souls”); the Yasna, which includes the offering and ritual drinking of the sacred liquor, haoma; the Fravartigan, or Farokhshi, prayers commemorating the dead; and the Satum, prayers recited at funeral feasts. Parsis greet one another with the rite of hamāzor, in which one’s right hand is passed between the palms of another.

NU, U \ˈü-ˈnü\, formerly Thakin Nu (b. May 25, 1907, Wakema, Burma [Myanmar]—d. Feb. 14, 1995, Yangōn), Burmese independence leader, prime minister of Burma (Myanmar; 1948–58, 1960–62), and Buddhist monk.

While studying law at the University of Rangoon (Yangōn), U Nu became president of the Student Union of Rangoon and joined student political movements. His expulsion in 1936 resulted in a student strike. One of the first confrontations between young Burmese nationalists and the British colonial authorities, it gained Nu national prominence. The following year he joined the We-Burmans Association and played an important part in the struggle for independence. Jailed by the British in 1940 for sedition, he was released only after the Japanese invaded Burma.

In 1943 U Nu served as foreign minister in Ba Maw’s government. Following the assassination in 1947 of Aung San, the principal nationalist leader, U Nu was asked to become head of the government and of Burma’s leading political party, the Anti-Fascist People’s Freedom League (AFPFL). When independence was declared in January 1948 U Nu became the first prime minister of Burma and served for 10 years, with only a brief interlude out of office in 1956–57. Although U Nu was an able and highly respected statesman, his government was plagued by communist and ethnic-minority insurrections, economic stagnation, and administrative inefficiency. In 1958 he resigned his post as prime minister and a “caretaker” government took over, headed by General Ne Win. In 1960 parliamentary government was restored, and U Nu again became prime minister after his party won elections. In March 1962, however, Ne Win staged a coup d’état, establishing a military government and putting U Nu in prison.

Following his release from prison U Nu left Burma (1969) and began organizing a resistance movement against the Ne Win government. When this movement failed he took up residence in India, but he returned to Burma in 1980 at the invitation of Ne Win and in July became a Buddhist monk in Rangoon. He made an unsuccessful bid for power after pro-democracy demonstrations toppled Ne Win’s government in 1988.

NUADU \ˈnü-ə-thü\, in Celtic MYTHOLOGY, king of the TUTHA DÉ DANANN, who lost his hand in the battle of MAG TUÍRED and with it his right to govern. DIAN CÉCHT replaced the hand with a hand made of silver; he later received a functional human hand from Dian Cécht’s son Miach and was thereupon able to overthrow his successor, Bres. From inscriptional evidence it is clear that Nuadu was originally a god.

NŪ KUA \ˈnü-ˈgwä\, Pinyin Nū Gua, in Chinese MYTHOLOGY, patroness of matchmakers; as wife or sister of the legendary emperor FU HSI, she helped establish norms for marriage and regulated conduct between the sexes. She is described as having a human head and the body of a snake or fish.

Mythology credits Nū Kua with repairing the pillars of heaven and the broken corners of earth after the rebel Kung Kung had destroyed them, building a palace that became a prototype for the later walled cities of China, and taming the monstrous King of Oxen by slipping a miraculous rope through his nose. One story names Nū and Kua as the first human beings, who found themselves at the moment of creation among the Kunlun Mountains. While offering sacrifice, they prayed to know if they, as brother and sister, were meant to be man and wife. The union was sanctioned when the smoke of the sacrifice remained stationary.

NUN \ˈnün\, also spelled Nu \ˈnü\, ancient Egyptian god and father of RE, the sun god. Nun’s name means “water,” and he represented the primeval waters of CHAOS out of which Re-Atum began creation. Nun’s qualities were boundlessness, darkness, and the turbulence of stormy waters. Nun, his female counterpart Naunet, and three further pairs together formed the Ogdoad (group of eight gods) of Hermopolis. Since it was believed that the primeval ocean continued to surround the ordered cosmos, the CREATION MYTH was reenacted each day as the sun god rose from the waters of chaos. Nun was also thought to continue to exist as subsoil water beneath the earth and as the source of the annual flooding of the Nile River.

NUN, woman who is a member of a monastic religious order or group. In most religious traditions of the world, the status of nuns is considerably lower than that of monks. This has been variously justified by reference to issues of ritual impurity (women being held to be impure because of MENSTRUATION) or social and theological convention (as in ROMAN CATHOLICISM, in which women are denied ORDINATION). See MONASTICISM; BHIKṢU.

NUSKU \ˈnūs-kü\, in MESOPOTAMIAN RELIGION, Sumerian-Akkadian god of light and fire. His father was Sin (Sumerian: NANNA), the moon god. Semitic texts describe Nusku as the king of the night, who illuminates the darkness and repels the DEMONS of the dark. On Babylonian boundary stones he is identified by a lamp. He is visible at the NEW MOON and thus is called its son. The last day of the month is sacred to him, so that he is a LUNAR DEITY. He figures much in incantations and rituals as the fire.

NUT \ˈnüt\, in EGYPTIAN RELIGION, goddess of the sky, vault of the heavens, often depicted as a woman arched over the earth god GEB. Nut swallowed the sun every evening and gave birth to it again on each morning.

Nut was also represented as a woman wearing a water-pot or pear-shaped vessel on her head, this being the hieroglyph of her name. She was sometimes portrayed as a cow, for this was the form she took to carry the sun god RE on her back to the sky. On five special days preceding the New Year, Nut gave birth successively to the deities OSIRIS, HORUS, SETH, ISIS, and Nephthys. These gods, with the exception of Horus, were commonly referred to as the “children of Nut.”

NYĀYA \ˈnyä-yə\ (Sanskrit: “Rule,” or “Method”), one of the six orthodox systems (darśanas) of Indian philosophy, important for its analysis of logic and epistemology.

Nyāya’s ultimate concern is to bring an end to human suffering, which results from ignorance of reality. Liberation is brought about through right knowledge. Nyāya is thus concerned with the means of right knowledge. The Nyāya school holds that there are four valid means of knowledge: perception (pratyakṣa), inference (anumāna), comparison (upamāna), and testimony (śabda). Invalid knowledge involves memory, doubt, error, and hypothetical argument.

The Nyāya theory of causation defines a cause as an unconditional and invariable antecedent of an effect. Three kinds of causes are distinguished: inherent, or material cause (the substance out of which an effect is produced); noninherent cause (which helps in the production of a cause); and efficient cause (which helps the material cause produce the effect). God is not the material cause of the universe, since atoms and souls are also eternal, but is rather the efficient cause.

The Nyāya system—from Gautama (c. 2nd century BCE) through his important early commentator Vātsyāyana (c. 450 CE) until Udayanācārya (Udayana; 10th century)—became qualified as the Old Nyāya (Prācīna-Nyāya) in the 11th century when a new school of Nyāya (Navya-Nyāya, or New Nyāya) arose in Bengal. The best known philosopher of the Navya-Nyāya, and the founder of the modern school of Indian logic, was Gaṅgeśa (13th century).

NYMPH (Greek nymphē, “young woman,” “bride,” or “minor goddess”), in Greek mythology, any of a large class of female divinities, usually associated with growing things, such as trees, or with water. They were not immortal but were extremely long-lived and were on the whole kindly disposed toward human beings. They were distinguished according to the sphere of nature with which they were connected: the Oceanids were sea nymphs; the NEREIDS inhabited both saltwater and freshwater; the NAIADS presided over springs, rivers, and lakes. The Oreads (oros, “mountain”) were nymphs of mountains and grottoes; the Napeae (napē, “dell”) and the Alseids (alsos, “grove”) were nymphs of glens and groves; the Dryads or Hamadryads presided over forests and trees.

Italy had native divinities of springs and streams and water goddesses (called Lymphae) with whom the Greek nymphs tended to become identified.

NYMPHAEUM \nim-ˈfē-əm\, ancient Greek and Roman SANCTUARY consecrated to water NYMPHS. The nymphaeum, originally a natural grotto with springs and streams but later an artificial grotto or a building filled with plants and flowers, sculpture, fountains, and paintings, served as a sanctuary, a reservoir, and an assembly chamber where weddings were held. Nymphaea existed at Corinth, Antioch, and Constantinople (now Istanbul); the remains of about 20 have been found in Rome; and others exist as ruins in Asia Minor, Syria, and North Africa. The word nymphaeum was also used in ancient Rome to refer to a bordello and also to the fountain in the atrium of the Christian BASILICA. In the 16th century the nymphaeum became a feature of Italian gardens.

NYX \ˈnix\, in Greek mythology, female personification of night and a great cosmogonical figure, feared even by ZEUS.

According to one tradition, she was the daughter of CHAOS and the mother of numerous primordial powers, including Sleep and Death. Another tradition made her the daughter and successor of Phanes, a creator god; she continued to advise her own successors (OURANUS, her son by Phanes; CRONUS, youngest son of Ouranus; and Zeus) by means of her oracular gifts. Throughout antiquity she frequently caught the imagination of poets and artists but she was seldom worshiped.

OANNES \ō-'ān-,nes\, in Mesopotamian mythology, amphibious being who taught mankind wisdom. Oannes, as described by the Babylonian priest Berosus, had the form of a fish but with the head of a man under his fish's head and under his fish's tail the feet of a man. In the daytime he came up to the seashore of the Persian Gulf and instructed humans in writing, the arts, and the sciences. Oannes was probably the emissary, or even a version, of EA, god of the freshwater deep and of wisdom.

OATH, sacred or solemn voluntary promise usually involving the penalty of divine retribution for intentional falsity and often used in legal procedures. It is not certain that the oath was always considered a religious act; such ancient peoples as the Germanic tribes, Greeks, Romans, and Scythians sometimes swore by their swords or other weapons. Even these peoples, however, were generally invoking a symbol of the power of a god as a guarantee of their trustworthiness.

The swearing of an oath before divine symbols reaches back at least to the Sumerian civilization (4th–3rd millennia BCE) of the ancient Middle East and to ancient Egypt, where one often swore by his life, or ANKH. In the Hittite Empire of the 14th–13th centuries BCE, various gods (e.g., INDRA and MITHRA) were appealed to in agreements between states. Mithra was viewed as the god of the contract. Modern-day Hindus might swear an oath while holding water from the holy river Gaṅgā (Ganges), which is a positive symbol of the divine.

In JUDAISM, two kinds of oaths are forbidden: (1) a vain oath, in which one attempts to do something that is impossible to accomplish, denies self-evident facts, or attempts to negate the fulfillment of a religious precept, and (2) a false oath, in which one uses the name of God to swear falsely, thus committing a SACRILEGE. In ISLAM, the qasam ("oath") is primarily a pledge to God, and consequently a false oath is considered a danger to one's soul.

OCCULTISM, various theories, practices, and rituals based on an alleged or esoteric knowledge of the world of spirits and unknown forces. The wide range of beliefs and practices generally held to be occult includes alchemy, DIVINATION, magic, and WITCHCRAFT. The Western tradition of occultism is that of an ancient "secret philosophy," which has its roots in Hellenistic magic—the principal source of which is the Corpus Hermeticum associated with Hermes Trismegistos (see THOTH), thus the "Hermetic" tradition—and in Jewish MYSTICISM, associated with the QABBALAH.

OCEANIC RELIGIONS, RELIGIOUS BELIEFS and practices of the peoples of Polynesia, Melanesia, and Micronesia. Many traditional institutions have been abandoned or modified under the pressures of Christian evangelism and Western capitalist economics, but the outline of the old religions may still be discerned.

Gods. Although there was wide variation in the beliefs of the various Oceanic peoples, POLYTHEISM was widespread prior to the arrival of CHRISTIANITY. Human effort in the uncertain projects of war, agriculture, and the pursuit of prestige was thought to succeed only when complemented by support from invisible beings and forces, which were manipulated by magical formulas and elicited through prayer and sacrifice. The presence and effects of invisible ghosts and spirits were manifested in dream, revealed in DIVINATION, and inferred from human success or failure, prosperity or disaster, health or death. In such a world, religion was not a separate sphere of the transcendental but a part of everyday life, and religion and magic were not clearly distinguishable. The most sacred rituals often entailed the performance of magic, and performance of magic for personal ends might be accompanied by prayer or sacrifice.

Polynesian peoples believed that there was a host of gods of various degrees of importance, ranging from the great gods of the pantheon, such as Tangaroa, Tu, and Lono, to strictly local gods who were deified priests or chiefs of great renown. All of these gods had to be worshiped in their own way, the most important by full-time priests of highest status, those of lesser importance by part-time priests.

Spirits and ancestors. Oceanic peoples believed that the universe was peopled with spiritual beings of various types, some attached to specific localities or performing specific functions. Ancestral spirits were often contacted in dreams and in the trances of spirit mediums, as were the HIGH GODS and other nonhuman spirits. They would give people information about the causes of disease, deaths, and other misfortunes and would sometimes prescribe new medicines or new varieties of magic. In Melanesia, in fact, beliefs in gods and powerful spirits were less important in everyday life than were beliefs in ancestral ghosts and other spirit beings, who were regarded as daily participants in social life.

Mana and tapu. In Polynesia and some areas of Melanesia all things, animate and inanimate, were believed to be endowed to a greater or lesser degree with mana, or sacred supernatural power. This power could be nullified by various human actions. Polynesian chiefs had such great mana that in some islands if a commoner touched the chief's shadow the injury to the chief's mana could only be compensated by the death of the commoner. In many Polynesian cultures it is still considered to be in very poor taste to step over a person's legs, pass one's hand over a person's head, or stand with one's head higher than that of a person of high rank. These actions are believed to sap a person's mana, rendering him profane.

It was not only people who had mana, however, but buildings, stones, tools, canoes, and all things. Life was infused with a wide variety of complicated rules designed to prevent damage to the mana inherent in various things. Groves, trees, temples, or tracts of land were considered sacred and could not be entered by ordinary people because they were pervaded by the mana of a high-status person or god. Women were not permitted in canoes under normal conditions in the Marquesas because their presence defiled the canoe. In many societies, men preparing for war or for any other hazardous undertaking had to go through a period of purification—avoiding the company of women, eating certain foods only, and often going into seclusion so as to protect their powers from defilement. The penalty for major violations of these tapu (TABOO), or prohibitions, was often death. Violations of lesser tapu, such as trespassing in a sacred grove or disturbing the bones of the dead, were believed to result in supernatural punishment, manifested in some form of illness, bad luck, or debilitation.

Rites and ceremonies. In pre-Christian Micronesia, ceremonies for the high gods appear to have been principally seasonal offerings of first fruits, performed often in private by a specialist priest with a few helpers. Special appeals to the high gods were probably also made at times of community crisis, such as wars or typhoons, but HUMAN SACRIFICE apparently was not practiced.

In Polynesia, various procedures were called for to announce the birth of a child to the community, to the ancestors, and to the gods, and to care for the welfare (both physical and supernatural) of the infant and mother by application of medical and magical techniques. CIRCUMCISION was a major event in the male life cycle and was marked by elaborate rituals, which increased in importance with the status of the male. Although no such rite is reported for girls, some societies, such as the Marquesas, had ceremonies in which adolescent girls made a more or less public debut, in a sexual sense. Other milestones in Polynesian cultural life—the formal presentation of a royal heir, the completion of a tattooing operation or ear piercing in a high-status child, the formal investiture of a priest or chief—were marked with a variety of rituals and quite often included human sacrifice.

Death, the terminal milestone, was universally celebrated with extravagant behavior, increasing in extravagance in direct proportion to the status of the deceased. In many societies these ceremonies were marked by violence, with mourners mutilating themselves and others, and by human sacrifices, obtained from within the social group or without. Feasts were also common, as was orgiastic behavior. The extravagance of funeral rites was surpassed, in some societies, by ceremonies to deify a departed chief or priest. These went on for prolonged periods, involving prodigious feasting and drinking, violence, and sexuality.

Magic. Some forms of everyday magic—for gardening, fishing, attracting valuables or lovers—were widely known. Other forms, for powers of fighting or theft, tended to be closely guarded, and magic for destructive ends was secretly held and generally used in clandestine fashion. In many Melanesian societies SORCERY was seen as the major cause of death or illness, and in New Guinea, accusations of sorcery are a major cause of hostility between groups and of blood feuding. Some highland peoples believe that witches—humans acting in the grip of forces or agencies beyond their conscious control—prey on the living, taking possession of them or draining their bodily substances.

OCEANUS \ō-'sē-ə-nəs\, in Greek mythology, river that flowed around the earth (conceived as flat). Beyond it, to the west, were the sunless land of the Cimmerii, the country of dreams, and the entrance to the underworld. In Hesiod's Theogony, Oceanus was the son of OURANUS and GAEA, the husband of the TITAN Tethys, and father of 3,000 stream spirits and 3,000 ocean NYMPHS. In Homer's works he was the origin of the gods. As a common noun the word received almost the modern sense of ocean.

OCKHAM, WILLIAM OF \'ä-käm\, also called William Ockham, Ockham also spelled Occam (b. c. 1285, Ockham, Surrey?, Eng.—d. 1347/49, Munich, Bavaria [now in Germany]), FRANCISCAN philosopher, theologian, and political writer. He was a late Scholastic thinker who was regarded as the founder of a form of nominalism—the school of thought that denies that universal concepts such as “father” have any reality apart from the individual things that the term signifies.

Little is known of Ockham's childhood. His early schooling in a Franciscan CONVENT concentrated on the study of logic; his interest in logic never waned, and in all his future disputes it served as his chief weapon. Ockham took the traditional course of theological studies at the University of Oxford and apparently between 1317 and 1319 lectured on the Sentences of PETER LOMBARD, the official textbook of theology in the universities until the 16th century. His opinions aroused strong opposition from members of the theological faculty of Oxford, however, and he left the university without a master's degree in theology; at the time the chancellor of the university was John Lutterell, who was dismissed from his post in 1322 at the demand of the teaching staff. Ockham continued his academic career, apparently in English convents.

Ockham's writings reveal two primary aspects of his intellectual and spiritual attitude. On the one hand, he referred to the primary importance of God, whose omnipotence determines the gratuitous salvation of men; God's saving action consists of giving without any obligation and is already profusely demonstrated in the creation of nature. On the other hand, he insisted on evaluations that are severely rational, on distinctions between the necessary and the incidental and differentiation between evidence and degrees of probability—an insistence that places great trust in man's natural reason and his human nature. "Ockham's razor" is the logical principle that "plurality should not be assumed without necessity"; Ockham employed it to eliminate many entities that had been devised to explain reality, especially by the Scholastic philosophers.

Ockham met Lutterell again at Avignon, France, in a treatise addressed to Pope John XXII, Lutterell denounced Ockham's teaching on the Sentences, extracting from it 56 propositions that he showed to be in serious error. Lutterell then became a member of a committee of six theologians that produced two critical reports on Ockham's commentary. Ockham, however, presented to the pope another copy of the Ordinatio in which he had made some corrections. Though it appeared that he would be condemned for his teaching, the condemnation never came.

At a convent in Avignon, Ockham met Bonagratia of Bergamo, a doctor of civil and CANON LAW who had been battling John XXII over the problem of Franciscan poverty. On Dec. 1, 1327, the Franciscan general Michael of Cesena arrived in Avignon and stayed at the same convent; he, too, had been summoned by the pope in connection with the dispute. They were at odds over the theoretical problem of whether Christ and his Apostles had renounced the right of property and the right to the use of property. Michael maintained that because Christ and his Apostles had renounced all ownership and all rights to property, the Franciscans were justified in attempting to do the same thing.

The relations between John and Michael grew steadily worse, and on May 26, 1328, Michael fled from Avignon accompanied by Bonagratia and Ockham. Ockham, who was already a witness in an appeal secretly drafted by Michael, publicly endorsed the appeal in September at Pisa, where the three Franciscans were staying under the protection of Emperor Louis IV the Bavarian, who had been excommunicated in 1324 and proclaimed by John XXII to have forfeited all rights to the empire. They followed him to Munich in 1330, and thereafter Ockham wrote fervently against the PAPACY in defense of both the strict Franciscan notion of poverty and the empire.

Instructed by his superior general in 1328 to study three papal bulls on poverty, Ockham found that they contained many errors that showed John XXII to be a heretic who had forfeited his mandate by reason of his HERESY. His status of pseudo-pope was confirmed in Ockham's view in 1330–31 by his sermons proposing that the souls of the saved did not enjoy the vision of God immediately after death but only after they were rejoined with the body at the LAST JUDGMENT, an opinion that contradicted tradition and was ultimately rejected.

For Ockham the power of the pope is limited by the freedom of Christians that is established by the gospel and the natural law. It is therefore legitimate and in keeping with the gospel to side with the empire against the papacy or to defend, as Ockham did in 1339, the right of the king of England to tax church property. From 1330 to 1338, in the heat of this dispute, Ockham wrote 15 or 16 more or less political works, some in collaboration.

Excommunicated after his flight from Avignon, Ockham maintained the same basic position after the death of John XXII in 1334, during the reign of Benedict XII (1334–42), and after the election of Clement VI. Ockham was long thought to have died at a convent in Munich in 1349 during the Black Death, but he may have died there in 1347.

ODIN \ˈō-dən\, also called Wodan, Woden \ˈwō-dən\, or Wotan \ˈvō-tän\, one of the principal gods in GERMANIC RELIGION. The Roman historian Tacitus stated that the Teutons worshiped Mercury, and because dies Mercurii ("Mercury's day") was identified with Wednesday ("Woden's day"), there is little doubt that the god Woden (the earlier form of Odin) was meant. Though Woden was worshiped preeminently, it is not clear whether it was practiced by all the Teutonic tribes or what the nature of the god was. Later sources indicate that at the end of the pre-Christian period Odin was the principal god in Scandinavia.

From earliest times Odin was a war god, and he appeared in heroic literature as the protector of heroes; fallen warriors joined him in VALHALLA, the "Hall of the Slain." The wolf and the raven were dedicated to him. His magical horse, SLEIPNIR, had eight legs, teeth inscribed with runes, and the ability to gallop through the air and over the sea. Odin was the great magician among the gods and was associated with runes. He was also the god of poets. In outward appearance he was a tall, old man, with flowing beard and only one eye (the other he gave in exchange for wisdom).

ODYSSEUS \ə-ˈdi-sē-əs, ɔ-ˈdi-s-,yūs\ (Greek), Latin Ulixes \yü-ˈlik-sēz\, English Ulysses \yü-ˈli-sēz\, hero of Homer's epic poem the Odyssey and one of the most frequently portrayed figures in Western literature. According to Homer, Odysseus was king of Ithaca, son of Laertes and Anticleia (the daughter of AUTOLYCUS of Parnassus), and father, by his wife, PENELOPE, of TELEMACHUS. (In later tradition, Odysseus was the son of SISYPHUS and fathered sons by CIRCE, CALYPSO, and others.)

Homer portrayed Odysseus as a man of shrewdness, eloquence, resourcefulness, courage, and endurance. In the Iliad he plays a leading part in achieving the reconciliation between AGAMEMNON and ACHILLES. His bravery and skill in fighting are demonstrated repeatedly, and his wiliness is shown most notably in the night expedition he undertakes with DIOMEDES against the Trojans.

Odysseus' wanderings and the recovery of his house and kingdom are the central theme of the Odyssey. After leaving Troy he first comes to the land of the LOTUS-EATERS and only with difficulty rescues some of his companions from their lōtos-induced lethargy; he encounters and blinds POLYPHEMUS the CYCLOPS, a son of POSEIDON, escaping from his cave by clinging to the belly of a ram; he loses 11 of his 12 ships to the cannibalistic Laistrygones and reaches the island of the enchantress Circe, where he has to rescue some of his companions whom she had turned into swine. Next he visits the Land of Dead, where he learns from the Theban seer TIRESIAS how he can expiate Poseidon's wrath. He then encounters the SIRENS, SCYLLA AND CHARYBDIS, and the Cattle of the Sun, which his companions, despite warnings, plunder for food. He alone survives the ensuing storm and reaches the idyllic island of the NYMPH Calypso.

After almost nine years, Odysseus leaves Calypso and at last arrives in Ithaca, where his wife, Penelope, and son, Telemachus, have been struggling to maintain their authority during his prolonged absence. Recognized at first only by his faithful dog and a nurse, Odysseus proves his identity by accomplishing Penelope's test of stringing and shooting with his old bow. He then, with the help of Telemachus, slays Penelope's suitors and is accepted as her long-lost husband and the king of Ithaca.

Classical Greek writers presented Odysseus sometimes as an unscrupulous politician, sometimes as a wise and honorable statesman. Philosophers usually admired his intelligence and wisdom. Some Roman writers (such as Virgil and Statius) tended to disparage him as the destroyer of Rome's supposed mother city, Troy; others (such as Horace and Ovid) admired him. The early Christian writers praised him as an example of the wise pilgrim.

OEDIPUS \ˈe-də-pəs, ˈē-, in Greek mythology, king of Thebes who unwittingly killed his father and married his mother. Homer related that Oedipus' mother hanged herself when the truth of their relationship became known, though Oedipus apparently continued to rule at Thebes until his death. In the post-Homeric tradition, most familiar from Sophocles' Oedipus Rex and Oedipus Coloneus, there are notable differences in emphasis and detail.

Laius, king of Thebes, was warned by an oracle that his son would slay him. Accordingly, when his wife, Jocasta (Iocaste; in Homer, Epicaste), bore a son, he exposed the baby on Mount Cithaeron, first pinning his ankles together (hence the name Oedipus, meaning Swell-Foot). A shepherd took pity on the infant, who was adopted by King Polybus of Corinth and his wife and was brought up as their son. In early manhood Oedipus visited DELPHI and upon learning that he was fated to kill his father and marry his mother, he resolved never to return to Corinth.

Traveling toward Thebes, he encountered Laius, who provoked a quarrel in which Oedipus killed him. Continuing on his way, Oedipus found Thebes plagued by the SPHINX, who put a riddle to all passersby and destroyed those who could not answer. Oedipus solved the riddle, and the Sphinx killed herself. In reward, he received the throne of Thebes and the hand of the widowed queen, his mother, Jocasta. They had four children: Eteocles, Polyneices, ANTIGONE, and Ismene. Later, when the truth became known, Jocasta committed suicide, and Oedipus (according to another version), after blinding himself, went into exile, accompanied by Antigone and Ismene, leaving his brother-in-law Creon as regent. Oedipus died at Colonus near Athens, where he was swallowed into the earth and became a guardian hero of the land.

SIGMUND FREUD chose the term Oedipus complex to designate a son's feeling of love toward his mother and jealousy and hate toward his father, although these were not emotions that motivated Oedipus' actions or determined his character in any ancient version of the story.

OENEUS \ˈēn-,yūs, ˈē-nē-əs \, in Greek mythology, king of Calydon, husband of Althaea, and father of Meleager—the leader of the Calydonian boar hunt. He was also connected with HERACLES as the father of Heracles' bride Deianeira, whom he won from the river god Achelous. Oeneus may have been originally a wine god; his name is derived from the Greek word for wine. According to one story, DIONYSUS, the great god of wine, was the real father of Deianeira.

OENONE \ē-ˈnō-nē \, in Greek mythology, fountain NYMPH of Mount Ida, the daughter of the River OENEUS, and the lover of PARIS, a son of PRIAM of Troy. Oenone and Paris had a son, Corythus, but Paris soon deserted her for HELEN. Bitterly jealous, Oenone refused to aid the wounded Paris during the Trojan War, even though she was the only one who could cure him. She at last relented but arrived at Troy too late to save him. Overcome with grief, she killed herself.

OGMA \ˈōg-mə \, ancient Irish god portrayed as a swarthy man whose battle ardor was so great that he had to be chained and held back by other warriors until the right moment for military action occurred. Ogham script, an Irish writing system dating from the 4th century CE, seems to have been named for him, suggesting that, like his Celtic equivalent OGMIOS, he was a god of eloquence. See also CELTIC RELIGION.

OGMIOS \ˈōg-mē-ōs \, in CELTIC RELIGION, god identified with the Roman Hercules (HERACLES). He was portrayed as an old man with dark skin and armed with a bow and club. He was also a god of eloquence, and in that aspect he was represented as drawing along a company of men whose ears were chained to his tongue. Ogmios' Irish equivalent was OGMIA.

OGYŪ SORAI \ō-ˈgyū-ˈsō-,rī \ (b. March 21, 1666, Edo, Japan—d. Feb. 28, 1728, Edo), leading Japanese scholar of Chinese culture and CONFUCIANISM (Japanese: KOGAKU), who stressed the pragmatic application of Confucianism to promote social and political reforms by means of uniform, rational laws.

ŌKUNINUSHI \ō-kū-nē-ˈnū-shē \, in full Ōkuninushi no Mikoto, in the mythology of the Izumo branch of SHINTŌ in Japan, the central hero, a son-in-law of the storm god, SUSANO-O.

Before becoming “Master of the Great Land,” Ōkuninushi offered compassionate advice to the suffering white hare of Inaba (who had been stripped of his fur by a crocodile), who rewarded him by helping to arrange his marriage with Yakami, the princess of Inaba. His chief consort was Princess Suseri, the daughter of Susanoo. After escaping from Susanoo’s palace in the netherworld with the storm god’s most precious possessions—his sword, lute, and bow and arrows—Ōkuninushi then commenced to build the world with the help of the dwarf deity Sukunahikona. The two together formulated the arts of medicine and the means of controlling disasters caused by birds and insects. He continued to rule Izumo until the appearance of NINIGI, when he turned over political rule to him while retaining control of religious affairs. In modern Japanese folk belief, he is venerated as a god who heals and who makes marriages happy.

OLCOTT, HENRY STEEL \ˈɒl-kət\ (b. Aug. 2, 1832, Orange, N.J., U.S.—d. Feb. 17, 1907, Adyar, Madras, India), American author, attorney, philosopher, and cofounder of the Theosophical Society, a religious movement incorporating aspects of BUDDHISM, Brahmanism, and Christian esotericism.

With HELENA PETROVNA BLAVATSKY, William Q. Judge, and others Olcott founded the Theosophical Society in 1875 and became its president. In 1878 he and Blavatsky visited India. The two settled there in 1879 and in 1882 established the permanent headquarters of the Theosophical Society of Adyar, Madras. He assisted Annie Besant in establishing the Central Hindu College at VARANASI (Benares). With her, he expounded their Theosophist ideas in appearances in India and Ceylon and contributed to the founding of three colleges and 250 schools in Ceylon.

Olcott edited the Theosophist (1888–1907). His Buddhist Catechism (1881) was translated into many languages.

OLD BELIEVER, Russian Starover, or Starobryadets, member of a group of Russian religious dissenters who refused to accept the liturgical reforms imposed upon the Russian Orthodox church by the PATRIARCH of Moscow Nikon (1652–58). Numbering millions of faithful in the 17th century, the Old Believers split into a number of different sects, of which several survived into modern times.

Patriarch Nikon faced the difficult problem of deciding on an authoritative source for the correction of the liturgical books in use in Russia. These books, used since the conversion of Rus to CHRISTIANITY in 988, were literal translations from the Greek into Old Church Slavic made less reliable by scribal errors over the centuries. Nikon chose to follow exactly the texts and practices of the Greek church as they existed in 1652, and to this effect he ordered the printing of new liturgical books. His decree also required the adoption of Greek usages, Greek forms of clerical dress, and a change in the manner of crossing oneself: three fingers were to be used instead of two. The reform, obligatory for all, was considered “necessary for salvation” and was supported by Tsar Alexis Romanov.

Opposition to the reforms was led by a group of Muscovite priests, notably the archpriest Avvakum Petrovich. Even after the deposition of Nikon (1658) a series of church councils culminating in that of 1666–67 endorsed the reforms and anathematized the dissenters. Several of them, including Avvakum, were executed.

The dissenters, sometimes called Raskol'niki (“Schismatics”), were most numerous in the inaccessible regions of northern and eastern Russia (but later also in Moscow itself) and were important in the colonization of these remote areas. Opposed to all change, they strongly resisted the Western innovations introduced by Peter the Great, whom they regarded as ANTICHRIST. Having no episcopal hierarchy, they split into two groups. One group, the Popovtsy (priestly sects), sought to attract ordained priests and were able to set up an episcopate in the 19th century. The other, the Bezpopovtsy (priestless sects), renounced priests and all SACRAMENTS, except BAPTISM. Many other sects developed out of these groups.

The Old Believers benefited from the edict of toleration (April 17, 1905), and most groups survived the Russian Revolution of 1917. Numerous branches of both the Popovtsy and the Bezpopovtsy succeeded in becoming registered and thus officially recognized by the Soviet state. Little is known, however, of the Old Believer settlements supposed to exist in Siberia, the Urals, Kazakstan, and the Altai. Some groups exist elsewhere in Asia, Brazil, and in the United States and Canada.

In 1971 the Council of the Russian Orthodox church rescinded the ANATHEMAS of the 17th century and recognized the full validity of the old rites.

OLD CATHOLIC CHURCH, any of the groups of Western Christians who believe themselves to maintain in complete loyalty the doctrine and traditions of the undivided church but who separated from the see of Rome after the FIRST VATICAN COUNCIL of 1869–70.

The steady process of centralization in the see of Rome and in the person of the POPE, which has marked the later history of the Christian church in the West, has led to recurrent opposition. Plans for the first Vatican Council and the promulgation of the doctrine of the infallibility of the pope in 1870 provoked widespread hostility, the most notable figure being the distinguished church historian J.J.I. von Dollinger.

After the council, all the bishops of the opposition one by one assented to the new dogma. Dollinger remained obdurate and in time was excommunicated by name. He himself took no part in forming separatist churches, but it was largely as a result of his advice and guidance that Old Catholic churches came into being in Germany, Switzerland, Austria, and elsewhere. As no bishop had joined any of these groups, recourse was had to the Jansenist church in Holland, which had maintained a somewhat precarious existence in separation from Rome since the 18th century but had preserved an episcopal succession recognized by Rome as valid though irregular.

The first consecration of the new order was that of Joseph H. Reinkens, who was made bishop in Germany by a sympathetic bishop of the Jansenist Church of Holland, Bishop Heykamp of Deventer, on Aug. 11, 1873. Rather later the Polish National Catholic Church came into being in the United States and Canada.

In 1889 the Union of Utrecht was formed, and the declaration of Utrecht is the charter of Old Catholic doctrine and polity. Adherents to this union are the Old Catholic Church of The Netherlands, the Old Catholic Church of Germany, the Christian Catholic Church of Switzerland, the Old Catholic Church of Austria, and the Polish National Catholic Church. The chief authority in the Old Catholic churches is the conference of bishops. The archbishop of Utrecht exercises a kind of honorary primacy. Each DIOCESE has its SYNOD, with full participation of both clergy and laity in every aspect of the life of the church, including the election of bishops.

The Old Catholics accept the SCRIPTURES, the APOSTLES' CREED and NICENE CREED, and the dogmatic decisions of the first seven ecumenical councils. They uphold the conciliar basis of the church and accord a high place to tradition. They accept seven SACRAMENTS as of permanent obligation in the life of the church. The episcopate is accepted as a gift given by God to the church, in which all Catholic bishops share equally, having been admitted thereto by bishops who themselves stand in unbroken historical succession from the time of the APOSTLES. By adopting in all countries the use of the vernacular in public worship, the Old Catholics accepted what at the time was regarded as one of the fundamental principles of the Protestant REFORMATION (although that situation was significantly altered by the decisions of the SECOND VATICAN COUNCIL allowing a vernacular liturgy). CONFESSION to God in the presence of a priest is not obligatory, and CELIBACY of the clergy was made optional in some Old Catholic churches.

Döllinger's founding principles included a pledge to work persistently for Christian union. This was stressed at the first Bonn conference on Christian union, held in 1874, and was repeated at all the international Old Catholic congresses, held at intervals of roughly five years. In 1931, by the agreement of Bonn, full intercommunion was established between the Church of England and the Old Catholic churches; this was followed in 1946 by a similar agreement between the Polish National Catholic Church and the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States. Most of the Anglican churches have accepted these agreements; through mutual participation in episcopal consecrations, rather more than half the Anglican episcopate in the world has the Old Catholic as well as the Anglican episcopal succession.

OLD TESTAMENT, biblical literature, canonical for Jews and Christians. Except for a few passages in Aramaic, the Old Testament was written originally in Hebrew during the period from 1200 to 100 BCE. The term Old Testament was devised by a Christian, Melito of Sardis, about 170 CE to distinguish this part of the BIBLE from the NEW TESTAMENT.

In its general framework, the Old Testament is the account of God's dealing with the Jews as his CHOSEN PEOPLE.

Its first six books narrate how the Israelites became a people and settled in the Promised Land. The following seven books describe the establishment and development of the monarchy and the messages of the prophets. The last 11 books contain poetry, theology, and some additional historical works. Throughout the Old Testament, the Jews' historical relation to God is conceived in reference to the ultimate redemption of all humanity.

The Hebrew canon recognizes three main divisions: (1) the TORAH, or Pentateuch; (2) the NEBI'IM, or Prophets; and (3) the KETUBIM, or Writings. The total number of books in the Hebrew canon is 24, the number of scrolls on which these works were written in ancient times. The Old Testament as adopted by CHRISTIANITY numbers more works because the ROMAN CATHOLIC canon, derived initially from the Greek-language SEPTUAGINT translation of the Hebrew Bible, absorbed a number of books that Jews and Protestants later determined were not canonical (see APOCRYPHA). Christians divided some of the original Hebrew works into two or more parts, specifically, Samuel, Kings, and Chronicles (two parts each), Ezra-Nehemiah (two separate books), and the Minor Prophets (12 separate books).

OLYMPIA \ō-'lim-pē-ə\, ancient SANCTUARY and site of the Olympic Games, located in the western Peloponnese, 10 miles inland from the Ionian Sea, near a point where the Alpheus (Alfios) and Cladeus (Kladios) rivers meet. The earliest remains date from 2000 to 1600 BCE, the sanctuary itself from around 1000. First controlled by the town of Pisa, after 570 BCE Olympia came under the jurisdiction of Elis and Sparta. The religious festival, of which the Games were a part, was held there every four years from the 8th century BCE until the end of the 4th century CE.

The sacred precinct, the ALTIS, or Sacred Grove of ZEUS, was bounded on the north by the hill of CRONUS and enclosed by a wall on the other three sides. In it were the temples, the principal altars and votive offerings, the treasuries, and administration buildings. Outside were the athletic installations and the hostels, baths, and other accommodations for visitors. In 426 the emperor Theodosius II ordered the temples destroyed; subsequent man-made and natural disasters further damaged the site.

The Temple of Zeus was the largest and most important building at Olympia and one of the largest Doric temples in Greece. Built about 460 BCE by the architect Libon of Elis, the temple was richly decorated with sculpture, much of which has survived. In the front gable the chariot race between PELOPS and Oenomaus was represented, and both parties were shown preparing for the race. In the back gable was the battle of the Lapiths and CENTAURS at the wedding of Perithous. The frieze that ran above the front and back porches had sculptured metopes with the 12 labors of HERACLES, 6 at each end. At the peak of the gable was a gilded figure of Victory and at each corner a gilded caldron, but these have not survived.

Within the temple was the great gold and ivory (chryselephantine) statue of Zeus, the work of the Athenian sculptor Phidias, the most famous of all ancient statues and counted one of the Seven Wonders of the World. It made a profound impression on all who saw it, and people generally agreed that Phidias had succeeded in creating the image of Homer's Zeus. The god was represented seated on an elaborately wrought throne. He held a figure of the goddess of victory (NIKE) in his right hand and a sceptre in his left.

The great altar of Olympian Zeus, to one side of the temple, was elliptical in shape and consisted of an elevated base approached by steps. From the base rose a large mound made of the ashes of the thighs of animal victims sacrificed to Zeus. The whole height of the altar was 22 feet.

The oldest temple at Olympia and one of the most venerable in all Greece was that of HERA, originally a joint temple of Hera and Zeus until a separate temple was built for him. The existing temple was probably built about 600 BCE, and an earlier phase, without peristyle (colonnade), may go back to the 8th century. Pausanias says that in the temple was an image of Hera seated on a throne with an image of Zeus standing beside her. Pausanias also reports the existence of a stone statue of HERMES carrying the young DIONYSUS, a work of Praxiteles that was found in the cella of the temple in 1877. Between the temples of Zeus and Hera, the Elean hero Pelops had a sanctuary in the Altis that was open to the sky and surrounded by a wall, with trees and statues within. The Metroum, or Temple of the GREAT MOTHER OF THE GODS, was a small Doric temple of the 4th century BCE just below the treasuries.

The stadium lay to the east of the Altis. In early classical times it was not cut off from the sanctuary, and one end of the track was in the area directly in front of the temple and the great ash altar of Zeus (beneath the later Echo Colonnade). About the middle of the 4th century BCE the stadium was shifted about 90 yards eastward and a little to the north.

There were no stone seats in the stadium except for a box on the south side; here sat the hellanodikai, or chief judges, of the Games. Directly opposite the box was the altar of DEMETER Chamyne, from which the priestess of that cult was privileged to watch the Games (married women were excluded from the Olympic festival, but unmarried girls were permitted).

When the stadium embankments were excavated many votive offerings were discovered, including bronze statuettes and reliefs, several terra-cotta statues, and arms or armor that had been dedicated in the sanctuary.

The hippodrome where the horse races were held lay south of the stadium in the open valley of the Alpheus. No trace of this has been found.

OM \ˈɔm\, in HINDUISM and other religions chiefly of India, sacred syllable considered to be the greatest of all MANTRAS. The syllable Om is composed of the three sounds a-u-m (in Sanskrit, the vowels a and u coalesce to become o), which represent several important triads: the three worlds of earth, atmosphere, and heaven; the three major Hindu gods, BRAHMĀ, VISHNU, and SHIVA; and the three sacred Vedic SCRIPTURES, R̥g, Yajus, and Sāma. Om is uttered at the beginning and end of Hindu prayers, chants, and meditation and is freely used in rituals of JAINISM and BUDDHISM. From the 6th century, the written symbol designating the sound is used to mark the beginning of a text or an inscription.

The syllable is discussed in a number of the UPANISHADS, and it forms the entire subject matter of one, the Māṇḍūkya. It is used in the practice of YOGA and is related to techniques of auditory meditation. Śaivites mark the LINGA, or sign of Shiva, with the syllable Om, whereas Vaiṣṇavas identify the three sounds as referring to a trinity composed of Vishnu, his wife LAKṢMĪ, and the worshiper.

OMEN, observed phenomenon that is interpreted as signifying good or bad fortune. In ancient times omens were numerous and varied and might be found in lightning or the flight of birds. The different kinds of bird in flight or the direction of flight in relation to the observer often had a special meaning. See DIVINATION.

OMETECUHTLI \,ō-mā-'tā-küt-lē\ (Nahuatl: "Two-Lord"), in Aztec religion, supreme deity in its masculine aspect, the Lord of Duality, or Lord of Life. With his consort Omecihuatl, Ometecuhtli resided in Omeyocan ("The Place of Duality"), the 13th and highest Aztec heaven, and together they constituted the dual god Ometeotl. The opposing factors in the Aztec universe included male and female, light and dark, motion and stillness, order and chaos. Ometecuhtli was the only Aztec god to whom no temple was erected, nor was any formal cult active in his name, as he was seen as remote and inaccessible in the heavens though far from unimportant.

Ometecuhtli is depicted by symbols of fertility and adorned with ears of corn. He was believed to be responsible for releasing the souls of infants from Omeyocan in preparation for human births on earth.

ŌMOTO \,ō-'mō-tō\ [Japanese: "Great Fundamentals"], also called Ōmoto-kyō \-kyō\ ("Religion of Ōmoto"), religious movement of Japan that had a large following between the two World Wars and that served as a model for numerous other sects. The teaching of Ōmoto is based on divine oracles transmitted through a peasant woman, Deguchi Nao (1836–1918), whose healing powers attracted an early following. Her first revelation in 1892 foretold the destruction of the world and the appearance of a leader who would usher in the new heaven on earth.

The doctrine was systematized and organized by her son-in-law, Deguchi Onisaburō (1871–1948), who denounced armament and war and identified himself as the leader who would establish the new order. He attracted more than 2,000,000 believers in the 1930s but aroused the hostility of the government, which twice arrested him and destroyed Ōmoto temples and buildings at the sect's headquarters in Ayabe, near Kyōto. He was released on bail in 1942 and initiated the revival of the movement in 1946 under the name Aizen-en (Garden of Divine Love). The sect was known by several names but has reverted to its most commonly used name, Ōmoto.

Though the membership of the sect in 1978 was estimated at only 163,760 believers, other new religious movements of Japan that owe their original inspiration to Ōmoto include Seichōno-ie (Household of Growth) and Sekai Kyūsei-kyō (Religion of World Salvation), both founded by former disciples of Onisaburō. Ōmoto emphasizes the universal character of religion. It promotes the use of Esperanto and sponsors an organization called ULBA (Universal Love and Brotherhood Association).

ONEIDA COMMUNITY \ō-ñī-də\, also called Perfectionists, or Bible Communists, utopian religious community established by John Humphrey Noyes and some of his disciples in Putney, Vt., U.S., in 1841.

Noyes experienced a religious conversion when he was 20 years old. He then gave up law studies and attended Andover Theological Seminary and Yale Divinity School. His acceptance and preaching of the doctrine of perfectionism, the idea that after conversion one was free of all SIN, was considered too unorthodox, and he was denied ORDINATION. He also became convinced that the SECOND COMING of JESUS CHRIST was not an event of the future but had already occurred within a generation of Christ's ministry on earth. But it was Noyes's ideas concerning sexual union that made him notorious. He rejected monogamy and the idea that one man and one woman should become closely attached to each other. The application of his views led to the practice of complex marriage in his community, in which every woman was the wife of every man and every man was the husband of every woman. Noyes also believed that socialism without religion was impossible and that the extended family system could dissolve selfishness and demonstrate the practicality of perfectionism on earth.

In 1847, Noyes proclaimed that the Spirit of Christ had earlier returned to earth and had now entered into his group at Putney. This proclamation, together with the practice of complex marriage, aroused the hostility of the surrounding community, and the group left Putney to found a new community at Oneida, N.Y. For the next 30 years Oneida flourished. The community, which in the early years numbered about 200 persons, earned a living by farming and logging before a new member gave the community a steel trap that he had invented. Manufacture and sale of Oneida traps became the basis of a thriving group of industrial enterprises that included silverware, embroidered silks, and canned fruit.

The community was organized into 48 departments that carried on the various activities of the settlement, and these activities were supervised by 21 committees. Though marriage was complex, the Perfectionists denied the charge of free love. Sexual relations were strictly regulated, and the propagation of children was a matter of community control. Those who were to produce children were carefully chosen and paired. The central feature of the community was the custom of holding criticism sessions, or cures, a practice that Noyes had discovered at Andover. They were attended by the entire community at first and, later, as the community grew, were conducted before committees presided over by Noyes. The criticism sessions had the effect of enforcing social control and promoting community cohesion.

Hostility mounted in the surrounding communities to the Perfectionists' marriage arrangements, and in 1879 Noyes advised the group to abandon the system. As the reorganization of the community began, the entire socialist organization of property in Oneida also was questioned. Noyes and a few adherents went to Canada, where he died in 1886. The remaining members set up a joint stock company, known as Oneida Community, Ltd., which carried on the various industries, particularly the manufacture of silver plate, as a commercial enterprise.

OPET \ō-ˌpet\, ancient Egyptian festival of the New Year. In the celebration of Opet, the god AMON together with MUT, his consort, and KHONS, their son, made a ritual journey from their shrines at Karnak to the temple of Luxor (called Ipet resyt in pharaonic Egyptian, hence the name of the festival). Scenes of the festival in the Colonnade of the Temple of Luxor carved during Tutankhamen's reign (1333–23 BCE) show white-robed priests carrying statues of Amon, Mut, and Khons in golden barks through the streets of ancient Thebes, onto river barges, and on to Luxor. Following this appearance to the populace, the statues remained in the temple of Luxor for about 24 days, during which the city remained in festival. The images were returned by the same route to their shrines in Karnak in a second public appearance that closed the festival. A direct survival of the ancient cult is seen in the present-day feast of the Muslim holy man Sheikh Yūsuf al-Haggāg, whose boat is carried about Luxor amid popular celebration. His mosque stands in the northeastern corner of the first court of the temple of Luxor, over the foundations of a Byzantine church.

Through an association with Mut, the name Opet (or Apet) was also applied to a local city goddess of Thebes, who was depicted in a manner similar to that of TAURT, the hippopotamus goddess of fertility and childbirth.

OPHITE \ä-ˌfīt, 'ō-\ (Greek Ophitēs, from ophis, "serpent"), member of any of several Gnostic sects that flourished in the Roman Empire during the 2nd century CE and for several centuries thereafter. A variety of Gnostic sects, such as the Naassenes and the CAINITES, are included under the designation Ophites. These sects' beliefs differed in various ways, but central to them all was a dualistic theology that opposed a purely spiritual Supreme Being, who was both the creator and the highest good, to a chaotic and evil material world. To the Ophites, the human dilemma resulted from humans being a mixture of these conflicting spiritual and material elements. Only gnosis, the esoteric knowledge of GOOD AND EVIL, could redeem humans from the bonds of matter and make them aware of the unknown God who was the true source of all being.

The Ophites regarded the JEHOVAH of the OLD TESTAMENT as merely a DEMIURGE—a subordinate deity who had created the material world. They attached special importance to the serpent in the biblical book of GENESIS because he had enabled men to obtain the all-important knowledge of good and evil that Jehovah had withheld from them. Accordingly, the serpent was a true liberator of mankind, since he first taught humans to rebel against Jehovah and to seek knowledge of the true, unknown God. The Ophites regarded the Christ as a purely spiritual being who through his union with the man Jesus taught the saving gnosis. See GNOSTICISM.

OPUS DEI \ō-pəs-ˈdē-ī, -ˈdā-ē\ (Latin: "God's Work"), ROMAN CATHOLIC organization of laymen and priests whose members pledge to seek personal Christian perfection and to strive to implement Christian ideals in their chosen occupations. It is theologically conservative in its unquestioning acceptance of the teaching authority of the church. A controversial organization, it has been accused by its critics of secrecy, cultlike practices, and promoting a right-wing political agenda; Opus Dei denies these charges. There are separate organizations for men and women, both of which are headed by a PRELATE appointed by the pope.

Opus Dei was founded in 1928 in Spain by Josemaría Escrivá de Balaguer y Albás (b. Jan. 9, 1902—d. June 26, 1975; canonized 2002), a priest with both legal and journalistic training. It was definitively approved by the Holy See in 1950. On Nov. 28, 1982, Pope JOHN PAUL II established Opus Dei as the first and only personal prelature in the church, with the title Prelature of the Holy Cross and Opus Dei. Its status is analogous to that of a DIOCESE.

Some members of Opus Dei, called numeraries, must be unmarried and celibate and are required to devote a large part of their time to the organization. The majority of members are supernumeraries, who are free to marry. All members serve a period of probation. Opus Dei is assisted by cooperators, who are not members and—with the permission of the Holy See—need not even be Christians.

A number of highly educated persons of acknowledged ability have been members of Opus Dei. In 1956 Spain's military dictator, Generalissimo Francisco Franco, turned to some of these persons for help following his decision to implement a program of economic reform. In the final years of his regime several ministers in his cabinet belonged to Opus Dei. After Franco's death in 1975, the political influence of the organization waned as other parties and associations began to compete in the political arena.

Opus Dei founded and endowed (with government assistance) the University of Navarre. It also operates a university in Piura, Peru, as well as presses in other countries.

ORACLE (Latin oraculum, from orare, "to pray to," or "to supplicate"), divine communication delivered in response to a petitioner's request; also, the seat of PROPHECY itself. Oracles were a branch of DIVINATION but differed from the casual pronouncements of augurs by being associated with a definite person or place.

Oracular shrines were numerous in antiquity, and at each the god was consulted by a fixed means of divination. The method could be simple, such as the casting of lots or the rustling of tree leaves, or more sophisticated, taking the form of a direct inquiry of an inspired person who then gave the answer orally. One of the most common methods was incubation, in which the inquirer slept in a holy precinct and received an answer in a dream.

The most famous ancient oracle was that of APOLLO at DELPHI, located on the slopes of Mt. Parnassus above the Corinthian Gulf. Traditionally, the oracle first belonged to Mother Earth (GAEA) but later was either given to or stolen by Apollo. At Delphi the medium was a woman over fifty, known as the Pythia, who lived apart from her husband and dressed in a maiden's clothes. The Pythia's counsel was most in demand to forecast the outcome of projected wars or political actions.

Consultations were normally restricted to the seventh day of the Delphic month, Apollo's birthday, and were at first banned during the three winter months when Apollo was believed to be visiting the HYPERBOREANS in the north, though DIONYSUS later took Apollo's place at Delphi during that time. In the usual procedure, sponsors were necessary, as was the provision of a pelanos (ritual cake) and a sacrificial beast that conformed to rigid physical standards. The Pythia and her consultants first bathed in the Castalian spring; afterward, she drank from the sacred spring Cassotis and then entered the temple. There she apparently descended into a basement cell, mounted a sacred tripod, and chewed leaves of the laurel, Apollo's sacred tree. While in her abnormal state, the Pythia would speak, intelligibly or otherwise. Her words were interpreted and written down by the priests in what was often highly ambiguous verse.

There were less frequented oracles at Thebes, Tegyra, and Ptoon in Boeotia, at Abae in Phocis, at Corope in Thessaly, and on Delos, Apollo's birthplace. In Anatolia the god's oracles at Patara, Branchidae, CLAROS, and Grynium were well known, though none rivaled Delphi.

The oracle of ZEUS at DODONA in northwestern Greece was regarded as the oldest. At Dodona the priests (later priestesses) revealed the god's will from the whispering of the leaves on a sacred oak, from a sacred spring, and from the striking of a gong. Zeus also prophesied from his altar at OLYMPIA, where priests divined from offerings, as well as from the oasis of Siwa in Libya, which was originally an oracle of the Egyptian god AMON.

Oracles delivered through incubation were believed to come from chthonian (underworld) powers. Thus invalids slept in the hall of ASCLEPIUS, the god of medicine, at Epidaurus and claimed to receive cures through dreams. At the oracle of the hero Amphiaraus at Oropus in Attica, consultants slept on skins, while visitors to the oracle of Trophonius (son of Erginus the ARGONAUT) at Levádhia slept in a hole in the ground. Incubation was also practiced at the oracle of Dionysus at Amphicleia. An oracle for consulting the dead existed beside the river Acheron in central Greece.

Oracles in the formal sense were generally confined to the classical world. The Egyptians, however, divined from the motion of images paraded through the streets, and the Hebrews from sacred objects and dreams. Babylonian temple prophetesses also interpreted dreams. In Italy the lot oracle of FORTUNA Primigenia at Praeneste was consulted even by the emperors. The goddess Albunea possessed a dream oracle at Tibur (Tivoli), and the incubation rites of the god FAUNUS resembled those of Amphiaraus.

ORACLE BONES, name given to Shang-period animal scapular bones and tortoise shells inscribed with the archaic Chinese script. These objects were ritual implements used in DIVINATION and were under the charge of a specialized group of diviners who were charged by the Shang king to prognosticate the fortunes of the state. These materials show the presence of a developed cult of ancestors and a theocratic concern for maintaining a harmonious relationship between the world of the living and the dead.

ORAL TRADITION, transmission of cultural values by word of mouth. Songs, stories, proverbs, epics and rituals are the most obvious forms used in the transmission of oral culture. Oral tradition is usually contrasted with textual tradition. The study of oral traditions as an academic discipline is quite new; The Journal of Oral Tradition was founded in 1986. John Miles Foley, The Theory of Oral Composition: History and Methodology (1988) remains the most useful overview and bibliography of the work in oral tradition.

ORDINATION, in Christian churches, a rite for the dedication and commissioning of ministers. The essential ceremony consists of the laying of hands of the ordaining minister upon the head of the one being ordained, with prayer for the gifts of the HOLY SPIRIT and of GRACE required for the carrying out of the ministry. The service also usually includes a public examination of the candidate and a sermon or charge concerning the responsibilities of the ministry.

CHRISTIANITY derived the ceremony from the Jewish custom of ordaining RABBIS by the laying on of hands (the Semikha). According to the Pastoral Letters (1 Timothy 4:14; 2 Timothy 1:6), ordination confers a spiritual gift of grace. The oldest ordination prayers extant are contained in the Apostolic Tradition of HIPPOLYTUS of Rome (c. 217 CE). In medieval times the Latin rites were elaborated by the addition of various prayers and of such ceremonies as the anointing of hands, clothing the ordinand with the appropriate vestments, and presenting him with the symbols pertinent to his rank; e.g., the Gospels to a deacon and the CHALICE and paten with the bread and wine to a candidate for the PRIESTHOOD. The rites of ordination in the ROMAN CATHOLIC church were considerably simplified in 1968.

In churches that have retained the historic episcopate, including the Anglican church, the ordaining minister is always a bishop. In PRESBYTERIAN CHURCHES, ordination is conferred by ministers of the presbytery. In the Reformed Protestant tradition lay persons are ordained to be ruling elders and deacons by the minister joined by others so ordained previously. In Congregational churches ordination is conducted by persons chosen by the local congregation.

According to Eastern Orthodox and Roman Catholic theology, ordination (holy orders) is a SACRAMENT essential to the church, and it bestows an unrepeatable, indelible character upon the person ordained.

ORESTES \ò-'res-tēz\, in Greek mythology, son of AGAMEMNON and his wife, Clytemnestra. According to Homer, Orestes was away when his father returned from Troy and met his death at the hands of Aegisthus, his wife's lover. On reaching manhood, Orestes avenged his father by killing Aegisthus and Clytemnestra.

In Aeschylus' Oresteia, Orestes killed his mother in accordance with Apollo's commands; he posed as a stranger with tidings of his own death, and, after killing her, he found his way to Athens and pleaded his case before the Areopagus. The jury divided equally, ATHENA gave her deciding vote for acquittal, and the FURIES were placated by being given the epithet Eumenides (kindly goddesses).

In Euripides' play Iphigenia in Tauris some of the Furies remained unappeased, and Orestes was ordered by APOLLO to go to Tauris and bring the statue of ARTEMIS back to Athens. Accompanied by his friend Pylades, they were arrested on arrival because it was the local custom to sacrifice all strangers to the goddess. The priestess in charge of the sacrifice was Orestes' sister Iphigenia; they recognized each other and escaped together, taking the statue with them. Orestes inherited his father's kingdom, adding to it Argos and Lacedaemon. He married Hermione, daughter of HELEN and MENELAUS, and eventually died of snakebite.

ORIENTAL JEW, Hebrew Ben Ha-Mizrah \,ben-hä-mēz-'räk\ ("Son of the East"), plural Bene Ha-Mizrah, any of the approximately 1,500,000 Diaspora Jews who lived for several centuries in North Africa and the Middle East. This group is distinct from the two other major groups of Diaspora Jews—the ASHKENAZI and the SEPHARDI.

In Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia, Libya, Egypt, Yemen, Jordan, Lebanon, Iraq, and Syria, Oriental Jews speak Arabic as their native tongue. In Iran, Afghanistan, and Bukhara they speak Farsi (Persian), whereas in Kurdistan their language is a variant of ancient Aramaic. Some Oriental Jews migrated to India, other parts of Central Asia, and China. In some Oriental Jewish communities (notably those of Yemen and Iran), polygyny has been practiced. Following the establishment of the state of Israel in 1948, practically all the Yemenite, Iraqi, and Libyan Jews and major parts of the other Oriental Jewish communities migrated to Israel.

ORIGEN \'ör-i-jən\, Latin in full Oregenes Adamantius \ò-'ri-jə-nēz-,a-də-'man-shē-əs\ (b. c. 185, probably Alexandria, Egypt—d. c. 254, Tyre, Phoenicia [now Şür, Lebanon]), the most important theologian and biblical scholar of the early Greek church. His most massive work was the Hexapla, a parallel edition of six versions of the OLD TESTAMENT.

Eusebius stated that Origen's father, Leonides, was martyred in the persecution of 202, so that Origen had to provide for his mother and six younger brothers. He earned money by teaching grammar and lived a life of strenuous ASCETICISM. Eusebius added that he was a pupil of CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA, whom he succeeded as head of the Catechetical school under the authority of the bishop Demetrius. Eusebius also alleged that Origen, as a young man, castrated himself so as to work freely in instructing female catechumens; but this may merely have been hostile gossip.

According to Porphyry, Origen attended lectures given by Ammonius Saccas, the founder of NEOPLATONISM. A letter of Origen mentions his "teacher of philosophy," at whose lectures he met Heraclas, who was to become his junior colleague, then his rival. During this period (from c. 212), Origen learned Hebrew and began to compile his Hexapla. At Alexandria he wrote Stromateis (Miscellanies), Peri anastaseos (On the Resurrection), and De principiis (On First Principles). He also began his immense commentary on ST. JOHN, written to refute the commentary of the Gnostic follower of VALENTINUS, HERACLEON.

About 229–230 Origen went to Greece to dispute with another follower of Valentinus, Candidus. On the way he was ordained PRESBYTER at Caesarea Palaestinae. The Valentinian doctrine that salvation and damnation are predestinate, independent of volition, was defended by Candidus on the ground that SATAN is beyond repentance; Origen replied that if Satan fell by will, even he can repent. Demetrius, bishop of Alexandria, was appalled by such a doctrinal view and instigated a synodical condemnation, which, however, was not accepted in Greece and Palestine. Thenceforth, Origen lived at Caesarea, where he attracted many pupils. One of his most notable students was Gregory Thaumaturgus, later bishop of Neocaesarea.

Origen's main lifework was on the text of the Greek Old Testament and on the exposition of the whole BIBLE. The Hexapla was a synopsis of Old Testament versions: the Hebrew and a transliteration, the SEPTUAGINT, the versions of Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion and, for the Psalms, two further translations (one being discovered by him in a jar in the Jordan Valley). The purpose of the Hexapla was to provide a secure basis for debate with RABBIS to whom the Hebrew alone was authoritative.

Origen's great apologetic work, Contra Celsum, written (probably in 248) at Ambrose's request, answers the Alēthēs logos ("The True Doctrine" or "Discourse") of the 2nd-century anti-Christian philosopher Celsus and is therefore a principal source for the PAGAN intelligentsia's view of 2nd-century CHRISTIANITY. Celsus' dismissal of Christianity as a crude and bucolic onslaught on the religious traditions and intellectual values of classical culture provoked Origen to argue that a philosophic mind has a right to think within a Christian framework and that the Christian faith is neither a prejudice of the unreasoning masses nor a crutch for social outcasts or nonconformists.

Everything in Origen's theology ultimately turns upon the goodness of God and the freedom of the creature. The transcendent God is the source of all existence and is good, just, and omnipotent. In overflowing love, God created rational and spiritual beings through the LOGOS (Word); this creative act involves a degree of self-limitation on God's part. In one sense, the cosmos is eternally necessary to God since one cannot conceive such goodness and power as inactive at any time. Yet in another sense, the cosmos is not necessary to God but is dependent on his will, to which it also owes its continued existence. Origen was aware that there is no solution of this dilemma.

Origen speculated that souls fell varying distances, some to be ANGELS, some descending into human bodies, and the most wicked becoming devils. Redemption is a grand education by Providence that restores all souls to their original blessedness, for no one, not even Satan himself, is so depraved and has so lost rationality and freedom as to be beyond redemption.

The influence of Origen's biblical EXEGESIS and ascetic ideals is hard to overestimate; his commentaries were freely plagiarized by later exegetes, both Eastern and Western, and he is a seminal mind for the beginnings of MONASTICISM. Through the writings of the monk EVAGRIUS PONTICUS (346–399), his ideas passed not only into the Greek ascetic tradition but also to John Cassian (360–435), a semi-Pelagian monk (who emphasized the worth of man's moral effort), and to the West. He was often attacked, suspected of adulterating the Gospel with pagan philosophy and his teachings were condemned by the Second COUNCIL OF CONSTANTINOPLE (553). Nevertheless, Origen's influence persisted, such as in the writings of the Byzantine monk Maximus the Confessor (c. 550–662) and the Irish theologian John Scotus Erigena (c. 810–877).

ORIGINAL SIN, in Christian doctrine, condition or state of SIN into which each human being is born; also, the origin, or cause, of this state. Traditionally, the origin has been ascribed to the sin of ADAM, who disobeyed God in eating the forbidden fruit and, in consequence, transmitted his sin and guilt by heredity to his descendants.

Although the human condition (suffering, death, and a universal tendency toward sin) is accounted for by the story of the fall of Adam in the early chapters of the book of GENESIS, the OLD TESTAMENT says nothing about the transmission of hereditary sin to the entire human race. In the GOSPELS also there are no more than allusions to the notion of the Fall of Man and universal sin. The main scriptural affirmation of the doctrine is found in the writings of ST. PAUL and particularly in Romans 5:12–19, a difficult passage in which Paul establishes a parallelism between Adam and JESUS CHRIST, stating that whereas sin and death entered the world through Adam, GRACE and eternal life have come in greater abundance through Christ.

ST. AUGUSTINE's controversy with the Pelagians (see also PELAGIUS) helped to fix the sinful state of humanity as a central element of orthodox Christian theology.

ORION \ò-ri-àn\, in Greek mythology, GIANT and very handsome hunter who was identified as early as Homer with the constellation known by his name.

The story of Orion has many different versions. He is considered to be Boeotian by birth, born (according to a late legend) of the earth (from a buried bull hide on which three gods had urinated). Some legends have him as the son of POSEIDON. He is associated with the island of Chios, from which he is said to have driven the wild beasts. There he fell in love with Merope, daughter of the king of Chios. The king, who disapproved of Orion and continually deferred the nuptials, eventually had Orion blinded.

His vision restored by the rays of the rising sun, Orion is said to have gone to Crete to live with ARTEMIS as a hunter. Accounts of his death vary widely: some have him a victim of Artemis' jealousy, others of Apollo's jealousy over Artemis' love of Orion; still others have him killed by a scorpion. After his death he was placed among the stars.

ORPHEUS \òr-fē-əs, -fyüs\, ancient Greek hero endowed with superhuman musical skills. He became the patron of a religious movement based on sacred writings that were said to be his own.

Traditionally, Orpheus was the son of a MUSE and Oeagrus, a king of Thrace (other versions give APOLLO). According to some tales, Apollo gave Orpheus his first lyre. Orpheus' singing and playing were so beautiful that animals, trees, and rocks danced about him.

Orpheus was one of the ARGONAUTS, and he saved them from the music of the SIRENS by playing his own music. On his return, he married EURYDICE, who was soon killed by a snakebite. Overcome with grief, Orpheus attempted to bring Eurydice back from the land of the dead. With his singing and playing he charmed the ferryman CHARON and the dog Cerberus. His music and grief so moved HADES that Orpheus was allowed to take Eurydice back with him. Hades set one condition, however: upon leaving the land of death, both Orpheus and Eurydice were forbidden to look back. The couple climbed up toward the opening into the land of the living, and Orpheus, seeing the sun again, turned back to share his delight with Eurydice. In that moment, she disappeared.

Orpheus himself was killed by the women of Thrace.

The earliest known account, that of Aeschylus, says that they were Maenads urged by DIONYSUS to tear him to pieces in a Bacchic orgy because he preferred the worship of the rival god Apollo. His head, still singing, with his lyre, floated to Lesbos, where an ORACLE of Orpheus was established. The head prophesied until the oracle became more famous than that of Apollo at DELPHI, at which time Apollo bade the Orphic oracle stop. The dismembered limbs of Orpheus were gathered up and buried by the Muses. His lyre they placed in the heavens as a constellation.

A MYSTERY RELIGION based on the teachings and songs of Orpheus is thought to have arisen in ancient Greece, although no coherent description of such a religion can be constructed from historical evidence. By the 5th century BCE there was at least an Orphic movement, with traveling priests who offered teaching and initiation, based on a body of legend and doctrine said to have been founded by Orpheus. Orphic ESCHATOLOGY laid great stress on rewards and punishment after bodily death, the soul then being freed to achieve its true life.

ORTHODOX, true doctrine and its adherents as opposed to heterodox or heretical doctrines and their adherents. The word was first used in early 4th-century CHRISTIANITY by the Greek Fathers. Because almost every religious group believes that it holds the true faith (though not necessarily exclusively), the meaning of "orthodox" in a particular instance can be correctly determined only after examination of the context in which it appears. More conservative movements within a particular religious tradition may lay exclusive claim to orthodoxy so as to distance themselves from the reforms or institutions of competing movements.

The term orthodox forms part of the official titles of the Eastern Orthodox church, those in communion with it, and some of the smaller Eastern churches; because the Greek word doxa can mean either "teaching" or "praise," Eastern Orthodox Christianity (Pravoslavie, in the Slavic languages) defines itself as both "right teaching" and "right worship." Within JUDAISM, ORTHODOX JUDAISM is the mainline tradition that adheres most strictly to ancient tradition. The term is also used to distinguish true Islamic doctrine from allegedly heretical teachings, such as those of the Mu'tazilites. The term evangelical orthodoxy is commonly applied to Protestant Christianity that insists on the full or literal authority and inerrancy of the BIBLE.

ORTHODOX CHURCH: see EASTERN ORTHODOXY.

ORTHODOX JUDAISM, in common parlance, "traditional," or "observant," JUDAISM. More accurately, the diversity of Orthodox Judaisms requires differentiation into subdivisions, for no single organizational structure encompasses all its religious worlds. Nonetheless, all Orthodox Judaisms can be said to affirm the divine revelation of the TORAH by God to MOSES at Sinai, to concur on the dual character of the revelation (oral and written), and to accept the authority of the sages of the TALMUD as participants in the process of the revelation of the Torah at Sinai.

Orthodox Judaism was first articulated by Jews who rejected the initiatives of REFORM JUDAISM and made a self-conscious decision to remain within the way of life and world view that they had known and cherished all their lives. They framed the issues in terms of change and history. The Reformers held that Judaism could change—that it was a product of history. The Orthodox opponents denied this, insisting that Judaism derived from God's will at Sinai and was eternal and supernatural, not historical and man-made.

One critical criterion for distinguishing among communities of Orthodox belief is social. Some Judaisms of the dual Torah maintain that holy Israel should live wholly apart from GENTILES, segregating itself socially and culturally. Other Judaisms of the dual Torah—the so-called "modern" or "Western" Orthodoxy—differ by affirming social and cultural integration into Western culture, maintaining that one may both keep the law of the Torah and participate in the politics and affairs of the secular world. Integrationist and, later on, Zionist Orthodox Judaism came into being in Germany in the middle of the 19th century. In the state of Israel segregationist Orthodoxy competes with Zionist and integrationist Orthodoxy, the former in great yeshivot, the latter at Bar Ilan University. The former maintains its own educational system, while the latter runs the "state-religious" schools. Each Judaism has its own political party as well. In the United States and in western Europe integrationist Orthodoxy predominates.

Another point of differentiation centers on the issues of ZIONISM and the state of Israel. Some Orthodox Judaisms completely reject the legitimacy of the state of Israel as the Jewish state; some accept the state of Israel as a secular fact; and some affirm the state of Israel as a chapter in the story of the coming of the MESSIAH in time to come.

OSIRIS \ō-'sī-rəs\, also called Usiri, one of the most important gods of ancient EGYPTIAN RELIGION. Osiris was a local god of BUSIRIS, in Lower Egypt, and may have been a personification of Underworld fertility, or possibly he was a deified hero. By about 2400 BCE, however, Osiris clearly played a double role: he was both a god of fertility and the embodiment of the dead and resurrected king within the Egyptian concept of divine kingship. The king after his death became Osiris, god of the Underworld, and the dead king's son, the living king, was identified with HORUS, a god of the sky. The goddess ISIS was the mother of the king and was thus the mother of Horus and consort of Osiris. The god SETH was considered the murderer of Osiris and adversary of Horus.

According to the form of the myth reported by the Greek author Plutarch, Osiris was slain or drowned by Seth, who tore the corpse into 14 pieces and flung them over Egypt. Eventually, Isis and her sister Nephthys found and buried all the pieces, except the phallus, thereby giving new life to Osiris, who thenceforth remained in the Underworld as ruler and judge. Isis revived Osiris by magical means and conceived her son Horus by him. Horus later successfully fought against Seth and became the new king of Egypt.

Osiris was not only ruler of the dead but also the power that granted all life from the Underworld, from sprouting vegetation to the annual flood of the Nile River. From about 2000 BCE onward it was believed that every man, not just the deceased kings, became associated with Osiris at death. This identification with Osiris, however, did not imply RESURRECTION, but rather the renewal of life both in the next world and through one's descendants on earth. In this universalized form Osiris' cult spread throughout Egypt, often joining with the cults of local fertility and Underworld deities.

The idea that rebirth in the next life could be gained by following Osiris was maintained through certain cult forms. In the Middle Kingdom the god's festivals consisted of processions and nocturnal rites and were celebrated at the temple of ABYDOS, where Osiris had assimilated the very ancient god of the dead, Khenty-Imentin. This name, meaning "Foremost of the Westerners," was adopted by Osiris as an epithet. Because the festivals took place in the open, public participation was permitted, and by the early 2nd millennium BCE it became fashionable to be buried on the processional road at Abydos or to erect a cenotaph there as a representative of the dead.

Osiris festivals symbolically reenacting the god's fate were celebrated annually in various towns throughout Egypt. A central feature of the festivals was the construction of the "Osiris garden," a mold in the shape of Osiris, filled with soil and various drugs. The mold was moistened with the water of the Nile and sown with grain. Later, the sprouting grain symbolized the vital strength of Osiris.

At Memphis the holy bull, APIS, was linked with Osiris, becoming Osiris-Apis, which eventually became the name of the Hellenistic god SARAPIS. Greco-Roman authors connected Osiris with the god DIONYSUS. Osiris was also identified with Soker, an ancient Memphite god of the dead.

The oldest known depiction of Osiris dates to about 2300 BCE, but representations of him are rare before the New Kingdom (1539–1075 BCE), when he was shown in an archaizing form as a MUMMY with his arms crossed on his breast, one hand holding a crook, the other a flail. On his head was the atef-crown, composed of the white crown of Upper Egypt and two ostrich feathers.

OSSIAN \ˈä-shən, ˈo-; ˈä-sē-ən\, Gaelic Oisín \ˈō-shēn\, Irish warrior-poet of the Fenian cycle of hero tales about Finn and his war band, the Fianna Éireann.

The name Ossian became known throughout Europe in 1762, when the Scottish poet James Macpherson "discovered" the poems of Oisín and published the epic Fingal and the following year Temora, supposedly translations from 3rd-century Gaelic originals. Actually, although based in part on genuine Gaelic ballads, the works were largely the invention of Macpherson. These poems won wide acclaim and were a central influence in the early Romantic movement. They infuriated Irish scholars because they mixed Fenian and Ulster legends indiscriminately and because Macpherson claimed that the Irish heroes were Caledonians and therefore a glory to Scotland's past, rather than to Ireland's.

The Ossianic controversy was finally settled in the late 19th century, when it was demonstrated that the only Gaelic originals that Macpherson had been able to produce were translations in a barbarous Gaelic of his own English compositions. The name Ossian, popularized by Macpherson, superseded Oisín, though they are often used interchangeably. The term Ossianic ballads refers to genuine late Gaelic poems that form part of the common Scots-Irish Gaelic tradition.

OTTO, RUDOLF \ˈō-tō, ˈä-\ (b. Sept. 25, 1869, Peine, Prussia—d. March 6, 1937, Marburg, Ger.), German theologian, philosopher, and historian of religions, who exerted wide influence through his investigation of RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE.

Otto studied theology and philosophy at the University of Erlangen and, later, at the University of Göttingen, where he was made a Privatdozent ("lecturer") in 1897, teaching theology, history of religions, and history of philosophy. From 1904 to 1914 he was professor of systematic theology at Göttingen, after which he became professor of theology at the University of Breslau. In 1917 he became professor of systematic theology at the University of Marburg and for one year (1926–27) served as rector of the university. He retired from his university post in 1929. Otto was a liberal and progressive member of the Prussian Parliament from 1913 to 1918 and a member of the Constituent Chamber in 1918, and he participated widely in Christian ecumenical activities.

Otto's study of the life and thought of MARTIN LUTHER prompted his concern to elucidate the distinctive character of the religious interpretation of the world, reflected in his first book, Die Anschauung vom heiligen Geiste bei Luther (1898; "The Perception of the Holy Spirit by Luther"). He was to expand his inquiry in his book, Naturalistische und religiöse Weltansicht (1904; Naturalism and Religion), in which he contrasted the naturalistic and the religious ways of interpreting the world and raised the question of whether their contradictions can be or should be reconciled. The sciences and the religious interpretation, he insisted, are to be heeded for what they purport to disclose concerning the world in which we live. Otto's principal concern, however, was to justify what the religious interpretation of the world conveys as a distinctive dimension of understanding beyond the discoveries of the sciences. In Kantische-Fries'sche Religionsphilosophie (1909; The Philosophy of Religion Based on Kant and Fries), a discussion of the religious thought of the German philosophers Immanuel Kant and Jacob Friedrich Fries, he sought to specify the kind of rationality that is appropriate to religious inquiry.

During 1911–12 Otto visited North Africa, Egypt, and Palestine, continued to India, China, and Japan, and returned by way of the United States. His travels turned him to an exploration of religious experience among various religions of the world. He was well equipped for such an exploration; in addition to being at home with the languages of Near Eastern religions, he had mastered Sanskrit sufficiently to translate many ancient Hindu texts into German as well as to write several volumes comparing Indian and Christian religious thought.

Initially in his studies Otto gave particular attention to the thought of the German Protestant theologian FRIEDRICH SCHLEIERMACHER. Schleiermacher perceived religion as a unique feeling or awareness, distinct from ethical and rational modes of perception, though not exclusive of them. Schleiermacher was later to speak of this feeling as one of "absolute dependence." At first impressed by this formulation, Otto later criticized it on the grounds that what Schleiermacher had pointed to was merely a close analogy with ordinary, or "natural," feelings of dependence. For "absolute dependence" Otto substituted "creature-feeling," a feeling which points to some object outside of the self. Otto called this object "the numinous" or "Wholly Other"—i.e., that which utterly transcends the mundane sphere, roughly equivalent to "supernatural" and "transcendent" in traditional usage.

In Das Heilige (1917; The Idea of the Holy) Otto sought to explore this idea of the numinous (from the Latin numen ["divine power," or "deity"]), which he considered to be the nonrational aspect of the religious dimension, the awe-inspiring element of religious experience that, Otto contended, evades precise verbal formulation. His concern was to attend to that elemental experience of apprehending the numinous itself. In such moments of apprehension, said Otto, "we are dealing with something for which there is only one appropriate expression, mysterium tremendum."

Although the mysterium, the form of the numinous experience, is beyond conception, it can be experienced in feelings that convey the qualitative content of the numinous experience. This content presents itself under two aspects: (1) that of "daunting awfulness and majesty," and (2) "as something uniquely attractive and fascinating." From the former comes the sense of the uncanny, of divine wrath and judgment; from the latter, the reassuring and heightening experiences of GRACE and divine love.

Otto took all religions seriously as occasions to experience the holy yet had much respect for their distinctive characteristics. He argued for a lively exchange between representatives of the various religions, in service of which he created the Religious Collection in Marburg, including religious symbols, rituals, and apparatus from around the world.

OUIJA BOARD \ˈwɛ-jə, -jɛ\, in OCCULTISM, device ostensibly used for obtaining messages from the spirit world, usually employed by a medium during a SÉANCE. The name derives from the French and German words for "yes" (oui and ja). The Ouija board consists of an oblong piece of wood with letters of the alphabet inscribed along its longer edge in a wide half-moon. On top of this is placed a much smaller, heart-shaped board, or planchette, mounted on casters, which enable it to slide freely.

Each participant lightly places a finger on the planchette, which then slides about because of the resultant pressure. The letters pointed out by the apex of the board may in some instances spell out words or even sentences. In the late 19th century, when the Ouija board was a popular pastime, it was fashionable to ascribe such happenings to spirits; more recent opinion is skeptical.

OURANIA \ü-ˈrā-nē-ə\, also spelled Urania \yü-\, in GREEK RELIGION, one of the nine MUSES, patron of astronomy. In some accounts she was the mother of LINUS the musician (in other versions, his mother is the Muse CALLIOPE); the father was either HERMES or Amphimarus, son of POSEIDON. Her attributes were the globe and compass.

OURANUS \ˈür-ə-nəs, ü-ˈrā-\, also spelled Uranus \ˈyür-ə-nəs, yü-ˈrā-\, in Greek mythology, the personification of heaven. According to Hesiod's Theogony, GAEA, emerging from primeval CHAOS, produced Ouranus, the Mountains, and the Sea. From Gaea's union with Ouranus were born the TITANS, the Cyclopes, and the Hecatoncheires.

Ouranus hated his offspring and hid them in Gaea's body. She appealed to them for vengeance, but CRONUS alone responded. With the harpē (a scythe) Cronus castrated Ouranus as he approached Gaea. From the drops of Ouranus' blood that fell on Earth were born the FURIES, the GIANTS, and the Meliai (ash-tree NYMPHS). The severed genitals floated on the sea, producing a white foam, from which sprang the goddess APHRODITE. Cronus by his action had separated Heaven and Earth. Ouranus also had other consorts: HESTIA, NYX, Hemera, and Clymene.

The story of the castration of Ouranus bears a close resemblance to the Hittite myth of Kumarbi.

OUROBOROS \ü-ˈrā-bə-rəs\, emblematic serpent of ancient Egypt and Greece represented with its tail in its mouth continually devouring itself and being reborn. A Gnostic and alchemical symbol, Ouroboros expresses the unity of all things, material and spiritual, which perpetually change form in an eternal cycle of destruction and re-creation.

In the 19th century, a vision of Ouroboros gave the German chemist Friedrich August Kekule von Stradonitz the idea of linked carbon atoms forming the benzene ring.

OXFORD MOVEMENT \ˈäks-fərd\, 19th-century movement centered at the University of Oxford that sought a renewal of ROMAN CATHOLIC thought and practice within the Church of England (see ANGLICAN COMMUNION) in opposition to the church's Protestant tendencies. From 1828 to 1832, laws that required members of municipal corporations and government-office holders to receive the EUCHARIST in the Church of England were repealed, and a law was passed that removed most of the restrictions formerly imposed on Roman Catholics. For a short time it seemed possible that the Church of England might be disestablished and that it might lose its endowments. Consequently, many loyal Anglicans wished to assert that the Church of England was not dependent on the state and that it gained its authority from the fact that it taught Christian truth and its bishops were able to trace their authority and office back in an unbroken line to the APOSTLES. The movement rapidly became involved in theological, pastoral, and devotional problems.

Leaders of the movement were JOHN HENRY NEWMAN (1801–90), a clergyman and subsequently a convert to Roman Catholicism and a cardinal; Richard Hurrell Froude (1803–36), a clergyman; John Keble (1792–1866), a clergyman and poet; and Edward Pusey (1800–82), a clergyman and professor at Oxford.

The ideas of the movement were published in 90 Tracts for the Times (1833–41), 24 of which were written by Newman, who edited the entire series. The Tractarians asserted the doctrinal authority of the Catholic church to be absolute, and by "catholic" they understood that which was faithful to the teaching of the early and undivided church. They believed the Church of England to be such a church.

The movement gradually spread its influence throughout the Church of England. Some of the results were increased use of ceremony and ritual in church worship, the establishment of Anglican monastic communities for men and for women, and better-educated clergy who were more concerned with pastoral care of their church members.

PACHACAMAC

PACHACAMAC \pə-'chä-kä,-mäk\, creator deity who, along with his consort Pachama-ma (Mother of the Earth), was worshiped by the pre-Inca maritime population of Peru; it was also the name of a PILGRIMAGE site in the Lurín Valley (south of Lima) dedicated to the god. Pachacamac was believed to be a god of fire and a son of the sun god; he rejuvenated the world originally created by the god VIRACOCHA and taught men the crafts. Pachacamac was also believed to be invisible and thus was never represented in art. After the INCAS conquered the coast, they incorporated Pachacamac into their own pantheon.

The ruins of the shrine in the Lurín Valley include several PYRAMIDS and TEMPLES and are partially restored.

PACHACUTI INCA YUPANQUI \,pä-chä-'kü-tē-'iŋ-kə-yü-'päŋ-kē\, also called Pachacutec \,pä-chä-'kü-tek\ (fl. 15th century), INCA emperor (1438–71), an empire builder who, because he initiated the swift, far-ranging expansion of the Inca state, has been likened to Philip II of Macedonia. (Similarly, his son Topa Inca Yupanqui is regarded as a counterpart of Philip's son Alexander III the Great.)

Pachacuti first conquered various peoples in what is now southern Peru and then extended his power northwesterly to Quito, Ecuador. He is said to have devised the city plan adopted for his capital, Cuzco (in present southern Peru).

PACHOMIUS, SAINT \pə-'kō-mē-əs\ (b. c. 290, probably in Upper Egypt—d. 346; feast day May 9), founder of Christian CENOBITIC MONASTICISM, whose rule for monks is the earliest extant.

Pachomius encountered Coptic CHRISTIANITY among his cohorts in the Roman emperor Constantine's North African army and, on leaving the military about 314, withdrew alone into the wilderness at Chenoboskion, near his Theban home. Soon after, he joined the HERMIT Palemon and a colony of anchorites in the same area at Tabennisi, on the east bank of the Nile River. Pachomius built the first monastic enclosure, replacing the scattered hermits' shelters, and he drew up a common daily program providing for proportioned periods of work and prayer patterned around a cooperative economic and disciplinary regimen.

This rule was the first instance in Christian monastic history of the use of a cenobitic, or uniform communal, habit as the norm, the first departure from the individualistic, exclusively CONTEMPLATIVE practice that had previously characterized religious life. Pachomius, moreover, instituted a monarchic structure that saw the religious superior's authority over the community as symbolic of God's evoking a response from man as he strives to overcome his egoism by self-denial and CHARITY. By the time he died, Pachomius had founded 11 monasteries, numbering more than 7,000 monks and nuns.

Though none of Pachomius' manuscripts has survived, his life and bibliography have been preserved by the 5th-century historian Palladius in his Lausiac History. The Rule of Pachomius is extant only in the early-5th-century Latin translation of ST. JEROME.

PADMASAMBHAVA \'pəd-mə-'səm-bə-və\, also called Guru Rin-po-che \-'rim-bō-chā\, Tibetan Slob-dpon \'lō-bōn\ ("Teacher"), or Padma-'byung-gnas \'bā-mä-'jün-nā\ ("Lotus Born") (fl. 8th century), legendary Indian Buddhist mystic who introduced VAJRAYĀNA (Tantric) BUDDHISM to Tibet.

Padmasambhava's background is a matter of controversy, though Tibetan sources suggest that he was a native of Udyāna (now in Pakistan). He was supposedly invited to come to Tibet by King Khri-srong-lde-brtsan (reigned 755–797) in the 8th century CE. In Tibet Padmasambhava is credited with quelling the local DEMONS, with helping to establish Bsam-yas, the nation's first Buddhist monastery, and with writing, translating, and lecturing on a number of important texts. The Tibetan Buddhist sect RNYING-MA-PA claims to follow his teachings most closely, emphasizing Vajrayāna ritual, worship, and YOGA. Texts basic to Rnying-ma-pa teachings that were said to have been buried by Padmasambhava, began to be found about 1125. He became an important figure in a number of Tibetan rituals concerned with the establishment and maintenance of Buddhism in Tibet.

PAGAN \'pā-gən\ (from Latin: paganus, "villager"), term often used as a synonym for "primitive," "uncivilized," or "heathen." It has been used primarily as a derogatory term and applied to those who followed polytheistic traditions rather than a monotheistic religion such as JUDAISM or CHRISTIANITY.

PAGAN \pə-'gän\, site of the old capital city of the kingdom of Pagan (now in Myanmar) and PILGRIMAGE center containing ancient Buddhist shrines, some of which have been restored and are in current use. Ruins of other shrines and PAGODAS cover a wide area. (An earthquake on July 8, 1975, severely damaged more than half the important structures, irreparably destroying many of them.)

Pagan's importance lies primarily in its heritage. It was probably first established in 849 CE, and, from the 11th century to the end of the 13th, it was the capital of a region roughly the size of modern Myanmar. Old Pagan was a walled city that probably originally contained only royal, aristocratic, religious, and administrative buildings. (The populace is thought to have lived outside the city walls.) The city, whose moats were fed by the Irrawaddy River, was thus a sacred dynastic fortress. The earliest surviving structure in the city is probably the 10th-century Nat Hlaung Gyaung. The shrines that stand by the Sarabha Gate in the eastern wall, although they are later than the wall they adjoin, are also of early date. These are shrines of protecting NATS—the traditional spirit deities of the ethnic Burmans.

Between about 500 and 950, people of the Burman ethnic group had been infiltrating a southern region occupied by other peoples who had already appropriated some aspects of Indian religion, including many forms of BUDDHISM. Under King Anawrahta (reigned 1044–77), the ethnic Burmans finally conquered the other peoples of the region, including a people called the Mon, who were previously dominant in the south. In 1056 they transported the Mon royal family, Mon scholars and monks committed to the THERAVĀDA (Pāli) form of Buddhism, and Mon craftsmen to Pagan, where the Theravāda tradition received royal support. This initiated the period of Pagan's greatest achievements in the largely overlapping areas of politics, economics, religion, architecture, and art. The enormous number of monasteries and shrines built and maintained during the next 200 years was made possible both by great wealth and by large numbers of slaves, skilled and unskilled, whose working lives were dedicated to the support of each institution. The city became one of the most important centers of Buddhist learning.

Lesser buildings are grouped around the more important pagodas and temples. Scattered around these are smaller pagodas and buildings, some of which may once have been aristocratic palaces and pavilions later adapted to monastic uses—e.g., as libraries and preaching halls. All are based on Indian prototypes, modified during subsequent development by the Mon. The principal architectural form in Pagan is the STUPA, a tall bell-shaped dome, designed originally to contain near its apex the sacred relics of the Buddha or of Buddhist saints. Another prominent structural type is the high, terraced plinth (subbase) that symbolizes a sacred mountain. Many buildings, especially those that have been left undisturbed, bear substantial remnants of external stucco and terra-cotta decorations and internal paintings and terra-cottas that recount Buddhist legends and history.

Anawrahta oversaw construction of the Shwezigon Pagoda, along with a nearby shrine filled with images of nats. The Shwezigon is a huge, terraced pyramid; square below and circular above, it is crowned by a bell-shaped stupa of traditional Mon shape and adorned with stairways, gates, and decorative spires. It is much revered and famous for its huge golden umbrella finial encrusted with jewels. (It was one of the structures damaged in the earthquake of 1975.) Also revered are the late 12th-century Mahābodhi Temple, which was built as a copy of the temple at the site of the Buddha's Enlightenment at BODH GAYĀ, and the Ananda Temple just beyond the east gate, founded in 1091 during the reign of King Kyanzittha. By the time the Thatpyinnyu Temple was built (1144), Mon influence was waning, and a Burman style of architecture had evolved. Thatpyinnyu has four stories and resembles a two-staged PYRAMID. Its interior rooms are spacious halls, rather than sparsely lit openings within a mountain mass as in the earlier style. This building functioned as stupa, temple, and monastery. The Burman style was further developed in the great Sulamani Temple and culminated in the Gawdawpalin Temple (late 12th century). The latter, which was dedicated to the ancestral spirits of the dynasty, had an exterior dotted with miniature pagodas and an interior decorated with lavishly colored ornamentation.

PA-HSIEN \ˈbä-ˈshyen\, Pinyin Baxian, English Eight Immortals, in TAOISM, a group of saints, each of whom earned the right to immortality and had free access to the Peach Festival of HSI-WANG-MU, Queen Mother of the West. The eight are frequently depicted as a group. In Chinese art they sometimes also stand alone or appear in smaller groups. They are often associated with symbolic objects.

PAI-YÜN KUAN \bī-'ywen-'gwän, -'ywän-\, Pinyin Baiyun-guan (Chinese: “White Cloud Temple”), major Taoist temple in Beijing, which was traditionally the center of the Lung-men subset of the Ch'üan-chen, or Perfect Realization, school of TAOISM. Today it is the center of the state-controlled Taoist Association and is both a religious and a tourist attraction in Beijing.

PALAMAS, SAINT GREGORY \pā-lä-'mäs\ (b. Nov. 11/14, 1296, Constantinople [now Istanbul, Tur.]—d. 1359, Thessalonica, Byzantine Empire [now in Greece]; canonized 1368), Orthodox monk, theologian, and intellectual leader of HESYCHASM (from the Greek word hēsychia, or “state of quiet”), an ascetical method of mystical prayer. Though controversial in Palamas' time, Hesychast spirituality is now sanctioned by the Orthodox church as a legitimate form of prayer.

Born of a distinguished family with ties to the imperial court, Palamas became a monk in 1316 at Mount Athos, the spiritual center of Greek Orthodoxy. For 25 years he immersed himself in study and reflection on the SCRIPTURES and the writings of the CHURCH FATHERS. He was introduced to CONTEMPLATIVE prayer by a spiritual master and in turn became a master for other initiates. Raids by the Turks about 1325 forced him to flee. He was ordained a priest in 1326 and later, with 10 companions, retired to a hermitage in Macedonia. He returned to Mount Athos in 1331 to the community of St. Sabas and about 1335 was chosen a religious superior (hēgoumenos) of a neighboring CONVENT. Because of differences with the monks who considered his spiritual regimen too strict, he resigned after a short term and returned to St. Sabas.

Beginning in 1332 Palamas entered into a lengthy theological dispute with a series of Greek and Latin scholastic theologians and certain rationalistic humanists. His first adversary was Barlaam the Calabrian, a Greek monk who denied that any rational concepts could express mystical prayer and its divine-human communication even metaphorically. Subsequently, Barlaam composed a satirical work defaming Hesychasm. Palamas responded to this attack by composing his “Apology for the Holy Hesychasts” (1338), also called the “Triad” because of its division into three parts.

The “Apology” established the theological basis for mystical experience that involves not only the human spirit but the entire human person, body and soul. Hesychast spirituality strove to bridge the gulf between human and divine existence. Hesychast prayer aspires to attain the most intense form of God-human communion in the form of a vision of the “divine light,” or “uncreated energy,” analogous to the Gospel account of Christ's Transfiguration on Mount Tabor, as noted in Matthew 16:17 and Mark 8:9. The corporeal disposition for this contemplative state involves intense concentration and a methodical invocation of the name of Jesus (the Hesychastic “Jesus prayer”).

After a succession of public confrontations with critics, and a politically motivated EXCOMMUNICATION in 1344, Palamas had his teaching systematized in the Hagioritic Tome (“The Book of Holiness”), which became the fundamental textbook for Byzantine MYSTICISM. The Hesychast controversy became part of a larger Byzantine political struggle that erupted in civil war. At its conclusion in 1347, Palamas, with support from the conservative, anti-Zealot party, was appointed bishop of Thessalonica.

In his fusion of Platonic and Aristotelian philosophy, used as a vehicle to express his own spiritual experience, Palamas set a definitive standard for Orthodox theological acumen. At the provincial COUNCIL OF CONSTANTINOPLE in 1368, nine years after his death, he was acclaimed a saint and titled “Father and Doctor of the Orthodox Church,” thus placing him among the ranks of those who determined the ideological shape of the Eastern church.

PALAMEDES \pa-lə-'mē-dēz\, in Greek mythology, son of Nauplius, king of Euboea, and a hero of the Trojan War. Before the war he exposed the trickery of Odysseus—who had feigned madness to avoid military service—by placing the infant TELEMACHUS in the path of Odysseus' plow in the field and forcing him to reveal his sanity.

During the siege of Troy, Palamedes alternated with two other Greek heroes, ODYSSEUS and DIOMEDES, in leading the army in the field, but his ability aroused their envy. In one version the other two drowned Palamedes while fishing or persuaded him to seek treasure in a well, which they thereupon filled with stones. In another AGAMEMNON, Diomedes, and Odysseus had an agent steal into his tent and conceal a letter that contained money and purported to come from King PRIAM. They then accused Palamedes of treason, and he was stoned to death.

Palamedes had a reputation for sagacity, and a number of inventions were attributed to him, including the alphabet, numbers, weights and measures, coinage, and the practice of eating at regular intervals.

PALE (from Latin: palus, “stake”), district separated from the surrounding country by defined boundaries or distinguished by a different administrative and legal system. It is this definition of pale from which the phrase “beyond the pale” is derived.

In imperial Russia, what came to be called the Pale of Settlement (Cherta Osedlosti) came into being as a result of the introduction of large numbers of Jews into the Russian sphere after the three partitions of Poland (1772, 1793, 1795). Russian leadership responded to the difficulty of adjusting to a population that had often been banned from the country altogether by allowing Jews to remain in their current areas of residence and by permitting their settlement in areas of the Black Sea littoral annexed from Turkey, where they could serve as colonists. In three decrees issued in 1783, 1791, and 1794, Catherine II the Great restricted the commercial rights of Jews to those areas newly annexed. In ensuing years, this area became a strictly defined pale, as legal restrictions increasingly proscribed Jewish settlement elsewhere in Russia.

By the 19th century the pale included all of Russian Poland, Lithuania, Belarus (Belorussia), most of Ukraine, the Crimean Peninsula, and Bessarabia. During the 1860s some merchants and artisans, those with higher educations, and those who had completed their military service were allowed to settle anywhere but in Finland. A period of reaction, however, arrived with the ascension of Tsar Alexander III in 1881, who promulgated the “Temporary Laws,” which, among many regressive measures, prohibited further Jewish settlements outside the pale; and Christians within the pale were allowed to expel Jews from their areas. Occasionally, new areas were proscribed, such as the city and province of Moscow in 1891.

The census of 1897 indicated that most Jews remained confined to the pale; almost 5,000,000 lived within it; only about 200,000 lived elsewhere in European Russia. The pale ceased to exist during World War I, when Jews in great numbers fled to the interior to escape the invading Germans. The Provisional Government formally abolished it in April 1917.

PALESTINIAN TALMUD \tāl-'müd; 'täl-,müd, 'tal-məd\; see YERUSHALMI.

PALI TEXT SOCIETY, organization founded with the intention of editing and publishing the texts of the THERAVĀDA canon and its commentaries, as well as producing English translations of many of those texts for an audience of scholars and interested readers. The Pali Text Society (PTS) was established by T.W. Rhys Davids in 1881. The output of the PTS in its early decades was plentiful, issuing editions of dozens of texts by the end of the 19th century. Rhys Davids was succeeded as president by his wife, Caroline, after his death in 1922.

In 1959 I.B. Horner was elected president of the PTS. Horner had worked and produced editions for the PTS since 1942, and the era in which she was president was especially productive and prosperous. Under her leadership the society produced revised editions of older PTS editions that were in need of correction or in need of new translations, and the society also produced editions of other, formerly neglected Pāli texts. Horner died in April 1981. Also in 1981, during its centenary anniversary year, the society completed the reissuing (in eight volumes) of the first issues of the Journal of the Pali Text Society. The society continues to produce issues of the journal periodically as material and resources permit.

In addition to its editions and translations of Pāli primary texts, the PTS has produced introductory works for students on Pāli language and meter, and compiled a Pāli-English dictionary, as well as commencing work on other scholarly volumes, such as the Pāli Tipiṭakam Concordance, intended to serve as an aid to researchers in their work in Theravāda Buddhist studies.

PALLADIUM \pə-'lā-dē-əm\, in GREEK RELIGION, image of the goddess Pallas (ATHENA), especially the archaic wooden statue of the goddess that was preserved in the citadel of Troy. As long as the statue was kept safe within Troy, it was believed, the city could not be conquered. It was said that ZEUS had thrown the statue down from heaven when Troy was founded, and that ODYSSEUS and DIOMEDES carried it off from the temple of Athena there, thus making the capture of Troy by the Greeks possible. Many cities in Greece and Italy claimed to possess the genuine Trojan Palladium, but it was particularly identified with the statue in the shrine of the goddess VESTA at Rome; it had supposedly been brought to Italy by the Trojan hero AENEAS. The story of its fall from heaven perhaps signifies that the Palladium was originally a BAETYLUS, or sacred stone.

PALM SUNDAY, also called Passion Sunday, in the Christian tradition, first day of HOLY WEEK and the Sunday before EASTER, commemorating JESUS CHRIST's triumphal entry into Jerusalem. It is associated in the ROMAN CATHOLIC church (and others) with the blessing and PROCESSION of palms (leaves of the date palm or twigs from locally available trees). These special ceremonies were taking place toward the end of the 4th century in Jerusalem. In the West the earliest evidence of the ceremonies is found in the Bobbio Sacramentary (8th century). During the Middle Ages the ceremony for the blessing of the palms was elaborate: the procession began in one church, went to a church in which the palms were blessed, and returned to the church in which the procession had originated for the singing of the account of the Passion of Christ (Matthew 26:36–27:54). After reforms of the Roman Catholic liturgies in 1955 and 1969, the ceremonies were simplified in order to emphasize the suffering and death of Christ. The day is now called officially Passion Sunday; the liturgy begins with a blessing and procession of palms, but prime attention is given to a lengthy reading of the Passion, with parts taken by the priest, lectors, and the congregation.

In the Byzantine liturgy the EUCHARIST on Palm Sunday is followed by a procession in which the priest carries the ICON representing the events being commemorated. In the churches of the ANGLICAN COMMUNION some traditional ceremonies were revived in the 19th century, but in most Protestant churches the day is celebrated without ceremonies.

ly (though erroneously) supposed in antiquity to be connected with pan ("all"). His father was usually said to be HERMES, but, because his mother was often named PENELOPE, one or another of the characters in the Odyssey was sometimes called his father. A fertility deity, Pan was generally represented as a lustful figure having the horns, legs, and the ears of a goat; in later art the human parts of his form were much more emphasized. He haunted the hills, and his chief concern was with flocks and herds. Hence he can make humans, like cattle, stampede in "panic." Like a shepherd, he was a piper and he rested at noon. Pan was insignificant in literature, aside from Hellenistic bucolic literature, but he was a very common subject in ancient art.

PANATHENAEA \,pɑ-nə-thə-'nē-ə\, in GREEK RELIGION, annual Athenian festival of great antiquity and importance. It was eventually celebrated every fourth year, probably in deliberate rivalry to the Olympic Games. The festival consisted solely of the sacrifices and rites proper to the season (mid-August) in the cult of ATHENA. At the Great Panathenaea, representatives of all the dependencies of Athens were present, bringing sacrificial animals. After the presentation of a new embroidered robe to Athena, the sacrifice of several animals was offered. The great PROCESSION, made up of the heroes of Marathon, is the subject of the frieze of the PARTHENON. The Athenian statesman Pericles (c. 495–429 BCE) introduced a regular musical contest in place of the recitation of rhapsodies (portions of epic poems), which were a long-standing accompaniment of the festival.

In addition to major athletic contests, many of which were not included at OLYMPIA, several minor contests also were held between the Athenian tribes.

PAÑCARĀTRA \,pān-chə-'rā-trə\, early Hindu religious movement whose members worshiped the deified sage Nārāyaṇa (who came to be identified with VISHNU) and, in merger with the BHĀGAVATA sect, formed the earliest sectarian movement within HINDUISM. The new group was a forerunner of modern VAISNAVISM.

The Pāñcarātras originated in the Himalayan region perhaps in the 3rd century BCE. The sect's name is attributed to a "five-night" sacrifice (pañca-rātra) performed by Nārāyaṇa by which he obtained superiority over all beings and became all beings.

The Pāñcarātra doctrine was first systematized by Śāṅḍilya (c. 100? CE); that the Pāñcarātra system was also known in South India is evident from 2nd-century-CE inscriptions. By the 10th century the sect had acquired sufficient popularity to influence other groups.

PAÑCHEN LAMA \'pān-chən-'lā-mə\, in Tibetan BUDDHISM, title traditionally given to head ABBOTS of the Tashilhunpo Monastery, near Zhikatsé in Tibet. Pañchen is a short form of the Sanskrit-Tibetan Paṅḍita Chen-po, or "Great Scholar," suggesting the original nature of the position.

In the 17th century the fifth DALAI LAMA declared that his tutor, Blo-bzang chos-kyi-rgyal-mtshan (1570–1662), who was the current Pañchen Lama, would be reincarnated in a child. He thus became the first of the line of reincarnated lamas, who were each regarded as physical manifestations of the self-born Buddha, AMITĀBHA. (Sometimes the three lamas who preceded Blo-bzang chos-kyi-rgyal-mtshan as abbots are also included in the list of REINCARNATIONS.)

Disagreements between the government of the 13th Dalai Lama and the Tashilhunpo administration over tax arrears led to the Pañchen Lama's flight to China in 1923. Bskal-bzang Tshé-brtan, a boy born of Tibetan parents in the Chinese province of Tsinghai about 1938, was recognized as his successor by the Chinese government, but without the usual exacting tests that determine the authenticity of the transmission through reincarnation. He was brought to Tibet in 1952 under military escort and enthroned as head abbot of Tashilhunpo. The Pañchen Lama remained in Tibet in 1959 after the anti-Chinese revolt and the Dalai Lama's flight into exile. However, his refusal to denounce the Dalai Lama as a traitor brought him into disfavor with the Chinese government and resulted in his imprisonment in Beijing in 1964. He was released in the late 1970s and died in 1989.

PANDARUS \'pan-də-rəs\, in Greek mythology, son of LYCAON, a Lycian. In Homer's Iliad, Pandarus broke the truce between the Trojans and the Greeks by treacherously wounding Menelaus; he was finally slain by DIOMEDES.

PĀNDAVAS \ˈpān-də-vəz\, in the Sanskrit epic MAHĀBHĀRATA, five sons of the king Pāṇḍu who were victorious in the great war with their cousins, the Kauravas.

PANDHARPUR \ˈpən-dər-pūr\, village, southern Maharashtra state, western India. Lying along the Bhīma or Candrabhāgā River, it is host to annual festivals that honor the deities Viṭhobā (or Viṭthal), who is associated with KRISHNA and his consort Rukmiṇī. The main temple of Viṭhobā and Rukmiṇī was built in the 12th century by the Yādavas of Devagiri. It becomes the destination for more than 100,000 pilgrims from all over Maharashtra during the summer Vārkarī festival, which culminates on the 11th day of the waxing half of the lunar month Āṣāḍh. Various CASTE and regional groups converge on Pandharpur carrying palanquins with images of the sandals of Viṭhobā's most storied devotees, some of whom thereby retrace the PILGRIMAGE to Pandharpur as they are remembered to have made it in their own lives. These BHAKTI poet-saints include JĀNEŚVAR, Muktabāi, NĀMDEV, and TUKĀRĀM. The PROCESSION gives religious definition to Maharashtra as a region, and the performance of the saints' songs, which accompanies it, celebrates Marathi as a language of BHAKTI.

PANDORA \pan-ˈdɔr-ə\ (Greek Pandōra, "All-gifts," or "All-giving"), in Greek mythology, the first woman. After PROMETHEUS, a trickster, had stolen fire from heaven and bestowed it upon mortals, ZEUS determined to counteract this blessing by commissioning HEPHAESTUS to fashion a woman out of earth, upon whom the gods bestowed their choicest gifts. She had or found a jar—the so-called Pandora's box—containing all manner of misery and evil. Zeus sent her to Epimetheus, who forgot the warning of his brother Prometheus and made her his wife. Pandora afterward opened the jar, from which the evils flew out over the earth. According to another version, Hope alone remained inside, the lid having been shut down before she could escape. In a later story the jar contained not evils but blessings, which would have been preserved had they not been lost through the opening of the jar out of curiosity.

PANEGYRIS \pə-ˈne-jə-ris, -ˈnē-\, also spelled Panegyry \-rē\, Greek Panēgyris ("Gathering"), plural Panēgyreis, in GREEK RELIGION, an assembly that met on certain fixed dates for the purpose of honoring a specific god. The gatherings varied in size from the inhabitants of a single town to great national meetings, such as the Olympic Games. The meetings centered around prayers, feasts, and processions, though the amusements, games, fairs, and festive orations (panegyrics) that also occurred at the gatherings were far more popular.

PAN KU \ˈpān-ˈgü\, Pinyin Ban Gu, central figure in popular Chinese CREATION MYTHS. Pan Ku, the first man, is said to have come forth from a primal egg, with two horns, two tusks, and a hairy body. Some accounts credit him with the separation of heaven and earth, setting the sun, moon, stars, and planets in place, and dividing the four seas. He shaped the earth by chiselling out valleys and stacking up mountains.

Others assert that the universe derived from Pan Ku's corpse. His eyes became the sun and moon, his blood and sweat formed rivers, his hair grew into trees and plants, and his body became soil. The human race evolved from parasites that infested Pan Ku's body.

PANTHEISM \ˈpan-thē-i-zəm\, doctrine that the universe conceived of as a whole is God and, conversely, that there is no God but the combined substance, forces, and laws that are manifested in the existing universe. The cognate doctrine of pantheism asserts that God includes the universe as a part though not the whole of his being.

The adjective pantheist was coined by John Toland in his book Socinianism Truly Stated (1705). The noun pantheism was first used a few years later by one of Toland's opponents. K.C.F. Krause introduced the term pantheism in 1828 as a designation for his own philosophy. Both of these terms have since been applied to aspects of numerous philosophical traditions, both Eastern and Western.

There are several types of pantheism, ranging from the attribution of consciousness to nature as a whole (panpsychism) to the interpretation of the world as merely an appearance and ultimately unreal (acosmic pantheism), and from the rational Neoplatonic, or emanationistic, strain to the intuitive, mystical strain. Pantheism of one form or another is deeply rooted in the VEDAS, the UPANISHADS, and the BHAGAVAD GĪTĀ. Numerous Greek philosophers, notably Xenophanes, Heraclitus, Anaxagoras, Plato, Plotinus, and the proponents of Stoicism, contributed to the foundations of Western pantheism. Through NEOPLATONISM and Judeo-Christian MYSTICISM, the tradition was continued in the medieval and Renaissance periods by John Scotus Erigena, MEISTER ECKHART, NICHOLAS OF CUSA, Giordano Bruno, and JAKOB BÖHME.

The Jewish rationalist Benedict Spinoza (1632–77) formulated the most thoroughly pantheistic system, insisting that there could be by definition only one unlimited substance possessing an infinitude of attributes. Therefore, God and Nature are but two names for one identical reality; otherwise, God-and-world would be a greater totality than God alone. The necessity of God thus implies the necessity of the world. Pantheism has traditionally been rejected by orthodox Christian theologians because it is interpreted to obliterate the distinction between the creator and creation, to make God impersonal, to imply a purely immanent rather than transcendent deity, and to exclude human and divine freedom.

Pantheism constitutes a middle way between the denial of individual freedom and creativity that characterizes many varieties of pantheism and the remoteness of the divine that characterizes classical THEISM. Though elements of quasi-pantheism reach as far back as Plato's Laws, it is in 19th-century German Idealism (Johann Gottlieb Fichte, Friedrich Wilhelm Joseph von Schelling, G.W.F. Hegel) and 20th-century process philosophy (Alfred North Whitehead) that the doctrine receives systematic elaboration. Charles Hartshorne, a follower of Whitehead, provided the definitive analysis of pantheism, based upon the analogy of an organism (God) comprising individual, semiautonomous cells (all known and unknown constituents of reality).

PAO \ˈbaʊ\, Pinyin bao (Chinese: "reciprocity," or "recompense"), generalized principle of Chinese social relations. It refers to the idea that each action necessarily elicits a reaction and that it is therefore necessary to establish a code of balanced interactions appropriate to particular social, natural, and cosmic circumstances. Primarily a system of debts and obligations (and coupled with the Buddhist karmic system), it is at the heart of Chinese popular morality.

PAO-CHÜAN \ˈbäu-ˈjwän\, Pinyin baojuan (Chinese: “sacred scrolls,” or “precious scriptures”), Chinese SCRIPTURES that are foundational narratives for schools of TAOISM, sects of BUDDHISM, and SECRET SOCIETIES. Written in the vernacular, they constitute a corpus of popular scripture distinct from the more orthodox Taoist and Buddhist texts, called ching. They are the source of the genre known as the SHAN-SHU, or “good books,” of popular morality.

PAO-P’U-TZU, Pinyin Baopuzi: see KO HUNG.

PAPACY, system of central government of the ROMAN CATHOLIC church, the largest of the three major branches of CHRISTIANITY, presided over by the POPE, the bishop of Rome.

The papal system developed over the centuries from the time of the early church to 1870, when the FIRST VATICAN COUNCIL officially defined the absolute primacy of the pope and his infallibility when pronouncing on “matters of faith and morals.” According to this definition the pope exercises judicial, legislative, and executive authority over the church as the direct successor of ST. PETER, who is thought to have been the head of the apostles and the first bishop of Rome. His authority rested on the words of Jesus quoted in Matthew 16:18–19 and elsewhere that have been interpreted as giving him authority in heaven and on earth in the place of Jesus.

There is a strong tradition, but no direct historical evidence, that St. Peter was the first leader of the church of Rome and that he was martyred there during a persecution of Christians (c. 67 CE). By the end of the 1st century, the see of Rome seems to have acquired a place of honor among the bishoprics claiming apostolic foundation because of Rome’s claim to the graves of both Peter and PAUL, its MARTYRS and its defense of what has triumphed as orthodoxy, and its status as the capital of the Roman Empire.

The Roman position was challenged in the middle of the 3rd century, when Pope Stephen I (reigned 254–257) and St. Cyprian, bishop of Carthage, clashed over Stephen’s claim to doctrinal authority over the universal church. In the 4th and 5th centuries, the growing power of Constantinople as the capital of the Eastern Empire challenged that of Rome. Although the Council of Chalcedon, called and largely directed by Emperor Marcian in 451, accorded the patriarch of Constantinople the same primacy in the East that the bishop of Rome held in the West, it acknowledged that Pope Leo I spoke (440–461) with the voice of Peter on matters of dogma, thus encouraging papal primacy. The link between Peter and the office of the pope was stressed by Gelasius I (492–496), the first pope to be called the “vicar of Christ.” In his “theory of the two swords,” Gelasius asserted that the pope embodied spiritual power while the emperor embodied temporal power. This position became an important part of medieval political theory.

During the next centuries of increasing political chaos, popes were often forced to trade their spiritual power for imperial protection. After the demise of effective Roman or Byzantine imperial control over Italy, the pope came to represent Roman imperial glory to the new Frankish and other German rulers. Stephen II (reigned 752–757) and other popes linked the fate of the Roman primacy to the support of Charlemagne and his house. Although the popes gained a measure of security from this relationship, they lost an equal measure of independence, because the Carolingians followed in the footsteps of their Byzantine and Roman predecessors by asserting control over the Frankish church and the papacy itself. On the other hand, the pope exercised influence in Carolingian affairs by maintaining the right to crown emperors and by intervening in political disputes.

The 11th century was a time of revolutionary change. Pope Leo IX (reigned 1049–54), whose attitudes had been shaped in the monastic reform movements of Burgundy and Lorraine, introduced reforms, including prohibitions against SIMONY and clerical marriage. One important measure was the election decree of 1059, which vested the right of naming a new pope exclusively with the CARDINALS, thus encouraging the independence of papal elections from then on. A significant point in the so-called GREGORIAN REFORM begun by Leo, and in the history of the papacy itself, was the INVESTITURE CONTROVERSY. This struggle between Pope Gregory VII (reigned 1073–85) and King Henry IV of Germany erupted when Henry claimed the long-standing royal right to invest ecclesiastical office holders with the symbols of their power, thereby maintaining control of the selection and direction of bishops. The proper order of Christendom was at stake. The papal position was elucidated in Gregory’s Dictatus Papae (1075), which emphasized the pope’s place as the highest authority in the church. Although Gregory was driven from Rome and died in exile, his ideals prevailed, as claims of sacral kingship and royal intervention in church affairs were seriously curtailed. Henry died under the ban of excommunication, and one of Gregory’s successors, URBAN II (1088–99), restored Rome’s prestige when he launched the First CRUSADE in 1095.

Later popes actively intervened in political affairs in an attempt to prove the validity of papal monarchy, rather than mere papal leadership, in Christian society. Papal monarchy reached its zenith in the pontificate of INNOCENT III, who reigned from 1198 to 1216. Thirteenth-century centralization of administrative as well as jurisdictional power in the CURIA (the body of officials surrounding the pope) led to increasing financial difficulties and eventually to the practice of “selling” benefices and other church services. This and other corruptions of the papal court, as well as the “Babylonian Captivity” of the papacy at Avignon, France (1309–77), resulted in both the conciliar movement, an attempt by bishops to regain control over the church, and loud calls for sacramental and organizational reform.

The Renaissance popes, most of whom were too involved in political and financial alliances to do more for the church than patronize the arts, were unable to deal with or to understand the significance of the Protestant REFORMATION of the 16th century. The papacy finally responded to the Protestants by calling the COUNCIL OF TRENT (1545), which instituted what has been called the COUNTER-REFORMATION, or the Catholic Reformation. The theological and ecclesiastical decisions of this council largely determined the shape of the Catholic church until the second half of the 20th century.

The alignment of the papacy with conservative political forces during the 19th century resulted in the loss of liberal and modernizing influences within the church and the loss of the Papal States to the new Kingdom of Italy. Divested of its temporal power, the papacy increasingly turned to its spiritual or teaching authority to retain control over Catholics, proclaiming the infallibility of the pope in matters of faith and morals and espousing the Ultramontane position (the idea that the pope is the absolute ruler of the church).

An unfavorable view of liberal ideas and modern culture was articulated by POPE PIUS IX in the Syllabus of Errors (1864). It persisted, even though the social ENCYCLICALS of several popes, beginning with Rerum Novarum of POPE LEO

XIII in 1891, aimed to align the papacy with the cause of social reform. The SECOND VATICAN COUNCIL, called by POPE JOHN XXIII in 1962, attempted to revitalize the church and opened it to reform, ecumenical dialogue, and increased participation of bishops, clergy, and laity. Many conservative Catholics, however, believed that the council went too far, especially in terminating the requirement of the Latin mass. Internationally, the papacy assumed a more dynamic role. Pope PAUL VI (1963–78) spoke out on a number of issues and traveled worldwide. JOHN PAUL II (1978–2005) traveled more than all the other popes combined, is credited with contributing to the collapse of communism in eastern Europe, canonized numerous new saints, and took great strides to establish dialogue with non-Christian faiths. However, he retained traditional positions on issues such as the ordination of women, clerical marriage, premarital sex, homosexuality, birth control, and abortion. In the 1990s the scandal arising from the church's handling of numerous cases of sexual abuse by priests prompted critics of the pope to question the wisdom of his stance on sexual issues. This controversy became part of a long-standing debate, joined by Catholics and non-Catholics alike, about whether the church had accommodated too much or too little to the secular, modern world. Despite this turmoil, as the church entered the 21st century the papacy continued to exercise its far-reaching spiritual leadership.

PAPAL INFALLIBILITY, ROMAN CATHOLIC doctrine that the pope, acting as supreme teacher and under certain conditions, cannot err when he teaches in matters of faith or morals. As part of the broader understanding of the infallibility of the church, this doctrine is based on the belief that the church has been entrusted with the teaching mission of JESUS CHRIST and that, in view of its mandate from Christ, it will remain faithful to that teaching through the assistance of the HOLY SPIRIT. As such, the doctrine is related to, but distinguishable from, the concept of indefectibility, or the doctrine that the GRACE that has been promised to the church assures its perseverance until the end of time.

The definition promulgated by the FIRST VATICAN COUNCIL (1869–70) states the conditions under which a pope may be said to have spoken infallibly, or ex cathedra ("from his chair" as supreme teacher). It is prerequisite that the pope intend to demand irrevocable assent from the entire church in some aspect of faith or morals. Despite the rarity of recourse to this claim, and despite the emphasis given to the authority of the bishops in the SECOND VATICAN COUNCIL (1962–65), the doctrine of infallibility remained a major obstacle to ecumenical endeavors in the late 20th century and was the subject of controversial discussion even among Roman Catholic theologians.

PAPYRUS COLUMN, in EGYPTIAN RELIGION, AMULET that conveyed youth and the continuance of life to its wearer. The amulet, made of glazed pottery or stone, was shaped like a papyrus plant. Its significance came from its ideographic value (Egyptian wadj, "green, fresh, vigorous"): just as the plant was vigorous and growing, so also would the wearer of the papyrus column possess these qualities.

PARABLE (from Greek: parabolē, "comparison," or "illustration"), short narrative by which moral or spiritual lessons are set forth. The term originally referred to a Greek rhetorical figure, an extended simile, involving the use of a literary illustration. The storytelling aspect of a parable is usually subordinated to the analogy it draws between a particular instance of human behavior and human behavior at large. The simple narratives of parables give them a mysterious tone and make them useful for the teaching of moral and spiritual truths.

There are parables in the OLD TESTAMENT (2 Samuel 12:1–9; 14:1–13), but the most famous parables are in the NEW TESTAMENT. Jesus uses them to illustrate his message to his followers by telling a fictitious story that is nevertheless true-to-life. Throughout Christian history, the parable has been a popular preaching device. The more paradoxical aspects of parables were revived in the 19th century through SØREN KIERKEGAARD's treatises on Christian faith and practice. His use of the form influenced the enigmatic works of Franz Kafka and the philosophical writings of Albert Camus.

PARADISE, place of exceptional happiness and delight. The term is used as a synonym for the GARDEN OF EDEN before the expulsion of ADAM AND EVE. An earthly paradise is often conceived of as existing in a time when heaven and earth were close together or touching, and when humans and gods had happy association. Many religions include the notion of life beyond the grave, a land in which there will be an absence of suffering and satisfaction of bodily desires. Accounts of a primordial earthly paradise range from that of a garden of life (JUDAISM, CHRISTIANITY, ISLAM) to that of a golden age of human society at the beginning of each cycle of human existence (BUDDHISM, HINDUISM). A final state of bliss is conceived of as a heavenly afterlife (Islam, Christianity), union with the divine (Hinduism), or an eternal condition of peace and changelessness (Buddhism).

PARAMĀRTHA \pär-ə-'mär-tə\ (b. 499—d. 569), Indian Buddhist missionary and translator whose arrival in China in 546 was important in the development of Chinese BUDDHISM. The teachings of the consciousness-oriented YOGĀCĀRA school of thought became known in China through the work of Paramārtha; he is credited with the translation of more than 60 Buddhist texts, including the Mahāyāna-saṃgraha, the Viṃśatikā, and the Madhyāntavibhāga-śāstra. These translations facilitated the development of the FA-HSIANG school.

PĀRAMITĀ \pär-ə-mē-'tä\, in MAHĀYĀNA Buddhism, any of the perfections, or transcendental virtues, practiced by BODHISATTVAS ("buddhas-to-be") in advanced stages of the path toward Enlightenment. The virtues are generosity (dāna-pāramitā), morality (śīla-pāramitā), perseverance (kṣānti-pāramitā), vigor (vīrya-pāramitā), meditation (dhyāna-pāramitā), and wisdom (prajñā-pāramitā). Some lists expand the number of virtues to 10, adding skill at helping others (upāya [kauśalya]-*pāramitā*s), profound resolution to attain Enlightenment (prañidhāna-pāramitā), perfection of the 10 powers (bala-pāramitā), and practice of transcendent knowledge (jñāna-pāramitā).

PARAŚURĀMA \pə-rə-shū-'rā-mə\ (Sanskrit: "Rāma with the Ax"), sixth of the 10 avatāras (incarnations) of the Hindu god VISHNU. The MAHĀBHĀRATA and the PURĀṆAS record that Paraśurāma was born to the BRAHMAN sage Jamadagni in order to deliver the world from the arrogant oppression of the KṢĀTRIYAS (warriors and kings). He killed all the male Kṣatriyas on earth 21 successive times (each time their wives survived and gave birth to new generations) and filled five lakes with blood. Paraśurāma is the traditional founder of Malabar and is said to have bestowed land there PARENTALIA \,par-ən-ˈtā-lē-ə, ,per-\, in ROMAN RELIGION, festival held in honor of the dead. The festival, which began at noon on February 13 and culminated on February 21, was essentially a private celebration of the rites of deceased family members that was extended to incorporate the dead in general. During the days of the festival, all temples were closed and no weddings could be performed. On the last day a public ceremony, the Feralia, was held, during which offerings and gifts were placed at the graves and the anniversary of the funeral feast was celebrated.

PAREVE \ˈpär-ə-və\, also spelled parve \ˈpär-və\, or parveh (Yiddish: “neutral”), in Jewish dietary laws (KASHRUTH), those foods that may be eaten with either meat dishes or dairy products. (Meat and dairy being two general classes of food that may not, under Jewish law, be consumed at the same meal.) Fruits and vegetables are classified as pareve unless cooking or processing alters their status, while cakes and similar foods are pareve, provided they are made without dairy products.

PARILIA \pə-ˈri-lē-ə\, in ROMAN RELIGION, festival celebrated annually on April 21 in honor of the goddess Pales. The festival, basically a purification rite for herdsmen, animals, and stalls, was at first celebrated by the early KINGS OF ROME, later by the PONTIFEX maximus, or chief priest. The VESTAL VIRGINS opened the festival by distributing straw and the ashes and blood of sacrificial animals. Ritual cleaning, anointment, and adornment of herds and stalls followed, together with offerings of food. The celebrants jumped over a bonfire three times to complete the purification, and an open-air feast ended the festival.

According to later tradition, April 21 was the day on which Romulus began building the city of Rome and was thus celebrated as the dies natalis of the city.

PARIS \ˈpar-əs\, also called Alexandros \,a-lig-ˈzan-drās, -drōs\, in Greek legend, son of PRIAM and his wife, HECUBA. A dream about his birth was interpreted as an evil portent, and so he was expelled from his family as an infant. Left for dead, he was either nursed by a bear or found by shepherds. He was raised as a shepherd, unknown to his parents. As a young man he defeated Priam’s other sons in a boxing contest at a Trojan festival. After his identity was revealed, he was received home by Priam.

Paris was chosen by ZEUS to determine which of three goddesses was the most beautiful. Rejecting bribes of kingly power from HERA and military might from ATHENA, he chose APHRODITE and accepted her bribe to help him win the most beautiful woman alive. His subsequent seduction of HELEN, wife of king MENELAUS of Sparta, was the cause of the Trojan War.

Near the end of the war, Paris shot the arrow that, by Apollo’s help, caused the death of the hero ACHILLES. Paris himself, soon after, received a fatal wound from an arrow shot by the archer PHILOCTETES.

PARISH, in some Christian churches, a geographic unit served by a pastor or priest. It is a subdivision of a DIOCESE.

In the NEW TESTAMENT the Greek word paroikia (from Ancient Greek: parōikos, “neighbor, non-native resident”) means “residence in a strange land.” Figuratively it alludes to a Christian’s earthly life—a brief sojourn away from eternal life in heaven—and hence to a community of such “sojourners.” In the very early church, the parish was the entire body of Christians in a city under the bishop, who stood in the same relationship to the Christians of the entire city as does the parish priest to the parish in modern times. In the 4th century, when CHRISTIANITY in western Europe spread to the countryside, Christians in an important village were organized into a unit with their own priest under the jurisdiction of the bishop of the nearest city. The unit was called a parish. The parish system was essentially created between the 8th and 12th centuries. The COUNCIL OF TRENT (1545–63) reorganized and reformed the parish system of the ROMAN CATHOLIC church to make it more responsive to the needs of the people.

In Anglo-Saxon England the first parish churches were founded in important administrative centers. They were called minsters, and subsequently old minsters, to distinguish them from the later village churches. When the Church of England became independent of Rome during the 16th century, it retained the parish as the basic unit of the church.

PARKER, THEODORE \ˈpɑr-kər\ (b. Aug. 24, 1810, Lexington, Mass., U.S.—d. May 10, 1860, Florence, Italy), American UNITARIAN theologian, pastor, scholar, and social reformer who was active in the antislavery movement. He repudiated much traditional Christian dogma, putting in its place an intuitive knowledge of God derived from one’s experience of nature and insight into one’s own mind, an outlook not unlike that of Ralph Waldo Emerson.

Although Parker passed the entrance examination for Harvard College in 1830, he had no funds to attend. He was allowed, however, to take the examinations for his course of study without enrolling and was granted an honorary degree. He then attended Harvard Divinity School, from which he graduated in 1836. The next year he was ordained pastor of the Unitarian Church in West Roxbury, Mass.

By 1841 he had formulated his liberal religious views and had incorporated them in the sermon “The Transient and Permanent in Christianity.” The transient, to him, was Christianity’s theological and scriptural dogma, and the permanent was its moral truths. He elaborated his views in lectures published as A Discourse of Matters Pertaining to Religion. Opposition to his liberalism forced him to resign his pastorate. His supporters founded the 28th Congregational Society of Boston and installed him as minister.

Parker worked for prison reform, temperance, women’s education, and other such causes. He made impassioned speeches against slavery, helped fugitive slaves to escape, and wrote an Abolitionist tract, A Letter to the People of the United States Touching the Matter of Slavery (1848). He also served on the secret committee that aided the Abolitionist John Brown.

PARSI \ˈpɑr-sē, pɑr-ˈsē\ : see ZOROASTRIANISM AND PARSISM.

PĀRŚVANĀTHA \ˈpɑrsh-və-ˈnā-tə\, also called Parśva, in JAINISM, 23rd TĪRTHĀNKARA, or saint, of the present age. Pārśvanātha was the first Tīrthānkara of whom there is historical evidence. He is said to have preceded MAHĀVĪRA, who died probably in 527 BCE, by about 250 years. The four vows that Pārśvanātha made binding on members of his community (not to take life, not to steal, not to lie, not to own property) became, with the addition of the explicit vow of CELIBACY introduced by Mahāvīra, the five “great vows” (mahāvratas) of later Jainism. Pārśvanātha allowed monks to wear garments, while Mahāvīra gave up clothing. The followers of Pārśvanātha were eventually won over to Mahāvīra’s reforms.

Pārśvanātha’s mother is said to have seen a black serpent crawling by her side (Sanskrit: pārśva) before his birth, and in sculpture and painting he is always identified by a canopy of snake hoods shown over his head. According to accounts in the JAINA text the Kalpa Sūtra, Pārśvanātha once saved a family of serpents that had been trapped in a burning log. One of these snakes, later reborn as Dharāṇa, the lord of the underworld kingdom of NĀGAS (snakes), sheltered Pārśvanātha from a storm sent by an enemy DEMON.

PARTHENON \ˈpɑr-thə-nən\, chief temple of the Greek goddess ATHENA on the hill of the Acropolis at Athens, Greece. It was built in the mid-5th century BCE and is generally considered to be the culmination of the development of the Doric order of Greek architecture. The name Parthenon refers to the cult of Athena Parthenos (“Athena the Virgin”) that was associated with the temple.

Directed by the Athenian statesman Pericles, the Parthenon was built by the architects Ictinus and Callicrates under the supervision of the sculptor Phidias. Work at the site began in 447 BCE, and the building itself was completed by 438 BCE. The same year a great gold and ivory statue of Athena, made by Phidias for the interior, was dedicated. Work on the exterior decoration of the building continued until 432 BCE.

The Parthenon’s basic structure has remained intact. A colonnade of fluted, baseless columns with square capitals stands on a three-stepped base and supports a stone roof structure; a frieze of alternating triglyphs (vertically grooved blocks) and metopes (plain blocks with relief sculpture, now partly removed); and, at the east and west ends, a low triangular pediment, also with relief sculpture (now mostly removed). The colonnade, consisting of 8 columns on the east and west and 17 on the north and south, encloses a walled interior rectangular chamber, or cella, originally divided into three aisles by two smaller Doric colonnades closed at the west end just behind the great cult statue. Behind the cella, but not originally connected with it, is a smaller, square chamber entered from the west. The east and west ends of the interior of the building are each faced by a portico of six columns.

The metopes over the outer colonnade were carved in high relief and represented, on the east, a battle between gods and giants; on the south, Greeks and centaurs; and on the west, probably Greeks and AMAZONS. Those on the north are almost all lost. The continuous, low-relief frieze around the top of the cella wall, representing the annual procession of citizens honoring Athena at the PANATHENAEA, culminated on the east end with a priest and priestess of Athena flanked by two groups of seated gods. The pediment groups, carved in the round, show, on the east, the birth of Athena and, on the west, her contest with POSEIDON for domination of the region around Athens.

The Parthenon remained essentially intact until the 5th century CE, when Phidias’ colossal statue was removed and the temple was transformed into a Christian church. By the 7th century, structural alterations in the inner portion had also been made. In 1460 the Turks adopted the Parthenon as a mosque and raised a MINARET at the southwest corner. During the bombardment of the Acropolis in 1687 by Venetians fighting the Turks, a powder magazine located in the temple blew up, destroying the center of the building. In 1801–03 a large part of the sculpture that remained was removed, with Turkish permission, by the British art collector Thomas Bruce, Lord Elgin, and sold in 1816 to the British Museum in London. Other sculptures from the Parthenon are now in the Louvre Museum in Paris, in Copenhagen, and elsewhere, but many are still in Athens.

PĀRVATĪ \ˈpār-və-tē\ (Sanskrit: “Daughter of the Mountain”), wife of the Hindu god SHIVA. Pārvatī is the benevolent aspect of the Goddess and is sometimes referred to as Umā or DEVĪ. She and Shiva had two children, the elephant-headed GANEŚA and the six-headed SKANDA. The Śaiva TANTRAS—texts of sects worshiping Shiva—are generally written as a discussion between Pārvatī and Shiva, during which Pārvatī assumes the role of the questioning disciple and Shiva of the preceptor. In tantras dedicated to the Goddess, Shiva and Pārvatī reverse these roles.

PARYUṢAṆA \pər-ˈyü-shə-nə\ (Sanskrit), Prākṛit Pajjusana, eight-day festival in JAINISM. It is celebrated by members of the ŚVETĀMBARA sect from the 13th day of the dark half of the month Bhādrapada (August–September) to the 5th day of the bright half of the month. Among DIGAMBARAS, a corresponding festival called Daśalakṣaṇa begins immediately following the Paryuṣaṇa.

Paryuṣaṇa closes the Jaina year. Jains make confessions at the meetinghouse to settle existing quarrels, and many lay members temporarily live the lives of monks, an observance called poṣadha. The fourth day coincides with the birth anniversary of MAHĀVĪRA.

On the eighth day, Bhadra-śukla-pañcamī (“Fifth Day of the Bright Fortnight of Bhādra”), Jains distribute alms to the poor and take out a JINA (savior) image in a PROCESSION that is headed by an ornamental pole called Indra-dhvaja (“Staff of INDRA”). The KALPA SŪTRA is read before the laity by monks, and its illustrations are shown and revered. The last day is a day of fasting, though the very pious observe a fast throughout the festival.

PASCHAL LAMB, in JUDAISM, the lamb sacrificed at the first PASSOVER, on the eve of the EXODUS from Egypt. The Jews marked their doorposts with the blood of the lamb, and this sign spared them from destruction (Exodus 12).

An unblemished year-old lamb was sacrificed in the TEMPLE OF JERUSALEM on the 14th of Nisan (or a month later for those who could not visit the Temple at the prescribed time) to commemorate the eve of the Exodus, and was eaten later by the family. Modern Jews use a roasted shank bone at the SEDER meal as symbolic of the Paschal lamb. The Apostle PAUL referred to JESUS CHRIST as the Paschal lamb (1 Corinthians 5:7); hence, the Christian view of Christ as the Lamb of God who by his death freed humanity from the bonds of SIN.

PASSOVER \ˈpas-ō-vər\, Hebrew Pesah, or Pesach, in JUDAISM, “the festival of our freedom.” Passover commemorates God’s deliverance of the Israelites from Egypt in the events described at EXODUS 1–15. Celebrated from the 15th day of Nisan, the first full moon after the vernal equinox, generally in April, the festival lasts for eight days in the diaspora, seven in the Land of Israel, with the first and final days holy days; during that time all leaven is forbidden, and in place of bread, the faithful eat MATZAH, unleavened bread.

Passover is marked in Judaism by a home banquet, or SEDER, that follows an order of song and story. With unleavened bread and sanctified wine, the holy people, ISRAEL, celebrate the liberation of slaves from Pharaoh’s bondage. Families see both the ancients and themselves as liberated—so states the Passover HAGGADAH, or Narrative: “We were slaves of Pharaoh in Egypt and the Lord our God brought us forth from there with a mighty hand and an outstretched arm. And if the Holy One, blessed be he, had not brought our fathers forth from Egypt, then we and our descendants would still be slaves to Pharaoh in Egypt. And so, even if all of us were full of wisdom, understanding, sages and well informed in the TORAH, we should still be obligated to repeat again the story of the Exodus from Egypt; and whoever treats as an important matter the story of the Exodus from Egypt is praiseworthy.” Not only so, but every generation celebrates God’s deliverance of Israel, encompassing the living: “This is the promise which has stood by our forefathers and stands by us. For neither once, nor twice, nor three times was our destruction planned; in every generation they rise against us, and in every generation God delivers us from their hands into freedom, out of anguish into joy, out of mourning into festivity, out of darkness into light, out of bondage into redemption.”

PĀŚUPATA \ˈpā-shū-pə-tə, .pā-shū-ˈpə-\, earliest Hindu sect to worship SHIVA as the supreme deity; it spread as far as Java and Cambodia. The name refers to Paśupati, an epithet of Shiva meaning Lord of Cattle; in later Śaiva Siddhānta theology it meant Lord of Souls.

The Pāśupata sect is mentioned in the MAHĀBHĀRATA (c. 400 CE). Shiva himself was believed to have been its first preceptor. Shiva was said to have revealed that he would make an appearance on earth during the age of VISHNU’s appearance as Vāsudeva-Krishna, when he would enter a dead body and incarnate himself as Lakulī

(or Lakulīṣa, lakula meaning “club”). Inscriptions of the 10th and 13th centuries refer to a teacher named Lakulī, who was believed by his followers to be an AVATAR of Shiva. Historians place the rise of the Pāśupatas in the period between the 2nd century BCE and the 2nd century CE.

Pāśupata ascetic practices included the smearing of their bodies with ashes, meditating on the MANTRAS sacred to Shiva, and dancing. Out of the Pāśupata doctrine developed two extreme schools, the Kālāmukhas and the Kāpālikas, as well as one moderate school, the Śaiva Siddhānta. The Pāśupatas and the extreme sects came to be called Atimārgika (schools of the “higher” or “outer” path), to distinguish them from Śaiva Siddhānta, which eventually developed into modern orthodox SAIVISM.

PATAÑJALI \pə-ˈtən-jə-lē\, also called Gonardīya, or Goṇikāputra (fl. 2nd century BCE or 5th century CE), author or one of the authors of the YOGA Sūtras, an arrangement of Yogic thought in four volumes, and the Mahābhāṣya (“Great Commentary”), a defense of Pāṇini and a refutation of some of his aphorisms. The volumes of the Yoga Sūtras are “Samādhi” (transcendental state induced by trance), “Practice of Yoga,” “Psychic Power,” and “Kaivalya” (liberation). The first three volumes were written in the 2nd century BCE and the Mahābhāṣya in the 5th century CE.

PĀTIMOKKHA \,pā-tē-ˈmòk-kə\; see PRĀTIMOKṢA.

PATRIARCH, Latin patriarcha, Greek patriarchēs, title used for some OLD TESTAMENT leaders (ABRAHAM, ISAAC, JACOB, and Jacob’s 12 sons) and, in some Christian churches, a title given to bishops of important sees.

The biblical appellation patriarch was used beginning in the 4th century to designate prominent Christian bishops. By the end of the 5th century, due to growing ecclesiastical centralization, it acquired a more specific sense. After the COUNCIL OF NICAIA in 325, church structure was patterned on the administrative divisions of the Roman Empire; each civil province was headed by a METROPOLITAN, or bishop of the metropolis (the civil capital of the province), while larger units, called DIOCESES, were presided over by an exarch, a title replaced by patriarch. Some patriarchs exercised authority over several dioceses: e.g., the bishop of Rome reigned over the entire West; the bishop of Alexandria over Egypt, Libya, and Pentapolis; and, after the COUNCIL OF CHALCEDON (451), the bishop of Constantinople (Istanbul) over Pontus, Asia, and Thrace.

Controversy over the growth of major ecclesiastical centers contributed to the SCHISM between East and West. Rome maintained that only apostolic sees, those established by apostles, had the right to become patriarchates. The East held that primacies should be based on factors such as the importance of cities and countries. Constantinople, the new imperial capital and ecclesiastical center of the East, had no claims to apostolicity (though a later tradition attributed its founding to the apostle Andrew), but jurisdictional rights were bestowed upon it at Chalcedon because it was “the residence of the emperor and the Senate.”

Five patriarchates—Rome, Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem—called the pentarchy, were the first to be recognized by the legislation of the emperor JUSTINIAN (reigned 527–565), later confirmed by the Council of Trullo (692). After the Muslim invasions of Egypt and Syria in 638–640, only the bishops of Rome and Constantinople possessed power. Despite Constantinople’s opposition to new patriarchates, centers emerged in Preslav (now Veliki Preslav; 932), Tŷrnovo (1234), Peć (1346), and Moscow (1589). EASTERN ORTHODOXY has nine patriarchates: Constantinople, Alexandria, Antioch, Jerusalem, Moscow, Georgia, Serbia, Romania, and Bulgaria. Except in title, there is no difference between a patriarch and any other head of an autocephalous (independent) church.

PATRICK, SAINT \ˈpa-trik\ (fl. 5th century, Britain and Ireland; feast day March 17), patron saint and apostle of Ireland, credited with bringing CHRISTIANITY to Ireland and responsible in part for the Christianization of the Picts and Anglo-Saxons. He is known from two short works, the Confessio, a spiritual autobiography, and his Epistola, a denunciation of British mistreatment of Irish Christians.

Patrick was born in Britain of a Romanized family. At age 16 he was carried off to slavery in Ireland, where, during five years spent as a herdsman, he turned with fervor to his faith. Hearing at last in a dream that the ship in which he was to escape was ready, he found passage to Britain. There he suffered a second captivity before he was reunited with his family.

The best-known passage in the Confessio tells of a dream, after his return to Britain, in which a letter headed “The Voice of the Irish” was delivered to him. As he read it he seemed to hear a company of Irish beseeching him to walk once more among them. His MISSION to the Irish was his response to this dream. On at least one occasion he was cast into chains. On another, he addressed a last farewell to his converts who had been slain or kidnapped by soldiers.

The phenomenal success of Patrick’s mission is not the full measure of his personality. Since his writings have come to be better understood, it is increasingly recognized that, despite their occasional incoherence, they mirror a truth and a simplicity of the rarest quality.

Before the end of the 7th century Patrick had become a legendary figure. One legend asserts that he drove the snakes of Ireland into the sea. Another, the most popular, is that of the shamrock, which has him explain the concept of the Holy TRINITY, three Persons in one God, to an unbeliever by showing him the three-leaved plant with one stalk. Today Irishmen wear shamrocks, the national flower of Ireland, in their lapels on St. Patrick’s Day, March 17.

PAUL VI, POPE, original name Giovanni Battista Montini (b. Sept. 26, 1897, Concesio, near Brescia, Italy—d. Aug. 6, 1978, Castel Gandolfo), pope from 1963 to 1978.

Ordained in 1920, he studied in Rome, earning degrees in civil and canon law. He held various posts in the Vatican diplomatic service until 1954, when he was named archbishop of Milan. He became a CARDINAL in 1958, and in 1963 he was elected pope. Paul VI presided over the final sessions of the Second VATICAN COUNCIL and appointed commissions to carry out its reforms, including revisions in the MASS. He also relaxed rules on FASTING, removed questionable saints from the church’s calendar, and enforced conservative positions on birth control and clerical CELIBACY. He promoted ECUMENISM and was the first pope to travel widely, visiting Israel, Asia, and Latin America.

PAULICIAN \pō-ˈli-shən\, member of a dualistic Christian sect that originated in Armenia in the mid-7th century. It was influenced most directly by the DUALISM of Marcionism (see MARCIONITE). The identity of the Paul after whom the Paulicians are called is disputed.

PAUL THE APOSTLE, SAINT

The fundamental doctrine of the Paulicians was that there are two principles, an evil God and a good God; the former is the creator and ruler of this world, the latter of the world to come. From this they deduced that JESUS CHRIST was not truly the son of MARY, because the good God could not have taken flesh and become man. They especially honored the Gospel According to Luke and the Letters of ST. PAUL, rejecting the OLD TESTAMENT and the Letters of ST. PETER. They also rejected the SACRAMENTS, worship, and hierarchy of the established church.

The founder of the Paulicians seems to have been an Armenian, Constantine, who took the additional name of Silvanus (Silas; one of St. Paul's companions). He gave a more distinctively Christian character to the Manichaeism that was prevalent in the Asian provinces of the Byzantine Empire. The sect seems to have started a widespread political and military rebellion shortly after its appearance. Between 668 and 698 Constantine III and Justinian II sent two expeditions to repress it. Constantine (Silvanus) was stoned to death, and his successor, Simeon (Titus), was burned alive.

In the early 9th century Paulicianism was revived. It expanded into Cilicia and Asia Minor under Sergius (Tychicus), who made it strong enough to survive the persecution and massacre instigated by the emperor Michael I and the empress Theodora. The number and power of the Paulicians were greatest under Karbeas and Chrysocheir, the leaders in the third quarter of the 9th century. An expedition sent by Basil I in 872 broke their military power, but they survived in Asia at least until the Crusades. After the 9th century their importance lay chiefly in Thrace, where many Paulicians had been forcibly located to serve as a frontier force against the Bulgarians.

Paulician doctrines were disseminated among the Macedonians, Bulgarians, and Greeks, especially the peasants, and it seems that they contributed to the development of the doctrines and practices of the BOGOMILS, another neo-Manichaean sect, who first appeared in Bulgaria in the early 10th century.

PAUL THE APOSTLE, SAINT \ˈpɒl\, original name Saul of Tarsus [b. 10? CE, Tarsus in Cilicia [now in Turkey]—d. 67?,

Rome [Italy]], 1st-century Jew who, after being a bitter enemy of the Christian church, became its leading missionary and possibly its greatest theologian. His extensive travels and his vision of a universal church were responsible for the speed with which CHRISTIANITY became a world religion. Over half of THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES deals with his career, and this, together with the letters written by him or in his name, constitutes one-third of the NEW TESTAMENT.

Paul had a strict Jewish upbringing, but he also inherited Roman citizenship and grew up with a good command of idiomatic Greek. At some stage he became an enthusiastic member of the PHARISEES, a Jewish sect that promoted purity and fidelity to the Law of MOSES. According to Acts, he received training as a RABBI in Jerusalem under GAMALIEL I. Like most rabbis he supported himself with a trade, tent making. It is clear that he never met JESUS; he became known rather as an opponent and even persecutor of the Christian movement.

Paul was converted as a result of a vision on the road to Damascus, on his way to apprehend some of the scattered Christians. His vision of Jesus risen from the dead and exalted as Lord in heaven convinced Paul that his vocation was to prepare people of every nation for God's imminent coming. Paul believed that Jesus, having died for the sins of mankind, was now reserved in heaven as God's agent for the judgment.

Three years after his conversion Paul visited Jerusalem, where he met Peter and James, Jesus' brother. This meeting established Paul as a recognized Apostle alongside the founders of the church. At some later point Paul moved to Antioch, the capital of Syria, to assist Barnabas in his successful MISSION there. The converts included a large number of GENTILES. This eventually led to a serious crisis: primitive Christianity was a closely knit fellowship of converts from JUDAISM with the common meal and the EUCHARIST at the heart of it, but Jewish purity rules made Jews reluctant to eat with Gentiles for fear of transgressing the Law. Some of the Jerusalem Christians who were converted Pharisees held the view that Gentile converts should be required to accept CIRCUMCISION and the obligations of the Law, while Paul opposed this stance.

Antioch continued to be Paul's base for further pioneering work, first to Cyprus, then to the mainland (modern Turkey). In some places the new congregations he founded may have been entirely composed of Gentiles. Shortly afterwards a deputation came from Jerusalem to Antioch to insist that the Gentile converts should be circumcised. This led Paul to visit Jerusalem, where it was determined that the Gentile mission should continue without pressure to Judaize converts. Paul's insistence on this point assured that Christianity would not be simply a Jewish sect.

After missionary visits to Galatia, Macedonia, Athens, Corinth, and Ephesus, Paul wrote his most important letters. In 1 Corinthians Paul tackles a whole array of problems. Paul's teaching on freedom from the Law had been interpreted to justify licentiousness. The question of which foods a Gentile Christian might eat was causing problems. In dealing with these matters Paul gave the account of the LAST SUPPER in its oldest known form. A section on the gifts of the HOLY SPIRIT includes his famous chapter on love (chapter 13). A long section on RESURRECTION shows that Paul still thought that Jesus' return was near and that the full experience of eternal life lay beyond this event. In his letters to the Galatians and the Romans he lays down the doctrine of JUSTIFICATION by faith.

In Jerusalem Paul was accused of bringing a Gentile into the inner courts of the Temple, beyond the barrier excluding non-Jews. He was arrested, partly to save his life from the mob, but given good treatment on account of his Roman citizenship. To avoid trial in Jerusalem Paul appealed to Caesar; he was taken to Rome for trial and arrived in the spring of 60 CE. There Paul was kept under house arrest for two years. Of the four letters said to be written during his captivity, Philippians and Philemon are generally accepted as genuine; Colossians and Ephesians are questioned. No more is known of this stage in his life, though it may be assumed that Paul was eventually convicted of the charges against him; no reliable account of his death exists.

It can be justly claimed that it was due to Paul more than anyone else that Christianity became a world religion. His surviving letters were collected for general circulation and quickly became a standard of reference for Christian teaching. In the Western (Latin) half of Christendom Paul had a profound effect upon the history of the church through the writings of St. Augustine. In arguing for the necessity of divine GRACE for salvation, Augustine built on Paul's idea of PREDESTINATION. The reformers of the 16th century were similarly indebted to him: MARTIN LUTHER seized on the doctrine of justification by faith and made the distinction between faith and works the basis of his attack on the late medieval church. JOHN CALVIN drew from Paul his concept of the church as the company of the ELECT.

PAX \ˈpaks, ˈpæks\, in ROMAN RELIGION, personification of peace, probably recognized as a deity for the first time by the emperor Augustus. An altar of Pax Augusta (the ARA PACIS) was dedicated in 9 BCE and a great temple of Pax completed by the emperor Vespasian in 75 CE.

PEACE MISSION, predominantly African-American 20th-century religious movement in the United States, founded and led by FATHER DIVINE (1878/80–1965), who was regarded, or worshiped, by his followers as God, Dean of the Universe, and Harnesser of Atomic Energy.

According to most accounts, Father Divine was born George Baker and reared in Savannah, Ga., during the post-Reconstruction period. He received indelible impressions from his immersion in MYSTICISM and the Holiness and Pentecostal movements. Father Divine set up his first "heaven" in Sayville, Long Island, N.Y., in 1919. Legal entanglements forced him to relocate in Manhattan (Harlem) and Philadelphia, Pa., but the movement continued to grow and spread through many cities of the northern and western United States.

Heaven, according to Father Divine, was symbolized by separation of sexes and union of all races in a communion composed of a multicourse feast. He also preached total racial integration, that all things and persons are to be forsaken for the Father, and that heaven is on earth. The key to Father Divine's success was the devotion of competent disciples. In the late 20th century, this cohesion diminished and the movement dwindled.

PEGASUS \ˈpe-gə-səs\, in Greek mythology, winged horse that sprang from the neck of MEDUSA as she was beheaded by the hero PERSEUS. With the help of ATHENA (or POSEIDON), another Greek hero, BELLEROPHON, captured Pegasus and rode him first in his fight with the CHIMERA and later while he was taking vengeance on Sthenoboea (Anteia), who had falsely accused him. Subsequently Bellerophon attempted to fly to heaven but was unseated and killed, the winged horse becoming the servant of ZEUS.

PEKO \ˈpā-kō\, in Estonian religion, agricultural deity who aided the growth of grain, especially barley. Peko was represented by a wax image that was kept buried in the grain in the granary and brought out on the night of October 1 for a ritual of agricultural increase. The worshipers were a kind of secret society, and the rites were performed like a mystery. After the feast, the men would engage in wrestling or fence jumping to determine who would be the host for Peko in the following year. The first one to get a bleeding wound would take Peko home and store him in his granary. Another rite, more public, was held at sowing time.

PELAGIANISM \pə-ˈlā-jē-ə-ni-zəm\, also called Pelagian Heresy, 5th-century Christian HERESY taught by PELAGIUS and his followers that stressed the essential goodness of human nature and the freedom of the human will. Rejecting the argument that SIN exists because of human weakness, Pelagius insisted that God made human beings free to choose between GOOD AND EVIL and that sin is a voluntary act committed by a person against God's law. Celestius, a disciple of Pelagius, denied the church's doctrine of ORIGINAL SIN and the necessity of infant BAPTISM.

Pelagianism was opposed by ST. AUGUSTINE, who asserted that human beings could not attain righteousness by their own efforts and were totally dependent upon the GRACE of God. Condemned by two councils of African bishops in 416, and again at Carthage in 418, Pelagius and Celestius were excommunicated in 418; Pelagius' fate is unknown.

The controversy, however, was not over. Julian of Eclanum continued to assert the Pelagian view and engaged Augustine in literary polemic until the latter's death in 430. Julian himself was finally condemned, with the rest of the Pelagian party, at the COUNCIL OF EPHEBUS in 431. Another heresy, known as SEMI-PELAGIANISM, flourished in southern Gaul until it was finally condemned at the second Council of Orange in 529.

PELAGIUS \pə-ˈlā-jē-əs\ (b. c. 354, probably Britain—d. after 418, possibly Palestine), monk and theologian whose heterodox theological system known as PELAGIANISM emphasized the primacy of human effort in spiritual salvation.

Coming to Rome about 380, Pelagius, though not a priest, became a highly regarded spiritual director for both clergy and laymen. Distressed by what he viewed as the spiritual sloth of many Roman Christians, he blamed Rome's moral laxity on the doctrine of divine GRACE that he heard a bishop cite from the Confessions of ST. AUGUSTINE, who in his prayer for continence beseeched God to grant whatever GRACE the divine will determined. Pelagius attacked this teaching on the grounds that it imperiled morality, and he soon gained a considerable following at Rome. Henceforth, his closest collaborator was a lawyer named Celestius.

After the fall of Rome to the Visigoths in 410, Pelagius and Celestius went to Africa. There they encountered the hostile criticism of Augustine, who published several denunciatory letters concerning their doctrine, particularly Pelagius' insistence on man's basically good moral nature and on man's own responsibility for voluntarily choosing Christian ASCETICISM for his spiritual advancement.

Pelagius left for Palestine c. 412. There, although he was accused of HERESY at the SYNOD of Jerusalem in 415, he succeeded in clearing himself and avoiding censure. In response to further attacks from Augustine and the Latin biblical scholar JEROME, Pelagius wrote De libero arbitrio ("On Free Will") in 416, which resulted in the condemnation of his teaching by two African councils. Pope Innocent I endorsed the condemnations and excommunicated Pelagius and Celestius. Innocent's successor, Zosimus, at first pronounced the Pelagians innocent on the basis of Pelagius' Libellus fidei ("Brief Statement of Faith"). However, after renewed investigation at the Council of Carthage in 418, Zosimus confirmed the council's nine canons condemning Pelagius.

PELEUS \ˈpēl-yūs, ˈpē-lē-əs\, in Greek mythology, king of the MYRMIDONS of Thessaly; he was most famous as the husband of THETIS, the NEREID, and as the father of ACHILLES. When Peleus and his brother Telamon were banished from their father Aeacus' kingdom of Aegina, Peleus went to Phthia to be purified by his uncle King Eurytion, whose daughter Antigone he married, receiving a third of Eurytion's kingdom. During the Calydonian boar hunt he accidentally killed Eurytion. He then went to Iolcos to be purified by King Acastus, whose wife Astydameia made advances to him. When he refused her, she told Antigone that he wanted to marry her daughter, causing Antigone to hang herself. Peleus later won Thetis by capture, and all the gods except ERIS (the goddess of discord) were invited to the wedding. The golden apple that Eris spitefully tossed amongst the wedding guests led to the "judgment of Paris" and thence to the Trojan War. Thetis, who had returned to the sea after bearing Achilles, eventually fetched Peleus to dwell with her.

PELIAS \ˈpē-lē-əs\, in Greek mythology, king of Iolcus in Thessaly who imposed on his half-nephew JASON the task of fetching the Golden Fleece. According to Homer, Pelias and Neleus were twin sons of Tyro by POSEIDON, who came to her disguised as the river god Enipeus, whom she loved. The twins were exposed at birth but were found and raised by a horse herder. Later, Pelias seized the throne and exiled Neleus.

On Jason's return with the fleece, his wife MEDEA took revenge on Pelias by persuading his daughters, except for Alcestis, to cut up and boil their father in the mistaken belief that he would thereby recover his youth.

PELOPS \ˈpē-läps, ˈpe-\, legendary founder of the Pelopid dynasty at Mycenae in the Greek Peloponnese, which was probably named for him. Pelops was a grandson of ZEUS. According to many accounts, his father, TANTALUS, cooked and served Pelops to the gods at a banquet. Only DEMETER, bereaved over the loss of her daughter, failed to recognize him and partook. When the body was restored by the gods, the shoulder, Demeter's portion, was missing; the goddess provided a replacement of ivory.

According to Pindar, however, POSEIDON loved Pelops and took him up to heaven. Pelops had to return to mortal life because his father had abused the favor of heaven by feeding mortals with nectar and ambrosia, of which only gods partook. Later, according to Pindar, Pelops strove for the hand of Hippodamia, daughter of King Oenomaus of Pisa in Elis. Oenomaus, who had an incestuous love for his daughter, had previously killed 13 suitors. He challenged Pelops to a chariot chase, with Hippodamia the prize of victory and death the price of defeat. Though Oenomaus' team and chariot were the gift of his father, the god ARES, Pelops' chariot was from Poseidon. Pelops won the bride and killed Oenomaus.

In other versions, Pelops bribed Oenomaus' charioteer, Myrtilus, to remove the linchpins from Oenomaus' chariot. After his victory he threw Myrtilus into the sea that afterward was called the Myrtoan. Myrtilus—or Oenomaus—was said to have uttered the curse that dogged the Pelopid house of ATREUS. Preparations for the race are depicted in the east pediment of the Temple of Zeus at OLYMPIA.

PENATES \pə-ˈnā-tēz, -ˈnā-\, formally Di Penates, household gods of the Romans and other Latin peoples. They were gods of the penus ("household provisions"), but by extension their protection reached the entire household. They are associated with other deities of the house, such as VESTA, and the name was sometimes used interchangeably with that of the Lares. Their number and precise identity were a puzzle even to the Romans.

The Penates were worshiped privately as protectors of the individual household and also publicly as protectors of the Roman state. Each house had a shrine with images of them that were worshiped at the family meal and on special occasions. Offerings were of portions of the regular meal or of special cakes, wine, honey, incense, and, more rarely, a blood sacrifice. The state as a whole worshiped the Penates Publici. This state cult occupied a significant role as a focal point of Roman patriotism and nationalism.

PENELOPE \pə-ˈne-lə-pē\, in Greek mythology, daughter of Icarus of Sparta and the NYMPH Periboea and wife of the hero ODYSSEUS. In the Odyssey, during her husband's long absence after the Trojan War, many chieftains of Ithaca and nearby islands became her suitors. She insisted that they wait until she had woven a shroud for Laertes, father of Odysseus. Every night for three years, until one of her maids revealed the secret, she undid the work that she had woven by day in order to delay the date at which she would have to forsake her lost husband by remarrying. She was finally relieved by the arrival of Odysseus. According to later writers, after the death of Odysseus, Penelope married TELEGONUS, son of Odysseus and CIRCE. A late tradition names her the mother of the god PAN by HERMES (who came to her in the shape of a goat); another variant stated that Pan was born from the accumulated seed of all the suitors, with each of whom Penelope had coupled; this was most likely based on the mistaken translation of Pan as "all."

PENTATEUCH \ˈpen-tə-ˌtük, -ˌtyük\, first five books of the Jewish BIBLE (the Christian OLD TESTAMENT).

PENTECOST (from Greek: pentekostē [hēmera], “50th day”), also called Whitsunday, major festival in the Christian church, celebrated on the Sunday concluding the 50-day period beginning with EASTER. It commemorates the descent of the HOLY SPIRIT on the disciples, which occurred on the Jewish Pentecost, after the death, RESURRECTION, and ASCENSION of JESUS CHRIST (Acts 2), and it marks the beginning of the Christian church’s MISSION to the world.

The Jewish feast was a thanksgiving for the first fruits of the wheat harvest, associated with remembrance of the Law given by God for the Hebrews to MOSES on MOUNT SINAI. The transformation of the Jewish feast to a Christian festival was thus related to the belief that the gift of the Holy Spirit to the followers of Jesus was the first fruits of a new dispensation that fulfilled and succeeded the old dispensation of the Law.

When the festival was first celebrated in the Christian church is not known, but it was mentioned in a work from the Eastern church, the Epistola Apostolorum, in the 2nd century. In the 3rd century it was mentioned by ORIGEN, theologian and head of the catechetical school in Alexandria, and by TERTULLIAN, a Christian writer of Carthage.

In the early church, Christians often referred to the entire 50-day period following Easter as Pentecost. BAPTISM was administered both at the beginning (Easter) and end (the day of Pentecost) of the season. Eventually, Pentecost became a more popular time for baptism than Easter in northern Europe, and in England the feast was commonly called White Sunday (Whitsunday) for the special white garments worn by the newly baptized.

PENTECOSTALISM \,pen-tə-ˈkōs-tə-ˌli-zəm\, charismatic religious movement that gave rise to a number of Protestant churches in the United States in the 19th and 20th centuries and that is characterized by the belief that all Christians should seek a postconversion RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE called the BAPTISM with the HOLY SPIRIT. This experience corresponds to the descent of the Holy Spirit upon the 12 disciples of Christ assembled in Jerusalem on the day of PENTECOST (Acts 1:12–2:4), and it is accompanied by the same sign: the gift of glossolalia, or “speaking in tongues.”

Pentecostals hold that a Spirit-baptized believer may receive at least one of the other supernatural gifts that were known to have existed in the early church: the ability to prophesy, to heal, or to interpret what is said when someone speaks in an unknown tongue. Pentecostal churches reflect patterns of faith and practice characteristic of the Fundamentalist-Holiness branches of PROTESTANTISM, which also originated in 19th-century America, with their emphases on biblical literalism, conversion, and moral rigor. Despite a common belief in certain doctrines, Pentecostals have not united in a single denomination. Estimates of the number of Pentecostals worldwide in the early 21st century ranged from 115 million to 400 million.

The roots of the modern Pentecostal movements are traceable to a number of charismatic outgrowths of the 19th-century Holiness revival. Perhaps the most far-reaching of these movements originated about the turn of the 20th century at Bethel Bible College in Topeka, Kan. The director of the institution, Charles Fox Parham, one of many ministers who had been influenced by the Holiness movement, believed that what he saw as a complacent, prosperity-ridden, and coldly formalistic church of the era needed to be revived and that such a revival could only be achieved by another outpouring of the Holy Spirit. He therefore instructed his students, many of whom already held ministerial credentials with Methodist, Friends, or Holiness churches, to pray, fast, study the SCRIPTURES, and await an endowment of Pentecostal blessing and power that would be very much like the events recounted in Acts.

On Jan. 1, 1901, the first of Parham's students to experience Spirit baptism began speaking in an unknown tongue. From that time on, Pentecostals usually declared that glossolalia was the "initial evidence" that one had been truly Spirit-baptized. These recurrences of Pentecost also had prophetic overtones that Parham and his students interpreted as a sign that they were living in the last days. Imbued with this sense of urgency, they set out to evangelize the American Southwest. According to Parham, by 1905 some 25,000 persons in Texas alone had embraced Pentecostalism. The charismatic movement was at first significant in only a few regions: in the states of Kansas, Missouri, Texas, and Alabama, and in the western part of the state of Florida.

The national and international expansion of Pentecostalism came about as a consequence of what is recorded as the Azusa Street revival of 1906. The Apostolic Faith Gospel Mission of Los Angeles was led by William Seymour, a former Holiness preacher, who had been exposed to Pentecostal teaching at a Bible school in Houston, Texas. Under his guidance, from April 1906 onward many people flocked to the Mission to receive spiritual help. Soon groups of Pentecostals sprang up all over the world. These congregations represented the effects of a novel revival that was known variously as the Latter Rain, Apostolic Faith, or Pentecostal movement.

From the beginning of Pentecostalism, its evangelists—Charles Price, AIMEE SEMPLE MCPHERSON, and, later, Oral Roberts—have taught that deliverance from sickness was provided for in Christ's ATONEMENT and is, therefore, the privilege of all who have faith. This effort to minister to the physical needs of people likely has been responsible for winning many followers to Pentecostalism.

Although members of the historic Protestant churches embraced the practices of healing, prophesying, and speaking in tongues, they initially had no intention of withdrawing from their own churches. They wished rather to be the agents of reform, helping to rid their churches of formalism, modernism, and worldliness. But the Pentecostal movement became the object of widespread opposition. Those who desired to embrace a charismatic religious way of life found it difficult to do so within conventional Protestantism, with the result that many withdrew from their churches to form new and distinctly Pentecostal groups.

Pentecostal denominations are found in many countries, notably the United States, Mexico, Chile, Sweden, Norway, Great Britain, South Africa, and Russia. Forty or more groups in America practice glossolalia; there are also hundreds of "storefront" congregations that cannot be included in any reliable computation. Pentecostal churches abound in remote mountain and other rural areas. The larger bodies are organized in the Pentecostal World Conference.

PĒRKONS \ˈpar-kwɔns\ (Latvian: "Thunder"), Lithuanian Perkūnas \pˈer-ˈkü-nás\, Old Prussian Perkunis, sky deity of BALTIC RELIGION, the guardian of law and order. The oak, as the tree most often struck by lightning, is sacred to him. Pērkons, probably the most popular of Baltic gods, is related to the Slavic PERUN, Germanic THOR, and Greek ZEUS.

Visualized as a bearded man holding an ax, Pērkons rides across the sky striking fire with his two-wheeled chariot and bringing rain. In the spring his lightning purifies the earth and stimulates plant growth. Pērkons also directs his thunderbolts against evil spirits and unjust men and even disciplines the gods. According to ancient tradition, thunderbolts—"bullets of Pērkons," found in the ground as prehistoric flint or bronze implements—or any object or person struck by lightning could be used as protection against devils or as cures for toothache, fever, and fright.

PERPETUA, in full Vibia Perpetua (b. c. 182—d. March 7, 203, Carthage [now a suburb of Tunis, Tunisia]; feast day March 7) Christian martyr who wrote The Passion of Saints Perpetua and Felicity, one of the rare surviving documents written by a woman in the ancient world.

Perpetua began her journal with an account of her imprisonment and continued it with descriptions of her trial and her father's impassioned but fruitless plea for her to renounce Christianity. Most of Perpetua's text concerns her prison dreams, which included visions of her entry into heaven, her deceased brother Dinocrates, and her ordeal in the arena. Before her death, Perpetua gave her journal to another Christian, who continued it by describing Perpetua's bravery in the arena when she was attacked by wild beasts and martyred by the sword.

Perpetua's diary was read annually in Carthage's churches for centuries. It was praised by orthodox as well as heretical Christians. Two hundred years later, St. Augustine commented on it. Perpetua's very personal text continues to draw readers.

PERSEPHONE \pər-ˈse-fə-nē\, Latin Proserpina or Proserpine, in GREEK RELIGION, daughter of ZEUS, the chief god, and DEMETER, the goddess of agriculture; she was the wife of HADES, king of the Underworld. In Homer she is queen of the Underworld and there is no mention of her relationship to Demeter. Hesiod was the first to relate that she was the daughter of Demeter and was carried off by Hades. In the Homeric "Hymn to Demeter," the story is told of how Persephone was gathering flowers when she was taken to the Underworld by Hades. Learning of the abduction, her mother became unconcerned with the fruitfulness of the earth, and famine ensued. Zeus then commanded Hades to release Persephone to her mother. Because Persephone had eaten one or more pomegranate seeds in the Underworld, she could not be completely freed but had to remain one-third of the year with Hades, spending the other two-thirds with her mother. The story that Persephone spent part of each year in the Underworld explained the barren appearance of Greek fields in summer (after harvest), before their revival in the autumn rains, when they were plowed and sown; other interpretations suggest that her descent followed the storage of seed grain in underground silos, or that the myth was a metaphor for human marriage rites.

The figure and name of Persephone may have been of pre-Hellenic origin. Once the connection with Demeter was formed, she was identified with Kore (Greek: "maiden"), a grain goddess and daughter of Demeter. Demeter and Kore/Persephone figured in the ELEUSINIAN MYSTERIES.

PERSEUS \ˈpɜr-sē-əs, -sɪəs, -sūs\, in Greek mythology, the slayer of MEDUSA and the rescuer of ANDROMEDA from a sea monster. Perseus was the son of ZEUS and DANAË, the daughter of Acrisius of Argos. As an infant he was cast into the sea in a chest with his mother by Acrisius, to whom it had been prophesied that he would be killed by his grandson. After Perseus had grown up on the island of Seriphus, King Polydectes of Seriphus, who desired Danaë, tricked Perseus into promising to obtain the head of Medusa, the only mortal among the GORGONS.

Aided by HERMES and ATHENA, Perseus pressed the Graiae, sisters of the Gorgons, into helping him by seizing the one eye and one tooth that the sisters shared and refusing to return them until they provided him with winged sandals (which enabled him to fly), the helmet of HADES (which conferred invisibility on its wearer), a curved sword, or sickle, with which to decapitate Medusa, and a bag in which to conceal the head. (According to another version, the Graiae merely directed him to the Stygian NYMPHS, who told him where to find the Gorgons and gave him the bag, the sandals, and the helmet; Hermes gave him the sword.) Because the gaze of Medusa turned all who looked at her to stone, Perseus guided himself by looking at her reflection in a shield given him by Athena, and he beheaded Medusa as she slept. He then returned to Seriphus and rescued his mother by turning Polydectes and his supporters to stone at the sight of Medusa's head.

A further deed attributed to Perseus was his rescue of the Ethiopian princess Andromeda when he was on his way home with Medusa's head. Andromeda's mother, Cassiopeia, had claimed to be more beautiful than the sea nymphs, or NEREIDS; so POSEIDON had punished Ethiopia by flooding it and plaguing it with a sea monster. An oracle informed Andromeda's father, King Cepheus, that the ills that had befallen his land would cease if he exposed Andromeda to the monster, which he did. Perseus, passing by, turned the sea monster to stone by showing it Medusa's head and afterward married Andromeda.

Later Perseus gave Medusa's head to Athena, who placed it on her shield, and he gave his other accoutrements to Hermes. He accompanied his mother back to her native Argos, where he accidentally struck her father, Acrisius, dead when throwing the discus, thus fulfilling the PROPHECY that he would kill his grandfather. He consequently left Argos and founded Mycenae as his capital, becoming the ancestor of the Perseids, including HERACLES. The Perseus legend was a favorite subject in painting and sculpture, both ancient and Renaissance. The chief characters in the Perseus legend, Perseus, Cepheus, Cassiopeia, Andromeda, and the sea monster (Cetus), all figure in the night sky as constellations.

PERUN \pɜi-ˈrʌn\, thundergod of the ancient Slavs, a fructifier, purifier, and overseer of right and order. His actions are perceived by the senses: seen in the thunderbolt, heard in the rattle of stones or the bellow of the bull or the bleat of the goat (thunder), and felt in the touch of an ax blade. The word for Thursday (Thor's day) in the Polabian language was perūdan. Polish piorun and Slovak parom denote "thunder" or "lightning."

The "Lightning-god" and his cult among the Slavs is attested by the Byzantine historian Procopius in the 6th century. In the Primary Russian Chronicle, compiled c. 1111, Perun is mentioned as having been invoked in the treaties of 945 and 971, and his name is the first in the list of gods of St. Vladimir's pantheon of 980. He was worshiped in oak groves by western Slavs, who called him Prone, which name appears in Helmold's Chronica Slavorum (c. 1172). Porenut, Perun's son, is mentioned by the Danish historian Saxo Grammaticus in the early 13th century.

In the Christian period the worship of Perun was gradually transferred to St. Elijah (Russian Iliya), but in folk beliefs, his fructifying, life-stimulating, and purifying functions are still performed by his vehicles: the ax, the bull, the goat, the dove, and the cuckoo. Sacrifices and communal feasts on July 20 in honor of Perun or Iliya continued in Russia until modern times.

PESHAT \pe-'shät\ (Hebrew: “spread out”), in Jewish HERMENEUTICS, the literal meaning of a biblical text. In the interpretation of the HALAKHAH, peshat was preferred. Other interpretive principles, however, could be used simultaneously: remez (meaning “hint,” in reference to allegorical interpretations), derash (meaning “search,” in reference to biblical study according to the MIDDOT, or rules), and sod (meaning “secret,” or mystical interpretation).

PETER LOMBARD \'pē-tər-'läm-,bärd, -bärd\, French Pierre Lombard, Latin Petrus Lombardus (b. c. 1100, Novara, Lombardy—d. Aug. 21/22, 1160, Paris), bishop of Paris whose Four Books of Sentences (Sententiarum libri IV) was the standard theological text of the Middle Ages.

After schooling at Bologna, he went to France to study at Reims and Paris. From 1136 to 1150 he taught theology in the school of Notre Dame, Paris, where in 1144–45 he became a staff clergyman. Lombard was present at the Council of Reims (1148) that assembled to examine the writings of the French theologian Gilbert de La Porrée. In June 1159 he was consecrated bishop of Paris, and he died the following year.

Although he wrote sermons, letters, and Scriptural commentaries, Lombard's Four Books of Sentences (1148–51) established his reputation and subsequent fame, earning him the title of magister sententiarum (“master of the sentences”). The Sentences, a collection of teachings of the CHURCH FATHERS and opinions of medieval masters arranged as a systematic treatise, marked the culmination of a long tradition of theological pedagogy, and until the 16th century it was the official textbook in the universities. Thousands of scholars wrote commentaries on it, including the celebrated philosopher ST. THOMAS AQUINAS.

Book I of the Sentences discusses God, the TRINITY, divine guidance, evil, and predestination; Book II, ANGELS, DEMONS, the Fall of man, GRACE, and SIN; Book III, the INCARNATION of JESUS CHRIST, the redemption of sins, virtues, and the TEN COMMANDMENTS; Book IV, the SACRAMENTS and the four last things—death, judgment, hell, and heaven. Of special importance to medieval theologians was Lombard's clarification of the theology of the sacraments. He asserted that there are seven sacraments and that a sacrament is not merely a “visible sign of invisible grace” (as ST. AUGUSTINE had defined it) but also the “cause of the grace it signifies.” In ethical matters, he decreed that a man's actions are judged good or bad according to their cause and intention, except those acts that are evil by nature. Later theologians rejected a number of his views, but he was never regarded as unorthodox, and efforts to have his works condemned were unsuccessful. The fourth LATERAN COUNCIL (1215) approved his teaching on the Trinity.

PETER THE APOSTLE, SAINT, original name Simeon, or Simon (d. c. 64 CE, Rome), disciple of JESUS CHRIST, recognized in the early church as the leader of the disciples and by the ROMAN CATHOLIC church as the first of its unbroken succession of popes.

Peter probably was known originally by the Hebrew name Simeon or the Greek form of that name, Simon. There is indirect evidence (Matthew 8:14; 1 Corinthians 9:5) that Peter was the son of John and was married. His family originally came from Bethsaida (John 1:44), but during the period of Jesus' ministry he lived in Capernaum, at the northwest end of the Sea of Galilee, where he and his brother ANDREW were in partnership as fishermen with JAMES and JOHN, the sons of Zebedee (Luke 5:10). Peter was untrained in the Mosaic Law (Acts 4:13), and it is doubtful that he knew Greek.

With differing degrees of emphasis, the SYNOPTIC GOSPELS agree that Peter served as spokesman for the disciples and enjoyed a certain precedence over the others. Whenever the disciples are listed, Peter is invariably mentioned first. In what may be a grouping of Petrine material (Matthew 16:18, 19) Jesus gave to Simon the title of Cephas, or Peter (from Greek petra). Matthew continues that upon this rock—that is, upon Peter—the church will be built. The word church in the Gospel is to be understood as referring to the community of the faithful rather than to a definite ecclesiastical organization.

Given the information supplied by the Gospels, it is not unexpected that Peter should emerge immediately after Jesus' death as the leader of the earliest church. For approximately 15 years after the RESURRECTION, the figure of Peter dominated the community. It was Peter who first “raised his voice” and preached at PENTECOST, the day when the church came into being (Acts 1:14–39). It was Peter who served as an advocate for the Apostles before the Jewish religious court in Jerusalem (Acts 4:5–22). Peter likewise led the Twelve Apostles in extending the church “here and there among them all” (Acts 9:32), going first to the SAMARITANS (Acts 8:4–17), then venturing to the Mediterranean coast (Acts 9:36–43; 10:1–11:18), where he introduced GENTILES into the church. In accepting the Gentiles and ordering “them to be baptized in the name of Jesus Christ” (Acts 10:48) without submission to the prior rite of CIRCUMCISION, Peter introduced an innovation that insured the opposition of the Jewish Christians and others. Soon the unchallenged leadership of Peter in Jerusalem came to an end.

The problems surrounding the residence, martyrdom, and burial of Peter are among the most complicated of all those encountered in the study of the NEW TESTAMENT and the early church. The absence of any reference in Acts or Romans to a residence of Peter in Rome gives pause but is not conclusive. It may be said that by the end of the 1st century there existed a tradition that Peter had lived in Rome. It is probable that the tradition of a 25-year episcopate of Peter in Rome is not earlier than the beginning or the middle of the 3rd century. The claims that the church of Rome was founded by Peter or that he served as its first bishop are in dispute and rest on evidence that is not earlier than the middle or late 2nd century. Words of John 21:18, 19 clearly allude to the death of Peter and are cast into the literary form of PROPHECY. The author of this chapter is aware of a tradition concerning the martyrdom of Peter when the Apostle was an old man. And there is a possible reference here to CRUCIFIXION as the manner of his death. But as to when or where the death took place there is not so much as a hint. Archaeological investigation has not solved the question of the location of the tomb of Peter.

PETTAZZONI, RAFFAELE \ˈpet-tād-ˈdzō-nē\ (b. Feb. 3, 1883, Persiceto, Italy—d. Dec. 8, 1959, Rome), Italian historian of religions and educator, a founder and president (1950–59) of the International Association for the Study of History of Religions. His comparative works include Dio, formazione e sviluppo del monoteismo nella storia delle religioni (1922; "God, the Formation and Development of Monotheism in the History of Religions"), La confessione dei peccati, 3 vol. (1929–35; "The Confession of Sins"), L'essere supremo nelle religioni primitive (1957; "The Supreme Being in Primitive Religions"), and Essays on the History of Religions (1954).

PEYOTE \pā-ˈō-tē\, also called mescal-button \me-ˈskal\, two species of the cactus genus Lophophora, native to North America, almost exclusively to Mexico.

Peyote, well known for its hallucinogenic effects, contains at least 28 alkaloids, the principal one of which is mescaline. Peyote figures prominently in old religious rituals of certain Native American peoples and in the ritual of the NATIVE AMERICAN CHURCH.

PHAETHON \ˈfā-ə-thən, -thän\ (Greek: "Shining," or "Radiant"), in Greek mythology, son of HELIOS and a woman or NYMPH variously identified as Clymene, Prote, or Rhode. Taunted with illegitimacy, Phaethon appealed to his father, who swore to prove his paternity by giving him whatever he wanted. Phaethon asked to be allowed to drive the chariot of the sun for a single day. Helios, bound by his OATH, had to let him make the attempt. Phaethon was unable to control the horses of the sun chariot, which came too near to the earth and began to scorch it. To prevent further damage, ZEUS killed Phaethon with a thunderbolt; he fell to the earth at the mouth of the river Eridanus.

PHALLICISM \ˈfa-lə-,si-zəm\, worship of the generative principle as symbolized by the sexual organs or the act of sexual intercourse.

The most important forms of sexual rituals are those in which intercourse is believed to promote fertility, those that release a flood of creative energy by breaking boundaries and by returning a culture to the state of primeval and powerful CHAOS, or those in which sexual intercourse symbolizes the bringing together of opposites (e.g., alchemy or Tantrism, a Hindu esoteric meditation system).

In other traditions objects of adoration are representations of the sexual organs (e.g., the phallus borne in Dionysian PROCESSIONS in Greece and Rome; the male LINGA and female YONI in India) or deities with prominent genitals (e.g., PRIAPUS in Rome, PAN in Greece). In these instances, the powers of creativity that the sexual organ represents, rather than the organ itself, are worshiped.

PHARISEES \ˈfar-ə-,sēz\, political party in the Land of Israel in the second and first centuries BCE, later on represented by the Christian Gospels and certain rabbinic traditions also as a religious sect in the first century CE. The sect was characterized by the belief in life after death and the revelation of "traditions of the fathers," and by the practice of requiring purity not only in the Temple, where the TORAH required it, but also in eating ordinary meals at home.

The Pharisees are of special interest for two reasons. First, they are mentioned in the SYNOPTIC GOSPELS as contemporaries of Jesus, represented sometimes as hostile, sometimes as neutral, and sometimes as friendly to the early Christians represented by Jesus. Second, they are commonly supposed to stand behind the authorities who, in the second century, made up the materials that come to us in the MISHNAH, the first important document, after SCRIPTURE, of JUDAISM in its classical or normative form. Hence the Mishnah and some related writings are alleged to rest upon traditions going back to the Pharisees before 70 CE. However, these views impute to the Pharisees greater importance than they are likely to have enjoyed in their own day.

Three discrete sources refer to Pharisees: (1) the Gospels (c. 70–90 CE), (2) the historical writings of JOSEPHUS (c. 90–100 CE), and (3) the later rabbinic compositions, beginning with the Mishnah (c. 200–600 CE). No writings survive that were produced by the Pharisees themselves; all we do know is what later writers said about them.

These sources have little in common in the picture they give of the Pharisees. On the one hand, in Josephus' historical work the Pharisees appear as a political party which tried to gain control of the government of Jewish Palestine. On the other hand, the rabbinic traditions about the Pharisees present them as forming a rather self-centered group, concerned with its internal issues, its own laws, and its own partisan conflicts. Of the rabbinic traditions that allude to persons or groups we assume to have been Pharisees, approximately two-thirds deal with dietary laws. These laws concern (1) ritual purity for meals and (2) agricultural rules governing the fitness of food for Pharisaeic consumption, with observance of SABBATHS and festivals a distant third. Pharisaeic laws deal not with the governance of the country but with the party's rules for table-fellowship. The political issues are not whether one should pay taxes to Rome or how one should know the MESSIAH, but whether in the Temple the rule of Shammai or that of HILLEL should be followed in a minor festal sacrifice. Josephus' portrayal thus has little, if anything, in common with the rabbis' portrait, except the rather general allegation that the Pharisees had "traditions from the fathers," a point made also by the Synoptic Gospels.

A similar difficulty arises in terms of chronology. Josephus' Pharisees are important in the reigns of John Hyrcanus and Alexander Jannaeus but drop from the picture after Alexandra Salome. But the Synoptics' Pharisees are much like those of the rabbis; they belong to the Roman period, and their legal agenda is virtually identical, including such issues as tithing, purity laws, Sabbath-observance, and vows. The question of who the Pharisees were, and the conflicts in which they figured, is still open to debate.

PHERECYDES OF SYROS \,fēr-ə-'sī-dēz . . . 'sī-rās\ (fl. c. 550 BCE), Greek mythographer and cosmogonist traditionally associated with the Seven Wise Men of Greece (especially Thales). Pherecydes is credited with originating metempsychosis, a doctrine that holds the human soul to be immortal, passing into another body, either human or animal, after death. He is also known as the author of Heptamychos, a work, extant in fragments only, describing the origin of the world. Pherecydes was characterized by Aristotle as a theologian who mixed philosophy and myth. Tradition says that he was the teacher of Pythagoras.

PHILEMON AND BAUCIS \fī-'lē-mən, fī- . . . 'bō-sis\, in Greek mythology, pious Phrygian couple who hospitably received ZEUS and HERMES when their richer neighbors turned away the two gods, who were disguised as wayfarers. As a reward, they were saved from a flood that drowned the rest of the country; their cottage was turned into a temple, and at their own request they became priest and priestess of it. Long after, they were granted their wish to die at the same moment, being turned into trees.

PHILOCTETES \fī-läk-'tē-tēz\, Greek legendary hero who played a decisive part in the final stages of the Trojan War.

He (or his father, Poeas) had been bequeathed the bow and arrows of HERACLES in return for lighting his funeral pyre; Philoctetes thus became a notable archer. En route to Troy he was incapacitated by a snakebite and was left behind. After a seer revealed that Troy could be taken only with the aid of Heracles' bow, ODYSSEUS and DIOMEDES persuaded Philoctetes to accompany them to Troy. There he was healed of his wound and killed PARIS. He returned home but later wandered as a colonist to southern Italy, where he ultimately died in battle. This story was used as the basis of Sophocles' tragedy Philoctetes.

PHILO JUDAEUS \fī-lō-jü-'dē-əs\, also called Philo of Alexandria (b. 15–10 BCE, Alexandria—d. 45–50 CE, Alexandria), Greek-speaking Jewish philosopher, the most important representative of Hellenistic JUDAISM. His writings provide the clearest view of this development of Judaism in the Diaspora. As the first to attempt to synthesize revealed faith and philosophic reason, he occupies a unique position in the history of philosophy. He is also regarded by Christians as a forerunner of Christian theology.

Philo's works include scriptural essays and homilies based on specific verses or topics of the PENTATEUCH, especially GENESIS, general philosophical and religious essays, and essays on contemporary subjects (including defenses of the Jews against anti-Semitic charges). A number of works ascribed to Philo are almost certainly spurious. Most important of these is Biblical Antiquities, an imaginative reconstruction of Jewish history from Adam to the death of SAUL, the first king of Israel.

The key influences on Philo's philosophy were Plato, Aristotle, the Neo-Pythagoreans, the Cynics, and the Stoics. Philo's basic philosophic outlook is Platonic; his reverence for Plato is such that he never took open issue with him, as he did with the Stoics and other philosophers. To Aristotle he was indebted primarily in matters of COSMOLOGY and ethics. To the Neo-Pythagoreans he owed his views on the mystic significance of numbers and the scheme of a peculiar, self-disciplined way of life as a preparation for immortality. The Cynics, with their diatribes, influenced him in the form of his sermons. Though Philo more often employed the terminology of the Stoics than that of any other school, he was critical of their thoughts.

Philo was the first to distinguish between the knowability of God's existence and the unknowability of his essence. He was equally original in insisting on an individual Providence able to suspend the laws of nature in contrast to the prevailing Greek philosophical view of a universal Providence who is himself subject to the laws of nature. Philo saw the cosmos as a great chain of being presided over by the LOGOS, which is the mediator between God and the world, though at one point he identifies the Logos as a second God. In anticipation of Christian doctrine he called the Logos the first-begotten Son of God, the man of God, the image of God, and second to God.

In his ethical theory Philo described two virtues that are otherwise unknown in Greek philosophic literature—religious faith and humanity. Like Plato, Philo regarded the body as the prison house of the soul, and in his DUALISM of body and soul he anticipated much of Gnostic thought. But unlike the Greek philosophers who believed in limited freedom of will, Philo held that man is completely free to act against all the laws of his own nature. Perfect happiness comes, however, not through men's own efforts to achieve virtue but only through the GRACE of God.

PHILOKALIA \,fē-lō-kä-'lē-ä, ,fī-lō-, -'kä-lē-ä, -'kä-lē-ä\ (Greek: "Love of the Good, the Beautiful"), prose anthology of Greek Christian monastic texts that was part of a movement for spiritual renewal in Eastern MONASTICISM and Orthodox devotional life in general. Compiled by the Greek monk Nikodimos and by Makarios, the bishop of Corinth, the Philokalia was first published in Venice in 1782 and gathered the unpublished writings of all major Hesychasts (see HESYCHASM) of the Christian East, from EVAGRIUS PONTICUS to ST. GREGORY PALAMAS.

The Philokalia is concerned with "inner ASCETICISM," which means, above all, daily recollection of death and judgment, together with perpetual remembrance of God as omnipresent and omnipotent, and ceaseless prayer. It is through this compilation that the tradition of Gregory Palamas prescribing the "prayer of the mind," or Jesus prayer, uttered in a particular bodily position with a special way of breathing, became better known and gained new followers among Orthodox as well as Western Christians.

The Philokalia had great success in the Slavic countries, especially Russia, and a Church Slavonic version appeared in 1793 in St. Petersburg under the title of Dobrotoliubie. It was translated by the starets (spiritual leader) Paissy Velitchkovsky, who introduced a neo-Hesychast spiritual renewal into Russian and Moldavian monasticism. Whereas in Greece the Philokalia apparently had little influence outside certain schools of monasticism (although attempts were made to reach a wider public with new editions in 1867 and 1957), the Church Slavonic version became, through the influence of the startsy, one of the favorite spiritual books of all classes of Russian laity during the 19th century. In 1877 Feofan Zatvornik (Theophanes the Recluse), the former bishop of Tambov, compiled a Russian version.

PHOCUS \'fō-kəs\, in Greek mythology, son of AEACUS, king of Aegina, and the NEREID Psamathe, who had assumed the likeness of a seal (Greek: phoce) in trying to escape Aeacus' embraces. PELEUS and Telamon, Aeacus' legitimate sons, resented Phocus' athletic prowess. At the instigation of their mother, Endeis, they plotted his death, drawing lots to decide who should destroy him. The lot fell to Telamon, who murdered Phocus, feigning an accident. Aeacus discovered the truth and banished both his sons.

PHOEBE \ˈfē-bē\, in Greek mythology, a TITAN, daughter of OURANUS and GAEA. By Coeus she was the mother of LETO and grandmother of APOLLO and ARTEMIS. She was also the mother of Asteria and HECATE. In later mythology she was identified with the moon.

PHOENIX \ˈfē-niks\, in ancient Egypt and in classical antiquity, fabulous bird associated with the worship of the sun. The Egyptian phoenix was said to be as large as an eagle, with brilliant scarlet and gold plumage and a melodious cry. Only one phoenix existed at any time, and it was very long-lived—no ancient authority gave it a life span of less than 500 years. As its end approached, the phoenix fashioned a nest of aromatic boughs and spices, set it on fire, and was consumed in the flames. From the pyre miraculously sprang a new phoenix, which, after embalming its father's ashes in an egg of myrrh, flew with the ashes to HELIOPOLIS ("City of the Sun") in Egypt, where it deposited them on the altar in the temple of the Egyptian god of the sun, RE. A variant of the story made the dying phoenix fly to Heliopolis and immolate itself in the altar fire, from which the young phoenix then rose.

The Egyptians associated the phoenix with immortality, and that symbolism had a widespread appeal in late antiquity. The phoenix was compared to undying Rome, and it appears on the coinage of the late Roman Empire as a symbol of the Eternal City. As an ALLEGORY of RESURRECTION and life after death it also appealed to emergent CHRISTIANITY.

In Islamic mythology the phoenix was identified with the 'anqā' (Persian: sīmorgh), a huge, mysterious bird (probably a heron) that was created by God with all perfections but had thereafter become a plague and was killed.

PHOENIX \ˈfē-niks\, in Greek mythology, son of Amyntor, king of Thessalian Hellas. After a violent quarrel Amyntor cursed him with childlessness, and Phoenix escaped to PELEUS, who entrusted him with the upbringing of ACHILLES. Phoenix accompanied Achilles to Troy and was one of the envoys who tried to reconcile him with AGAMEMNON after the two had quarreled.

In another version, Amyntor blinded his son, whose sight was later restored by CHIRON.

PHOTIUS, SAINT \ˈfō-shē-əs\ (b. c. 820, Constantinople [now Istanbul, Tur.]—d. Feb. 6, 891?, Bordi, Armenia; canonized 10th century?; feast day February 6), PATRIARCH of Constantinople (858–867 and 877–886), defender of the autonomous traditions of his church against Rome, and leading figure of the 9th-century Byzantine renaissance.

Photius became a distinguished teacher. A circle gathered around him for regular readings in classical and Christian literature, including medical and scientific works. On the basis of notes taken at these readings, which continued after he left the schools for the civil service, he composed his Myriobiblon or Bibliotheca (Bibliothēkē), a digest of Greek prose, with more than 270 articles.

He became first secretary of state, probably before 855, and in 858 he was promoted through all the ecclesiastical orders to be made patriarch of Constantinople on CHRISTMAS Day, replacing the austere Ignatius. The deposition of Ignatius offended not only the Studites and other monks, who objected to the promotion of a civil servant, but also Pope Nicholas I, who did not understand the role of laymen educated in theology and in Byzantine civilization.

Photius offended him further by refusing to restore DIOCESES transferred from the Roman to the Byzantine patriarchate during the ICONOCLASTIC CONTROVERSY. The importance of these dioceses had been increased by the conversion to CHRISTIANITY of leading chiefs among the Slavonic nations (the Moravians, Croats, and Bulgarians); jurisdictionally they might belong to either the Roman or the Byzantine patriarchate.

As conflicts developed among Roman, German, and Byzantine missions, Photius wrote a circular letter to the other Eastern patriarchs complaining of theological, liturgical, and other innovations by Latin missionaries in Bulgaria. At a council in Constantinople in 867, he condemned and excommunicated Nicholas I, who had refused to recognize him as the lawful patriarch—thus bringing about the Photian Schism—and in letters to other bishops had represented him as a persistent adversary of the West.

When he protested the murder of the emperor Michael III by Basil the Macedonian, Photius was deposed and Ignatius was restored. Pope Adrian II, who had just succeeded Nicholas I at Rome, now envisioned a settlement of the differences between Rome and Constantinople. The terms proposed by his legates to a council in Constantinople in 869–870, however, were unacceptable to many Byzantine ecclesiastics. Ignatius himself in 870 consecrated bishops for Bulgaria. Without help from the friends of Photius, however, he could neither reach a satisfactory settlement between East and West nor solve the internal problems of the Byzantine Orthodox church.

Photius returned to the court before 876 as tutor to the princes of the imperial family, and at the death of Ignatius in 877 or 878 he also returned to the patriarchate. He now won support from Rome, since Pope John VIII was in need of Byzantine naval assistance against the Moors, who were harrying the Italian coastline. The pope sent legates to a new council at the church of HAGIA SOPHIA in Constantinople in 879–880. In the resulting settlement, Bulgaria was assigned to the Roman patriarchate, but the continued presence of Greek bishops secured its cultural links with the East. Bulgaria soon became a center from which the Byzantine liturgy in the language of the Macedonian Slavs spread to other Slavonic-speaking lands.

Rome did not press its claims to Greek dioceses in Italy and Greece, and the Roman legates consented to the Byzantine demand to condemn Western additions to the NICENE CREED, without explicit mention of the contentious use of the word FILIOQUE (Latin: "and the Son"), whereby the HOLY SPIRIT was said to proceed from the Father "and the Son." This interpolation had been introduced into the Nicene Creed in Spain and had spread among the Franks, but it was not yet in use in Rome. Photius' Latin was limited, and on the filioque controversy his information was inadequate, though he showed more understanding of the question in his later work on The Mystagogia of the Holy Spirit, completed in or after his second patriarchate. In 886 Photius resigned the patriarchate on the accession to the throne of his pupil the emperor Leo VI.

PHYLACTERY, Hebrew tefillin, also spelled tephillin, or fillin, in JUDAISM, one of two small, black leather, cube-shaped cases containing TORAH texts written on parchment, which are to be worn by male Jews of 13 years and older as reminders of God and of the obligation to keep the Law during daily life (Deuteronomy 6:8, 11:18; EXODUS 13:9, 16).

According to rabbinic regulations, one of the phylacteries is worn on the left hand and arm facing the heart and the other on the forehead at the morning service (except on the SABBATH and festivals) and at the afternoon service on the Ninth of Av. They are worn in a prescribed manner so as to represent the letters shin, daleth, and yod, which together form the divine name Shaddai. The hand phylactery (tefillin shel yad) has one compartment with the texts written on a single parchment; the head phylactery (tefillin shel rosh) has four compartments, each with one text. The extracts are Exodus 13:1–10, 11–16; Deuteronomy 6:4–9, 11:13–21.

PICUS \ˈpī-kəs\, in Roman mythology, woodpecker sacred to the god MARS. It was widely worshiped in ancient Italy and developed into a minor god. Picus was associated particularly with the fertilization of the soil with manure. The woodpecker was also an important bird in AUGURY.

Later rationalizations made Picus an early king of Italy. Virgil made him son of SATURN, father of FAUNUS, and grandfather of LATINUS. According to Ovid, his bride, CIRCE, changed him into a woodpecker for reasons of unrequited love. As son of Saturn he later came to be identified with ZEUS. His earliest representations were as a wooden pillar mounted with the image of a woodpecker. Later he was shown as a youth with a woodpecker on his head. In zoology, Picus is a genus of woodpecker.

PIDYON HA-BEN \pēd-ˈyōn-hä-ˈben, ˈpid-yən-hə-ˈben\ (Hebrew: "redemption of the son"), Jewish ceremony in which the father redeems his wife's firstborn son by offering to a KOHEN the equivalent of five silver shekels (ancient coins). The ceremony, which normally takes place 30 days after the child's birth, dates from OLD TESTAMENT times, when the firstborn sons of the Israelites were spared from death on the first PASSOVER (EXODUS 12). These children subsequently belonged to God in a special way and would have constituted the Jewish PRIESTHOOD had not the LEVITES been substituted in their place. Pidyon ha-ben thus commemorates a historical event, for the father ritually gives money to a kohen in order to keep his son. If the father is a kohen or if either parent is related to the tribe of Levi, such children already belong to God by reason of heredity, and no redemption is required. Pidyon ha-ben also acknowledges the general law that, in the broadest sense, all "first fruits" (including grain, animals, and fruit) rightfully belong to God.

PIETAS \ˈpī-ə-tas, ˈpē-ə-tās\, in ROMAN RELIGION, personification of a respect of gods, country, and relatives, especially parents. Pietas had a temple at Rome, dedicated in 181 BCE, and was often represented on coins as a female figure carrying a palm branch and a sceptre or as a matron casting incense upon an altar, sometimes accompanied by a stork, the symbol of FILIAL PIETY.

PIETISM \ˈpī-ə-ti-zəm\, influential religious reform movement that began in German LUTHERANISM in the 17th century. Emphasizing personal faith in protest against secularization in the church, Pietism spread and later expanded its emphases to include social and educational concerns.

Throughout Christian history, pietistic movements have arisen whenever religion has seemed to become divorced from experience. By the beginning of the 17th century, Lutheranism had hardened into a scholastic system, but out of the devastation wrought by the Thirty Years' War there appeared some notable signs of renewal. Interest was awakened in devotional literature and the pious mystical tradition. Influences of English PURITANISM reached the European continent through the translation of works by Richard Baxter, John Bunyan, and others. Religious exiles in the Netherlands, among them William Ames, generated a distinctive brand of Dutch Pietism that soon spread into Germany as part of the reform movement that had already begun to take shape in German Lutheran circles as "Reform Orthodoxy," which found its highest expression and widest audience in the writings of Johann Arndt (1555–1621).

The various streams of the renewal movement converged in the life and work of PHILIPP JAKOB SPENER (1635–1705), who organized the first collegia pietatis (“assemblies of piety”), in which lay Christians met regularly for devotional reading and spiritual exchange. The practice quickly became characteristic of the movement, and those who attended the conventicles acquired the name Pietists. In his most famous work, Pia Desideria (1675; Pious Desires), Spener assessed orthodoxes’ weaknesses and advanced proposals for reform: (1) greater private and public use of the SCRIPTURES, (2) greater assumption by the laity of their priestly responsibilities as believers, (3) the importance of bearing the practical fruits of a living faith, (4) ministerial training that emphasized piety and learning rather than disputation, and (5) preaching with the aim of edification.

From Spener, the leadership of German Pietism eventually passed to August Hermann Francke (1663–1727) of the University of Halle. Francke’s capable leadership made Halle a thriving institutional center of Pietism. Among the illustrious figures sent out from Halle was Henry Melchior Mühlenberg, the organizer of colonial American Lutheranism. Another Halle alumnus, Nikolaus Ludwig, count von Zinzendorf (1700–60), founded the MORAVIAN CHURCH among Pietist-influenced Moravian refugees on his estate in Saxony. In contrast to the Halle Pietists’ demand for penitential remorse, Zinzendorf’s followers preached belief in Christ’s ATONEMENT as the only requisite for salvation.

JOHN WESLEY, the founder of METHODISM, received his inspiration among the Moravians and incorporated important Pietistic elements, such as the emphasis on saving GRACE, into his evangelical movement. Other denominations felt the influence of Pietism on pastoral theology, MISSION activity, and modes of worship. It was under the influence of Pietism that the foreign missionary enterprise, which had been neglected in Lutheranism, received a new lease on life. The zenith of Pietism had been reached by the mid-18th century, but the movement still survives, both explicitly in parts of Germany and in the Moravian church elsewhere and implicitly in evangelical PROTESTANTISM at large. The revival movements of the 19th and 20th centuries were connected directly or indirectly with Pietism, which in its turn received stimulation from them.

PILATE, PONTIUS \ˈpān-chəs-ˈpī-lət, ˈpən-\ (d. after 36 CE), Roman prefect (governor) of Judaea (26–36 CE) under the emperor Tiberius; he presided at the trial of JESUS and gave the order for his CRUCIFIXION.

According to the traditional account of his life, Pilate was a Roman equestrian (knight) of the Samnite clan of the Pontii (hence his name Pontius). He was appointed prefect of Judaea through the intervention of Sejanus, a favorite of the Roman emperor Tiberius. Protected by Sejanus, he incurred the enmity of the Jews by insulting their religious sensibilities, as when he hung worship images of the Emperor throughout Jerusalem and had coins bearing PAGAN religious symbols minted. After Sejanus’ fall (31 CE) the Jews may have capitalized on his vulnerability by obtaining a death sentence on Jesus (John 19:12). The SAMARITANS reported him to Vitellius, legate of Syria, after he attacked them on Mt. Gerizim in 36. He was ordered back to Rome to stand trial for cruelty and oppression, particularly on the charge that he executed men without proper trial. According to an uncertain 4th-century tradition, Pilate killed himself on orders from Emperor Caligula in 39.

The historian FLAVIUS JOSEPHUS’ references to Pilate picture a strong-willed, authoritarian Roman leader who was, nevertheless, both rational and practical and who knew how far he should go in a given case. The NEW TESTAMENT, however, suggests a weak, vacillating personality. Would the mob be just as happy if he released Jesus instead of Barabbas on the feast day (Mark 15:6 ff.)? Pilate weakly capitulates. His wife sends him word of her dream (Matthew 27:19), and Pilate abdicates his responsibility. In John’s Gospel, Pilate is depicted as having accepted the Christian interpretation of the meaning of Jesus (John 19:7–11), and he rejects the Jews’ reminder that Jesus has merely said that he is “the king of the Jews” (19:21). Clearly, as an index to the character and personality of Pilate, the New Testament is devastating. Eventually, in Christian tradition, Pilate and his wife became converts, and the latter is a saint in the Eastern church.

PILGRIMAGE, journey to a shrine or other sacred place undertaken to gain supernatural help, as an act of thanksgiving or penance, or for the sake of devotion.

Records indicate that Christian pilgrimages were made to Jerusalem as early as the 2nd century. The Roman liturgical calendar of the year 354 CE lists 29 local sanctuaries of the saints at which the faithful gathered annually.

The medieval Christian pilgrim began his journey with a blessing by a priest. His garb was recognizable, and on his return trip he would wear on his hat the badge of the shrine visited. Along the way he would find hospices set up specifically for pilgrims. The chief attractions for pilgrims in medieval times were the Holy Land, Santiago de Compostela in Spain, and Rome; but there were hundreds of pilgrim resorts of more local reputation, including the tombs of ST. FRANCIS (died 1226) in Assisi, Italy; of ST. MARTIN (died 397) in Tours, France; of ST. BONIFACE (died 754) in Fulda, Ger.; of THOMAS BECKET (died 1170) at Canterbury, Eng.; and of ST. PATRICK at Downpatrick, Ire.

Though many medieval centers still attract ROMAN CATHOLIC pilgrims, the more recent shrines of ST. FRANCIS XAVIER (died 1552) in Goa, India; of the SHROUD OF TURIN (1578) at Turin, Italy; of St. Anne de Beaupré (1658) in Canada; of St. Jean-Baptiste-Marie Vianney (died 1859) at Ars and of St. Thérèse de Lisieux (died 1897) at Lisieux, both in France; and the Marian centers of Our Lady of Guadalupe (1531) in Mexico, of La Salette (1846) and LOURDES (1858) in France, of Fátima (1917) in Portugal; and Medjugorje (1981 and continuing) in Bosnia and Herzegovina have grown steadily in importance. Eastern Orthodox Christians commonly make pilgrimages to celebrated monasteries to ask for spiritual and practical help from the holy men (starsy). The attitude of the 16th-century Protestant Reformers found expression in 1530 in the AUGSBURG CONFESSION, which portrayed pilgrimages as “childish and useless works.”

Pilgrimages became an important component in the life of the Buddhist community already within the first two centuries following the BUDDHA GOTAMA’s death. During these early centuries of Buddhist history there were at least four major pilgrimage centers—the place of the Buddha’s birth at Lumbini, the place of his enlightenment at BODH GAYA, the Deer Park in VARANASI (Benares) where he is said to have delivered his first sermon, and the village of Kusinara, which was recognized as the place of his parinirvāna (escape from the cycle of rebirth). During this period Bodh Gaya was the most important pilgrimage center, and it has continued to hold its preeminent position up to the present day.

In addition to these four primary sites, major pilgrimage centers have emerged in every region or country where BUD-

PILGRIM FESTIVALS

DHISM has been established. Many local temples have their own festivals associated with a relic enshrined there or an event in the life of a sacred figure. Some of these, such as the display of the tooth relic (TEMPLE OF THE TOOTH) at Kandy, Sri Lanka, are occasions for great celebrations attracting many pilgrims. In many Buddhist countries famous mountains have become sacred sites and centers of pilgrimage. In China, for example, four such sites are especially important: O-mei, Wu t'ai, P'u-t'o, and Chiu-hua. Each is devoted to a different BODHISATTVA, whose temples and monasteries are located on the mountainside. In many Buddhist regions there are pilgrimages that include stops at a whole series of sacred places. One of the most interesting and elaborate of these is the SHIKOKU pilgrimage in Japan, which involves visits to 88 temples located along a route that extends for more than 700 miles.

Within ISLAM the HAJJ, the pilgrimage to the holy city of MECCA in Saudi Arabia, is one of the PILLARS OF ISLAM and something which every adult Muslim must do at least once in his life. 'Umrah, the "minor pilgrimage" undertaken by Muslims whenever they enter Mecca, is often performed in combination with the hajj, but pilgrims have the choice of performing the 'umrah separately. As in the hajj, the pilgrim begins the 'umrah by assuming the state of ihram (ritual purity). Following a formal declaration of intent (nīyah) to perform the 'umrah, he enters Mecca and circles the sacred shrine of the KA'BA seven times. He may then touch the Black Stone, pray at the sacred stone Maqām Ibrāhīm, drink the holy water of the Zamzam spring, and touch the Black Stone again, though these ceremonies are supererogatory. The sa'y, running seven times between the hills of aṣ-Ṣafā and al-Marwah, and the ritual shaving of the head complete the 'umrah.

PILGRIM FESTIVALS, Hebrew Shalosh Regalim, in JUDAISM, the three occasions—PASSOVER, SHAVUOT, and SUKKOT—on which male Israelites were required to go to Jerusalem to offer sacrifice at the TEMPLE and bring offerings of their produce from the fields. In SYNAGOGUE liturgy, special Psalms (called collectively HALLEL) are read and prayers are recited that vary with the nature of the festival. Thus, the Song of Solomon is read on Passover, the Book of Ruth on Shavuot, and Ecclesiastes on Sukkot.

PIRITHOUS \pī-'ri-thō-əs\, also spelled Peirithous, in Greek mythology, companion of the hero THESEUS; it was his idea to make the descent into HADES to carry off PERSEPHONE. The two were detained there until HERACLES rescued THESEUS, but Pirithous was left behind.

Pirithous belonged to the Lapiths, a northern mountain tribe, and at his marriage to Hippodamia (daughter of Butes the beemaster) the CENTAURS, who had come to the wedding as guests, in drunken fury tried to rape the bride and her attendants; this led to the battle of the Lapiths and the Centaurs, a favorite subject of Greek art.

PĪTHĀ \pī-tā\ (Sanskrit), "seats," or "benches," of the Goddess, usually numbered at 108 and associated with the parts of the deity's body and with the various aspects of her divine female power, or śakti. Many of the 108 pīthās have become important PILGRIMAGE sites for members of the Śakti sects of HINDUISM.

The origin myth for the creation of the pīthās is recounted in several texts, most fully in the MAHĀBHĀRATA and the Brahma Purāṇa. The legend concerns the Goddess SATĪ, daughter of Dakṣa and wife of SHIVA. When Dakṣa held a great sacrifice and refused to invite Shiva and Satī, Satī took offence, came to the sacrifice uninvited, and there committed suicide. Shiva thereupon became enraged, killed Dakṣa, and destroyed the sacrifice. Carrying the body of Satī on his shoulder, he began a dance that threatened the cosmos. The gods, in order to stop Shiva's dance, caused the body of Satī to disintegrate, whereupon the parts of her body fell to earth.

The pīthās are scattered throughout India, with a concentration in West Bengal. Each pīthā is located on or near a body of water believed to be infused with the energy of the Goddess; here the pilgrims bathe. Many are also near trees that are identified with the Goddess as Earth Mother, and the images of the female deities at the pīthās are accompanied by the proper animal companions, or vāhanas. Every pīthā is associated with a manifestation of Shiva.

The pīthās are places where believers can interact and communicate with the manifest deity, and taken together they represent the Goddess' body on earth, as well as a symbol of the unity of all the various temples and traditions of ŚĀKTISM. See TĪRTHA.

PITR \pī-trē, -tər\, also spelled Pitṛi (Sanskrit: "father"), in HINDUISM, ancestral spirits or any of the dead who have been cremated or buried in accordance with the proper rites. In the VEDAS, the "fathers" shared with the gods in the sacrifice, though they received different offerings. The "way of the fathers," characterized by observance of sacrifice, almsgiving, and traditional austerities, came to be distinguished from the "way of the gods," which was directed toward the goal of liberation from rebirth.

PITTSBURGH PLATFORM, in JUDAISM, declaration drawn up by a conference of Reform RABBIS at Pittsburgh, Pa., in 1885. The platform declared that Judaism was an evolutionary, and no longer a national, faith. While the conference recognized the value of Jewish historical identity, it dissociated this from a continuity of tradition: the TALMUD was to be considered merely as religious literature, and not as legislation; meanwhile, Jews should no longer look forward to a return to Israel. The rationalist principles of the Pittsburgh Platform remained the official philosophy of the American Reform movement until the issuance of the COLUMBUS PLATFORM in 1937. See REFORM JUDAISM.

PIUS IX \pī-əs\, original name Giovanni Maria Mastai-Ferretti (b. May 13, 1792, Senigallia, Papal States—d. Feb. 7, 1878, Rome; beatified Oct. 3, 2000; feast day February 7), pope whose pontificate (1846–78) was the longest in history. Notable events of his reign included the declaration of the dogma of the IMMACULATE CONCEPTION (1854) and the sessions of the FIRST VATICAN COUNCIL (1869–70), during which the doctrine of PAPAL INFALLIBILITY was authoritatively defined.

Pius IX was the fourth son of Girolamo Mastai-Ferretti, gonfalonier of Senigallia, and the countess Caterina Solazzi. He first became prominent as archbishop of Spoleto from 1827 to 1832, a time of revolutionary disturbance. He was made bishop of the important DIOCESE of Imola in 1832 and CARDINAL in 1840.

At Pius' accession all of Europe agreed that the Papal States (see PAPACY) was in dire need of reform, with France, Austria, Russia, and Prussia urging a more representative government. In addition, the papacy was under attack by Italian nationalists as an instrument through which Austria maintained its domination over the peninsula. On March 14, 1848, Pius was compelled to grant a constitution establishing a two-chamber parliament with full legislative and fiscal powers subject only to the pope's personal veto. Pius claimed that his program of reform was merely the one long pressed upon the papacy by European powers, but it was seen as hostile to the national cause, and the papacy was never again able to appear in Italy as anything other than a bulwark of reaction.

To prevent revolution from breaking out in Rome itself, Pius consented to the appointment of popular ministries, but none of the appointees was able to control the situation and a radical ministry was installed. On November 24–25 he fled to Naples. In his absence a democratic republic was established. The papacy thereupon issued a formal appeal to the rulers of France, Austria, Spain, and Naples for assistance; Pius held out against any concessions and asserted his determination to exercise his temporal power without any restrictions whatsoever. A period of military and diplomatic maneuvers on the part of France and Austria resulted in the restoration of papal rule in April 1850.

Papal government formed a barrier to Italian unification, however. On Sept. 20, 1870, Italian troops occupied Rome, and in October an overwhelming majority voted for the incorporation of Rome in the kingdom of Italy. For the rest of his days Pius considered himself a prisoner in the Vatican. He refused any contact with the Italian government.

The doctrinal developments of Pius' pontificate sprang directly out of these political disasters. After 1850, Pius became increasingly convinced that the real danger to the church lay in the modern secular ideas that liberal Catholics were endeavoring to incorporate into its doctrines. The ENCYCLICAL Jamdudum Cernimus (1861) denounced all modern political doctrines, as Pius moved toward a new kind of Ultramontanism, one that would concentrate all church authority in the pope's hands.

Calls for greater freedom within the church and respect for the right of scholars to pursue independent inquiries made clear the need for authoritative pronouncements about the church's relations with the state and with modern society, and discussion began about the possibility of calling an ecumenical council for this purpose. But on Dec. 8, 1864, Pius issued the encyclical Quanta Cura with, attached to it, the famous Syllabus listing 80 of the "principal errors of our times"; the 80th article stigmatized the view that "the Roman Pontiff can and should reconcile himself to and agree with progress, liberalism, and modern civilization." The Syllabus completely undermined the liberal Catholics' position and destroyed their following among intellectuals.

In the doctrine of papal infallibility itself there was nothing new. It had been employed to define, on Dec. 8, 1854, the dogma of the Immaculate Conception. Its opponents objected, however, that the doctrine would be inopportune, tending to widen the breach between the church and modern society, and that it would present a one-sided view of the source of authority in the church. When the first Vatican Council opened on Dec. 8, 1869, however, Pius intervened to postpone all deliberation except that upon infallibility. The decisive vote came on July 13, when 451 voted for it, 88 against it, and 62 in favor of some amendment. Thereupon the minority left Rome and the final definition was carried on July 18 by 533 votes to 2. Infallibility was confined to those occasions upon which the pope made pronouncements ex cathedra ("from his chair," as supreme teacher) on matters of faith or morals.

During the remainder of his reign Pius became further estranged from the Italian government.

PIUS X, SAINT, original name Giuseppe Melchiorre Sarto (b. June 2, 1835, Riese, Venetia, Austrian Empire [now in Italy]—d. Aug. 20, 1914, Rome, Italy; canonized May 29, 1954; feast day August 21), pope from 1903 to 1914, whose staunch political and religious conservatism dominated the early 20th-century church.

Ordained in 1858, he became a PARISH priest in the Italian region of Venetia. POPE LEO XIII made him bishop of Mantua (1884) and in 1893 CARDINAL and PATRIARCH of Venice. He was elected pope on Aug. 4, 1903.

Tepid toward Leo's social reforms, Pius decided to concentrate on apostolic problems and to make the defense of ROMAN CATHOLICISM his cause. Three aspects of his policy particularly aroused bitter controversy: the repression of MODERNISM, a contemporary intellectual movement seeking to reinterpret traditional Catholic teaching in the light of 19th-century philosophical, historical, and psychological theories; his reaction against Christian Democrats; and his attitude toward separation of CHURCH AND STATE in France.

Because Modernism tended to ignore certain traditional values in order to achieve its ends, Pius placed several Modernist books on the INDEX OF FORBIDDEN BOOKS and issued (1907) the decree Lamentabili Sane Exitu (On a Deplorable Outcome) and the ENCYCLICAL Pascendi Dominici Gregis (Feeding the Lord's Flocks), rejecting Modernist teachings and suggesting remedies to extirpate it. He also urged immediate compliance with his strict censorship program. In 1910 he ordered that all teachers in seminaries and clerics before ORDINATION take an OATH denouncing Modernism and supporting Lamentabili and Pascendi.

Pius' opposition to Christian Democracy was a reaction to the trend in European countries where Christians reacted against doctrines of materialism by forming their own social movements or popular action groups independent of the church hierarchy. Accordingly, he formally condemned the Italian priest Romolo Murri's popular action movement in 1903 and the pioneering Christian Democrat Marc Sangnier's Sillon movement in France.

On Pius' accession, the separation of church and state in France was already inevitable, given growing anticlericalism in France. In 1905 the French formally separated church from state, an act condemned by Pius on Feb. 11, 1906. Most of the French bishops were willing to try the new French legislation, which safeguarded all that could still be preserved of the church's material interests, but Pius rejected the compromise.

Some of his directives, though outmoded by later social developments, mark him as one of the forerunners of Catholic Action, such as the organization of the laity for special and direct collaboration in the church's apostolic work. His eucharistic decrees eased the regulations governing daily communion, and his revival of the Gregorian plainsong and his recasting of the breviary and of the missal were important liturgical reforms. In many ways Pius X was the founder of the movement toward liturgical reforms that culminated with the SECOND VATICAN COUNCIL, and it was largely for this that he was canonized in 1954. His decision to adapt and systematize CANON LAW led to the publication of the new code in 1917, effective in 1918. His reorganization of the Curia modernized the church's central administration, including a codification of the conclave.

PIUS XII, original name Eugenio Maria Giuseppe Giovanni Pacelli (b. March 2, 1876, Rome, Italy—d. Oct. 9, 1958, Castel Gandolfo), pope of the ROMAN CATHOLIC church during World War II and the years of postwar reconstruction (reigned 1939–58).

Pacelli was born into a Tuscan family that had produced Vatican lawyers since 1819. He grew up in a home of deep piety and devotion to the PAPACY. He studied for the priesthood at the Gregorian University in Rome and was ordained in 1899. He rose rapidly through the ranks of the Vatican Secretariat of State; in 1917 he was made an archbishop and sent as nuncio to the Bavarian Court to negotiate a concordat. In 1925 he was sent to Berlin with the same aim; he remained there until 1929, when he was named a CARDINAL by Pius XI and recalled to Rome to serve as secretary of state. After 10 years in this office, he was elected pope in the shortest CONCLAVE since 1623.

In 1922, while Pacelli was in Germany, the Fascists took power in Italy. Pacelli's brother, a lawyer, helped to fashion the concordat (1929) with the dictator Benito Mussolini, which sacrificed the Catholic Popular Party and any chance of ousting Mussolini. This settlement created the Vatican city-state, as well as many problems for the Vatican's relations with the increasingly hostile dictatorship and with the uneasy democracy that succeeded it after the war.

Twelve years in Germany had made Pacelli fluent in German and had given him great love and respect for the German people, but he had no illusions about Nazism, and the concordat with Hitler's Germany (1933), largely his work, was (he said) a calculated risk, aimed at preserving a platform for Catholic life and ministry in a hostile German society. His part in the anti-Nazi ENCYCLICAL Mit brennender Sorge (1937; With Burning Sorrow), his frigid and outspoken reception of the Nazi foreign minister Joachim von Ribbentrop in Rome, and his bitter reproach of the Austrian cardinal Theodor Innitzer's weakness in response to Germany's annexation of Austria in 1938 demonstrated his attitude toward the German tyranny. During the few months between his election and the outbreak of war Pius XII turned his diplomatic gifts to preventing the catastrophe. He strove to keep Italy neutral and was saddened when he failed.

During the war Pius tried to spare Rome from aerial assault. After the Anglo-American bombardment of the city on July 19, 1943, he visited the wounded in the San Lorenzo quarter. When German troops occupied the city after Italy's surrender to the Allies in September 1943, Pius proclaimed it an "open city," and he came to be known as defensor civitatis ("defender of the city"). Several thousand antifascist politicians and Jews found refuge in church buildings during the German occupation. Less fortunate were 1,259 Romans rounded up in Jewish homes on the Sabbath, Oct. 16, 1943. The Vatican secured the release of 252 of these, who were either "Aryan" or the children of mixed marriages, but more than 1,000 Jews were transported to Auschwitz, where some 800 were killed.

After the war Pius refused to be drawn into a crusade against communism, though he did enact measures against Catholics collaborating with communists (1946). The balance between Christian Democrats and the extreme left in postwar Italy led him to encourage the Catholic Action leader Luigi Gedda, whose meddling in politics embarrassed the Christian Democratic Party. When Pius' failing health left power in the hands of a bureaucracy of cardinals, including the autocratic head of the Holy Office, Alfredo Ottaviani, clerical interference in Italian public life reached a high pitch.

In the encyclical Divino Afflante Spiritu (1943; "With the Help of the Divine Spirit") Pius ended the strict opposition to modern historical and biblical scholarship that had been church policy since PIUS X. Devoted to MARY, Pius in 1950 announced the dogma that she was bodily assumed into heaven, the sole infallible declaration made after the official proclamation of the doctrine of PAPAL INFALLIBILITY at the First VATICAN COUNCIL (1869–70). He also liberalized the rules for the period of FASTING before communion, took steps to revise the liturgy, made evening masses possible, and emphasized the role of the laity in the church.

The controversy that followed Pius throughout his life did not stop with his death. Although he was posthumously praised by world leaders and by Jewish groups for his actions during World War II on behalf of the persecuted, within a decade he was depicted as indifferent to the Nazi genocide in the play The Deputy (1963), by the German author Rolf Hochhuth. John Cornwell's controversial book on Pius, Hitler's Pope (1999), characterized him as anti-Semitic. Both portrayals, however, lack credible substantiation. Furthermore, although Pius' wartime public condemnations of racism and genocide were cloaked in generalities, he did not turn a blind eye to the suffering but chose to use diplomacy to aid the persecuted. It is impossible to know if a more forthright condemnation of the Holocaust would have proved more effective in saving lives, though it probably would have better assured his reputation. Not surprisingly, the move to beatify Pius XII in 2000 provoked a storm of controversy, and it was later decided that his beatification should be postponed.

PLATFORM SUTRA \ˈsü-trə\ (Chinese: Liu-Tsu t'an-ch'ing), important text from the Ch'an (ZEN) school of Chinese BUDDHISM, most likely composed in the 8th century CE. It is attributed to the sixth patriarch of the Ch'an tradition, HUI-NENG (638–713), though it is likely the work of disciples who sought to legitimate their school by devising a lineage of DHARMA masters back to BODHIDHARMA, the first patriarch. Hui-neng, who is portrayed in the Platform Sutra as an illiterate commoner, receives the robe of dharma transmission from Hung-jen, the fifth patriarch after Hui-neng defeats Shen-hsiu, a Northern scholar, in a contest of writing dharma verses that reveals true understanding of the nature of enlightenment; Hui-neng intuitively grasps the nature of enlightenment simply by hearing the Diamond Sutra (a MAHĀYĀNA Perfection of Wisdom sutra). The Platform Sutra encapsulates the debate between the Northern and Southern Ch'an schools concerning whether enlightenment was the result of prolonged study and attainment of levels of progress along the Buddhist path (the position of the Northern school), or an instantaneous grasp of the pure nature of one's mind (the position of the Southern school). The Platform Sutra thus represents the emergence and eventual dominance of the orthodox, Southern position, wherein it is held that the mind is pure by nature, and it advocates the methods of meditation and insight as the means to attain enlightenment.

PLEIADES \ˈplē-ə-dēz, ˈplā-, ˈplī-\, in Greek mythology, the daughters of ATLAS and the Oceanid Pleione: Maia, Electra, Taygete, Celaeno, Alcyone, Sterope, and Merope.

The Pleiades eventually formed a constellation. One myth recounts that they all killed themselves out of grief over the death of their sisters, the HYADES. Another explains that after seven years of being pursued by ORION, they were turned into stars by ZEUS. Orion became a constellation, too, and continued to pursue the sisters across the sky. The faintest star of the Pleiades was thought to be either Merope, who was ashamed of loving a mortal, or Electra, grieving for Troy, her son's city.

PL KYÖDAN \ˈkyō-dän\, in full Perfect Liberty Kyōdan, church (Japanese: kyōdan) founded in Japan in 1946 by Miki Tokuchika. The movement, unique for the use of English words in its name, is based on the earlier HITO-NO-MICHI sect. In the early 21st century the group claimed some 2,000,000 adherents worldwide.

PL Kyōdan teaches that the goal of humanity is joyful self-expression. Forgetting God brings suffering, but the believer may pray that his or her troubles be transferred by divine mediation to the patriarch, who is strengthened for vicarious suffering by the group's collective prayers.

The headquarters of the movement are at Habikino, near Ōsaka. PL Kyōdan operates a hospital, a golf course, and other sports facilities. Considerable missionary activity is carried on in Japan and among Japanese living abroad.

PLUTO \ˈplü-tō\; see PLUTUS.

PLUTUS \ˈplü-təs\, in GREEK RELIGION, a personification of wealth (Greek: ploutos). According to Hesiod, Plutus was born in Crete, the son of DEMETER and the Cretan IASION. In art he appears chiefly as a child with a CORNUCOPIA. Pluto, as a cognomen signifying "the wealthy," became an epithet for HADES in his milder, gentler aspect.

PLYMOUTH BRETHERN \ˈpli-məth\, community of Christians whose first congregation was established in Plymouth, Devon, Eng., in 1831. The movement originated in Ireland and England a few years earlier with groups who met for prayer and fellowship. John Nelson Darby, a former clergyman in the Church of Ireland (Anglican), founded groups of Brethren throughout Britain and in Europe, especially in Switzerland.

After Darby returned to England in 1845, disputes split the Brethren into two groups, one forming a closely knit federation of churches, the Exclusive Brethren, and the other, the Open Brethren, maintaining a congregational form of church government and less rigorous standards for membership. Exclusive Brethren have suffered further divisions.

Brethren recognize no order of clergy as distinct from the laity. A communion service is celebrated every Sunday. Most practice believer's BAPTISM, but some Exclusives, following Darby's practice, baptize children of members.

Brethren have been active in foreign missionary work, principally in Central Africa, India, and Latin America. Brethren are found throughout the English-speaking world and in most European countries. In the United States, which they reached in the 1860s, there are eight groups.

POHJOLA \ˈpöh-yō-lä\; see MANALA.

POLTERGEIST (from German poltern, "to make a racket"; Geist, "spirit"), disembodied spirit or supernatural force credited with malicious phenomena, such as noises, breakage of household items, or violent actions. Such events are said to be sporadic, unpredictable, and repetitive.

According to popular belief, a poltergeist's activity appears to concentrate on a particular member of a family, often an adolescent, its object being harassment or, rarely, physical harm. When strangers are present, the unusual phenomena often cease. The activities attributed to poltergeists are often explained as natural phenomena—e.g., the normal creaking of boards in an old house.

POLUDNITSA \pə-ˈlüd-nɪt-sə\, in Slavic MYTHOLOGY, female field spirit, generally seen as a tall woman or a girl dressed in white. The poludnitsa appears in the field at noon. Humans who disturb her risk their lives. The poludnitsa is related to the polevoy, the male field spirit, who is seen at noon in the fields. He is described as a man who is as black as the earth, with grass instead of hair growing out of his head. Others say he dresses in white. In some areas offerings are made to the polevoy to ensure fertility.

POLYMNIA \pä-ˈlim-nē-ə\, also called Polymnis \pä-ˈlim-nis\, or Polyhymnia \,pä-lē-ˈhim-nē-ə\, in GREEK RELIGION, one of the nine MUSES, patron of dancing or geometry. She was said to have been the mother of Triptolemus, the first priest of DEMETER and the inventor of agriculture. In other variants, she was the mother of ORPHEUS or of EROS.

POLYPHEMUS \,pä-li-ˈfē-məs\, in Greek mythology, most famous of the Cyclopes, son of POSEIDON and the NYMPH Thoësa. Homer relates that when ODYSSEUS, sailing home from the Trojan War, was cast ashore on the coast of Sicily, he fell into the hands of Polyphemus, who trapped him with 12 of his companions in his cave and then began eating them one by one. Odysseus succeeded in making Polyphemus drunk, blinded him by plunging a burning stake into his eye while he lay asleep, and, with his six remaining friends escaped by clinging to the bellies of Polyphemus' sheep as they were let out to pasture. Later tradition tells of his love for the Sicilian NEREID Galatea.

POLYTHEISM, the belief in many gods, which has characterized the majority of religions throughout history. The many gods may be subordinate to a supreme god and object of devotion (as in some stages of HINDUISM), or subordinate to an enlightened one (as in BUDDHISM), or subordinate to one god that is dominant though not supreme (as in GREEK RELIGION). In addition to belief in many gods, polytheistic cultures generally also include belief in many other malevolent or benevolent spiritual forces or powers. Compare MONOTHEISM.

POLYXENA \pə-'lik-sə-nə\, in Greek mythology, daughter of PRIAM and HECUBA. After the fall of Troy, she was claimed by the ghost of ACHILLES as his share of the spoils and was therefore put to death at his tomb. In post-classical times the story was elaborated to include a love affair between Polyxena and Achilles before his death.

POMERIUM \pō-'mir-ē-əm\, in ancient Rome, sacred open space located just inside the wall surrounding the four hills—the Esquiline, the Palatine, the Quirinal, and the Capitoline—of the early city. In historic times it was marked by stones and was extended several times. In most Italian walled cities, such spaces, which ran along the complete length of the city walls, were originally left clear to facilitate the maneuvering of defenders in times of attack. The space was also invested with religious significance, being dedicated to the gods in gratitude for their protection, and building and planting upon it remained forbidden. Religiously it marked the sacred space of the city as opposed to the "outside" where different rules applied. Long after Rome expanded beyond its pomerium, the legendary date of its demarcation—April 21—was celebrated as the anniversary of the city's foundation.

PONĠAL \pəŋ-gāl\, important Hindu festival in South India marking the beginning of the Tamil New Year. It is celebrated on the first day of the Tamil month of Tai (January–February).

The name of the festival comes from the Tamil word meaning "to boil"; rice is boiled in milk and offered first to the gods, then to the cows, and then to family members. During the festival, the anticipated greeting, "Has the rice boiled?" is answered, "It has boiled." Cows are especially venerated on the second day of Ponġal: their horns are painted, and they are garlanded with flowers and fruit, taken in PROCESSION, and allowed to graze freely.

PONTIFEX \pən-tə-'feks\, plural pontifices, member of a council of priests in ancient Rome. The college, or collegium, of the pontifices was the most important Roman PRIESTHOOD, being especially charged with the administration of the jus divinum (i.e., that part of the civil law that regulated the relations of the community with the deities recognized by the state), together with a general superintendence of the worship of gods and family.

The college existed under the monarchy, when its members were probably three in number; they probably were legal advisers of the rex in all matters of religion. Under the republic a pontifex maximus, or supreme priest, took over the king's duties as chief administrator of religious law. During the republican period the number of pontifices increased until by the time of Julius Caesar there were 16. Included in the collegium were also the rex sacrorum, the flamines, three assistant pontifices (minores), and the VESTAL VIRGINS, who were all chosen by the pontifex maximus. From the second Punic War onward the pontifex maximus was chosen by popular election, and in the last age of the republic this was true for all the members. They all held office for life.

The immense authority of the collegium centered in the pontifex maximus, the other pontifices forming his consilium, or advising body. His functions were partly sacrificial or ritualistic, but the real power lay in the administration of the jus divinum, the chief departments of which may briefly be described as follows: (1) the regulation of all expiatory ceremonies needed as the result of pestilence, lightning, etc.; (2) the consecration of all temples and other sacred places and objects dedicated to the gods by the state through its magistrates; (3) the regulation of the calendar both astronomically and in detailed application to the public life of the state; (4) the administration of the law relating to burials and burying places and the worship of the Manes, or dead ancestors; (5) the superintendence of all marriages by confarreatio (i.e., originally, of all legal patrician marriages); and (6) the administration of the law of adoption and of testamentary succession. They had also the care of the state archives and of the lists of magistrates and kept records of their own decisions (commentarii) and the chief events (annales).

For the first three centuries of the republic it is probable that the pontifex maximus was its most powerful member. The office might be combined with a magistracy, and, though its powers were declaratory rather than executive, it may be described as quasi-magisterial. Under the later republic it was coveted chiefly for the great dignity of the position; Julius Caesar held it for the last 20 years of his life, and Augustus took it after the death of Lepidus in 12 BCE, after which it became inseparable from the office of the reigning emperor.

Pontifex was used of ROMAN CATHOLIC bishops and pontifex maximus of the pope by the end of the 4th century. In modern usage, both terms generally refer to the pope.

POOR CLARE \k'lar\, also called Clarissine, or Clarisse, member of any order of nuns descending from the FRANCISCAN order founded at Assisi, Italy, in 1212 by ST. CLARE OF ASSISI (1194–1253), a noblewoman who took a vow of poverty and became a follower of ST. FRANCIS OF ASSISI. She and her following of nuns, often called the Second Order of St. Francis, devoted themselves to a cloistered life of prayer and penance; but, when the society spread elsewhere in Europe, some communities accepted property and revenues. The society's rule was revised a number of times until, in 1263/64, Pope Urban IV issued a rule permitting common ownership of property, greater self-governance for the order, and other concessions. The monasteries adopting this rule came to be called the Urbanist Poor Clares, or, officially, the Order of St. Clare (O.S.C.), whereas those communities who continued to observe the stricter Rule of St. Clare (as revised in 1253) became known as the Primitives, or Poor Clares (P.C.). Early in the 15th century St. Colette of Corbie (1381–1447), in France, sought to reform the order, restoring the primitive observance in 17 monasteries during her lifetime and reasserting the strict principle of poverty; her followers came to be called the Colettine Poor Clares, or Poor Clares of St. Colette (P.C.C.), and today are located mostly in France. The Capuchin Sisters, originating in Naples in 1538, and the Alcantarines, of 1631, are also Poor Clares of the strict observance.

POPE (Latin papa, from Greek pappas, “father”), ecclesiastical title expressing affectionate respect, formerly given, especially from the 3rd to the 5th century, to any BISHOP and sometimes to PRIESTS. The title is still used in the East for the Orthodox PATRIARCH of Alexandria and for Orthodox priests, but, since about the 9th century, it has been reserved in the West for the bishop of Rome.

The official directory of the Holy See describes the office of the pope by the following titles: Bishop of Rome, VICAR of JESUS CHRIST, Successor of the Prince of the Apostles, Supreme Pontiff of the Western Church, Patriarch of the West, PRIMATE of Italy, Archbishop and METROPOLITAN of the Province of Rome, Sovereign of the State of Vatican City. The title pope or papa (abbreviated PP.) is officially used only as a less solemn style.

In CATHOLIC churches, the pope is regarded as the successor of ST. PETER (the head of the APOSTLES) and thus, as bishop of Rome, has supreme power of jurisdiction over the church in matters of faith, morals, discipline, and government. The understanding of papal primacy developed as the church developed, two notable factors being the role of Rome as the imperial city until the 5th century and the religious and political role of the bishop of Rome afterward.

The teaching of the Second VATICAN COUNCIL (1962–65) on the role of bishops counterbalanced the emphasis on papal prerogatives while maintaining the view that the authority of the bishops as a body cannot be separated from that of the pope as its head. Although EASTERN ORTHODOXY has long been willing to give the bishop of Rome the primacy of honor accorded to patriarchs, and, although many Protestants have appreciated the moral leadership shown by some popes, the Catholic doctrine was still a major obstacle to ecumenical efforts in the 20th century. See also PAPACY.

POPOL VUH \ˈpō-pōl-ˈvü, -ˈwük\ (Quiché: “Council Book”), MAYA document, an invaluable source of knowledge of ancient Mayan mythology, history, and culture. Written in Quiché (a Guatemalan Mayan language) with Spanish letters by a Mayan author or authors between 1554 and 1558, it chronicles the creation of man, the actions of the gods, the origin and history of the Quiché people, and the chronology of their kings down to 1550.

The original text, now lost, was discovered and translated at the beginning of the 18th century by a Guatemalan PARISH priest of Chichicastenango, Francisco Jiménez (or Ximénez).

POPULAR RELIGION, term often used in the past to describe the RELIGIOUS BELIEFS and practices of members of a society that are unsophisticated or opposite of an elite class. Thus many books have been written on “Popular TAOISM” in contrast to “Philosophical Taoism,” or “Popular HINDUISM” or BUDDHISM as opposed to the “Philosophical Hinduism” of ascetics and Buddhist monks. The use of “Popular Religion” usually indicates that a distinction is being drawn between religious classes in society relative to literacy or rationality; for instance, the mythic PURĀṆAS in Hinduism were often classified as belonging to “Popular Hinduism” in contrast to the UPANISHADS and philosophical literature of the ascetic or Brahminic elite.

POSEIDON \pə-ˈsī-dən\, in GREEK RELIGION, god of the sea and of water generally; he is to be distinguished from Pontus, the personification of the sea. Originally he was probably a god of fresh water and the underworld regions. Traditionally he was a son of CRONUS and RHEA, and was brother of ZEUS and HADES. When the three brothers deposed their father, the kingdom of the sea fell by lot to Poseidon. His weapon was the trident, but it may originally have been a long-handled fish spear.

Poseidon was also the god of earthquakes; his primary epithet was “Earth-Shaker,” and many of his oldest places of worship in Greece were inland. He was also closely associated with horses. He was the father of the winged horse PEGASUS by the winged monster MEDUSA. Most scholars agree that Poseidon was brought to Greece by the earliest Hellenes, who also probably introduced horses to the country.

Although Poseidon lost a contest for sovereignty over Attica to ATHENA, he was also worshiped there, particularly at

POSSESSION

Colonus, as hippios ("of horses"). Elsewhere he was associated with freshwater springs. Poseidon was the father of PELIAS and Neleus by Tyro, the daughter of Salmoneus, and thus became the divine ancestor of the royal families of Thessaly and Messenia. Otherwise his offspring were mostly GIANTS and savage creatures, such as ORION, ANTAEUS, and POLYPHEMUS.

The chief festival in Poseidon's honor was the Isthmia, the scene of famous athletic contests, celebrated in alternate years near the Isthmus of Corinth.

POSSESSION, in religious and folk traditions, condition characterized by unusual behavior and a personality change that is interpreted as evidence that the person is under the direct control of an external powerful spirit. Symptoms of spirit possession include violent or unusual movements, shrieking, groaning, and uttering strange speech. Occasionally a normally pious person becomes incapable of prayer, utters blasphemies, or exhibits terror or hatred of sacred persons or objects. CHRISTIANITY and some other religions allow for the possibility that some of these states have an evil transcendental cause.

In some traditions the "possessed" individual becomes ill and is regarded by his community as having committed some spiritual transgression; recovery is held to require expiation of his SIN, often by a sacrifice. In other traditions the "possessed" person is conceived as a medium for the controlling spirit and functions as an intermediary between spirits and humans. His major role is usually to diagnose and heal other spirit-afflicted individuals. In this tradition the trance behavior of the medium is often self-induced (autohypnotic); it may be stimulated by drugs, drumming, or collective hysteria. In his trance the medium appears genuinely insensible to ordinary stimuli.

POTALA PALACE \ˈpɒ-tə-lə\, winter palace of the DALAI LAMAS, located in Lhasa, Tibet, and built during the reign of Ngag-dbang-rgya-mtsho (1617–82). Potala exhibits a combination of Tibetan, Indian, and Chinese decorative and structural elements; its tiered, ornamented roof was of Indian inspiration, while its magnificent interior carving was inspired by Indian and Nepalese originals.

PRACTICAL LEARNING SCHOOL, Korean Silhak \ˈshēl-ˈhāk\, also spelled Sirhak, school of thought that came into existence in the midst of the chaotic conditions of 18th-century Korea, dedicated to a practical approach to statecraft, instead of the blind and uncritical following of Confucian teachings. The SILHAK school attacked NEO-CONFUCIANISM, particularly its formalism and concern with ritual. Members of the school originated many ideas for social reform, especially for land reform and the development of farming.

The greatest contribution to the Silhak school came from Yi Ik (1681–1763) and Pak Chi-won (1737–1805). Yi's concern was largely with such matters as land reform, farming, and the abolition of class barriers and slavery. Pak advocated the development of commerce and technology.

With the introduction of Western culture in the late 19th century, the Practical Learning school contributed to the development and spread of ideas that stimulated the gradual modernization of Korea.

PRADAKṢIṆA \prə-ˈdæk-shi-nə\, in HINDUISM and BUDDHISM, the rite of circumambulating in a clockwise direction an image, relic, shrine, or other sacred object. PILGRIMAGES sometimes consist of circumambulating an entire town or the GAṄGĀ (Ganges) River from source to sea and back, a trip that when undertaken on foot requires several years.

Explanations of the rite vary from the delineation of an area for a particular sacred purpose to an attempt to influence the course of events and produce good fortune by imitating the auspicious journey of the sun. Circumambulating in a counterclockwise movement, called prasavya, is observed in funeral and in certain Tantric ceremonies.

PRAJĀPATI \prə-ˈjā-pə-tē\ (Sanskrit: "Lord of Creatures"), one of the creator figures of the Vedic period of ancient India; later he came to be identified with BRAHMĀ, who gradually surpassed him in importance.

Early Vedic literature alludes to various primal figures, such as Hiraṇyagarbha ("Golden Embryo") and VIŚVAKARMAṆ ("All-Accomplishing"), and the title of Prajāpati was applied to more than one such figure. Later it signified one deity, the lord of all creatures. According to myth, Prajāpati produced the universe and all its beings after preparing himself by undergoing tapas (ascetic practices); other stories allude to his own creation from the primal waters. His female emanation was Vāc, the personification of the sacred word, but sometimes his female partner is given as Uṣas, the dawn, who is also regarded as his daughter.

Collectively, the Prajāpatis are the "mind born" children of Brahmā. They are generally considered to number 10, though some authorities reduce them to seven and relate them to the seven great ṛṣis (ancient sages).

PRAJÑĀPĀRAMITĀ \ˈprəg-,nyä-ˈpär-ə-mē-tä\ (Sanskrit: "Perfection of Wisdom"), body of sutras and their commentaries that represents the oldest of the major forms of MAHĀYĀNA Buddhism; the name also denotes the female personification of literature or of wisdom, sometimes called the Mother of All Buddhas.

The main creative period of Prajñāpāramitā thought extended from perhaps 100 BCE to 150 CE. In these works wisdom (prajna) becomes the supreme paramita and the primary avenue to NIRVANA. The best-known work from this period is the Aṣṭasāhasrikā ("8,000-Verse") Prajñā-pāramitā. The first Chinese translation appeared in 179 CE. Later, some 18 "portable editions" were forthcoming, the best known of which is the DIAMOND CUTTER SUTRA. Still later, schematic and scholastic commentaries were produced in the MĀDHYAMIKA ("Middle Way") monasteries of eastern India, thus introducing into the Prajñāpāramitā movement the same confining RATIONALISM against which it had reacted in the first place.

Of the personified Prajñāpāramitā the Chinese traveler FA-HSIEN described images of her in India as early as 400 CE, but all known existent images date from 800 or later. She is usually represented yellow or white in color, with one head and two arms (sometimes more), the hands in the teaching gesture (dharmacakra-mudrā) or holding a lotus and the sacred book. Also frequently associated with her are a ROSARY, sword (to cleave away ignorance), thunderbolt (VAJRA, symbolizing the EMPTINESS of the void), or begging bowl (renunciation of material goods being a prerequisite to the obtaining of wisdom).

PRAKṚTI AND PURUṢA \ˈprə-kri-tē . . . ˈpü-rü-shə\ (from Sanskrit prakṛti, "source," or "principal"; puruṣa, "person," or "spirit"), prakṛti also called pradhāna, in Indian philosophy, two fundamental concepts, the first designating material nature in its germinal state, eternal and beyond perception, while the second denotes the soul or self. In the dualistic philosophies of Sāṃkhya and YOGA, puruṣa is opposed to prakṛti, as the two ontological realities. Prakṛti, a feminine construct, comes into contact with puruṣa, a male construct, and starts on a process of evolution that leads through several stages to the creation of the existing material world. Prakṛti is made up of three guṇas ("strands," or constituent cosmic factors) that characterize all nature. In the Sāṃkhya view, only prakṛti is active, while the self is incarcerated in it and only observes and experiences. Release (MOKṢA) consists in the self's extrication from prakṛti by the recognition of its total difference from it and noninvolvement in it.

Puruṣa is also, in one of the creation myths related in the VEDAS, the primal man from whose body the universe was created. He was both sacrificer and victim, and his rite was the prototype for all later Vedic and Hindu sacrifices.

PRAMĀNA \prā-'mā-nə\ (Sanskrit: "measure"), in Indian philosophy, means by which one obtains accurate and valid knowledge (pramā, pramiti) about the world. The accepted number of pramāṇas varies, according to the philosophical system or school; the exegetical system of Mīmāṃsā accepts five, whereas VEDĀNTA as a whole proposes three.

The three principal means of knowledge are (1) perception, both direct sensory perception (anubhava) and such perception remembered (SMṚTI); (2) inference (anumāna), based on perception but able to conclude something that may not be open to perception; and (3) word (ŚABDA), most fundamentally the VEDA, the validity of which is self-authenticated. Some philosophers broaden śabda to include the statement of a reliable person (āpta-vākya). To these, two additional means of knowledge have been added: (4) analogy (upamāna), and (5) circumstantial implication (arthāpatti), which appeals to common sense.

PRĀṆA \prā-nə\ (Sanskrit: "breath"), in Indian philosophy, the body's vital "airs" or energies. In early Hindu philosophy, prāṇa was thought to survive as a person's "last breath" for eternity or until a future life.

Prāṇa was at times identified with the self. It is also the first in a series of "five prāṇas," windlike vital forces that are supposed to assist breathing, distribution of food in the body, and digestion. In YOGA philosophy, full control of the prāṇa is achieved through the practice of PRĀṆĀYĀMA ("breath control"), for its therapeutic effects and so that one might meditate without respiratory distraction.

PRĀṆĀYĀMA \prā-nā-'yā-mə\ (Sanskrit: "breath control"), in the YOGA system of Indian philosophy, fourth of the eight stages intended to lead the aspirant to SAMĀDHI, a state of perfect concentration. The immediate goal of prāṇāyāma is to reduce breathing to an effortless, even rhythm, thus helping to free the mind from attention to bodily functions. The practitioners of Yoga recognize four states of consciousness—waking, sleep with dreams, sleep without dreams, and a state resembling cataleptic consciousness—each of which has its own respiratory rhythm. By prolonging each respiration as long as possible in simulation of the unconscious states, the yogi learns to pass from one state to another, without loss of consciousness.

PRAPATTI \prā-pə-'tē\, practice sometimes regarded as the central act of devotion among the Hindu BHAKTI (devotional) sects. Prapatti refers to the individual's complete self-surrender to the Supreme Being owing to feelings of utter helplessness and to an absolute belief in God's GRACE. Prapatti was analyzed by the philosopher RĀMĀNUJA into five individual components: the intention of submitting to God; the surrender of resistance; the belief in God's protection; the prayer for salvation; and the consciousness that one is helpless to attain salvation on one's own.

PRASĀDA \prā-'sā-də\ (Sanskrit: "favor, grace"), in HINDUISM, food and water offered to a deity in worship (pūjā). It is believed that the deity partakes of and then returns the offering, thereby consecrating it. The offering is then distributed and eaten by the worshipers. The efficacy of the prasāda comes from its having been touched by the deity. Food left by a GURU is considered prasāda by his followers, as the guru is a living god. All food, if silently offered to God with the proper prayers before eating, becomes consecrated and thus prasāda.

Among the Sikhs of India, the distribution of karāh-prasād, a sweet dish of wheat flour, sugar, and clarified butter, is customarily part of a worship service or of any special ceremony such as an initiation, wedding, or funeral. Communal eating reinforces the ideals of social equality that are an integral part of Sikh belief.

PRATIMA \prā-ti-mə\ (Sanskrit: "image," or "likeness," of the deity), in HINDUISM, also referred to as mūrti, or vigraha. The image, or ICON, is not intended to be a representation of an earthly form but rather, through depicting the deity with multiple heads, arms, or eyes or with part animal features, is meant to point to the transcendent "otherness" of the divine. Traditionally the image serves as a vehicle through which the infinite, unmanifest god willingly takes finite and manifest form; when invoked, the deity is believed literally to be present in the icon. Worship centering around the image (pūjā) has been a form of Hindu religious practice for about 2,000 years.

Most Hindu images are man-made, constructed by artisans following strict guidelines, and consecrated in a ceremony. Such images can be permanent and housed in temples or homes; others are temporary and used only for the duration of a festival. Still other images are aniconic and found in nature, such as a special type of fossil known as the śālagrāma that is sacred to the god VISHNU. The mass printing of color reproductions in poster form has extended the availability of images to greater numbers of devotees.

PRATIMA \prā-ti-məz\, in JAINISM, one of the 11 stages of a householder's spiritual progress. Medieval writers conceived pratima (literally, "statue") as a regular progressing series, a ladder leading to higher stages of spiritual development. The last two stages lead logically to renunciation of the world and assumption of the ascetic life.

PRĀTIMOKṢA \prā-tē-'mōk-shə\ (Sanskrit: "that which is binding"), Pāli pātimokkha \pā-tē-'mōk-kə\, Buddhist monastic code, set of 227 rules that govern the daily activities of monks and nuns. The prohibitions of the prātimokṣa are arranged in the Pāli canon according to the severity of the offense—from those that require immediate expulsion from the order to those that require confession only. Also given are rules for settling disputes within the monastic community. The entire prātimokṣa is recited during the uposatha, or biweekly assembly of THERAVĀDA monks.

A comparable set of 250 monastic rules is contained in the Sanskrit canon of the SARVĀSTIVĀDA ("Doctrine That All

Is Real") tradition that was widely known in northern Buddhist countries. The MAHĀYĀNA tradition in China and Japan more generally rejected those rules that were not applicable locally and substituted disciplinary codes that differed from sect to sect and sometimes even from monastery to monastery.

PRATĪTYA-SAMUTPĀDA \prə-ˈtēt-yə-,sə-mūt-ˈpā-də\ (Sanskrit: "origination by dependence"), Pāli paṭicca-samuppā-da, chain of causation—a fundamental concept of BUDDHISM describing the causes of pain and the course of events that lead a being through rebirth, old age, and death.

Existence is seen as an interrelated flux of phenomenal events that have no permanent, independent existence of their own. These events happen in a series, one interrelating group of events producing another. The series is usually described as a chain without beginning or end that is constituted by twelve links (Sanskrit: nidānas, "causes"). According to one very widespread way of interpreting the chain, the first two links are related to the past (or previous life) and explain the present, the next eight belong to the present, and the last two represent the future as determined by the past and what is happening in the present. The series consists of (1) ignorance (Sanskrit: avidyā; Pāli: avijja), which leads to (2) faulty thought constructions about reality (samskāra/sankhāra). These in turn provide the structure of (3) knowledge (vijñāna/viññāṇa), the object of which is (4) name and form—i.e., the principle of individual identity (nāma-rūpa) and the sensory perception of an object—which are accomplished through (5) the six domains (ṣaḍāyatana)—i.e., the five senses and their objects—and the mind as the coordinating organ of sense impressions. The presence of objects and senses leads to (6) contact (sparsa/phassa) between the two, which provides (7) sensation (vedanā). Because this sensation is agreeable, it gives rise to (8) thirst (tṛṣṇā/taṇhā) and in turn to (9) grasping (upādāna), as of sexual partners. This sets in motion (10) the process of becoming (bhava), which fructifies in (11) birth (jāti) of the individual and hence to (12) old age and death (jarā-maraṇa).

The BUDDHA GOTAMA is said to have reflected on the series just prior to his enlightenment, thus demonstrating that a correct understanding of the causes of pain and the cycle of rebirth is closely associated with emancipation from the ongoing bondage that the chain generates. The formula led to much discussion within the various schools of early Buddhism. Later it came to be pictured as the outer rim of the wheel of becoming (bhavacakra), frequently reproduced in Tibetan painting.

PRAYER, act of communication by humans with the sacred or holy—God, the gods, the transcendent realm, or supernatural powers. Found in all religions in all times, prayer may be a communal or personal act utilizing various forms and techniques. Prayer has been described in its sublimity as "an intimate friendship, a frequent conversation held alone with the Beloved" by ST. TERESA OF ÁVILA, a 16th-century Spanish mystic.

Prayer is a significant and universal aspect of religion that expresses the broad range of religious feelings and attitudes that command man's relations with the sacred or holy. Described by some scholars as religion's primary mode of expression, prayer is said to be to religion what rational thought is to philosophy; it is the very expression of living religion. Prayer distinguishes the phenomenon of religion from those phenomena that approach it or resemble it, such as religious and aesthetic feelings. Of the various forms of religious literature, prayer is considered by many to be the purest in expressing the essential elements of a religion. The Islamic QUR'AN is regarded as a book of prayers, and the book of Psalms of the BIBLE is viewed as a meditation on biblical history turned into prayer. The CONFESSIONS of the great Christian thinker ST. AUGUSTINE (354–430) are, in the final analysis, a long prayer with the Creator.

Prayer expresses a desire on the part of men to enter into contact with the sacred or holy. As a part of that desire, prayer is linked to a feeling of presence (of the sacred or holy), which is neither an abstract conviction nor an instinctive intuition but rather a volitional movement conscious of realizing its higher end. Thus, prayer is described not only as meditation about God but as a step, a "going out of one's self," a PILGRIMAGE of the spirit "in the presence of God." It has, therefore, a personal and experiential character that goes beyond critical analysis.

The forms that prayer takes in the religions of the world, though varied, generally follow certain fixed patterns. These include BENEDICTIONS (blessings), litanies (alternate statements, titles of the deity or deities, or petitions and responses), ceremonial and ritualistic prayers, free prayers (in intent following no fixed form), repetition or formula prayers (e.g., the repetition of the name of Jesus in Eastern Christian HESYCHASM, a quietistic monastic movement, or the repetition of the name of AMITĀBHA Buddha in Japanese BUDDHISM), HYMNS, doxologies (statements of praise or glory), and other forms.

Although the various types of prayer are connected and permit a flow from one type to another, it is possible to distinguish several, even if more on the basis of psychology than on history.

Petition. The role of the request in religion has played such a central part that it has given its name to prayer. The requests that occur most often are for preservation of or return to health, the healing of the sick, long life, material goods, prosperity, or success in one's undertakings. A request for the attainment of such goals may be tied to a magical invocation; it may also be a deviation from prayer when it takes the form of a bargain or of a request for payment due: "In payment of our praise, give to the head of the family who is imploring you glory and riches" (from the ṚG VEDA [Rigveda], a sacred scripture of HINDUISM). CHRISTIANITY has never condemned material requests but rather has integrated them into a single providential order while at the same time subordinating them to spiritual values. Thus, in essence though not always in practice, requests are only on the fringe of prayer.

Confession. The term confession expresses at the same time an affirmation of faith and a recognition of the state of SIN. In Mazdaism (ZOROASTRIANISM AND PARSIISM), as in ancient Christianity, the CONFESSION OF FAITH accompanies the renunciation of DEMONS. In a similar fashion, ancient and primitive men recognize that their sins unleash the anger of the gods. To counter the divine wrath, a member of the West African Ewe tribe, for example, throws a little bundle of twigs—which symbolizes the confessor's sins—into the air and he says words symbolizing the deity's response, "All your sins are forgiven you."

The admission of sin cannot be explained only by anguish or by the feeling of guilt; it is also related to what is deepest in man—i.e., to what constitutes his being and his action. The awareness of sin is one of the salient features of religion, as, for example, in Hinduism: "Varuṇa is merciful even to him who has committed sin" (Rg Veda). Confession is viewed as the first step toward salvation in both JUDAISM and Christianity; in Buddhism, monks confess their sins publicly before the Buddha and the congregation two times every month.

Intercession. Intercessory prayers derive from and express a sense of social solidarity—with family, tribe, nation, or other structure. In the hymns of the Rg Veda the father implores the god AGNI (god of fire) for all of those who “owe him their lives and are his family.” In the Greek play Alcestis by Euripides (5th century BCE), the mother, on her death, entrusts the orphans she is about to leave to HESTIA, the goddess of the home. Among the Babylonians and the Assyrians, a PRIESTHOOD was established primarily to say prayers of intercession.

Prayers of intercession to the divine are supported by mediatory minor gods or human protectors (alive or dead)—MARABOUTS (dervishes, or mystics, believed to have special powers) in ISLAM, or saints in Christianity, for example—whose mediation ensures that the prayer will be efficacious.

In biblical religion, intercession is spiritualized in view of a consciousness of the messianic (salvatory) MISSION. MOSES views himself as one with his people even when they fail in their duty: “Pardon your people,” he prays, “or remove me from the Book of Life.” Such solidarity finds its supreme form in the prayer of Christ on the cross—“Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do.”

Praise and thanksgiving. Praise can be traced to salutations, such as in the prayer of the Khoikhoi (of South Africa) to the New Moon—“Welcome.” Praise among most of the ancient peoples was expressed in the hymn, which was primarily a prayer of praise (whether ritual or personal) for the gift of the created world. Israel praises its Creator for “his handiwork,” as does the Qur’an.

Praise—in addition to concerns for the created world—plays an important role in the prayer of mystics, for whom it is a form of adoration. Praise in this instance constitutes an essential element of the mystic experience and celebrates God, no longer for his works, but for himself, his greatness, and his mystery.

When the great deeds of God are the theme of praise, it becomes benediction and thanksgiving. Even when words denoting thanksgiving are not present, the substance of thanksgiving is manifest. Mealtime prayers in both ancient and modern religions give thanks for the goods of the earth and are linked to the giving of an offering.

Adoration. Adoration is generally considered the most noble form of prayer, a kind of prostration of the whole being before God. Names given to the divinity in prayers of adoration express dependency and submission, as, for example, in the prayer of the Kekchí Indians of Central America: “O God, you are my lord, you are my mother, you are my father, the lord of the mountains and the valleys.” To express his adoration man often falls to the ground and prostrates himself. The feeling of submissive reverence also is expressed by body movements: raising the hands, touching or kissing a sacred object, deep bowing of the body, kneeling with the right hand on the mouth, prostration, or touching the forehead to the ground. The gesture often is accompanied by cries of fear, amazement, or joy; e.g., has (Hebrew), hū (Islam), or svāhā (Hindu).

Adoration takes on another meaning in the presence of the transcendental God who reveals himself to man in the religions of revelation (Judaism, Christianity, and Islam). The supreme form of adoration is generally considered to be holy silence, which expresses the most adequate attitude toward the immeasurable mystery of God: “I am in a dark sanctuary, I pray in silence, O silence full of reverence” (Gerhard Tersteegen, an 18th-century Protestant mystic).

Unitative: mystical union or ecstasy. ECSTASY is literally a departure from, a tearing away from, or a surpassing of human limitations and also a meeting with and embracing of the divine. The mystic experiences God himself in an inexpressible encounter because it is beyond the ordinary experiences of man. The mystical union may be a lucid and conscious progression of CONTEMPLATIVE prayer, or it may take a more passive form of a “seizing” by God of the one who is praying. Ecstatic prayer goes beyond the frame of ordinary prayer and becomes an experience in which words fail. It is found in the accounts of Hindu, Persian, Hellenistic, and Christian mystics. “You are me, supreme divinity, I am you,” says Nimbāditya. The Sufi (mystic) of Islam JALĀL AD-DĪN AR-RŪMĪ sighs in the same words as a Christian mystic, Angela da Foligno: “I am you and you are me.” Such reciprocity that is so complete that it becomes identity is the supreme expression of ecstatic prayer. It is found in all of the mystic writings, from the Orient to the West.

PRAYER WHEEL, Tibetan maṇi chos'khor \ˈmä-nē-ˈchō-ˈkōr\, in TIBETAN BUDDHISM, an often beautifully embossed hollow metal cylinder, mounted on a rod handle and containing a consecrated written MANTRA (sacred syllable). Each turning of the wheel by hand is equivalent in efficacy to one oral recitation of the prayer.

Variants to the hand-held prayer wheel are large cylinders that can be attached to windmills or waterwheels and thus kept in continuous motion. The mantra on a prayer flag is similarly activated by the blowing of the wind.

PRE-COLUMBIAN MESO-AMERICAN RELIGIONS

P

re-Columbian Meso-American religions encompass the religious beliefs and practices of the peoples of the part of Mexico and Central America that had developed urbanized societies before the arrival of the Spanish in the 16th century. The Meso-American system of thought was ultimately organized around a calendar in which a ritual cycle of 260 (13 × 20) days intermeshed with a “vague year” of 365 days (18 × 20 days, plus five “nameless” days), producing a 52-year Calendar Round. The Meso-American pantheon was associated with the calendar and featured an old, dual creator god; a god of royal descent and warfare; a Sun god and a Moon goddess; a rain god; a fire god; a culture hero called the FEATHERED SERPENT; and many other deities. Also characteristic was a layered system of 13 heavens and 9 underworlds, each with its presiding god.

EARLY RELIGIOUS LIFE

Early religious phenomena can be deduced only from archaeological remains. Numerous clay figurines have been found that date to the Pre-Classic period (roughly 1500 BCE to the 1st century CE); among these are terra-cotta statuettes of women that may have represented agricultural goddesses. Two-headed figurines found at Tlatilco, a site of the late Pre-Classic, may portray a supernatural being. Depictions of a fire god in the form of an old man with an incense burner on his back date from the same period.

The first elaborate pre-Columbian culture of Meso-America was that of the Olmecs, who inhabited present-day southern Mexico. The Olmecs worshiped at least ten distinct gods, several of which were depicted as “were-jaguars,” hybrids between jaguars and human infants. Later evidence suggests that their deities probably included a fire god, a rain god, a corn god, and a Feathered Serpent. The Izapan civilization was focused on Izapa, a huge temple center near modern Tapachula, Chiapas, on the Pacific coast plain. A large number of carved stone stelae have been found at Izapa, and in front of most stelae is a round altar, often crudely shaped like a toad. Izapan stelae are carved in relief with narrative scenes derived from mythology and legend; among the depictions are warfare and decapitation, ceremonies connected with a sacred tree, and meetings of what seem to be tribal elders. Many deities are shown, each of which is derived from what is perhaps an Olmec prototype.

The first monumental ceremonial center on the Mexican plateau is the PYRAMID of Cuicuilco, near Mexico City. It was doubtless a religious monument, crowned by a temple built on the terminal platform and surrounded by tombs. By the Late Formative Period (300 BCE–100 CE) the construction of temple-pyramids had become common. It was a Meso-American custom to bury the dead beneath the floors of their own houses, which were often then abandoned by the bereaved. As an elite class of noble lineages became distinguished from the mass of the people, these simple house platforms might have become transformed into more imposing structures, ending in the huge pyramids of the Late Formative and Classic, which surely had funerary functions. The deceased leader or the gods from which he claimed descent, or sometimes both, would then have been worshiped in a “house of god” on the temple summit. These pyramids became the focal point of Meso-American ceremonial life as well as the centers of settlement.

THE MAYA

The problem of the origin of the Mayan-speaking people has not been solved. It may be that they were Olmec people who had been forced out of their homeland to the west, or it could be that the earliest Maya descended to their lowland homelands from the Guatemalan highlands.

Maya chronology envisioned a 260-day sacred year (tzolkin) formed by the combination of the numbers 1 through 13 and 20 day names. The tzolkin were the most sacred means of DIVINATION, enabling the priests to detect the favorable or evil influences attached to every day. ITZAMNÁ was the supreme Maya deity, functioning as creator god and lord of fire (and therefore of the hearth). The Feathered Serpent was known to the Maya as Kukulcán.

The Maya lavished great attention on their royal dead, who almost surely were thought of as descended from the gods and partaking of their divine essence. Reliefs and pictorial pottery found in tombs deal with the underworld and the dangerous voyage of the soul through that land, which was ruled by a number of gods, including several old men often embellished with jaguar emblems. While the Classic Maya did practice HUMAN SACRIFICE, this was not on the scale of the Aztecs. The victims were captives, including defeated rulers and nobles. Self-sacrifice or self-mutilation was also common; blood drawn by jabbing spines through the ear or penis or by drawing a thorn-studded cord through the tongue was spattered on paper or otherwise collected as an offering to the gods.

By 300 BCE, if not earlier, with the appearance of major centers and pyramid and temple constructions, an elaborate worldview had evolved. Deified heavenly bodies and time periods were added to the earlier corn and rain gods. Religion became increasingly esoteric, with a complex mythology interpreted by a closely organized priesthood.

Creation. The Maya, like other Meso-American Indians, believed that several worlds had been successively created and destroyed before the present universe had come into being. People were made successively of earth (who, being mindless, were destroyed), then of wood (who, lacking souls and intelligence and being ungrateful to the gods, were punished by being drowned in a flood or devoured by DEMONS), and finally of a corn gruel (the ancestors of the Maya). The Yucatec Maya worshiped a creator deity called Hunab Ku, “One-God.” Itzamná (“Iguana House”), head of the Maya pantheon worshiped by the ruling class, was his son, whose wife was Ix Chebel Yax, patroness of weaving.

Four Itzamná, one for each direction, were represented by celestial monsters or two-headed, dragonlike iguanas. Four gods, the BACABS, sustained the sky. Each geographic direction was associated with a Bacab; a sacred ceiba, or silk cotton tree; a bird; and a color, according to the following scheme: east–red, north–white, west–black, and south–yellow. Green was the color of the center.

The main act of creation, as stated in the POPOL VUH (a Maya document) was the dawn: the world and humanity were in darkness, but the gods created the Sun and the Moon. According to other traditions, the Sun (male) was the patron of hunting and music, and the Moon (female) was the goddess of weaving and childbirth. Both the Sun and the Moon originally inhabited the Earth, but they were translated to the heavens as a result of the Moon's sexual license. Lunar light is less bright than that of the Sun because, it was said, one of her eyes was pulled out by the Sun in punishment for her infidelity.

Cosmology. The Maya believed that 13 heavens were arranged in layers above the Earth, which itself rested on the back of a huge crocodile or reptilian monster floating on the ocean. Under the Earth were nine underworlds, also arranged in layers. Thirteen gods, the Oxlahuntiku, presided over the heavens; nine gods, the Bolontiku, ruled the subterranean worlds.

Time was an all-important element of Maya cosmology. The priest-astronomers viewed time as a majestic succession of cycles without beginning or end. All the time periods were considered gods; time itself was believed to be divine.

The gods. Among the several deities represented by statues and sculptured panels of the Classic period are such gods as the young corn god, whose statue is to be seen at Copán, the Sun god shown at Palenque in the form of the solar disk engraved with anthropomorphic features, the nine gods of the night (also at Palenque), and a snake god especially prominent at Yaxchilán. Another symbol of the corn god is a foliated cross or life tree represented in two Palenque sanctuaries. The rain god (CHAC) has a mask with characteristic protruding fangs, large round eyes, and a proboscis-like nose.

Itzamná, lord of the heavens, ruled over the pantheon; he was closely associated with Kinich Ahau, the Sun god, and with the Moon goddess Ix Chel. Itzamná was considered an entirely benevolent god, but Ix Chel, often depicted as an evil old woman, had unfavorable aspects.

The Chacs, the rain gods of the peasants, were believed to pour rain by emptying their gourds and to hurl stone axes upon the earth (the lightning). Their companions were frogs (uo), whose croakings announced the rains. Earth gods were worshiped in the highlands.

The corn god, a youthful deity with an ear of corn in his headdress, also ruled over vegetation in general. His name was Ah Mun, and he was sometimes shown in combat with the death god, Ah Puch, a skeleton-like being, patron of the sixth day-sign Cimi ("Death") and lord of the ninth hell. Several other deities were associated with death—e.g., Ek Chuah, a war god and god of merchants and cacao growers, and Ixtab, patron goddess of suicides.

Eschatology. The present world, the Maya believed, was doomed to end in cataclysms, as the other worlds had done previously. According to the priestly concept of time, cycles repeated themselves. Therefore, prediction was made possible by probing first into the past and then into the future: hence the calculations, bearing on many millennia, carved on temples and stelae. The priests probably believed that the present world would come to a sudden end, but a new world would be created so that the succession of cycles would remain unbroken.

Sacrifice. Sacrifices were made for many reasons, including agricultural and cosmic renewal, preparation for warfare, purification, and especially to repay the gods for divine gifts of life. Sacrifices made in return for divine favor were numerous: animals, birds, insects, fish, agricultural products, flowers, rubber, jade, and blood drawn from the tongue, ears, arms, legs, and genitals. Human sacrifice was known in Classic times, but even in the Postclassic era, when the Maya increased ritual violence, their sacrifices did not become as frequent as in central Mexico. Toltec-Maya art shows many instances of human sacrifice: removal of the heart, shooting with arrows, or beheading. At Chichén Itzá, in order to obtain rain, sacrificial victims were hurled into a deep natural well together with copper, gold, and jade offerings. Prayers for material benefits (which were usually recited in a squatting or standing position), fasting and continence (often for 260 days), and the drawing of blood from the supplicant's body often preceded important ceremonies and sacrifices.

Rites. Ritual activities, held on selected favorable days, were complex and intense. Performers submitted to preliminary fasting and sexual abstinence. Features common to most rites were: offerings of incense (pom), of balche (an intoxicating drink brewed from honey and a tree bark), bloodletting from ears and tongues, sacrifices of animals (human sacrifices in later times), and dances. Special ceremonies took place on New Year's Day, 0 Pop, in honor of the "Year-Bearer"; i.e., the tzolkin sign of that day. Pottery, clothes, and other belongings were renewed. The second month, Uo, was devoted to Itzamná, Tzec (the 5th month) to the Bacabs, Xul (6th) to Kukulcán, Yax (10th) to the planet VENUS, Mac (13th) to the rain gods, and Muan (15th) to the cocoa-tree god. New idols were made during the 8th and 9th months, Mol and Ch'en, respectively.

The priesthood. Bejeweled, feather-adorned priests are often represented in Classic sculpture. The high priests of each province taught in priestly schools such subjects as cosmology, dynastic history, divination, and glyph writing. The priesthood was hereditary. Ahkin, "he of the Sun," was the priests' general title. Specialized functions were performed by the nacoms, who split open the victims' breasts; the chacs, who held their arms and legs; and the chilans, who interpreted the sacred books and predicted the future. Some priests used hallucinatory drugs in their roles as prophets and diviners.

THE AZTEC

The Aztec, whose origin is uncertain, may have been several communities of hunters and gatherers, but they also brought agricultural skills into the Basin of Mexico in the 13th century. Their religious ideology was a synthesis of myths, symbols, and ritual practices, some of which they had brought with them and some of which they borrowed and inherited from well-established societies in central Mexico. Their religion was a combination of "blood" and "flowers," of commitments to social and military aggression, as well as to traditions of beauty and artistry in the areas of speech, sculpture, painting, dance, and philosophy. In all aspects, the priesthood lived rigorous lives, preparing the community for disciplined cultivation of agricultural fields, periodic and intense warfare, and the expression of sacred truths and beauty. Aztec religion was organized and expressed in the great ceremonial center of Tenochtitlán, the magnificent imperial capital that shocked and thrilled visitors (including the Spaniards). This capital and its various sacred precincts were organized as a microcosm of the principal myths and cosmologies, which the Aztecs combined from various competing traditions during the two hundred years of their rise and florescence.

The cult of the gods required a large professional priesthood. Spanish documents indicate that the priesthood was one of the most elaborate of Aztec institutions. Each temple and god had its attendant priestly order. Within the splendid ceremonial center in the heart of the capital, where the Great Aztec Temple—called by the Aztecs Coatepec, or Serpent Mountain—received the most precious tributary payments and sacrificial offerings, the High Priests of TLALOC and HUITZILOPOCHTLI served as head of the entire priestly organization. Within the orders were priests in charge of ceremonies, the education of novices, ASTROLOGY, and the temple lands.

Aztec religion, though also characterized by philosophies of truth, the afterlife, and the nature of human life in relation to a divine duality, emphasized sacrifice and ascetic behavior as the necessary preconditions for approaching the supernatural. Priests were celibate and were required to live a simple, spartan life. They performed constant self-sacrifice in the form of bloodletting as penitence (by passing barbed cords through the tongue and ears). This pattern of worship reached its climax in the practice of human sacrifice, which was an institution of great cultural importance. Aztec warfare was waged for many purposes, including the extraction of tributary payments to the capital, the suppression of rebellions, territorial control, and it always included the collection of sacrificial victims.

Cosmogony and eschatology. The Aztec believed that four worlds had existed before the present universe. Those worlds, or “suns,” had been destroyed by catastrophes. Humankind had been entirely wiped out at the end of each sun. The present world was the fifth sun, and the Aztec thought of themselves as “the People of the Sun.” Their divine duty was to wage cosmic war in order to provide the Sun with his tlaxcaltiliztli (“nourishment”). Without it the Sun would disappear from the heavens. Thus the welfare and very survival of the universe depended on the offerings of blood and hearts to the Sun, a notion that the Aztec extended to all the deities of their pantheon.

Present humanity had been created by Quetzalcóatl. The Feathered Serpent, with the help of his twin, Xólotl, the dog-headed god, had succeeded in reviving the dried bones of the old dead by sprinkling them with his own blood. The present Sun was called Nahui-Ollin, “Four-Earthquake,” and was doomed to disappear in a tremendous earthquake. The skeleton-like monsters of the West, the tzitzimime, would then appear and kill all people. The present Sun and Moon had been created when the gods, assembled in the darkness at Teotihuacán, had built a huge fire; two of them, Nanahuatzin and Tecciztécatl, threw themselves into the flames, from which the former emerged as the Sun and the latter as the Moon. When the Sun refused to move across the sky the gods realized they must give blood and were compelled to sacrifice themselves to feed the Sun.

Cosmology. Above the Earth, which was surrounded by the “heavenly water” (ilhuicáatl) of the ocean, were 13 heavens, the uppermost of which was the abode of the Supreme Couple. Under the “divine Earth,” teotlalli, were the nine hells of Mictlan, with nine rivers that the souls of the dead had to cross. Thirteen was considered a favorable number, nine extremely unlucky.

All the heavenly bodies and constellations were divinized, such as the Great Bear (TEZCATLIPOCA), Venus (Quetzalcóatl), the stars of the North (Centzon Mimixcoa, “the 400 Cloud-Serpents”), and the stars of the South (Centzon Huitznáua, “the 400 Southerners”). The solar disk, TONATIUH, was supposed to be borne from the East to the zenith on a litter surrounded by the souls of dead warriors and from the zenith to the West among a retinue of divinized women, the Cihuateteo. When the night began on Earth, day dawned in Mictlan, the abode of the dead.

PRE-COLUMBIAN MESO-AMERICAN RELIGIONS

Deities. The ancient societies of central Mexico had worshiped fertility gods for many centuries when the Aztec invaded the valley. The cult of these gods remained extremely important in Aztec religion. Tlaloc, the giver of rain but also the wrathful deity of lightning, was the leader of a group of rain gods, the Tlalocues, who dwelt on mountaintops, in caves, and in waters. CHALCHIUHTLICUE ("One Who Wears a Jade Skirt") presided over fresh waters, Huixtocihuatl over salt waters and the sea. Numerous Earth goddesses were associated with the fertility of the soil and with the fecundity of women, such as Teteoinnan ("Mother of the Gods"), COATLICUE ("One Who Wears a Snake Skirt"), Cihuacóatl ("Serpent-Woman"), and Itzpapálotl ("Obsidian-Butterfly"). Their significance was twofold: as fertility deities, they gave birth to the young gods of corn, Centéotl, and of flowers, Xochipilli; as symbols of the Earth that devoured bodies and drank blood, they appeared as warlike godheads. TLAZOLTÉOTL, a Huastec goddess, presided over carnal love and the confession of sins. XIPE TOTEC, borrowed from the Yopi people, was a god of the spring and of the renewal of vegetation, as well as the patron of goldsmiths. Human victims were killed and flayed to honor him.

Among the Aztec the concept of a supreme couple took the form of Intonan, Intota ("Our Mother, Our Father"), the Earth and the Sun. But the fire god Huehuetéotl was also associated with the Earth. In addition, OMETECUHTLI ("Lord of the Duality") and Omecihuatl ("Lady of the Duality") were held to abide in the 13th heaven: they decided on which date a human being would be born, thus determining his destiny.

Among the fertility gods are to be counted the "400 Rabbits" (Centzon Totochtin), little gods of the crops, among which are Ometochtli, the god of octli (a fermented drink), and Tepoztécatl, the god of drunkenness.

The Aztec brought with them the cult of their Sun and war god, Huitzilopochtli, "the Hummingbird of the Left," who was considered to be the conquering Sun of midday. According to a legend probably borrowed from the Toltec, he was born near Tula. His mother, the Earth goddess Coatlicue, had already given birth to the

Sites of Meso-American civilization

400 Southerners and to the Moon goddess Coyolxauhqui, whom the newborn god exterminated with his xiuhcoatl ("turquoise serpent"). Tezcatlipoca, god of the night sky, was the protector of the young warriors.

Quetzalcóatl, the ancient Teotihuacán deity of vegetation and fertility, had been transformed into a god of the morning star. He was also revered as a wind god and as the ancient priest-king of the Toltec golden age: the discoveries of writing, of the calendar, and of the arts were attributed to him.

Death. The beliefs of the Aztec concerning the other world and life after death also showed the same syncretic combination of various traditions. The old paradise of the rain god Tlaloc, depicted in the Teotihuacán frescoes, opened its gardens to those who died by drowning, lightning, or as a result of leprosy, dropsy, gout, or lung diseases. He was supposed to have caused their death and to have sent their souls to paradise.

Two categories of dead persons went up to the heavens as companions of the Sun: the Quauhteca ("Eagle People"), who comprised the warriors who died on the battlefield or on the sacrificial stone and the merchants who were killed while traveling; and the women who died while giving birth to their first child and thus became Cihuateteo, "Divine Women." The Cihuateteo were said to appear at night at the crossroads and strike the passersby with palsy. All other dead went to Mictlan, under the northern deserts, the abode of MICTLANTECUHTLI, the god of death. There they traveled for four years until they arrived at the ninth hell, where they disappeared altogether.

Offerings were made to the dead 80 days after the funeral, then one, two, three, and four years later, after which all links between the dead and the living were severed. But the warriors who crossed the heavens in the retinue of the Sun were thought to come back to Earth after four years as hummingbirds.

Ritual calendar. Tonalpohualli, an Aztec term meaning "the count of days," was the name of the ritual calendar of 260 days. It ran parallel to the solar calendar of 365 days, which was divided into 18 months of 20 days and five supplementary unlucky days. The word tonalli means both "day" and "destiny": the 260-day calendar was mainly used for purposes of divination. The days were named by the combination of 20 signs—natural phenomena such as the wind and the earthquake, animals such as the rabbit and the jaguar, plants such as the reed, and objects such as the flint knife and the house—with the numbers 1 to 13. Thus the calendrical round included 20 series of 13 days.

Specialized priests called tonalpouhque interpreted the signs and numbers on such occasions as births, marriages, departures of traders to faraway lands, and elections of rulers. Each day, and each 13-day series, was deemed lucky, unlucky, or indifferent according to the deities presiding over it. Thus Ce-Coatl ("One-Snake") was held as favorable to traders, Chicome-Xochitl ("Seven-Flower") to scribes and weavers, and Nahui-Ehécatl ("Four-Wind") to magicians. The men who were born during the Ce-Ocelotl ("One-Jaguar") series would die on the sacrificial stone, those whose birth took place on the day Ometochtli ("Two-Rabbit") would be drunkards, and so on. The tonalpohualli influenced every aspect of public and private life.

PRE-COLUMBIAN SOUTH AMERICAN RELIGIONS

omprising the beliefs and practices of the peoples of the Andean region (western South America) prior to Spanish exploration in the 16th century, these pre-Columbian religions include those of both the Inca and their precursors.

THE PRE-INCA PERIODS

In the Andean area, the threshold of a successful village agricultural economy can be placed at c. 2500 BCE with the cultivation of corn, beans, squash, potatoes, and other foods. Indications of a more complex sociopolitical order—large-scale constructions and densely populated centers—occurred very soon after this (c. 1800 BCE). Prior to this date llamas and alpacas were domesticated. In about 1000 BCE there was an invasion of highlanders into the coastal Casma Valley who brought with them their own architectural styles, ceramics, and food plants and animals. Archaeologists at one time generally agreed that their chief object of worship was a cat, probably the jaguar, but this has been questioned. Many natural bird, animal, and human forms were depicted with feline mouths and other attributes, and feline representations were widespread.

Most temples in this time seem to have been ceremonial centers without people living around them. The most elaborate temple known is that at Chavín, which contains a shaft of white granite, carved in low relief to symbolize a standing human figure with snakes representing the hair and a pair of great fangs in the upper jaw. This figure, which has variously been called El Lanzón, the Great Image, and the Smiling God, is thought to have been the chief object of worship in the original temple.

Elsewhere in the temple, one facade has a lintel bearing 14 eagles in low relief, supplied with feline jaws with prominent fangs behind their beaks. The columns supporting the lintel are entirely covered by mythical birds bristling with feline fangs and faces. These have been interpreted as attendants of the god worshiped in that part of the temple, who perhaps superseded the Smiling God and could have been the god shown on the Raimondi Stone, now in Lima. The stone shows the Staff God, a standing semihuman figure having claws, a feline face with crossed fangs, and a staff in each hand. Above his head is a towering, pillarlike structure fringed with snakes and emerging from a double-fanged face. Unlike the Smiling God, this figure has been found in areas as far from Chavín as the northern and southern coasts of Peru. Also found was the Tello obelisk, a pillar covered with symbolic carvings, such as bands of teeth and animal heads. This is considered to be an object of worship like the Smiling God and Staff God.

Other carvings found on and around the temple include jaguars, eagles, and snakes, and a number of heads of men and the Smiling God; they are thought to be decorations or the attendants of gods rather than objects of worship.

At a later period (c. 400–200 BCE) in the south highlands, depictions of a new divine figure appear: at Tiahuanaco near Lake Titicaca, temple carvings depict a figure that may represent a spear thrower carrying staves and darts and attended by three rows of smaller winged figures that appear to run inward toward him. This divinity has been termed the Doorway, or Gateway, God. Versions of the Doorway God and his attendants are found almost everywhere within the range of Tiahuanaco influence in the subsequent period.

INCA RELIGION

Religion was a complex and fundamental part of Inca life with emphasis on formality and ritual, agricultural, curing, and the devotion to the gods and HUACAS (sacred sites). A central practice was the worship of the sun, which was presided over by the priests of the last native pre-Columbian conquerors of the Andean regions of South America. Though there was an Inca state religion of the sun, the substrata RELIGIOUS BELIEFS and practices of the pre-Inca peoples exerted an influence on the Andean region prior to and after the conquest of most of South America by the Spaniards in the 16th century.

Gods. The creator god of the Inca and of pre-Inca peoples was VIRACocha, who was also a culture hero. Creator of earth, humans, and animals, Viracocha had a long list of titles, including Lord Instructor of the World, the Ancient One, and the Old Man of the Sky. Some have said that he also was the creator of the Tiahuanaco civilizations, of which the Inca were the cultural heirs. Viracocha went through several transmogrifications, often with grotesque or humorous effects. He made peoples, destroyed them, and re-created them of stone; once they were re-created, he dispersed humankind in four directions. As a culture hero he taught people various techniques and skills. He journeyed widely until he came to the shores of Manta (Ecuador), where he set off into the Pacific—some say in a boat made of his cloak, others that he walked on the water. This part of the myth has been seized upon by modern mythmakers, and, as Kon-Tiki, Viracocha was said to have brought Inca culture to Polynesia.

INTI, the sun god, was the ranking deity in the Inca pantheon. His warmth embraced the Andean earth and matured crops, and for this intercession he was beloved by farmers. Inti was represented with a human face on a ray-splayed disk. He was considered to be the divine ancestor of the Inca.

Apu Illapu, the rain giver, was an agricultural deity to whom commoners addressed their prayers for rain. He was often depicted as a man in the sky wearing radiant clothing and holding a war club in one hand and a sling in the other. Temples to Illapu were usually on high structures; in times of drought, PILGRIMAGES were made to them and prayers were accompanied by sacrifices—often human, if the crisis was sufficient. The people believed that Illapu's shadow was in the Milky Way, from whence he drew the water that he poured down as rain.

Mama-Quilla, wife of the sun god, was the Moon Mother and regulator of women's menstrual cycles. The waxing and waning of the moon was used to calculate monthly cycles, from which the time periods for festivals were set. Silver was considered to be tears of the moon. The stars had minor functions. The constellation Lyra, which was believed to have the appearance of a llama, was entreated for protection. The constellation Scorpio was believed to have the shape of a cat; the Pleiades were called "little mothers," and festivals were celebrated on their reappearance in the sky. Earth was called Pacha-Mama, or "Earth Mother." Mama-Cocha or "Sea Mother" was the ultimate source of all waters including the ocean, streams, rivers, and irrigation water and therefore important to all agricultural peoples. She was also important to fishing peoples living near the coast.

Temples and shrines. Temples and shrines housing cult objects were occupied by priests, their attendants, and the CHOSEN WOMEN. In general, temples were not intended to shelter the celebrants, since most ceremonies were held outside the temple proper. The ruins of the Temple of Viracocha at San Pedro Cacha (Peru), however, had a ground plan that measured 330 by 87 feet, which indicates that it was designed for use other than the storage of priestly regalia. The Sun Temple in Cuzco is the best known of the Inca temples. Built with stones, it had a circumference of more than 1,200 feet. Within the temple was a large image of the sun, and in another precinct, the Golden Enclosure (Corincancha), were gold models of cornstalks, llamas, and lumps of earth. Portions of the land which supported the temples, the priests, and the Chosen Women, were allotted to the sun and administered for the priests. Another temple, at Vilcashuman (which was regarded as the geographic center of the empire), is still in existence. Near Mount Aconcagua in Argentina, at the southern limit of the Inca Empire, there was a temple and oracle at which important sacrifices were performed, and on Titicaca Island, one of the largest of several islands in Lake Titicaca, there was a temple of the sun. As the Inca conquered new territories, temples were erected in the new lands. In Caranqui, Ecuador, one such temple was described by a chronicler as being filled with great vessels of gold and silver. At Latacunga (Llacta cunga) in Ecuador there was a sun temple where sacrifices were made.

Along with the shrines and temples, huacas were widespread. A huaca could be a man-made temple, mountain, hill, or bridge, such as the great huacachaca across the Apurímac River near Cuzco. A huaca also might be a MUMMY bundle, especially if it was that of a lord-Inca. On high points of passage in the Andes, propitiatory CAIRNS (apacheta, "piles of stones") were made, to which passing persons would add a small stone.

The priesthood. Priests resided at all important shrines and temples. The priests were organized into a complex hierarchy according to the prestige of the shrine in which they worked. At the top was the HIGH PRIEST who was a close relative of the king, who was the manifestation of the Sun. A chronicler suggests that a priest's title was umu, but in usage his title was geared to his functions as diviner of lungs, sorcerer, confessor, and curer. The title of the chief priest in Cuzco, who was of noble lineage, was villac umu. He held his post for life, was married, had power over all shrines and temples, and could appoint and remove priests. The temples of the official Inca cult were served by the macmaconas, a group of consecrated women under the supervision of a noble woman who guided their tasks of making chicha and textiles for the temple communities. These women were selected from a larger group known as the Chosen Women or aclyaconas. The Chosen Women were selected around the age of 10, on the basis of their physical beauty, from the conquered communities as well as from the noble families of Cuzco. The most perfect women were sacrificed to the gods. Others became attendants to temples and secondary wives to the Inca king. Still others became macmaconas.

Divination. DIVINATION was the prerequisite to all meaningful action. It was used to diagnose illness, to predict the outcome of battles, to ferret out crimes, and to determine what sacrifice should be made to what god. Life was believed to be controlled by the all-pervading unseen powers, and oracles were considered to be the most important and direct means of access to the gods. Oracles were sacred figures who could answer questions about the future. There were four main oracles in the empire. One oracle of a huaca close by the Apurímac River near Cuzco was described by a chronicler as a wooden beam as thick as a fat man, with a girdle of gold about it with two large golden breasts like a woman. These and other idols were blood-spattered from sacrifices. "Through this large idol," a chronicler wrote, "the DEMON of the river used to speak to them." Another well-known oracle was housed in a temple in the large adobe complex of PACHACAMAC near Lima.

Divination also was accomplished by watching the meandering of spiders and the arrangement that coca leaves took in a shallow dish. Another method of divination was to drink ayahuasca, a narcotic that had profound effects on the central nervous system. This was believed to enable one to communicate with the supernatural powers.

Fire was also believed to provide spiritual contact. The flames were blown to red heat through metal tubes, after which a practitioner (yacarca) who had narcotized himself by chewing coca leaves summoned the spirits with fiery conjuration to speak—"which they did," wrote a chronicler, by "ventriloquism." Divination by studying the lungs of a sacrificed white llama was considered to be efficacious. The lungs were inflated by blowing into the dissected trachea, and the future was foretold by priests who minutely observed the markings and patterns of the veins. On the reading of this augury, political or military action was taken.

Should rain not fall or a water conduit break without cause, it was believed that such an occurrence could arise from someone's failure to observe the required ceremonies. This was called hochá, a ritual error. The ayllu, a basic social unit identified with communally held land, was wounded by individual misdeeds. It was important that crimes be confessed and expiated by penitence so as not to call down the divine wrath.

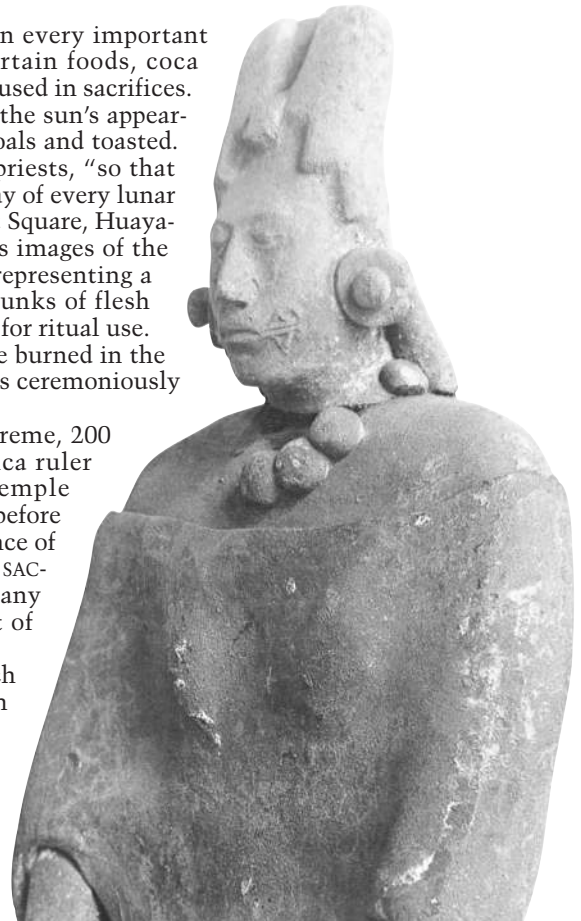

Sacrifice. Sacrifice, human or animal, was offered on every important occasion; guinea pigs (more properly cui), llamas, certain foods, coca leaves, and chicha (an intoxicant corn beverage) were all used in sacrifices. Many sacrifices were daily occurrences for the ritual of the sun's appearance. A fire was kindled, and corn was thrown on the coals and toasted. "Eat this, Lord Sun," was the objunction of officiating priests, "so that you will know that we are your children." On the first day of every lunar month 100 pure-white llamas were driven into the Great Square, Huayaca Pata in Cuzco; they were moved about to the various images of the gods and then assigned to 30 priestly attendants, each representing a day of the month. The llamas were then sacrificed; chunks of flesh were thrown onto the fire, and the bones were powdered for ritual use. Ponchos of excellent weave or miniature vestments were burned in the offering. The Inca ruler wore his poncho only once: it was ceremoniously sacrificed in fire each day.

Humans also were sacrificed; when the need was extreme, 200 children might be immolated, such as when a new Inca ruler took power. Even a Chosen Woman from the Sun Temple might be taken out for sacrifice. Children were feasted before being sacrificed, "so that they would not enter the presence of the gods hungry and crying." It was important in HUMAN SACRIFICE that the sacrificed person be without blemish. Many victims were chosen from conquered provinces as part of regular taxation.

Festivals. The 30-day calendar was religious, and each month had its own festival. The 17th-century Andean writer Felipe Guamán Poma de Ayala, in a letter to Philip II of Spain, described two different versions of the religious calendar, one centering on state ceremonies and sacrifices performed at Cuzco, and the other describing the agricultural practices at the local level in the highlands. Quite different calendars prevailed on the irrigated coast, but surviving sources do not record them in any detail.

PREDESTINATION

PREDESTINATION, in CHRISTIANITY, the doctrine that God has eternally chosen those whom he intends to save. In modern usage, predestination is distinct from both determinism and fatalism and is subject to the free decision of the human moral will; but the doctrine also teaches that salvation is due entirely to the eternal decree of God. In its fundamentals, the problem of predestination is as universal as religion itself, but the emphasis of the NEW TESTAMENT on the divine plan of salvation has made the issue especially prominent in Christian theology.

The Apostle PAUL stated (Romans 8:29–30) that “those whom he [God] knew he also predestined to be conformed to the image of his Son . . . and those whom he predestined he also called; and those whom he called he also justified; and those whom he justified he also glorified.” Three types of predestination doctrine, with many variations, have developed subsequently. One theory (associated with SEMIPELAGIANISM, some forms of nominalism, and ARMINIANISM) makes foreknowledge the ground of predestination and teaches that God predestined to salvation those whose future faith and merits he foreknew. At the opposite extreme is the doctrine of double predestination, commonly identified with JOHN CALVIN but more correctly associated with the SYNOD OF DORT, and appearing also in some of the writings of ST. AUGUSTINE and MARTIN LUTHER and in the thought of the Jansenists (see JANSEN, CORNELIUS). According to this doctrine, God has determined from eternity whom he will save and whom he will damn, regardless of their merit or lack thereof. A third doctrine was set forth in other writings of St. Augustine and Luther, in the decrees of the second Council of Orange (529), and in the thought of ST. THOMAS AQUINAS. It ascribes the salvation of man to the unmerited GRACE of God and thus to predestination, but it attributes divine reprobation to man’s SIN and guilt.

PREHISTORIC RELIGION, wide variety of beliefs and ritual practices prevalent throughout the world during the Pleistocene Ice Age and the early Holocene, or Recent, Epoch—a period of approximately 500,000 years. During this period, the climates and environments of the world fluctuated considerably, and there were no ethnological regions that conformed in any meaningful way to those of the present. There was no such thing, therefore, as a unitary “prehistoric religion,” but certain widespread features of the religions that the various prehistoric cultures practiced can be identified.

Throughout the Paleolithic Period (from about 600,000–700,000 years ago to roughly 8000 BCE) humans subsisted by gathering food, as well as by hunting and fishing. The Upper Paleolithic saw the beginning of the basic techniques of drawing, modeling, sculpture, and painting, as well as the earliest manifestations of dancing, music, the use of masks, ceremonies, and the organization of society into complex patterns. From this period dates the first material evidence of fertility magic, private property, and possible social stratification. After c. 8000 BCE the Mediterranean zone became the first center of cultural modifications from hunting and food gathering to the earliest farming, followed by similar changes in southwestern Asia about 7000 BCE and in southern Mesopotamia about 4500 BCE.

Burial customs and cults of the dead. The first known burials can be dated to the Middle Paleolithic Period. The corpses, accompanied by stone tools and parts of animals, were laid in holes in the ground, and sometimes the corpses were especially protected; these practices imply a belief in life after death in some form. The Upper Paleolithic Period saw the first adoption of practices such as secondary burials or the burning of bodies (evident from the Neolithic period). The disposition of the individual parts of the body, especially the skull, is important. Ritual deposition of skulls is confirmed for the Middle Paleolithic Period. From even earlier periods, however, individual or multiple human skulls and long bones have been found within a single burial site. Evidence for ancestor cult practices dating to the 7th century BCE was first discovered from excavations at JERICHO in Palestine, where several skulls were found to have been deposited in a separate room, some of them covered with a sculpted face.

In finds belonging to the Paleolithic Period parts of human bodies as well as the bones of animals are found scattered throughout the archaeological layers and are sometimes broken or charred. By the Neolithic Period, human remains occasionally are found in association with remains of foodstuffs in waste pits or in holes and tunnels that served as sacrificial sites. Especially where human skulls have been broken open and the hollow bones split, the inference of CANNIBALISM is unavoidable. Cannibalism was likely practiced to acquire the powers and other qualities of the victim.

Sacrifice. Sacrifices appear as early as the Middle Paleolithic Period. Pits containing animal bones have been found in the vicinity of burial sites; thus, it is likely that they represent offerings to the dead or offerings to a deity believed to control the fertility of the animals. With conspicuous frequency human victims in ceremonial remains are females and children, sometimes along with young pigs. The inclusion of servants or women in the burial sites of highly placed persons most likely reflects the social status of the deceased leader and his need for servants or consorts in the afterlife, rather than a sacrificial offering in the strict sense.

Hunting rites and animal cults. In the oldest known examples of graphic art, the representations of animals play a large part; humans appear rarely, and then frequently with animal attributes or as mixed human-animal figures. This would seem to indicate a special and intimate relationship between humans and animals, a belief system often accompanied by practices such as placating and begging for forgiveness of the game killed, performing DIVINATION with animal bones, and performing mimic animal dances and fertility rites for animals. Several finds and pictures from the Upper Paleolithic Period indicate a practice in which a bear skin with attached head was draped over the body of a bear made out of clay; the bear’s skull and long bones were buried separately; the bear was shot with arrows and killed by a shot or a thrust into the lungs; and the animal or a bear-like figure was surrounded by dancers.

The Venus of Willendorf, a fertility symbol, 30,000–25,000 BCE; in the Naturhistorisches Museum, Vienna

Ali Meyer—The Bridgeman Art Library

Female fertility deities. Small female figures, the so-called Venus statuettes, appear for the first time in the Upper Paleolithic Period (beginning 40,000 years ago). Typically they are naturalistic representations of corpulent women whose breasts and buttocks are given special prominence, an emphasis that easily conveys the idea of female fertility. Such figures may have been conceived, among other things, as mothers or rulers of the animals, goddesses of the Underworld, helpers during hunting and donators of game, and sovereigns both of the land and other regions and of natural forces, including fertility.

Shamanism. Shamanism is a complex of practices and conceptions, typically including the use of ecstasy, the belief in GUARDIAN SPIRITS (who are often in animal form, with the function of helping and guiding the dead on their voyage to the beyond), and beliefs concerning metamorphosis (change of form) and traveling to the beyond. Pictures from the Upper Paleolithic Period indicate the existence of ecstatic practices and of beliefs in protective and helping spirits, which assume the forms of birds and other animals. Noisemaking objects (to drive away evil spirits) are often found in the material remains of the Iron Age and probably are connected with shamanism.

PRELATE, ecclesiastical dignitary of high rank. In the ROMAN CATHOLIC church, prelates are those who exercise the public power of the church. True prelacy is defined as “pre-eminence with jurisdiction,” and true, or real, prelates are distinguished as (1) greater prelates, who possess episcopal jurisdiction (such as PATRIARCHS, archbishops, and bishops), and (2) lesser prelates, who possess a quasi-episcopal or other jurisdiction (such as ABBOTS and prelates “of no diocese” and religious superiors, withdrawn from the ordinary diocesan jurisdiction). In some Protestant churches the title of prelate was retained after the REFORMATION.

PRESBYTER (from Greek presbyteros, “elder”), officer or minister in the early Christian church intermediate between bishop and deacon or, in modern Presbyterianism, an alternative name for elder. The word presbyter is etymologically the original form of “priest.”

The history of presbyterial government in the early church is not known in detail. During the last quarter of the 1st century a threefold organization is found in the church: (1) a spiritual organization composed of apostles, prophets, and teachers; (2) an administrative organization, consisting of the bishop and the deacons; and (3) a patriarchal organization based upon the natural deference of the younger to the older members of the church, though the senior members held no official position and were not appointed for any particular work as were the bishops and deacons. In the 2nd century the patriarchal element in the organization was merged in the administrative, and the presbyters became a definite order in the ministry.

The Epistles of Ignatius suggest that by the year 115 “the three orders” as they were afterward called—bishops, presbyters, and deacons—already existed in most of the churches. The presbyters occupied an intermediate position between the bishop and the deacons. They constituted “the council of the bishop.” It was their duty to maintain order, exercise discipline, and superintend the affairs of the church. At the beginning of the 3rd century, TERTULLIAN attests, they had no spiritual authority of their own with regard to the SACRAMENTS. The right to baptize and celebrate the communion (see EUCHARIST) was delegated to them by the bishop.

With the rise of the diocesan bishops, the position of the presbyters became more important. The charge of the individual church was entrusted to them, and gradually they took the place of the local bishops of earlier days, so that in the 5th and 6th centuries an organization was reached that approximated in general outline to the system of the priesthood, as known in modern times.

PRESBYTERIAN, form of church government developed by Swiss and Rhineland Reformers during the 16th-century Protestant REFORMATION and used with variations by REFORMED and PRESBYTERIAN CHURCHES throughout the world. JOHN CALVIN believed that the system used by him and his associates in Geneva, Strassburg, Zürich, and other places was based upon the BIBLE and the experience of the church, but he did not claim that it was the only acceptable form. Some of his successors did make such a claim.

According to Calvin’s theory of church government, the church is a community or body in which Christ is head and all members are equal under him. The ministry is given to the entire church and is distributed among many officers. All who hold office do so by election of the people. The church is to be governed and directed by assemblies of officeholders, pastors, and elders chosen to provide just representation for the church as a whole.

Since the Reformation the various Reformed and Presbyterian churches have made many adaptations of the basic structure but have not departed from it in essentials. In the Presbyterian churches of British-American background, there are usually four categories of church government: the congregational level (including the session, deacons, and trustees, and administering local church matters); the presbytery (composed of all ministers and a few elders in a given area, and administering the financial, legal, and religious affairs of the member congregations, as well as ordaining and installing ministers); the SYNOD (composed of representatives of several presbyteries, acting as a court of appeal in judicial matters); and the General Assembly (an annual meeting of commissioners, ministers, and elders, elected by all the presbyteries according to their membership, that is in charge of the general concerns of the church’s faith, order, property, MISSIONS, and education and functions as the final court of appeal on cases that come up from the congregational sessions, presbyteries, and synods).

PRESBYTERIAN CHURCHES, one of the major representative groups of classical Protestant CHRISTIANITY that arose in the 16th-century REFORMATION. Generally speaking, the modern Presbyterian churches trace their origins to the Calvinist churches of Britain, the Continental counterparts of which came to be known by the more inclusive designation REFORMED. The term presbyterian denotes a collegiate type of church government by pastors and lay leaders called elders, or PRESBYTERS. Strictly speaking, all Presbyterian churches are a part of the Reformed, or Calvinist, tradition, although not all Reformed churches are presbyterian in their form of government.

PRESTER JOHN \ˈpres-tər-ˈjän, also called Presbyter John, or John the Elder, legendary Christian ruler of the East, popularized in medieval chronicles and traditions as a hoped-for ally against the Muslims. Believed to be a NESTORIAN and a king-priest reigning “in the Far East beyond Persia and Armenia,” Prester John was the center of a number of legends that harked back to the writings of “John the Elder” in the NEW TESTAMENT.

The legend arose during the period of the Crusades (late 11th–13th century), when European Christians hoped to regain the Holy Land (Palestine) from the Muslims, and was first recorded by Bishop Otto of Freising, Germany, in his Chronicon (1145). According to this, John, a wealthy and powerful “priest and king,” reputedly a lineal descendant of the MAGI who had visited the Christ child, defeated the Muslim kings of Persia in battle, stormed their capital at Ecbatana, and intended to proceed to Jerusalem but was impeded by difficulties in crossing the Tigris River. The battle referred to may have been that fought at Qatwan, Persia, in 1141, when the Mongol khan Yeh-lü Ta-shih, the founder of the Karakitai empire in Central Asia, defeated the Seljuq SULTAN Sanjar. The title of the Karakitai rulers was GURKhan, or Kor-khan, which may have been changed phonetically in Hebrew to Yohanan or, in Syriac, to Yuhanan, thus producing the Latin Johannes, or John. In 1221, Jacques de Vitry, bishop of Acre in Palestine, and Cardinal Pelagius, a Western churchman accompanying crusaders at Damietta in Egypt, reported to Rome information about a Muslim defeat by a certain King David of India, the son or grandson of Prester John. This King David probably was Genghis Khan.

A 13th-century chronicler, Alberic de Trois-Fontaines, recorded that in 1165, a letter was sent by Prester John to several European rulers, especially Manuel I Comnenus, the Byzantine emperor, and Frederick I Barbarossa, the Holy Roman emperor. A literary fiction, the letter was in Latin and was translated into various languages. The realm of Prester John, “the three Indies,” is described as a land of natural riches, marvels, peace, and justice administered by a court of archbishops, priors, and kings. Preferring the simple title PRESBYTER, John declared that he intended to come to Palestine with his armies to battle with the Muslims and regain the HOLY SEPULCHRE, the burial place of Jesus. The letter notes that John is the guardian of the shrine of St. Thomas, the apostle to India, at Mylapore, India.

In response to an embassy from Prester John, Pope Alexander III sent a reply in 1177 to John. The fate of this letter is unknown. In the 13th and 14th centuries various missionaries and lay travelers, such as Giovanni da Pian del Carpine, Giovanni da Montecorvino, and Marco Polo, all searching for the kingdom of Prester John, established direct contact between the West and the Mongols. After the mid-14th century, Ethiopia became the center of the search for the kingdom of Prester John, who was identified with the negus (emperor) of that African Christian nation.

PRIAM \ˈprī-əm, -am\, in Greek mythology, last king of Troy. He succeeded his father, LAOMEDON, as king and extended his control over the Hellespont. He married first Arisbe (a daughter of Merops the seer) and then HECUBA, by whom he had many children, including his favorites, HECTOR and PARIS. Homer described Priam as an old man, powerless but kindly, not even blaming HELEN for all his personal losses resulting from the Trojan War. In the final year of the conflict, Priam saw 13 sons die: ACHILLES killed Polydorus, Lycaon, and Hector within one day. The death of Hector, which signified the end of Troy’s hopes, also broke the spirit of the king. Priam’s paternal love impelled him to brave the anger of Achilles and to ransom the corpse of Hector; Achilles, respecting the old man’s feelings and foreseeing his own father’s sorrows, returned the corpse. When Troy fell, NEOPTOLEMUS, the son of Achilles, butchered Priam on an altar.

PRIAPUS \ˈprī-ˈā-pəs\, in GREEK RELIGION, god of animal and vegetable fertility whose cult was originally located in the Hellespontine regions, centering especially on Lampsacus. He was represented in a caricature of the human form, grotesquely misshapen, with an enormous phallus. The ass was sacrificed in his honor, probably because the ass symbolized lecherousness and was associated with the god’s sexual potency. In Greek mythology his father was Dionysus; his mother was either a local NYMPH or APHRODITE.

In Hellenistic times Priapus’ worship spread throughout the ancient world. Sophisticated urban society tended to regard him with ribald amusement, but in the country he was adopted as a god of gardens, his statue serving as a combined scarecrow and guardian deity. He was also the patron of seafarers and fishermen and of others in need of good luck; his presence was thought to avert the EVIL EYE.

PRIEST (from Old English prēost, ultimately from Greek presbyteros, “elder”), in the Christian churches that have an episcopal policy, an officer or minister who is intermediate between a bishop and a deacon.

A priesthood developed gradually in the early Christian church as first bishops and then elders, or “presbyters,” began to exercise certain priestly functions, mainly in connection with celebration of the EUCHARIST. By the end of the 2nd century, the church’s bishops were called priests (Latin:

sacerdos). Although the priestly office was vested primarily in the bishop, a PRESBYTER shared in his priestly functions and, in his absence, could exercise certain of them as his delegate. With the spread of CHRISTIANITY and the establishment of PARISH churches, the presbyter, or parish priest, adopted more of the bishop's functions and became the principal celebrant of the Eucharist. In this capacity, as well as by hearing CONFESSION and granting ABSOLUTION, the priest eventually assumed the role of the church's chief representative of God to the people.

During the 16th-century Protestant REFORMATION, the Reformers rejected the ROMAN CATHOLIC doctrine of the sacrifice of the MASS and the conception of the priesthood that went along with it. The priesthood of all Christians was emphasized. Consequently, ministers were substituted for priests in Protestant churches except for those of the ANGLICAN tradition.

The priesthood has been traditionally made up of men, so the Anglican churches' admission of women to the priesthood has been controversial. Women had been ordained priests in Hong Kong in 1944 and in 1971. American Episcopalians approved women as priests in 1976 after heated debate. After several other Anglican churches took a similar course, the Church of England ordained its first women candidates in 1994.

PRIESTHOOD, office of a holy person, a ritual expert learned in a special knowledge of the techniques of worship and accepted as a religious leader.

In many societies certain forms of social organization (the family, clan, etc.) have a sacral character; hence, a priestly quality often attaches to the head of the group by virtue of the sacerdotal functions that he or she is required to perform. On the other hand, most civilizations also exhibit a definite tendency toward cultic specialization, and it has been suggested that the term priest should be limited to the holder of such special office.

The full-fledged priest, as a religious functionary and cultic specialist, is distinct from the ordinary people, or "laity," who require priestly services and mediation. Specialization, in its turn, leads to social differentiation and to the establishment of a "clergy"—that is, of a priestly class, or CASTE. Obviously such specialization arises only in societies able to exempt some individuals from the common toil for subsistence and to provide for their needs in exchange for their ritual contribution to the general welfare. Where such institutionalized division of labor does not exist, as in many indigenous societies, suitably gifted or knowledgeable persons will perform priestly duties in addition to their ordinary activities.

Generally speaking, the term priest denotes religious functionaries whose activity is concerned with the right performance of the ritual acts required by the divine powers and supernatural beings recognized by the group. Because sacrifice is one of the most prominent features of the human ritual relation with gods and spirits, it has come to be associated with priesthood as one of its chief functions; the BRAHMINS, or priestly caste of HINDUISM, for example, derive from those who performed the ritual sacrifice in Vedic times. Medieval ROMAN CATHOLICISM owed much of its doctrine of the priesthood to the connection of the latter with the EUCHARIST conceived as a propitiatory sacrifice.

The ancient Inca, Maya, and Aztec (see PRE-COLUMBIAN MESO-AMERICAN RELIGIONS) distinguished between priests responsible for the cult of the great national gods and such ritual experts as those engaged in DIVINATION or curing.

Similarly, many African societies differentiated between priests responsible for the worship of the tribal ancestors, on the one hand, and SHAMANS, on the other.

Priesthood, in its fully developed form, generally implies large societies with centralized authority, a fairly elaborate culture, and the existence of an organized cult with fixed rituals and well-formulated doctrines. However, not every highly developed religion of necessity possesses a priesthood. ISLAM is a religion without priests, religious authority being defined in other than sacerdotal terms. In JUDAISM, the decline of the priesthood in ancient times resulted in the assumption of many priestly functions by the RABBI, or teacher. The former hereditary priesthood of the KOHEN is still recognized symbolically in ORTHODOX JUDAISM.

Many indigenous societies exhibit patterns of "priesthood of all believers"—i.e., of all members of the group. Thus the Pueblo Indians in the southwestern United States were organized in religious fraternities, and their highly formalized and elaborate rituals were performed by these groups and not by priestly functionaries. The principle of the priesthood of all believers was also a cardinal doctrine of the churches of the 16th-century REFORMATION, both LUTHERAN and REFORMED, and of the Protestant Free churches that arose from the Reformation churches. In its PROTESTANT form the doctrine asserts that all men have access to God through JESUS CHRIST, the high priest, and thus do not need a priestly mediator.

PRIESTLY CODE, in JUDAISM, the Holiness Code of Leviticus 17–26 and EXODUS 26–40, the rest of Leviticus and most of Numbers. The Priestly Code was produced by the Temple priests and completed when the Temple, destroyed in 586 BCE, was rebuilt c. 450 BCE. Israel was admonished to form "a kingdom of priests and a holy people," thus: "You shall be holy to me, for I the Lord am holy and have separated you from the peoples that you should be mine" (Leviticus 20:26). To the priests, what mattered in 586 was the destruction of the Temple, and what made a difference "three generations later" was the restoration of ZION and the rebuilding of the Temple. To them the cult was the key, the Temple the nexus between heaven and earth. The story of creation (GENESIS 1:1–2:3) stressed the perfection of the order of nature, culminating in the SABBATH repose with all things at rest and in place. The Priestly Code builds upon the theme of restoration to perfection through the right ordering of nature as celebrated in the Temple and its sacrificial service. That is why the Priestly Code centers upon the Temple and its procedures, the governance of the PRIESTHOOD and its emoluments, the genealogical purity of Israel, culminating in that of the priesthood, and the perfection of world order embodied in the cultic center and the rhythm of holy time set there.

PRIMATE \ˈpri-mət, -māt\, in CHRISTIANITY, bishop who has precedence in a province, group of provinces, or a nation.

PROCESSION, in CHRISTIANITY, organized body of people advancing in formal or ceremonial manner as an element of Christian ritual or as a less official expression of popular piety. Public processions seem to have come into vogue soon after the recognition of Christianity as the religion of the Roman Empire by CONSTANTINE in the 4th century.

Of the vast number of processions that developed during the Middle Ages, some of the more important still have a place in the ritual of the ROMAN CATHOLIC church. They include ordinary processions, held on certain yearly festivals throughout the universal church and on other days according to the customs of the local churches, and extraordinary processions, held for special occasions (e.g., to pray for divine assistance in time of storm, famine, plague, war, and other disasters). Other processions characteristic of certain localities, though not regulated so strictly by the church and considered nonliturgical, play an important part in the religious life of the people; in the United States, for example, May processions are sometimes conducted in honor of the Virgin MARY.

The Major Rogation procession (April 25), a penitential observance with the object of obtaining God's blessing on crops that have been planted, seems to have been adopted from one of the festivals in the pre-Christian calendar of Rome. The Minor Rogations, observed on the three days before the Feast of the ASCENSION, date from the 5th century. The procession on CANDLEMAS (February 2), which includes the blessing and carrying of candles, might well be another instance of the church's subrogating a procession from a prior tradition. Another procession with a long history is that celebrated on PALM SUNDAY, commemorating the triumphant entrance of Christ into Jerusalem.

Processions have been a part of the Roman Catholic eucharistic liturgy (MASS) at the entrance rite and at the offertory rite, when the bread and wine to be used in the liturgy are brought up to the altar. Although these processions were discontinued at the end of the Middle Ages, strong efforts have been made by liturgists in the 20th century to reintroduce them to promote participation by the people.

In the Protestant REFORMATION, processions associated with the eucharistic Host and those honoring the Virgin Mary and the saints were abolished. The Anglican and Lutheran traditions still retain certain processions.

In the EASTERN ORTHODOX church, two noteworthy processions connected with the celebration of the EUCHARIST are the "little entrance" before the reading of the Gospel and the "great entrance" before the eucharistic prayer, when the offerings of bread and wine are carried in a more elaborate procession. The separation of the people from the SANCTUARY by a solid wall known as the ICONOSTASIS has tended to concentrate their devotion on these processions.

PROCRUSTES \prō-'krəs-tēz\, also called Polypemon \pā-'li-'pē-män\, Damastes \da-'mas-tēz\, or Procoptas \prō-'kăp-təs\, in Greek mythology, robber dwelling somewhere in Attica—in some versions, in the neighborhood of Eleusis. His father was said to be POSEIDON. Procrustes had an iron bed (or, according to some accounts, two beds) on which he compelled his victims to lie. If a victim was shorter than the bed, he stretched him by hammering or racking the body to fit. If the victim was longer than the bed, he cut off the legs to make the body fit the bed's length. In either event the victim died. Ultimately Procrustes was slain by his own method at the hands of the hero THESEUS, who as a young man went about slaying robbers and monsters that pervaded the countryside.

The "bed of Procrustes," or "Procrustean bed," has become proverbial for arbitrarily forcing someone or something to fit into an unnatural scheme or pattern.

PROETUS \prō-'ē-təs\, in Greek mythology, king of Argos, grandson of DANAUS. He quarreled with his brother Acrisius and divided the kingdom with him, Proetus taking Tiryns, which he fortified. Proetus' daughters were driven mad either because they insulted the goddess HERA or because they would not accept the new rites of DIONYSUS.

They imagined themselves cows until the seer MELAMPUS cured them on condition that he be given a third of the kingdom and his brother, Bias, another third.

PROKOPOVICH, FEOFAN \prə-kə-'pō-v'ich\ (b. June 18, 1681, Kiev, Ukraine, Russian Empire—d. Sept. 19, 1736, St. Petersburg), Russian Orthodox theologian and archbishop of Pskov, who by his administration, oratory, and writings directed the reformation of the Russian orthodox church (see EASTERN ORTHODOXY) in accordance with a LUTHERAN model and effected a political integration of CHURCH AND STATE that was to last two centuries.

After an Orthodox education, Prokopovich became a ROMAN CATHOLIC and in 1698 entered the Greek College of San Anastasio in Rome. He returned to Kiev in 1701, reverted to his Orthodox faith, and later became ABBOT of the Kiev monastery and rector of its celebrated ecclesiastical academy, where he taught theology, literature, and rhetoric. After publicizing laudatory statements on the cultural-political reform of Peter the Great, he was called to the court at St. Petersburg in 1716 and was made a counselor to the tsar on church and educational affairs. As principal theorist in the restructuring of the Russian church as a political arm of the state, Prokopovich cooperated in replacing the patriarchate with a Holy Synod, or supreme ecclesiastical council, by drawing up in 1720 the Spiritual Regulations, a new constitution for Orthodoxy. Appointed synodal first vice president, he was responsible for the legislative reform of the entire Russian church, subordinating it to the secular and spiritual authority of Tsar Peter, and for effecting a church-state relationship, sometimes termed a Protestantized CAESAROPAPISM, that was to continue until the Russian Revolution of 1917. Such a theory was derived by combining concepts from the 17th-century English political philosopher Thomas Hobbes with Byzantine theocratic thought.

As a theologian, Prokopovich promoted the autonomy of doctrinal theology from moral and ascetic teaching. Basing his theology mainly on liberal Protestant sources, he formed a body of doctrine markedly Lutheran in orientation, particularly in its insistence on sacred SCRIPTURE as the sole source of Christian revelation and in its account of GRACE, FREE WILL, and JUSTIFICATION. His design of the theological curriculum for St. Petersburg's ecclesiastical academy was patterned after the Lutheran faculty of Halle, Ger., and became the center for the propagation of his Orthodox reform.

Prokopovich's teachings prevailed until about 1836, when a movement toward more traditional Orthodox beliefs set in. (Indeed, during the reign of Peter's second successor, the empress Anna Ivanovna [1730–40], Prokopovich himself assumed a more conservative theological outlook.)

PROMETHEUS \prə-'mē-thē-əs, -,thi'yūs\, in GREEK RELIGION, one of the TITANS and a trickster. His intellectual side was emphasized by the apparent meaning of his name, Forethinker. In common belief he developed into a master craftsman, and in this connection he was associated with fire and the creation of humanity.

The Greek poet Hesiod related two principal legends concerning Prometheus. The first is that ZEUS, who had been tricked by Prometheus into accepting the bones and fat of a sacrifice instead of the meat, hid fire from humans. Prometheus, however, stole it and returned it to Earth once again. As the price of fire, and as punishment for mankind in general, Zeus created the woman PANDORA and sent her down to Epimetheus (Hindsight), who, though warned by Prometheus, married her. Pandora took the great lid off the jar she carried, and evils, hard work, and disease flew out to wander among mankind. Hope alone remained within.

Hesiod relates in his other tale that, to avenge himself on Prometheus, Zeus had him chained and sent an eagle to eat his liver, which constantly replenished itself; in Prometheus Bound Aeschylus made Prometheus not only the bringer of fire and civilization to humans but also their preserver, bestowing all the arts and sciences in addition to the means of survival.

PROPHECY, divinely inspired revelation or interpretation. Although prophecy is perhaps most commonly associated with JUDAISM and CHRISTIANITY, it is found throughout the religions of the world, both ancient and modern.

In its narrower sense, the term prophet (Greek: prophētēs, “interpreter,” “expounder [of divine will]”) refers to an inspired person who believes that he has been sent by his god with a message to tell. In a broader sense, the word can refer to anybody who utters the will of a deity, often ascertained through visions, dreams, or the casting of lots; the will of the deity also may be spoken in a liturgical setting. The prophet, thus, is often associated with the PRIEST, the SHAMAN, the diviner (foreteller), and the mystic.

The nature of prophecy is twofold: either inspired (by visions or revelatory auditions) or acquired (by learning certain techniques). In many cases both aspects are present. The goal of learning certain prophetic techniques is to reach an ecstatic state in which revelations can be received. That state might be reached through the use of music, dancing, drums, violent bodily movement, and self-laceration. The ecstatic prophet is regarded as being filled with the divine spirit, and in this state the deity speaks through him. Ecstatic oracles, therefore, are generally delivered by the prophet in the first-person singular pronoun and are spoken in a short, rhythmic style.

Types of prophecy can be classified on the basis of inspiration, behavior, and office. Divinatory prophets include seers, oracles, soothsayers, and mantics, all of whom predict the future or tell the divine will in oracular statements by means of instruments, dreams, telepathy, clairvoyance, or visions received in the state of ECSTASY. Predictions and foretellings, however, may also be the result of inspiration or common sense by the intelligent observation of situations and events, albeit interpreted from a religious point of view.

The diviner, sometimes compared with the prophet, performs the priestly art of foretelling (see DIVINATION). His art is to augur the future on the basis of hidden knowledge discerned almost anywhere, as in the constellations (AS-TROLOGY), the flight of birds (auspices), the entrails of sacrificial animals (haruspicy), hands (chiromancy), casting lots (cleromancy), the flames of burning sacrifices (pyromancy), and other such areas of special knowledge.

The cult prophet, or priest-prophet, is of broad importance to the religious community. Under the mandate of the cult, the priest-prophet (who may be an ordinary priest) is part of the priestly staff of a SANCTUARY, and his duty is to pronounce the divine oracular word at the appropriate point in a liturgy. As such, he is an “institutional” prophet. The difference between a cult prophet and a prophet in the classical sense is that the latter has always experienced a divine call, whereas the cult prophet, pronouncing the word of the deity under cultic mandate, repeats his messages at a special moment in the ritual.

Missionary (or apostolic) prophets are those who maintain that the religious truth revealed to them is unique to themselves alone. Such prophets—e.g., ZOROASTER, JESUS, and MUHAMMAD—acquire a following of disciples who accept that their teachings reveal the true religion. The result of this kind of prophetic action may lead to a new religion. The founders of many modern religious sects also should be included in this type.

Another type of prophet is of the reformatory or revolutionary kind (looking to the past and the future), closely related to the restorative or purificatory type (looking to the past as the ideal). The best examples are the OLD TESTAMENT classical prophets—e.g., AMOS and JEREMIAH—who were working to reform the religion of YAHWEH. In ISLAM Muhammad is included in this category. The social sympathy found among such prophets is rooted in their religious conscience. What may have been preached as religious reform, therefore, often took on the shape of social reform. This kind of prophecy is also found in India and Africa, where prophets in modern times have arisen to restore or purify the old tribal religious forms, as well as the customs and laws that had their sources in the older precolonial religious life. Many of these movements became revolutionary not only by force of logic but also by force of social and political pressure.

Though scholars may distinguish several categories of prophecy, no sharp line of demarcation differentiates the various types. Any given prophet may be both predictive and missionary, ecstatic and reformatory.

PROPHET, THE, byname of Tenskwatawa \ten-'skwä-tä-wä\ (b. c. March 1768, Old Chillicothe, Ohio [U.S.]—d. 1834, Argentine, Kan.), North American Shawnee Indian religious revivalist, who worked with his brother Tecumseh for an Indian confederacy to resist U.S. encroachment on the American Northwest.

PROPHET DANCE

The Prophet declared in 1805 that he had a message from the “Master of Life,” and in 1806 he followed this declaration with an accurate prediction of a solar eclipse. He advocated a return to distinctively Indian ways of life, rejecting the use of alcohol and of textile clothing, the concept of individual ownership of property, and racial intermarriage. Witch-burning was also a feature of his program. In November 1811, while Tecumseh was away, he allowed the Shawnees to be drawn into military action with General William Henry Harrison; the defeat on the Tippecanoe River (November 7) discredited him and destroyed the Indian confederacy.

PROPHET DANCE, North American Plateau Indian ritual of the early 19th century, precursor of the famous GHOST DANCE movement of the 1870s and 1890s. The participants danced in order to hasten the return of the dead and the return of the world to its state before European contact.

PROPHET’S MOSQUE, courtyard of the Prophet MUHAMMAD in MEDINA, Arabian Peninsula, which was the model for later Islamic architecture. The home of Muhammad and his family was a simple structure, made of raw brick, that opened on an enclosed courtyard where people gathered to hear him. In 628 a minbar, or pulpit, was added so that the Prophet was raised above the crowd; besides leading prayer, Muhammad declared his new law and decided disputes from the minbar. In 634 Muhammad decreed that prayer be directed toward MECCA; against the wall facing Mecca, the QIBLA wall, he built a roofed shelter supported by pillars made of palm trunks. Against the opposite wall of the courtyard stood a roofed gallery to shelter his companions, the antecedent of the roofed oratories in later mosques. In 706 CALIPH al-Walid I destroyed the original brick buildings and created a new mosque on the site. The new mosque, containing the tomb of Muhammad, is one of the three holiest places of ISLAM.

PROTESILAUS \ˈprō-tē-sə-ˈlā-əs\, Greek mythological hero in the Trojan War, leader of the force from Phylace and other Thessalian cities west of the Pegasaeon Gulf. Though aware that an oracle had foretold death for the first of the invading Greeks to land at Troy, he was the first ashore and the first to fall. His bride, Laodameia, was so grief-stricken that the gods granted her request that Protesilaus be allowed to return from the dead for three hours. At the expiration of the time she accompanied him to the Underworld by taking her own life.

PROTESTANT ETHIC, in sociological theory, the high value attached to hard work, thrift, and efficiency in one’s worldly calling, which, especially in the Calvinist view, were deemed signs of an individual’s election, or eternal salvation.

The German sociologist MAX WEBER in The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism (1904–05) held that the Protestant ethic was an important factor in the economic success of Protestant groups in the early stages of European capitalism, owing to the mandate that all sinners should work for the glorification of God. Calvinism’s antipathy to the worship of the flesh, its emphasis on the religious duty to make fruitful use of the God-given resources at each individual’s disposal, and its orderliness and systemization of ways of life were also regarded by Weber as economically significant aspects of the ethic.

Weber’s thesis has been subject to criticism by various writers. The English historian R.H. Tawney expanded Weber’s thesis in his Religion and the Rise of Capitalism (1926) by arguing that political and social pressures and the spirit of individualism with its ethic of self-help and frugality were more significant factors in the development of capitalism than Calvinist theology.

PROTESTANTISM, one of the three major branches of CHRISTIANITY, originating in the 16th-century REFORMATION, characterized by its doctrines of JUSTIFICATION by GRACE through faith, the priesthood of all believers, and the authority of the SCRIPTURES. In the early 21st century there were nearly 370 million Protestants worldwide.

The origin of the word Protestant lies in the second imperial Diet of Speyer (1529), which reversed by a majority vote the decision of the first Diet of Speyer (1526) to allow each prince of the Holy Roman Empire to determine the religion of his territory. The minority, consisting of 6 princes and 14 cities, issued a formal Protestation, the primary purpose of which was to insist that “in matters which concern God’s honour and salvation and the eternal life of our souls, everyone must stand and give account before God for himself.” A secondary purpose was to protest against the ban on the expansion of evangelical religion.

The supporters of the Reformation doctrines gradually came to be called Protestants both by their opponents and by themselves, since it was a convenient name to cover the many varieties of Christianity that emerged in the 16th century. No communion incorporated the word Protestant into its title, however, until this was done by the Protestant Episcopal Church of America. The 19th-century OXFORD MOVEMENT persuaded an increasingly large number of clergy and laity of the Church of England (see ANGLICAN COMMUNION) to repudiate the word Protestant as a description of their church. The term is officially used on both sides of the Atlantic Ocean by a number of societies propagating the view that the principles of the Reformation are being neglected.

The basic doctrines of Protestantism at the Reformation, in addition to those of the traditional creeds, were the justification by grace alone through faith alone, the priesthood of all believers, and the supremacy of Holy Scripture in matters of faith and order. There has been variation in sacramental doctrine among Protestants, but the limitation of the number to the two “sacraments of the Gospel,” BAPTISM and Holy Communion (see EUCHARIST), has been almost universal. The Enlightenment produced liberal Protestantism, which cast doubt on some doctrines and stressed reason, RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE, and the principle of private judgment in a way that would have been repugnant to the original Reformers. Through the efforts of thinkers such as SØREN KIERKEGAARD and KARL BARTH, Protestant theology and devotion regained a deeper appreciation of the values of pre-Reformation Christianity. Although the doctrine of the verbal inerrancy of Scripture is maintained by several Protestant groups, the supremacy of the biblical revelation usually has been reasserted without it.

PROTEUS \ˈprō-tē-əs, -tjūs, -tūs\, in Greek mythology, prophetic old man of the sea and shepherd of the sea’s flocks (e.g., seals). He was subject to the sea god POSEIDON, and his dwelling place was either the island of Pharos, near the mouth of the Nile River, or the island of Carpathus, between Crete and Rhodes. He knew all things—past, present, and future—but disliked telling what he knew. Those who wished to consult him had first to surprise and bind him during his noonday slumber. Even when caught he would try to escape by assuming all sorts of shapes. But, if his captor held him fast, the god at last returned to his proper shape, gave the wished-for answer, and plunged into the sea.

PSEUDEPIGRAPHA \,sü-di-'pi-grə-fə\, in biblical literature, a work affecting biblical style and usually spuriously attributing authorship to some biblical character. Pseudepigrapha are not included in any canon. See APOCRYPHA.

PSILOCIN AND PSILOCYBIN \ˈsɪ-lə-sən, 'sɪ- . . . ,sɪ-lə-'sɪ-bən, -sɪ-\, hallucinogenic principles contained in certain mushrooms (notably two Mexican species, Psilocybe mexicana and Stropharia cubensis). Hallucinogenic mushrooms used in religious ceremonies by the Native Americans of Mexico were considered sacred and were called “god’s flesh” by the Aztecs. In the 1950s the active principles psilocin and psilocybin were isolated from the Mexican mushrooms.

PSYCHE \ˈsɪ-kē\ (Greek: “Soul”), in classical mythology, princess of outstanding beauty who aroused VENUS’ jealousy and CUPID’S love. The fullest version of the tale is that told by the Latin author Apuleius in his Metamorphoses (The Golden Ass).

According to Apuleius, the jealous Venus commanded her son Cupid to inspire Psyche with love for the most despicable of men. Instead, Cupid placed Psyche in a remote palace where he could visit her secretly and, by his warning, only in total darkness. One night Psyche lit a lamp and found that the figure at her side was the god of love himself. When a drop of oil from the lamp awakened him, he reproached Psyche and fled. Wandering the earth in search of him, Psyche fell into the hands of Venus, who imposed upon her difficult tasks. Finally, touched by Psyche’s repentance, Cupid rescued her, and, at his request, JUPITER made her immortal and gave her in marriage to Cupid.

The sources of the tale are a number of folk motifs; the handling by Apuleius, however, conveys an ALLEGORY of the progress of the Soul guided by Love, which adhered to Psyche in Renaissance literature and art. In Greek FOLKLORE the soul was pictured as a butterfly, which is another meaning of the word psychē.

PTAH \ˈptä\, in EGYPTIAN RELIGION, creator-god and maker of things, a patron of craftsmen, especially sculptors; his high priest was called “chief controller of craftsmen.” The Greeks identified Ptah with HEPHAESTUS, the divine blacksmith. Ptah was originally the local deity of Memphis, capital of Egypt from the 1st dynasty onward; the political importance of Memphis caused Ptah’s cult to expand over the whole of Egypt. With his companion SEKHMET and the youthful god NEFERTEM, he was one of the Memphite Triad of deities. He was represented as a man in MUMMY form, wearing a skullcap and a short, straight false beard. As a mortuary god, Ptah was often fused with Seker (or Soker) and OSIRIS to form Ptah-Seker-Osiris.

PTAHHOTEP \,ptä-'hō-tep\ (fl. 2400 BCE), vizier of ancient Egypt who attained high repute in wisdom literature. His treatise “The Maxims of Ptahhotep,” probably the earliest extant large piece of Egyptian wisdom literature, was written primarily for young men of influential families who would assume higher civil offices. Ptahhotep’s proverbial sayings upheld obedience to a father and a superior as the highest virtue, but they also emphasized humility, faithfulness in performing one’s own duties, and the ability to keep silence when necessary.

P’U \ˈpü\, Pinyin pu (Chinese: “simple,” “in primordial condition”), in TAOISM, metaphorical expression signifying the “uncarved block”—i.e., the primordial condition of the mind before it has been affected by experiences. In the state of p’u there are no distinctions between right and wrong, black and white, beautiful and ugly. Because truth becomes relative, ideas have no value and all contradictions are resolved. Taoists desire to return to this state by abandoning conventional knowledge and by suppressing desires that bind them to the world. Individuals who achieve this state of mental unity thereby align their existence with the unity of the Absolute TAO.

PUDGALAVĀDIN \,püd-gə-lə-'vā-din\, also called Vātsīputrīya \,vāt-sē-'pü-trē-yə\, ancient Buddhist school in India that affirmed the existence of an enduring person (pudgala) distinct from both the conditioned (saṃskṛta) and the unconditioned (asaṃskṛta); the sole asaṃskṛta for them was NIRVANA. If consciousness exists, there must be a subject of consciousness, the pudgala; it is this alone that transmigrates from life to life.

The Sammatīya school, a derivation of the Pudgalavādin, had a wide diffusion, extending from India to Bengal and Champa, located in what now is central Vietnam; the Chinese pilgrim HSÜAN-TSANG described it in the 7th century as one of the four main Buddhist sects of that time. The Sammatīya believed that, although humans do not exist independently from the five SKANDHAS (components) that make up their personalities, still they are greater than the mere sums of their parts. The Sammatīya were severely criticized by other Buddhists, who considered the theory close to the rejected theory of ĀTMAN—i.e., the supreme universal self.

PŪJĀ \ˈpü-jä\ (Sanskrit: “worship”), in HINDUISM, ceremonial worship, ranging from brief daily rites in the home to elaborate temple ritual. The components of a pūjā vary greatly according to the sect, community, location, time of day, needs of the worshiper, and religious text followed. Basically, in a pūjā, a deity, manifested in his or her image, is accorded the honor given to a royal guest. The attentions (upacāras) paid to the deity begin in the morning and continue all day, including ritual bathing and dressing, serving the usual three meals, and putting the deity to bed at night.

A pūjā may also include a circumambulation (PRADAKṢIṆA) of the image or shrine and, in an elaborate ritual, a sacrifice (bali) and oblation to the sacred fire (homa). Special ceremonies according to the festival calendar may also be observed, such as swinging the deity or playing games according to the season.

One important type of pūjā in Indian temple and private worship is ārati (Sanskrit ārātrika), the waving of lighted lamps before an image of a deity or a person to be honored. In performing the rite, the worshiper circles the lamp three or more times in a clockwise direction while chanting a prayer or singing a hymn. In Indian households, ārati is a commonly observed ritual element accorded specially honored guests. It is also a part of many domestic ceremonies.

Some pūjās may be performed by the worshiper alone, while others may require the services of a ritually pure person such as a PRIEST. A pūjā may be performed for a specific announced purpose or simply as an act of devotion.

PUNĀNA \ˈpūn-yə\ (Pāli: “merit”), primary attribute sought by Buddhists in order to build up better KARMA (the cumulative consequences of deeds) and thus to achieve a more favorable future rebirth. The concept is particularly stressed in the THERAVĀDA tradition of Southeast Asia.

Punāna can be acquired through DANA (“giving,” such as the offering of food and robes to monks or donation to a temple or monastery); sila (the keeping of the moral precepts); and bhavana (the practice of meditation). Merit can also be transferred from one being to another. This is a central feature of the MAHĀYĀNA schools, in which the ideal Buddhist is the BODHISATTVA who dedicates himself to the service of others and transfers merit from his own inexhaustible store to benefit others.

PURĀNA \pū-ˈrā-nə\ (Sanskrit: “Ancient Lore”), any of a number of popular encyclopedic collections of Hindu religious narrative, legend, and genealogy, varying greatly as to date and origin.

Traditionally a Purāna treats five subjects: primary creation of the universe, secondary creation after periodical annihilation, genealogy of gods and saints, grand epochs, and history of the royal dynasties. Purānas are connected in subject with the MAHĀBHĀRATA and have some relationship to the lawbooks (DHARMA ŚĀSTRAS). Other materials of religious concern were accumulated in Purānic texts during the period c. 400 CE to c. 1000, concerning customs, ceremonies, sacrifices, festivals, CASTE duties, donations, construction of temples and images, and places of PILGRIMAGE. Purānas are written almost entirely in narrative couplets.

The 18 principal surviving Purānas are often grouped loosely according to whether they exalt VISHNU, SHIVA, or BRAHMĀ, but they all deal with similar material. The main Purānas are usually regarded as (1) the Viṣṇu, Nārādīya, Bhāgavata, Garuḍa, Padma, and Vārāha, (2) the Matsya, Kūrma, Liṅga, Śiva, Skanda, and Agni (or Vāyu), and (3) the Brāhmāṇḍa, Brahmavaivarta, Mārkaṇḍeya, Bhaviṣya, Vāmana, and Brahma Purānas. By far the most popular is the BHĀGAVATA PURĀNA, which in its treatment of the early life of KRISHNA has had profound influence on the RELIGIOUS BELIEFS of India. Narratives that glorify the goddess and her exploits are found primarily in the Devī-bhāgavata-purāna and in the Devī-māhātmya, a section of the Mārkaṇḍeya Purāna. There are also 18 “lesser,” or Upapurānas, treating similar material, and a large number of sthala purānas, or māhātmyas, glorifying temples or sacred places, which are recited in the services of the temples.

PURDAH \ˈpər-də\, also spelled pardah, Hindi pardā (Persian: “screen,” or “veil”), practice that was inaugurated by Muslims and later adopted by various Hindus, especially in India, which involves the seclusion of women from public observation by means of concealing clothing (including the veil) and by the use of high-walled enclosures, screens, and curtains within the home.

The practice of purdah is said to have originated in the Persian culture and to have been acquired by the Muslims during the Arab conquest of what is now Iraq in the 7th century CE. Muslim domination of northern India influenced the practice of HINDUISM, and purdah became usual among the Hindu upper classes of northern India. Purdah has largely disappeared in Hindu practice, though the seclusion and veiling of women is practiced to a greater or lesser degree in many ISLAMIC countries. PURE LAND BUDDHISM, Chinese (Wade-Giles romanization) Ch’ing-t’u \ˈchiŋ-ˈtū\, or (Pinyin) Qingtu, Japanese Jōdo \ˈjō-dō\, devotional cult of the Buddha AMITĀBHA (Sanskrit: “Buddha of Infinite Light”), known in China as O-mi-t’o-fo and in Japan as Amida Butsu. It is one of the most popular forms of MAHĀYĀNA BUDDHISM in eastern Asia. Pure Land schools believe that rebirth in Amitābha’s Western Paradise, Sukhāvātī (known as the Pure Land, or Pure Realm), is assured for all those who invoke Amitābha’s name with sincere devotion (nembutsu, referring to the Japanese formula of invocation, namu Amida Butsu).

The Pure Land belief is based on three Sanskrit SCRIPTURES, the Amitāyur-dhyāna Sūtra (“Discourse Concerning Meditation on Amitāyus”) and the “larger” and “smaller” Pure Land sūtras, the Sukhāvātī-vyūha Sūtras (“Description of the Western Paradise Sūtras”). These texts relate the story of the monk Dharmākara, the future Amitāyus, or Amitābha, who made a series of vows that were meant to be fulfilled when he became a buddha. The most important of these, the 18th, promised rebirth in the Pure Land to all the faithful who called upon his name, who would then remain in that beautiful land until they were ready for final Enlightenment.

According to the larger Pure Land sūtra, in addition to calling upon Amitābha, one needs to accumulate merit and concentrate on Enlightenment. In the later, smaller Pure Land sūtra, however, the Blessed Land is not a reward for good works but is accessible to anyone who invokes Amitābha at the hour of death.

In China the beginnings of the Pure Land cult can be traced back to the 4th century, when the scholar Hui-yūan formed a society of monks and laymen who meditated on the name of Amitābha. T’an-luan and his successors Tao-ch’o and Shan-tao systematized and spread the doctrine in the 6th and 7th centuries and are recognized as the first patriarchs of the Pure Land school. In devotional art, new emphasis was given to the representation of Amitābha, together with AVALOKITEŚVARA and Mahāsthāmaprāpta, his attendant BODHISATTVAS. In China the Pure Land tradition prospered throughout the premodern period, and many of its beliefs and practices were accepted by members of other Buddhist sects.

The Pure Land teaching was transmitted from China to Japan by monks of the Tendai (T’ien-t’ai) school, and in the 12th–13th century the sect took on a separate and distinctively Japanese identity, mainly through the efforts of HŌNEN, who founded the Jōdo-shū (Pure Land sect). Hōnen believed that most men were, like himself, incapable of obtaining buddhahood on this earth through their own efforts (such as learning, good deeds, or meditation) but were dependent on Amida's help. Hōnen stressed the recitation of nembutsu as the one act necessary to gain admittance to the Pure Land.

With the passage of time the Jōdo sect split up into five branches, of which two are still in existence—the Chinzei, the larger of the two, which is often referred to simply as Jōdo, and the Seizan. The Ji, or Time, sect was another variant; its name derived from the sect's rule of reciting the hymns of Zendo (Shan-tao) six times a day.

Hōnen's disciple SHINRAN is regarded as the founder of the Jōdo Shinshū, or True Pure Land sect, which has become the largest Pure Land group. According to Shinran, faith alone is sufficient to ensure rebirth into Amida's paradise. The school is distinguished by the fact that it discourages the worship of other Buddhist deities and also by the fact that it was one of the first of many Japanese schools explicitly to sanction the practice of clerical marriage.

PURGATORY, in ROMAN CATHOLIC doctrine, state of existence or condition of the soul of a person who has died in a state of GRACE but who has not been purged, or purified, from all possible stain of unforgiven venial SINS (pardonable less-serious offenses against God), forgiven mortal sins (serious offenses against God that destroy sanctifying grace), imperfections, or evil habits. Souls in such conditions must thus be purified before entering heaven.

The doctrine of purgatory is derived from 2nd–1st-century BCE Jewish concepts that persons will be judged by God according to their deeds and that the faithful should pray that God show mercy to souls. Primarily based on 2 Maccabees 12:45, Roman Catholic teaching also derives from indirect references in the NEW TESTAMENT.

During the period of the early church, purgatory was in many circles considered a fundamental doctrine, but it was not until the councils of Lyon and Florence in the Middle Ages and the COUNCIL OF TRENT in the REFORMATION period that the teaching was authoritatively defined. The matter of the place, duration, and nature of the punishments of purgatory has not been definitively answered. Roman Catholic doctrine also holds that the souls who are in purgatory may be aided by the faithful on earth by way of prayers, almsgiving, INDULGENCES, fasting, sacrifices, and other works of piety.

The existence of purgatory has been denied by PROTESTANT churches and most EASTERN ORTHODOX churches, as well as by the independent churches of Eastern CHRISTIANITY (e.g., Syrians, NESTORIANS, and MONOPHYSITES), although most Eastern Christians believe that the dead can be helped by the prayers and good deeds of the living faithful.

PURIFICATION, use of ritual techniques to protect against what are held to be unclean, sinful, or otherwise undesirable situations. In a society with a strong sense of solidarity, if one individual violates a prohibition, the whole community may feel itself menaced until the violator is purified.

Childbirth, puberty, marriage, warfare or bloodshed, and death are commonly marked by purifying rites. Contaminating factors may include foods (as the flesh of totem animals), persons (as menstruating women or persons of inferior CASTE), places, and so on. Rituals of purification may entail the use of water (as in BAPTISM), mutilation (as in CIRCUMCISION), fasting, prayer, and CONFESSION.

PURIM \ˈpür-im, pür-ˈrēm\, English Feast of Lots, Jewish festival commemorating the survival of the Jews who, in the 5th century BCE, were marked for death by their Persian rulers.

The story is related in the OLD TESTAMENT Book of Esther. Haman, chief minister of King Ahasuerus, arranged for the Jews to be slaughtered because of a personal grudge he had against Mordecai, a Jew. Haman, by casting lots, selected the 13th day of the month of Adar as the date of execution. Esther, the Jewish queen of Ahasuerus and adopted daughter of Mordecai, convinced the king to have Haman hanged and to elevate Mordecai to chief minister. A royal edict allowed Jews throughout the empire to attack their enemies on Adar 13, and after their victory they declared the following day a holiday named Purim (alluding to the lots Haman had cast).

The ritual observance of Purim begins with a day of fasting, Ta'anit Esther (Fast of Esther) on Adar 13, the day preceding the actual holiday. The SYNAGOGUE service includes a reading of the Book of Esther. Jews are enjoined to exchange gifts and make donations to the poor. Many nonreligious customs have come to be associated with the festival, including Purim plays, which became popular during the 17th century, and the baking of three-cornered pastries called hamantaschen ("Haman's pockets").

PURITANISM, religious reform movement in the late 16th and 17th centuries that sought to "purify" the Church of England (see ANGLICAN COMMUNION) from remnants of Roman Catholic "popery" that the Puritans claimed had been retained after the religious settlement reached early in the reign of Queen Elizabeth I. Puritans became noted for a spirit of moral and religious earnestness that determined their whole way of life, and they sought through church reform to make their lifestyle the pattern for the whole nation.

King Henry VIII separated the Church of England from Rome in 1534, and the cause of PROTESTANTISM advanced rapidly under Edward VI (reigned 1547–53). During the reign of Queen Mary (1553–58) England returned to ROMAN CATHOLICISM, and many Protestants were martyred or forced into exile. Many of the exiles found their way to Geneva, where John Calvin's church provided a working model of a disciplined church. Elizabeth's accession was enthusiastically welcomed by these Protestants in 1558, but her settlement disappointed those who sought extensive reform, and they were unable to achieve their objectives in the Convocation, the primary governing body of the church.

Many of these Puritans—as they came to be known during a controversy over vestments in the 1560s—sought parliamentary support for an effort to institute a PRESBYTERIAN form of polity for the Church of England. Other Puritans, concerned with the long delay in reform, decided upon a “reformation without tarrying for any.” These “Separatists” repudiated the state church and formed voluntary congregations based on a covenant with God and among themselves. Both groups were repressed by the establishment. Denied the opportunity to reform the ESTABLISHED CHURCH, English Puritanism turned to preaching, pamphlets, and a variety of experiments in religious expression and in social behavior and organization. Its successful growth also owed much to patrons among the nobility and in Parliament and its control of colleges and professorships at Oxford and Cambridge.

Puritan hopes were again raised when the Calvinist James VI of Scotland succeeded Elizabeth as James I of England in 1603. But in 1604 he dismissed the Puritans' grievances. Puritans remained under pressure. Some were deprived of their positions; others got by with minimal conformity; and still others fled England. The pressure for conformity increased under Charles I (1625–49) and his archbishop, William Laud. Nevertheless, the Puritan spirit continued to spread, and, when civil war broke out between Parliament and Charles in the 1640s, Puritans seized the opportunity to urge Parliament and the nation to renew its covenant with God. Parliament called together a body of clergy to advise it on the government of the church, but this body—the Westminster Assembly—was so badly divided that it failed to achieve reform of church government and discipline. Meanwhile, the New Model Army, which had defeated the royalist forces, feared that the Assembly and Parliament would reach a compromise with King Charles that would destroy their gains for Puritanism, so it seized power and turned it over to Oliver Cromwell. The religious settlement under Cromwell's Commonwealth allowed for a limited pluralism that favored the Puritans. A number of radical Puritan groups appeared, including the Levelers, the Diggers, the Fifth Monarchy Men, and the Quakers (the only one of lasting significance).

After Cromwell's death in 1658, Laud's strict episcopal pattern was reinstated. Thus, English Puritanism entered a period known as the Great Persecution. English Puritans made a final unsuccessful attempt to secure their ideal of a comprehensive church during the Glorious Revolution, but England's religious solution was defined in 1689 by the Act of Toleration, which continued the established church as episcopal but also tolerated dissenting groups.

The Puritan ideal of realizing the Holy Commonwealth by the establishment of a covenanted community was carried to the American colony of Virginia by Thomas Dale, but the greatest opportunity came in New England. The original pattern of church organization in the Massachusetts Bay colony was a “middle way” between presbyterianism and Separatism, yet in 1648 four New England Puritan colonies jointly adopted the Cambridge Platform, establishing a congregational form of church government. Only the elect could vote and rule. When this raised problems for second-generation residents, they adopted the Half-Way Covenant, which permitted baptized, moral, and orthodox persons to share the privileges of church membership. Other variations of the Puritan experiment were established in Rhode Island by ROGER WILLIAMS, who was banished from the Massachusetts Bay colony, and in Pennsylvania by the Quaker William Penn.

Puritans believed that conversion was necessary to redeem one from one's sinful condition, that God had chosen to reveal salvation through preaching, and that the HOLY SPIRIT rather than reason was the energizing instrument of salvation. In the place of contemporary Anglican preaching and ritual, the Puritans emphasized plain preaching that drew on images from SCRIPTURE and from everyday experience. Still, because of the importance of preaching, the Puritans placed a premium on a learned ministry. The conversion experience that was characteristic of Puritans combined with the doctrine of PREDESTINATION inherited from CALVINISM to produce a sense of themselves as elect spirits chosen by God to revolutionize history.

PURITY AND IMPURITY, set of opposing conceptions found throughout the history of religions. Although variously defined, they are important for the establishment of order and structure for both the individual and society.

It is important to remember that the pure and the impure are not defined by certain natural properties. What is defined as pure and impure across religions can be quite arbitrary. For instance, in some systems animal excrement might be viewed as inherently impure, yet among Hindus, cow urine and dung are used and classified as pure (see COW, SANCTITY OF THE). The CASTE system in India involves notions of purity and impurity as well: the Brahmin ritual specialist is held to be most pure, while the ŚŪDRA, the service workers, are regarded as most impure, and the Śūdra castes themselves are distinguished from one another by varying degrees of purity and impurity.

In the various religions of the world it is commonly held that a worshiper must attain a degree of ritual purity before approaching the divinity. In ancient Greece, for example, the Homeric heroes washed their hands before praying or performing sacrifice. With time, this developed into the principle that one must be pure both externally (physically) and internally (ethically) if one is to address the divine. Similar systems in contemporary religions include ṬAHĀRA, the Muslim code on ritual cleanliness. See also TOHORAH.

PWYLL \ˈpü-əhl\, in Celtic mythology, king of Dyfed, a beautiful land containing a magic cauldron of plenty. He became a friend of Arawn, king of Annwn (the Underworld), and exchanged shapes and kingdoms with him for a year and a day, thus gaining the name Pwyll Pen Annwn (“Head of Annwn”). With the aid of the goddess RHANNON, who loved him, Pwyll won her from his rival, Gwawl. She bore him a son, Pryderi, who was abducted by Gwawl. Pryderi was later restored to his parents and succeeded Pwyll as ruler both in Dyfed and in Annwn. In Arthurian legend, Pwyll's cauldron became the Holy Grail, and Pwyll appeared as Pelles, the keeper of the Grail.

PYANOPSIA \,pī-ə-ˈnäp-sē-ə\, also spelled Pyanepsia \-ˈnep-\, in ancient GREEK RELIGION, festival in honor of APOLLO, held at Athens on the seventh day of the month of Pyanopsion (October). The festival's rites included two offerings, consisting of a hodgepodge of pulse (edible seeds) and a branch of olive or laurel bound with wool, around which were hung fruits of the season, pastries, and small jars of honey, oil, and wine. The offerings were carried to the temple of Apollo, where they were suspended on the gate. The doors of private houses were similarly adorned. Both offerings have been connected with the Cretan expedition of THESEUS, who vowed to make a thanks offering to Apollo if he was successful in slaying the MINOTAUR.

PYGMALION \ˈpɪg-ˈmāl-yən, -ˈmā-lē-ən\, in Greek mythology, king of Cyprus who fell in love with a statue of the goddess APHRODITE. Ovid, in his Metamorphoses, embellished the tale: Pygmalion, a sculptor, made an ivory statue representing his ideal of womanhood and then fell in love with his own creation; the goddess VENUS brought the statue to life in answer to his prayer.

PYRAMID, in architecture, monumental structure constructed of or faced with stone or brick and having a rectangular base and four sloping triangular (or sometimes trapezoidal) sides meeting at an apex (or truncated to form a platform). Pyramids have been built at various times in Egypt, The Sudan, Ethiopia, western Asia, Greece, Cyprus, Italy, India, Thailand, Mexico, South America, and some islands of the Pacific Ocean.

The pyramids of ancient Egypt were funerary edifices. They were built over a period of 2,700 years, ranging from the beginning of the Old Kingdom to the close of the Ptolemaic Period; from c. 2686–2345 BCE the pyramid was the regular type of royal tomb. It was not, as such, an isolated structure but rather was always part of an architectural complex. The essential components were the pyramid itself, containing or surmounting the grave proper and standing within an enclosure on high desert ground; an adjacent mortuary temple; and a causeway leading down to a pavilion that was situated at the edge of the cultivation and probably connected with the Nile by a canal. About 80 royal pyramids have been found in Egypt, many of them reduced to mere mounds of debris and long ago plundered of their treasures.

The prototype of the pyramid was the mastaba, a form of tomb that was characterized by a flat-topped rectangular superstructure of mud brick or stone with a shaft descending to the burial chamber far below it. Djoser, the second king of the 3rd dynasty, undertook for the first time the construction of a mastaba entirely of stone; once the base was completed it was extended on the ground on all four sides, and its height was increased by building rectangular additions of diminishing size superimposed upon its top. This monument, which lies at Saqqarah, is known as the Step Pyramid; it is probably the earliest stone building of importance erected in Egypt.

The earliest tomb known to have been designed and executed throughout as a true pyramid is the North Stone Pyramid at Dahshur, thought by some also to have been erected by Snefru. It is about 720 feet wide at the base and 340 feet high. The greatest of the Egyptian pyramids are those of the pharaohs Khufu, Khafre, and Menkure at Giza.

Among American pyramids the best known include the Pyramid of the Sun and the Pyramid of the Moon at Teotihuacán in central Mexico, the Castillo at Chichén Itzá, and various Inca and Chimú structures in Andean settlements. American pyramids were generally built of earth and then faced with stone, and they are typically of stepped form and topped by a platform or temple structure. The Pyramid of the Sun, with base dimensions of 720 feet by 755 feet, rivals in size the Great Pyramid of Khufu at Giza.

PYRAMID TEXTS, collection of Egyptian mortuary prayers, hymns, and SPELLS intended to protect a dead king or queen and ensure life and sustenance in the hereafter. The texts, inscribed on the walls of the inner chambers of the PYRAMIDS, are found at Saqqārah in several 5th- and 6th-dynasty pyramids, of which that of Unas (c. 2400 BCE), last king of the 5th dynasty, is the earliest known. The texts constitute the oldest surviving body of Egyptian religious and funerary writings.

PYTHIAN GAMES \ˈpi-thē-ən\, in ancient Greece, various athletic and musical competitions held in honor of APOLLO, chiefly those at DELPHI. The musicians' contest there dated from very early times. In 582 BCE it was made quadrennial, and athletic events including foot and chariot races were added in emulation of the Olympic Games. Open to all Greeks, the contests were held either at the Delphic shrine on Mount Parnassus or on the Crisaean plain below. The victor was awarded a laurel wreath. The games took place in August of the third year of each Olympiad (the four-year period between Olympic Games). They continued to be held until the 4th century CE.

PYTHON \ˈpɪ-,thän, -thən\, in Greek mythology, huge serpent that was killed by the god APOLLO at DELPHI either because it would not let him found his oracle, being accustomed itself to giving oracles, or because it had persecuted Apollo's mother, LETO, during her pregnancy. In the earliest account the serpent is nameless and female, but later it is male and named Python (Pytho was the old name for Delphi). Python was traditionally the child of GAEA, who according to myth, had had an oracle at Delphi long before Apollo came.

QABBALAH AND JEWISH MYSTICISM, in JUDAISM, system that entails the attempt on the part of a believer to interact with God on a personal and highly intense level. Visions, applying special spiritual techniques to the study of SCRIPTURE, and performing Jewish ritual in a certain manner are all modes of mystical experience in which people conceive themselves as coming close to God. Jewish mysticism is often identified with Qabbalah (also spelled Kabbalah). The Hebrew word qabbalah means “the Act of Receiving” or “(Religious) Tradition.” There is no word in Hebrew for “mysticism.” Indeed, mysticism itself is a difficult word to define but may be seen for the purposes of this article as a crystallizing of the human wish to interact with the divine and the divine world (ANGELS, spirits, etc.) in a direct and immediate manner. Therefore, aspects of experiences and notions that in other religions are called mysticism are present in a number of phenomena in Judaism. There is also no Hebrew word for “ECSTASY,” which in many mystical phenomena designates the highest point that a mystic can reach. Still, Jewish mysticism has a number of terms that cover the experience of mystical ecstasy—the feeling that the gap between the human and the divine has been bridged, even if only temporarily; such terms include the Hebrew word DEVEQUT. In other cases, this state of union is sometimes defined as “Holy Marriage.”

The earliest phases of Jewish mystical experience can be traced back to Scripture, which contains various accounts of people who experienced visions of the divine, apparently while losing consciousness. In all likelihood these accounts describe ecstatic fits (these descriptions are made, for instance, of Abram [later ABRAHAM] in GENESIS 15 and of SAUL in 1 Samuel).

The earliest accounts of experiences that substantially depart from the kind of experiences reported in Scripture are found in what became known as APOCALYPTICISM (literature of divine revelations that are secretly received and fictitiously attributed to biblical figures). This literature was created mostly in the Hellenistic period—that is, in the days of the Second Temple (6th century BCE–1st century CE). Among the more essential features not represented in Scripture are: the descriptions of heavenly ascensions (from which the visionaries come back); vision of angels that come to earth to disclose cosmological and historical secrets; the application of semi-magical means to obtain the relevant experiences and survive; and the element of exclusive secrecy that is imposed on those who receive the apocalyptic information. Apocalypticism in its radical forms of interpretation of Scripture involved, at times, a rewriting of biblical texts. As the apocalyptic trend among the QUMRAN people shows, the rewriting of Scripture can even involve the Law-sections of Scripture (as in the case of the Temple Scroll; see DEAD SEA SCROLLS). Scholars believe that the mystical aspects of Apocalypticism were inherited by Christianity; this can be seen in the writings of ST. PAUL. The Apocalypse of John (OR, REVELATION TO JOHN) clearly translates Jewish apocalyptic lore to a Christian provenance.

In the wake of Apocalypticism, further mystical aspects can be discovered among the rabbinic sages of the MISHNAH and the TALMUD. It is surprising that the sages, who are generally viewed as having been singularly engaged in the advancement of Judaism in its legalistic framework, were openly engaged in mystical experiences as well. In this context the mystical experiences were referred to as the “[Works of the] Chariot” (Hebrew: [Ma’aseh] Merkabah)—referring to the visions that the prophet EZEKIEL had in regard to the departure of the Divine Glory (God) from the demolished temple, and the future return of that Glory to the rebuilt temple. Another term that became current among the RABBIS and which in all likelihood indicated a mystical translation to heaven was “Pardes,” that is (in Persian), “an orchard [or forest] surrounded by a fence.” (There may be erotic implications with this term, but, even if this is not so, eroticism is clearly expressed in medieval Qabbalah and in subsequent developments of Jewish mysticism.) This branch of Jewish Merkabah mysticism is fully developed in the Hekhalot (“The Heavenly Palaces”) literature, attributed to some of the Mishnah authorities (e.g., Rabbi AKIBA BEN JOSEPH, Rabbi ISHMAEL BEN ELISHA). Among other things, these Hekhalot writings (in Hebrew) influenced Jewish liturgical poetry, including the daily prayer book. See also MERKABAH MYSTICISM.

Jewish mysticism took a completely new turn when Sefer Yetsirah (“The Book of Creation”) became known, most probably in the 6th or 7th century CE. As with many books from early times, this book is known in more than one version (three of them, in this case), and in its enigmatic brevity it outlines the creation of the world through the 10 SEFIROT and the 22 letters of the Hebrew alphabet. This is done on three parallel dimensional levels: in the cosmic world (in Hebrew, ‘Olam), in the dimension of time (Shanah, literally “year”), and in the human realm (Nefesh, that is, “soul”). The book actually says very little on how the world was created; it just sets the factual process and means in a sequential and paradigmatic order. Some scholars have suggested that the book is not mystical at all. Its inclusion in the mystical literature is justified by its mentioning the term Sefirot for the first time. It is not exactly clear what the term means. A likely suggestion is that in Sefer Yetsirah it refers to the mathematical value of letters and words as employed in the divine structuring of the world. Other suggestions refer to the Greek word Sphaira, metaphysical circles. In any event, when the word became the key notion in the mystical doctrine of the Qabbalah, it indicated 10 spiritual principles that paradigmatically stand for the whole of the scriptural vocabulary.

The first book that employs the notion of the 10 Sefirot in this elaborate sense is SEFER HA-BAHIR (“The Book of Clear Light”). It first appeared in Provence, France, about the 12th century. The principle that the book sets forth is that every word in Scripture corresponds to one of these Sefirot. Thus, every phrase or clause in Scripture outlines a process that is inherent in the divine world. However, the more systematic writing, in this respect, is the SEFER HA-ZOHAR ("The Book of [the Divine] Splendor").

The Zohar is attributed to Rabbi SIMEON BEN YOHAI, a 2nd-century-CE authority on the TANNA, but in all likelihood was written by a group of mystics affiliated with MOSES DE LEÓN, who lived in Spain and was active there in the second half of the 13th century. The book is written mostly in Aramaic and runs as a mystical Midrashic commentary to almost every verse in the Hebrew PENTATEUCH. Once again, every phrase or clause in Scripture reflects in a symbolic manner the special dynamic that is believed to be inherent in the celestial manifestations of the divine powers. The names of these Sefirot as they are given in the Zohar are Keter (Crown), Hokhamah (Wisdom), Binah (Sagacity), Chesed (Grace), Gevurah (Power), Tif'eret (Glory), Netsach (Longevity), Hod (Magisterial Dignity), Yesod (Foundation), and Malkhut (Kingdom). These names may seem rather arbitrary, and the internal logic upon which they are based is never made clear in any known text.

There are several kinds of spiritual dynamic that go through this doctrine of the 10 Sefirot. Three of the more essential ones are: God is conceived as En Sof (The Limitless), and he is dwelling in the remote recesses of the unknown above the Sefirot. En Sof acts through the Sefirot who emanate from him and in this respect are his manifested powers. They are either his own essence or else the vessels containing the divine essence. The Sefirot are structurally arranged in three columns. The right one is dominated by Chesed; the left one is dominated by Gevurah and is the source of stern judgment and, hence, of evil. The middle section is dominated by the interaction between Tif'eret and Malkhut, respectively the male and female principles in the divine world. Union between the two is brought about by the predominance of the right side of the Sefirot, and separation by the predominance of the left side. Predominance, in this respect, is the result of what the People of ISRAEL do in the lower world. When they do good things and are obedient to the laws of God, Chesed prevails and therefore the union between Tif'eret and Malkhut, as well. However, when the opposite is the case, Gevurah prevails, and hence separation and exilic conditions. The onslaught of the mythic powers of evil—generally described as the Sitra Achra ("The Other Side," SATAN) and the Qelipot ("Shells")—are let loose and cause fatal damage to the divine powers and to the People of Israel, alike. We may define this doctrine as theurgic THEOSOPHY. That is to say, divine history is effected by processes that come into being through the acts of Israel. This is considered the apex of Jewish mysticism. It is noteworthy that such a radical form of interpreting Scripture could be suggested in the Middle Ages. There were, of course, many who did, and many who still do, define all this as the culmination of mythological APOSTASY. Nevertheless, the effect of this doctrine on all later forms of Jewish thinking and spirituality was enormous. Hardly any later books or historical events—in particular, messianic events like 17th-century Shabbetaianism (see SHABBETAI TZEVI) and modern HASIDISM (e.g., Chabad)—were not in one way or another affected by these doctrines. Several Halakhic matters, too, are influenced by Qabbalistic ideas and notions.

The publication of the Zohar led to a proliferation of mystical activity. Hundreds of books were written in its wake, some of which imitate its genre, others seeking new approaches. A few key authors were Abraham ben Samuel Abulafia (1240–c. 1291), MOSES BEN JACOB CORDOVERO (1522–70) and ISAAC BEN SOLOMON LURIA (1534–72).

A Christian type of "Qabbalah" became known in Europe from the 16th century onward. In its wake Qabbalistic notions, particularly those of the 10 Sefirot, were blended with the philosophical ALLEGORY of the Hebrew Scripture as known in the Christian HERMENEUTICS of Scripture and Christian doctrine. All this was mainly conceived as a Platonic program, in which new philosophical and scientific ideas created the needed intellectual background.

Today, Qabbalah is often identified with a number of manifestations of popular religion and spirituality, as people seek new types of RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE that are not identified with established forms of religiousness. There is actually a precedent for this, as, since the days of the Renaissance, Qabbalah has often housed divergent forms of religious ideas and experiences that had very little to do with the Judaic notion of the term.

QADARĪYA \kă-dă-'rē-ə\, in ISLAM, adherents of the doctrine of FREE WILL (from qadar, meaning "fate" or "destiny"). The name was also applied to the MU'TAZILA, the theological school that believed that humans, through their free will, can choose between GOOD AND EVIL. The Mu'tazila themselves, however, preferred to be called ahl al-adl ("the people of justice").

On the question of free will and predetermination, the Qadarīya based their stand on the necessity of divine justice. They maintained that without responsibility and freedom humans cannot justly be held accountable for their actions. Their opponents disregarded the question of justice and argued that to allow humans any freedom is equal to denying God's omnipotence and his absolute creative power. Two compromise views were held by moderate theological schools, the Ash'ariya and the MĀTURĪDĪYA.

QĀDĪ \kă-dē\ (Arabic), also spelled Cadi, or Kadi, Muslim judge who renders decisions according to the SHARĪ'A. The qāḍī hears only religious cases such as those involving inheritance, pious bequests (waqf), marriage, and divorce, though theoretically his jurisdiction extends to both civil and criminal matters. Originally, the qāḍī's work was restricted to nonadministrative tasks—arbitrating disputes and rendering judgments. Eventually, however, he assumed the management of pious bequests, the guardianship of property for orphans and others incapable of overseeing their own interests, and the control of marriages for women without guardians. The qāḍī's decision in all such matters was final.

The qāḍī must be an adult Muslim male of good character, possessing sound knowledge of the Sharī'a, and a free man. In the 7th and 8th centuries the qāḍī was expected to be capable of deriving the specific rules of law from their sources in the QUR'ĀN, HADITH, and IJMĀ' (consensus of the community). This view was later modified to allow the qāḍī to accept as absolute the opinions of one of the four SUNNI law schools.

The second caliph, 'Umar I, was the first to appoint a qāḍī to eliminate the necessity of his judging every dispute that arose in the community. Thereafter it was considered a religious duty for authorities to provide for the administration of justice through the appointment of qāḍīs.

QĀDIRĪYA \kă-di-'rē-ə\, in ISLAM, probably the oldest of the Sufi orders, founded by the Ḥanbali scholar 'ABD AL-

QALANDARĪYA

QĀDIR AL-JĪLĀNĪ (1078–1166) in Baghdad. Al-Jilānī had only a small circle of followers, but his sons broadened this community into an order and encouraged its spread into North Africa, Central Asia, and India. The order, which stresses philanthropy, humility, piety, and moderation, is loosely organized, allowing each regional community to develop its own ritual prayers (DHĪKRŚ). The main body (the Qādirīya proper) maintains a moderate Sufi (see SUFISM) system and is governed by a descendant of al-Jilānī, who serves as the keeper of his tomb in Baghdad. A smaller group in North Africa, the Jilāliya, worships al-Jilānī as a supernatural being and combines Islamic MYSTICISM with pre-Islamic beliefs and practices.

QALANDARĪYA \,kă-lăn-dă-'rē-ə\, loosely organized group of wandering Muslim dervishes who form an "irregular" (bī-shar') or ANTINOMIAN mystical order in SUFISM. The Qalandarīya seem to have arisen from the earlier MALĀMATĪYA in Central Asia and exhibited Buddhist and perhaps Hindu influences. The adherents of the order were notorious for their contempt for the norms of Muslim society and their use of drugs. They shaved their heads, faces, and eyebrows, dressed only in blankets or in hip-length hairshirts. They led a wandering, nomadic life, and regarded all acts as lawful. The movement is first mentioned in Khorāsān in the 11th century; from there it spread to India, Syria, and western Iran.

QARMATIANS \kăr-'mā-tē-ənz\, also spelled Qarmathians \-thē-ənz\, Karmatians, or Karmathians, Arabic Qarmati, plural Qarāmiṭa, members of the SHĪ'ITE Muslim subdivision known as the Ismā'īlis. The Qarmatians flourished in Iraq, Yemen, and especially Bahrain during the 9th to 11th centuries, taking their name from Ḥamdān Qarmaṭ, who led the sect in southern Iraq during the second half of the 9th century. The Qarmatians were notorious for an insurrection in Syria and Iraq in 903–906 and for the exploits of two Bahraini leaders, Abū Sa'īd al-Jannābī and his son, Abū Ṭāhir Sulaymān, who invaded Iraq several times and sacked MECCA in 930, carrying off the Black Stone of the KA'BA.

QIBLA \'ki-blə\, also spelled qiblah, direction of the sacred shrine of the KA'BA in MECCA, toward which Muslims turn five times each day when performing the ṢALĀT (daily ritual prayer). Soon after MUHAMMAD'S emigration (HIJRA) to MEDINA in 622, he indicated Jerusalem as the qibla, probably influenced by Jewish tradition. When Jewish-Muslim relations no longer seemed promising, Muhammad changed the qibla to Mecca.

The qibla is used not only for prayer but also for burial; the dead, including slaughtered animals, are interred facing Mecca. In a mosque, the qibla is indicated by the mihrab, a niche in the mosque's interior wall facing Mecca.

QIYĀS \kē-'yās\, in Islamic law, analogical reasoning as applied to the deduction of juridical principles from the QUR'AN and the SUNNA (the normative practice of the community). With the Qur'an, the sunna, and IJMĀ' (scholarly consensus), it constitutes the four sources of SUNNI Islamic jurisprudence (UṢŪL AL-FIQH). The SHĪ'ITE counterpart for qiyās is aql ("reason").

The need for qiyās developed soon after the death of MUHAMMAD, when the expanding Islamic state came in contact with societies and situations beyond the scope of the Qur'an and the sunna. Very often, qiyās was used to deduce new beliefs and practices on the basis of analogy with past practices and beliefs.

Muslim scholars consider qiyās a specific variant of the general concept of IJTIHĀD, which is original interpretation and thought. It is also related to ra'y, personal thought and opinion, a forerunner of qiyās criticized by traditional authorities as too arbitrary.

QODASHIM \,kō-dă-'shēm\ (Hebrew: "Holy Things"), fifth of the six major divisions, or orders (SEDARIM), of the MISHNAH, which was given its final form early in the 3rd century CE by JUDAH HA-NASI. Qodashim deals primarily with rites and sacrifices that took place in the TEMPLE OF JERUSALEM. The 11 tractates of Qodashim are Zevaḥim ("Animal Sacrifices"), Menaḥot ("Meal Offerings"), Hullin ("Profane Objects"), Bekhorot ("Firstborn"), Arakhin ("Estimates"), Temura ("Exchange"), Keretot ("Excisions"), Me'ila ("Transgression"), Tamid ("Burned Offering"), MIDDOT ("Dimensions"), and Qinnim ("Birds' Nests"). GEMARA are found in the Talmud BAVLI on all but the last two of the tractates.

QOM \ˈkʊm\, also spelled Qum, city, north-central Iran. The town lies on both banks of the Rūd-e Qom and beside a salt desert, the Dasht-e Kavīr, 92 miles south of Tehrān.

In the 8th century Qom was one of the centers of Shi'ism; in 816 Fāṭima, the sister of the IMAM 'ALĪ AL-RIDĀ, died in the town and was buried there. In the 17th century it became a place of PILGRIMAGE (second only to MASHHAD in Iran), when the Šafavid rulers built a golden-domed shrine over Fāṭima's tomb. The modern city has the largest MADRASA (religious college) in the country; at this school students can specialize in Islamic law, philosophy, theology, and logic. There are some 10 kings and 400 Islamic saints interred in Qom and its surrounding area.

The modernization programs that were launched by Reza Shah in the 1920s and again in the 1960s by his son Muhammad Reza Shah were seen by leading SHĪ'ITE scholars and jurists in Qom as assaults on their prerogatives. Qom's madrāsas and bazaars consequently became a nexus for the revolutionary movement that, under the charismatic leadership of Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, would topple the monarchy and replace it with an Islamic republic in 1978–79. Many of the key positions in the post-revolutionary government were occupied by teachers and students from Qom's madrāsas, and, at the end of the 20th century, the city continues to be Iran's foremost center for religious learning.

QUAKER, byname of Friend, member of a Christian group (the SOCIETY OF FRIENDS, or Friends church) that stresses the guidance of the HOLY SPIRIT and rejects outward rites and an ordained ministry. It also actively works for peace. GEORGE FOX, founder of the society in England, recorded that in 1650 "Justice Bennet of Derby first called us Quakers because we bid them tremble at the word of God."

QUESTIONS OF MILINDA \mi-ˈlin-də\, Pāli Milinda-pāṇha \-ˈpən-hə\, lively dialogue on Buddhist doctrine with questions and dilemmas posed by King Milinda—i.e., Menander, Greek ruler in the late 2nd century BCE—and answered by Nāgasena, a senior monk. Composed in northern India in perhaps the 1st or 2nd century CE by an unknown author, the "Questions of Milinda" is the one noncanonical work whose authority was accepted implicitly by such commentators as BUDDHAGHOSA. The problems discussed are common themes in the Pāli canon and the doctrine is orthodox THERAVĀDA.

QUETZALCOATL \ˌkāt-säl-ˈkō-ä-təl, -kō-ˈä-təl\ (from Nahuatl: quetzalli, "tail feather of the quetzal bird," and coatl, "serpent"), the FEATHERED SERPENT, one of the major deities of the ancient PRE-COLUMBIAN MESO-AMERICAN pantheon. Representations of a feathered snake occur as early as the Teotihuacán civilization (3rd to 8th century CE) on the central plateau. At that time, Quetzalcoatl seems to have been conceived as a vegetation god also associated with time and the calendar—an earth and water deity closely associated with the rain god TLA-LOC.

Historical changes including the rise of other city-states and the migration of Nahuatl-speaking tribes from the north, resulted in innovations in Quetzalcoatl's cult. The subsequent Toltec culture (9th through 12th centuries), centered at the city of Tula, emphasized war and HUMAN SACRIFICE linked with the worship of heavenly bodies. Quetzalcoatl became the god of the morning and evening star, and his temples were the center of ceremonial life in Tula.

In Aztec times (14th through 16th centuries) Quetzalcoatl was revered as the patron of priests, the inventor of the calendar and of books, and the protector of goldsmiths and other craftsmen; he was also identified with the planet VENUS. As the morning and evening star, Quetzalcoatl was the symbol of death and rebirth. With his companion Xolotl, a dog-headed god, he was said to have descended to the Underworld of Mictlan to gather the bones of the ancestors. He annointed those bones with his own blood, giving birth to the men who inhabit the present universe.

One important body of myths relates Quetzalcoatl to Topiltzin Quetzalcoatl, the priest-king of Tula, the capital of the Toltecs. He refused to offer human victims for sacrifice, offering instead only snakes, birds, and butterflies. But the human representative of the god of the night sky, TEZCATLIPOCA, expelled him from Tula by performing feats of magic. Quetzalcoatl wandered down to the coast and then immolated himself on a pyre, emerging from this as the planet Venus. According to another version, Quetzalcoatl embarked upon a raft made of snakes and disappeared beyond the eastern horizon.

In addition to his guise as a plumed serpent, Quetzalcoatl was sometimes represented as a man with a beard; as Ehécatl, the wind god, he was shown with a mask with two protruding tubes (through which the wind blew) and a conical hat typical of the Huastec tribe of northeastern Mexico. The temple of Quetzalcoatl at Tenochtitlán, the Aztec capital, was a round building, a shape that fitted the god's power as Ehécatl.

As the god of learning, of writing, and of books, Quetzalcoatl was particularly venerated in the calmecac, religious colleges annexed to the temples, in which the future priests and the sons of the nobility were educated. Outside of Tenochtitlán, the main center of Quetzalcoatl's cult was Cholula, on the Puebla plateau.

QUIETISM, doctrine of Christian spirituality that holds that perfection consists in passivity (quiet) of the soul, in the suppression of human effort so that divine action may have full play. Quietistic elements have been discerned in several religious movements through the centuries, but the term is usually identified with the doctrine of MIGUEL DE MOLINOS, a Spanish priest who became an esteemed spiritual director in Rome during the latter half of the 17th century and whose teachings were condemned as heretical by the ROMAN CATHOLIC church.

For Molinos, the way of Christian perfection was the interior way of contemplation to which anyone with divine assistance can attain and that can last for years, even for a lifetime. To wish to act is an offense against God, who desires to do everything in man. Inactivity brings the soul back to its principle, the divine being, into which it is transformed. God, the sole reality, lives and reigns in the souls of those who have undergone this mystic death. They can will only what God wills because their own wills have been taken away. They should not be concerned about salvation, perfection, or anything else but must leave all to God. According to Quietist tenets, at least as they were interpreted by hostile critics, the devil can make himself master of the contemplative's body and force him to perform acts that seem sinful; but because the CONTEMPLATIVE does not consent, they are not SINS. Molinos' teachings were condemned by Pope Innocent XI in 1687, and he was sentenced to life in prison.

Quietism was perhaps paralleled among Protestants by some of the tenets of PIETISM and among the QUAKERS. It certainly appeared in a milder form in France, where it was propagated by JEANNE-MARIE BOUVIER DE LA MOTTE GUYON, an influential mystic.

QUIPU \kē-pū\, also spelled quipo \-pō\, in PRE-COLUMBIAN MESO-AMERICAN RELIGIONS, Incan accounting apparatus consisting of a long rope, from which hung 48 secondary cords and various tertiary cords attached to the secondary ones. Knots were made in the cords to represent units, tens, and hundreds; and, in imperial accounting, the cords were colored to designate the different concerns of government—such as tribute, economic productivity, ceremonies, and matters relating to war and peace. The quipus were created and maintained as historical records and were kept not only by high officials at the capital of Cuzco—judges, commanders, and important heads of extended families—but also by regional commanders and village headmen.

QUIRINUS \kwə-ˈrī-nəs, -ˈrē-\, major Roman deity ranking close to JUPITER and Mars, the flamines of these gods constituted the three major priests at Rome in ancient times. Both modern scholars and the Romans themselves link Quirinus with Quirites, a name for the citizens of Rome in republican times, though earlier usage was probably restricted to the inhabitants of the northernmost of Rome's seven hills, called after Quirinus the Quirinal (collis Quirinalis). The Quirinal was the traditional site of a Sabine settlement that united with the Palatine community to form the original Rome.

In spite of his importance, little is known about Quirinus. He bears a similarity to MARS, and some believe that he is only another form of that deity. By the late republic he is identified completely with Romulus. His was the name under which the immortalized Romulus was worshiped, and his festival fell on the same date that Romulus was said to have ascended to the gods, perhaps to assume the identity of Quirinus. He had a festival, the Quirinalia, on February 17; his temple on the Quirinal was one of the oldest in Rome. A cult partner, HORA, is spoken of, as are minor deities, the Virites Quirini, of whom nothing else is known. JANUS appears with the epithet Quirinus, but the relationship between the two is a matter of conjecture.

QUMRĀN \kūm-ˈrān\, also spelled Kumran, region on the northwestern shore of the Dead Sea, notable since 1947 as the site of the caves where the DEAD SEA SCROLLS were first discovered. Excavations (since 1949) at a site called Khirbet Qumrān (Arabic: "Qumrān Ruins"), less than a mile from the sea and north of the waterway Wadi Qumrān, have revealed the ruins of buildings believed by some scholars to have been occupied by a community of ESSENES, who have been posited as the owners of the Scrolls.

Excavations at Qumrān in the 1950s were led by the French archaeologist Roland de Vaux, whose workers revealed a complex of structures occupying an area about 260 by 330 feet. An extensive aqueduct system, fed by the Wadi Qumrān, traversed the site and filled as many as eight internal reservoirs (cisterns), as well as two baths. In the eastern part of the ruins stood the principal building; east and south of this are several rooms, one of which served seemingly as a scriptorium. A cemetery near Qumrān holds the remains of about 1,100 male adults; two lesser grave sites were reserved for some 100 women and children.

The Essenes separated from the rest of the Jewish community in the 2nd century BCE, when Jonathan Maccabeus and, later, Simon Maccabeus, usurped the office of HIGH PRIEST, which conferred secular as well as religious authority. Simon felt compelled to persecute the Essenes, who opposed the usurpation. Hence, they fled into the wilderness with their leader, the Teacher of Righteousness. Some scholars hold that Essenes established a monastic community at Qumrān in the mid-2nd century BCE.

Living apart, like other Essenian communities in Judaea, the members of the Qumrān community turned to apocalyptic visions of the overthrow of the wicked priests of Jerusalem and of the ultimate establishment of their own community as the true PRIESTHOOD and the true Israel. They devoted their time to study of the SCRIPTURES, manual labor, worship, and prayer. Meals were taken in common as prophetic celebrations of the messianic banquet. The BAPTISM they practiced symbolized repentance and entry into the company of the "Elect of God."

During the reign (37–4 BCE) of Herod the Great an earthquake (31 BCE) and fire caused the temporary abandonment of Qumrān, but the community resumed its life there until the center was destroyed (68 CE) by Roman legions under Vespasian. Until about 73 CE the site was garrisoned by Roman soldiers; during the Second Jewish Revolt (132–135) rebels under BAR KOKHBA were based there.

QUR'AN \kūr-'ān; kə-'rān, -'rān\, also spelled Koran (Arabic: "Recitation"), the sacred SCRIPTURE of ISLAM, regarded by Muslims as the infallible Word of God, a perfect transcription of an eternal tablet preserved in heaven and revealed to the Prophet MUHAMMAD.

The intermittent revelations to Muhammad were first memorized by followers and used in ritual prayers. Although verses were later written down during the Prophet's lifetime, according to Muslim sources they were first compiled in their present authoritative form during the reign of the third CALIPH (deputy or successor to the Prophet), 'Uthmān (d. 656).

The Qur'an consists of 114 chapters (SŪRAS) of unequal length. The earliest sūras of the Meccan period are generally shorter and written in dynamic rhymed prose. The sūras of the later Medinan period are longer and more prosaic in style. With the exception of the first sūra the FĀTIḤA ("Opening"), the sūras are arranged roughly according to length, with the longer sūras preceding the shorter ones. Consequently, the present arrangement is partly an inversion of the text's chronological order.

The emphases of Qur'anic teachings differ according to the periods of revelation. The early sūras convey an emphatic call to moral and religious obedience in light of the coming Day of Judgment, while the late Medinan sūras provide directives for the creation of a social fabric supportive of the moral life called for by God.

Absolute MONOTHEISM governs all Qur'anic ideas about God. The imperative to recognize no divinity besides God is reiterated throughout the scriptures. The God who revealed his word to Muhammad is identified with the God worshiped by both Jews and Christians, though these communities failed to hear and incorporate God's revelation to their prophets. The Qur'an emphasizes God as the absolute creator and sustainer of an ordered universe, an order that reflects his infinite power, wisdom, and authority. Although God is completely unlike his creation, He is also recognized as omnipresent. Through his revealed word, God has provided guidance for humanity, and by the standard of that guidance he will judge humanity on the Day of Reckoning. Emphasis on the stern justice of God is tempered by recurrent references to his mercy and compassion.

The Qur'an describes the human both as "God's viceregent" within the created order as well as an "ignorant and foolhardy" creature. While humans are endowed with the greatest potential of any created beings, they alone are susceptible to evil. The Qur'an states explicitly that humanity is responsible, both individually and collectively, for its action. Though numerous passages refer to human freedom to accept or reject the Qur'anic teachings, other verses speak of God's control of history in terms more akin to PREDESTINATION. This ambiguity has given rise to a variety of Muslim interpretations of human nature and destiny. See also MATURIDIYĀ; MU'TAZILĀ; QADARĪYĀ.

The Qur'an demands absolute submission (islām) to God and his word. This submission requires the implementation of moral principles both individually and within the sociopolitical order. With the end of history, each person will face judgment, with the joys of the gardens of paradise or the punishment and terror of hell awaiting the outcome.

Although the Qur'an is the primary source of Islamic law, it does not enumerate the detailed requirements of that law. Similarly, the scriptures provide merely fragmentary directives for the basic duties of the faithful, referred to as the FIVE PILLARS OF ISLAM.

Correct interpretation of the Qur'an has been a central concern of all schools of Islamic thought. A special branch of learning, called TAFSĪR, deals exclusively with Qur'anic EXEGESIS. Commentators use tafsīr to study Qur'anic texts in terms of auxiliary branches of learning such as Arabic grammar, lexicography, and the Prophetic tradition. This development of exegesis, however, did not forestall doctrinal disputes; instead, various theological and legal schools used this discipline to support their respective systems of thought.

The Qur'an is regarded as immutable in both form and content, and its translation has traditionally been forbidden. Muslims throughout the world thus continue to recite its sūras in Arabic, although they may not understand the language. The many translations now available are viewed as "paraphrases" to facilitate understanding of the actual scripture. See also BIBLE.

QURAYSH \kū-'rīsh\, also spelled Kuraish, or Koreish, in ISLAM, ruling tribe of MECCA at the time of the birth of the Prophet MUHAMMAD. There were 10 main clans, the names of some of which gained great luster through their members' status in early Islam.

QURRĀ' \kū-'rā\ (Arabic: "Reciters"), singular qārī', professional reciters of the text of the QUR'AN. In the early Islamic community MUHAMMAD'S revelations had often been memorized by the COMPANIONS OF THE PROPHET, a practice derived from the pre-Islamic tradition of preserving poetry orally. It became common for Muslims to memorize the Qur'an in its entirety, even after it had been assembled in written form. Such reciters were often called upon by scholars to elucidate points of pronunciation and meaning obscured by the early Arabic script, and they helped to define the rudiments of Arabic grammar and linguistics.

The sheer number of reciters—who by the 9th century formed an established, specialized class—produced such a variety of subtly differing interpretations that in the time of the 'Abbāsīd CALIPH al-Qāhīr (reigned 932–934) seven qurrā' were declared the sole orthodox interpreters of the Qur'an and all other readings were banned. As early as the 7th century CE, in the confrontation at Šiffin (657) between the fourth caliph, 'Alī, and Mu'āwīya, a contender for the caliphate, the qurrā' forced 'Alī to submit to the arbitration that cost him the caliphate. At the beginning of the 9th century, a union of qurrā', with its own elected head, the SHAYKH al-qurrā', is recorded in Baghdad.

The science of reciting the Qur'an (qirā'a) soon produced a corresponding art of intoning the Qur'an (TAJWĪD), and this unaccompanied ritual chanting enabled large congregations of Muslims to follow the texts with relative ease. Religious figures employed in the mosques still memorize the Qur'an to aid them in interpreting the revelations to the faithful. In some Arab countries the professional duties of reciting the Qur'an at festivals and mosque services are generally reserved for blind men, who are trained in qirā'a from childhood as a means of supporting themselves. The art of recitation is highly esteemed in all Muslim communities; recordings by the best reciters are broadcast on radio and television, and they are available on audio cassettes and CDs.

RABBI (Hebrew: "my teacher," or "my master"), in JUDAISM, a title of respect. Used generically for great sages or teaching authorities, the title ultimately came to signify the sages of the Judaism of the dual TORAH, oral and written, which therefore is called "RABBINIC JUDAISM." A sage in that Judaism acquired the status of rabbi through a process of discipleship to a great master. That accords with the myth of divine revelation of the Torah at Sinai in two media, the oral part being passed on from master to disciple in an ongoing chain of memorization and verbatim tradition. The rabbis of rabbinic Judaism served not only as teachers of a circle of disciples but also as judges and administrators of the community of Judaism.

In modern times, especially in Western countries, rabbis became clergy and undertook tasks of preaching and conducting such rites as marriage and burial, while in Reform and Conservative SYNAGOGUES they also became principal leaders of public worship. In the United States rabbis also undertake pastoral counseling, hospital and military chaplaincies, Jewish community administration, as well as teaching in Jewish schools and YESHIVAS. Rabbis in Western countries ordinarily complete a secular education as well as a rabbinical study and ordination; those in the state of Israel study only in yeshivas. Rabbis in parts of Europe and the state of Israel are paid by the state. REFORM, RECONSTRUCTIONIST, and CONSERVATIVE JUDAISM ordain women as rabbis; no ORTHODOX JUDAISM does so.

RABBINICAL ASSEMBLY, THE, organization of Conservative RABBIS in the United States, Canada, Latin America, Europe, and Israel. It was founded in 1900 as the Alumni Association of the Jewish Theological Seminary and was reorganized in 1940 as the Rabbinical Assembly of America; in 1962 it acquired its present name and international scope. The Rabbinical Assembly recommends rabbis for appointment to Conservative congregations and promotes the goals of CONSERVATIVE JUDAISM. In 1985 the Rabbinical Assembly voted to allow the admittance of women as rabbis for the first time. Its publications include the quarterly Conservative Judaism and several prayer books.

RABBINIC JUDAISM, normative form of JUDAISM that developed after the fall of the TEMPLE OF JERUSALEM (70 CE). Originating in the work of the Pharisaic RABBIS, it was based on the legal and commentative literature in the TALMUD, and it set up a mode of worship and a life discipline that have been practiced by Jews through modern times.

RADCLIFFE-BROWN, A(LFRED) R(EGINALD) \ˈrad-klif-ˈbräun\ (b. Jan. 17, 1881, Birmingham, Warwick, Eng.—d. Oct. 24, 1955, London), English social anthropologist who developed a system of concepts and generalizations relating to the social structures of relatively simple societies.

Radcliffe-Brown went to the Andaman Islands (1906–08), where his fieldwork won him a fellowship at Trinity College, Cambridge. On an expedition to Western Australia (1910–12), he concentrated on KINSHIP and family organization. He became director of education for the kingdom of Tonga (1916) and served as professor of social anthropology at the University of Cape Town (1920–25), where he founded the School of African Life and Languages. At the University of Sydney (1925–31) he developed a vigorous teaching program involving research in theoretical and applied anthropology.

His theory had its classic formulation and application in The Social Organisation of Australian Tribes (1931). Treating all Aboriginal Australia known at the time, the work cataloged, classified, analyzed, and synthesized a vast amount of data on kinship, marriage, language, custom, occupancy and possession of land, sexual patterns, and COSMOLOGY. He attempted to explain social phenomena as enduring systems of adaptation, fusion, and integration of elements. He held that social structures are arrangements of persons and that organizations are the arrangements of activities; thus, the life of a society may be viewed as an active system of functionally consistent, interdependent elements.

At the University of Chicago (1931–37) Radcliffe-Brown was instrumental in introducing social anthropology to American scholars. He joined the faculty of the University of Oxford from 1937–46. His later works include Structure and Function in Primitive Society (1952) and Method in Social Anthropology (1958).

RĀDHĀ \ˈrā-dä\, in HINDUISM, consort of the god KRISHNA when he lived among the cowherds of Vṛndāvana. Rādhā was the wife of another gopa (cowherd) but was the most beloved of Krishna's consorts and his constant companion. In the BHAKTI (devotional) movement of VAIṢṆAVISM, Rādhā symbolizes the human soul and Krishna the divine.

The allegorical love of Rādhā has been given expression in the lyrical poetry of many Indian languages. Jayadeva's 12th-century Sanskrit poem, the GĪTAGOVINDA, celebrates their love in its many forms. The Bengali saint CAITANYA was said to be an incarnation of the two lovers; he was Krishna on the inside and Rādhā on the outside. Caitanya also composed many lyrics celebrating this divine love, which have not survived. The bronze images of Krishna playing the flute that are enshrined in temples are often accompanied, particularly in the northern and eastern parts of India, by images of his beloved Rādhā. She is also worshiped as Krishna's hlādinī śakti ("blissful energy") or as a goddess in her own right.

RADHASOAMI SATSANG \ˈrā-dä-ˈsvā-mē-sət-ˈsəŋ-gä, -ˈswā-mē-, -ˈsət-səŋ-g\, also spelled Rādhāsāmī Satsaṅg \ˈrā-dä-ˈsvā-mē-\, guru-focused esoteric religious sect of India that has followers among both Hindus and Sikhs, as well as a significant international following. The sect was founded in 1861 by Shiv Dayal Singh (later called Soamiji Maharaj), the son of a Punjabi moneylender and follower of SIKHISM. He believed that human beings could perfect their highest capabilities only through repetition of the śabd ("sound"), or NĀM ("name"), of the Lord. The term Radha-soami signifies the union of the soul with God, the name of God, and the sound heard internally that emanates from God. Great emphasis is placed on the Satsang ("congregation of good people") and on the experience of the GURU externally through visual contact and internally through meditation. After the death of Shiv Dayal Singh, the sect split into several factions, now located in Agra, Delhi, and Gwalior and at Beas in the Punjab, the latter of which is far more influenced by Sikh traditions than the former. Two of its branches—at Dayalbagh in Agra and at Beas—have established Utopian communities.

RAGNARÖK \ˈræ-nə-rœk, -ræk\ (Old Norse: "Doom of the Gods"), in GERMANIC RELIGION, the end of the world of gods and men. The Ragnarök is fully described only in the Icelandic poem Völuspá ("Sibyl's Prophecy"), probably of the late 10th century, and in the 13th-century Prose EDDA of Snorri Sturluson (d. 1241), which largely follows the Völuspá. According to those two sources, the Ragnarök will be preceded by cruel winters and moral chaos. GIANTS and DEMONS approaching from all points of the compass will attack the gods, who will meet them and face death like heroes. The sun will be darkened, the stars will vanish, and the earth will burn and then sink into the sea. Afterward, the earth will rise again, the old enemies BALDER and HODER will be reconciled and return from the dead, and the just will live in a hall roofed with gold.

Disjointed allusions to the Ragnarök, found in many other sources, show that conceptions of it varied. According to one poem, two human beings, Lif and Lifthrasir ("Life" and "Vitality"), will emerge from the WORLD TREE (which was not entirely destroyed) and repeople the earth.

RAHITNĀMĀ \ˈrə-hit-ˈnā-mā\ (Punjabi: "Manual of Conduct"), in SIKHISM, sets of guidelines that govern the behavior of Sikhs. The Rahitnāmās provide systematic statements of the principles of the KHĀLSĀ and the way of life lived in accordance with these principles.

NĀNAK (1469–1539), the founder of the Sikh tradition, used the term rahit to designate a distinctive way of living, but it was not until the turn of the 17th century that formula statements of what Sikhs should and should not do began to appear. With the declaration of the Sikh community as the Khālsā in 1699, the earlier rahit expanded to include new obligations, such as keeping the hair uncut and abjuring the use of tobacco. This comprehensive rahit came to be recorded in texts called Rahitnāmās. The earliest extant Rahitnāmā is attributed to Chaupa Singh (d. 1723); others followed during the 18th and 19th centuries. This literature was codified into the authoritative text Sikh Rahit Maryādā ("The Sikh Code of Conduct") in the mid-20th century by the Shiromanī Gurdwārā Prabandhak Committee, the most important Sikh governing body.

RAHNER, KARL \ˈrā-nər\ (b. March 5, 1904, Freiburg im Breisgau, Baden, Ger.—d. March 30, 1984, Innsbruck, Austria), German JESUIT priest who is widely considered to have been one of the foremost ROMAN CATHOLIC theologians of the 20th century. He is best known for his work in Christology and for his integration of an existential philosophy of personalism with Thomistic realism, by which human self-consciousness and self-transcendence are placed within a sphere in which the ultimate determinant is God.

Rahner was ordained in 1932. He studied at the University of Freiburg under Martin Heidegger before earning a doctorate at the University of Innsbruck. He taught at the Universities of Innsbruck, Munich, and Münster. He was an editor of Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche, 10 vol. (1957–68; "Lexicon for Theology and the Church"), and of Sacramentum Mundi, 6 vol. (1968–70; "Sacrament of the World").

Rahner's many books emphasize the continuity of modern and ancient interpretations of Roman Catholic doctrine. His works include Geist in Welt (1939; Spirit in the World), Hörer des Wortes (1941; Hearers of the Word), Sendung und Gnade, 3 vol. (1966; Mission and Grace), Grundkurs des Glaubens (1976; Foundations of Christian Faith), and Die siebenfältige Gabe: über die Sakramente der Kirche (1974; Meditations on the Sacraments).

RAIN DANCE, ceremonial dance performed in many cultures to invoke rain.

Agrarian cultures, including the Mayan civilization and that of ancient Egypt, have most commonly employed rain dances; Egyptian tomb scenes depicted rain dancers as early as 2700 BCE. Rain dances often feature dancing in a circle, the participation of young girls, decoration with green vegetation, nudity, the pouring of water, phallic rites, and whirling, meant to act as a wind charm. Thus, the South African Angoni carry tree branches, and Papuan mythology teaches that grass carried in such dances pierces the eye of the sun, causing it to weep and be covered with clouds. The Sioux Indians perform a ceremonial dance around a jug of water, while the Hopi snake dance is based on the belief that the snakes carry prayers to the Rainmakers beneath the earth. In southeastern European ceremonies, a group of girls proceed from house to house, their leader clothed in leaves and grass and whirling in their midst while housewives pour water on her.

RAJNEESH, BHAGWAN SHREE \ˈrəj-nēsh, rāj-ˈnēsh\, original name Chandra Mohan Jain (b. Dec. 11, 1931, central India—d. Jan. 19, 1990, Pune, India), spiritual leader who preached an eclectic doctrine of Eastern MYSTICISM, individual devotion, and sexual freedom while amassing vast personal wealth.

He taught philosophy at Jabalpur University, where he received his B.A. degree (1955); he also attended the University of Saugar (M.A., 1957). He acquired the nickname Rajneesh and took the honorific Bhagwan (Hindi: "God"). After lecturing throughout India he established an ASHRAM (spiritual community) in Pune (Poona). By the early 1970s he had attracted 200,000 devotees, many from Europe and the United States.

In 1981 Rajneesh's cult purchased a dilapidated ranch in Oregon, U.S., which became the site of Rajneeshpuram, a community of several thousand disciples. Rajneesh was widely criticized by outsiders for his private security force and his ostentatious display of wealth. By 1985 many of his most trusted aides had abandoned the movement, which was under investigation for arson, attempted murder, drug smuggling, and vote fraud in the nearby town of Antelope. In 1985 Rajneesh pleaded guilty to immigration fraud and was deported from the United States. He was refused entry by 21 countries before returning to Pune, where his ashram soon grew to 15,000 members. In later years he took the Buddhist title Osho and altered his teaching of unrestricted sexual activity because of his growing concern over AIDS.

RĀKṢASA \ˈrāk-shə-sə\ (Sanskrit: "demon"), feminine form rākṣasī ("demoness"), in HINDUISM, type of DEMON or goblin. Rākṣasas have the power to change their shape at will and appear as animals, as monsters, or in the case of the female demons, as beautiful women. They are most powerful in the evening, particularly during the dark period of the new moon, but they are dispelled by the rising sun. They especially detest sacrifices and prayer. The best-known rākṣasa is the 10-headed RĀVAṆA, demon king of Laṅkā, who abducts SĪTĀ, Rāma's wife, in the epic Rāmāyana. Pūtānā, a female demon, is well known for her attempt to kill the infant KRISHNA by offering him milk from her poisoned breast; Krishna, however, sucked away her life.

Some rākṣasas are akin to YAKṢAS (nature spirits), while others are similar to ASURAS, the traditional opponents of the gods. The term rākṣasa, however, generally applies to those demons who haunt cemeteries, eat the flesh of men, and drink the milk of cows dry.

RĀMA \ˈrā-mə\, one of the most widely worshiped deities of HINDUISM, the embodiment of chivalry and virtue. Although there are three Rāmas in Indian tradition (PARASURĀMA, BALARĀMA, and Rāmacandra), the name is most associated with Rāmacandra, the seventh incarnation (AVATAR) of VISHNU. His story is told briefly in the MAHĀBHĀRATA and at great length in the RĀMĀYAṆA ("Story of Rāma").

References to Rāma as an incarnation of Vishnu appear in the early centuries of the common era; there was apparently no widespread special worship of him before the 11th century, as would be attested by independent Rāma temples. It was not until the 14th or 15th century that sects appeared venerating him as the supreme god (see RĀMĀNANDA). Rāma's popularity is especially associated with vernacular versions of the Rāmāyaṇa, such as those composed by Kampan in Tamil (12th century) and by TULSĪDĀS in Hindi (16th century; see RĀMĀRĪTĀMĀNAS).

Rāma and KRISHNA are the two most popular recipients of adoration from the BHAKTI (devotional) cults that swept India from the 6th century onward. Rāma is conceived as a model of reason, right action, and desirable virtues, but his subordination, at crucial moments, of his duties as husband to his responsibilities as king have also made him the object of questions and criticism. In North India Rāma's name is a popular form of greeting among friends ("Rām! Rām!") and is the focus of a name-mysticism that parallels the sort found in other religious traditions. Rāma is the deity most invoked at death.

The image of Rāma in a shrine or temple is almost invariably attended by figures representing his wife SĪTĀ, his half-brother Lakṣmaṇa, and his devotee, the monkey chief HANUMĀN.

RAMADĀN \rā-mə-'dān\, in ISLAM, the month of FASTING, the ninth month of the Muslim year, in which "the QUR'AN was sent down as a guidance for the people" (Qur'an 2:185).

Islamic law prescribes abstention from food, drink, and sexual intercourse from dawn until dusk throughout the month for all rational adult Muslims. The young, the ill, travelers, soldiers, and women in menses or childbirth are generally exempted; though all but the young are expected to fulfill their fasting obligation later when their condition allows. The beginning and end of Ramaḍān are announced when one trustworthy witness testifies before the authorities that the new moon has been sighted; a cloudy sky may, therefore, delay or prolong the fast. The end of the fasting period is marked by the 'ĪD al-Fiṭr, a three-day festival.

In the Qur'an, the development of the Ramaḍān fast, which is one of the FIVE PILLARS OF ISLAM, may be traced from the injunction to fast on 'ASHŪRĀ, the 10th of Muḥarram, probably once identical with the Jewish Day of Atonement. This injunction was abrogated by a command to fast during Ramaḍān (2:184).

RAMAKRISHNA PARAMAHAMSA \rā-mə-'krish-nə\, also spelled Rāmakṛṣṇa Paramahamṣa, original name Gadādhara Chattopādhyāya (b. 1836, Kamarpukur, India—d. Aug. 16, 1886, Calcutta), founder of a school of religious thought that became the Rama Krishna order and considered by many Hindus to be not just a GURU but a saint.

Ramakrishna lived the life of a Hindu villager until late adolescence when poverty forced him and his older brother Ramkumar to move to Calcutta and seek employment. There they found work in a temple dedicated to the Hindu goddess KĀLĪ. Shortly after the move, however, Ramkumar died. Ramakrishna, now alone, turned to Kālī-Mā (Kālī the Mother) and prayed to the goddess for a vision that would not come. Traditional accounts tell a story of the young priest despairing of a vision and attempting suicide, only to find himself overwhelmed in an ocean of blissful conscious light that he interpreted as a manifestation of the Mother he had sought so desperately.

Soon after this first vision, Ramakrishna commenced on a series of SĀDHANAS, or "practices," in the various mystical traditions, including Bengali VAIṢṆAVISM, Śākta Tantrism, ADVAITA Vedānta, and even Islamic SUFISM and ROMAN CATHOLICISM. (The last practice ended with a vision of Jesus "the great yogi" who embraced the young priest and disappeared into his body, after which Ramakrishna is said to have experienced BRAHMAN.) Ramakrishna claimed to experience this same formless Brahman after each of these *sādhana*s, and later in life he became famous for his pithy PARABLES about the ultimate unity of the different religious traditions in this formless Vedantic Brahman.

This message, that all religions lead to the same Brahman, was certainly a politically and religiously powerful one, as it answered in classical Indian terms the challenges of British missionaries and colonial authorities who had battered HINDUISM for almost a century with a barrage of social, religious, and ethical criticisms. That all religions could be seen as different paths to the same divine source or, even better, that this divine source showed itself in classically Sanskritic ways (that is, in Hindu categories) was welcome and truly liberating news.

Partly because of the timeliness and attractiveness of this most basic message, and partly because of Ramakrishna's own undeniable CHARISMA as a guru and ecstatic mystic, a small band of disciples, most of them Western-educated, started to gather around Ramakrishna in the early 1880s. It was also about this time that Calcutta newspaper and journal articles began to refer to Ramakrishna as "the Hindu saint" or as "the Paramahansa" (a religious title of respect and honor). Much of what is known about Ramakrishna's teachings comes from a remarkable text whose diary-sources date back to the early 1880s, Mahendranath Gupta's five-volume Bengali classic The Nectar-Speech of the Twice-Blessed Ramakrishna, best known to English readers as The Gospel of Sri Ramakrishna.

After Ramakrishna's death, his disciple and successor, Narendranath Datta (d. 1902) became the world-traveling Swami VIVEKANANDA and helped establish the Ramakrishna Order, whose teachings, texts, and rituals divinized Ramakrishna as a new AVATAR, or "descent," of God. With its headquarters in Belur Maṭh, the Ramakrishna Order played an important role in the dissemination of Hindu ideas and practices in the West, particularly in the United States.

RAMANA MAHARSHI \rə-mə-nə-mə-'hər-shē, -'hār-; -mə-'hā-'ri-shē\, original name Venkataraman Aiyer (b. Dec. 30, 1879, Madurai, Tamil Nadu, India—d. April 14, 1950, Tiruvannāmalai), Hindu philosopher and yogi called "Great Master," "Bhagavān" (the Lord), and "the Sage of Aruṇāchala," whose views of the identity between individual souls and the world-soul BRAHMAN and of the illusory nature of phenomenal reality (MĀYĀ) roughly parallel those of Śaṅkara (c. 700–750 CE), a founder of the ADVAITA school of philosophy. His original contribution to yogic philosophy is the technique of vicāra (self-"pondering" inquiry).

Born to a middle-class, southern Indian, Brahmin family, Venkataraman read mystical and devotional literature, particularly the lives of South Indian Śaiva saints and the life of KABĪR, the medieval mystical poet. At the age of 17 he had a spiritual experience from which he derived his vicāra technique: he suddenly felt a great fear of death, and, lying very still, imagined his body becoming a stiff, cold corpse. Following a traditional "not this, not that" (neti-neti) practice, he began self-inquiry, asking "Who am I?" and answering not the body, nor the mind, nor the personality, nor the emotions, for all these will decay and die. He arrived at SAMĀDHI, a state of blissful consciousness beyond the mind. He immediately adopted the life of a HERMIT at Mount Aruṇāchala, some 120 miles southwest of Madras, which had for centuries served as a dwelling place for renunciants. In time he became celebrated for his absolute indifference to bodily needs, and his frequent preference for remaining silent attracted to him a devoted company of followers, many of whom experienced great calm and healing—both physical and psychological—in his presence.

Ramana Maharshi believed that death and evil were MĀYĀ, or illusion, which could be dissipated by the practice of vicāra, by which the true self and the unity of all things would be discovered. This he coupled with intense religious devotion, especially to SHIVA and Mount Aruṇāchala itself, as expressed in the HYMNS of his own composition.

RĀMĀNANDA \rā-mā-'nən-də\, also called Rāmānand, or Rāmadatta \rām-'dət\ (fl. 14th–15th century?), North Indian BRAHMIN, held by his followers (Rāmānandīs) to be fifth in succession in the lineage of the philosopher-mystic RĀMĀNUJA. According to his standard HAGIOGRAPHY, Rāmānanda left home as a youth and became a SANNYĀSĪ (ascetic) before settling in VARANASI (Banaras) to study Vedic texts, Rāmānuja's philosophy, and yogic techniques. His studies completed, he wandered about teaching and eating with his students, regardless of their CASTE, but the opposition of his upper-caste companions so angered Rāmānanda that he left the lineage to found his own sect, the Rāmānandīs. His original 12 disciples are said to have included at least one woman, members of the lowest castes (including the leatherworker Ravidās), and a Muslim (the mystic KABĪR). However, the almost complete absence of any reference to Rāmānanda in poetry attributed to them has caused some scholars to question the historical veracity of this connection, especially in light of its clear hagiographic utility as a device for anchoring the NIRGUṆA bhakti traditions of North India in a SAGUṆA bhakti tradition that had historical roots in the South and was superintended by Brahmins.

The connection between the historical Rāmānanda and the important monastic community (Rāmānandīs) that claims him as its founder has also been called into question—both by academic scholars and by a group of “radical Rāmānandīs” in the early 20th century who disputed the Brahmin tie with Rāmānuja. The history of the present Rāmānandī SAMPRADĀYA apparently does not reach back before the 17th century, but this does nothing to diminish the fact that it is the largest Vaiṣṇava monastic order in North India today, and perhaps the largest monastic order of any sectarian affiliation throughout the Indian subcontinent.

RĀMĀNUJA \rā-'mä-nü-jə\, also called Rāmānujācārya, or Īaiya Perumāḷ (Sanskrit and Tamil: “Designations of Lakṣmaṇa”) (b. c. 1017, Śrīperumbūdūr, India—d. 1137, Śrīraṅgam), South Indian Brahmin theologian and philosopher and probably the single most influential thinker of devotional HINDUISM. He organized temple worship, founded centers to disseminate his doctrine of devotion to VISHNU and his consort LAKṢMĪ, and provided an intellectual basis for the practice of BHAKTI (devotional worship) in three major commentaries: the Vedārtha-saṃgraha (on the VEDA), the Śrī-bhāṣya (on the Brahma sūtras), and the Bhagavadgītā-bhāṣya (on the BHAGAVAD GĪTĀ).

According to tradition, Rāmānuja was born in southern India, in what is now Tamil Nadu state. He showed early signs of theological acumen and was sent to Kanchipuram for schooling, under the teacher Yādavaprakāśa, who was a follower of the monistic system of VEDĀNTA of Saṃkara, the famous 8th-century philosopher. Rāmānuja was soon at odds with a doctrine that offered no room for a personal god. After falling out with his teacher he had a vision of Vishnu and Lakṣmī and instituted a daily worship ritual at the place where he beheld them.

He became a temple priest at the Varadarāja temple at Kanchipuram, where he began to expound the doctrine that the goal of those who aspire to final release from transmigration is not the impersonal BRAHMAN but rather Brahman as represented in the personal god Vishnu. In Kanchipuram, as well as Śrīraṅgam, where he was to become associated with the Ranganātha temple, he taught that the worship of a personal god and the soul's union with that deity are essential parts of the doctrines of the UPANISHADS on which the system of Vedānta is built; therefore, the teachings of the Vaiṣṇavas and BHĀGAVATAS are not heterodox. In this he continued the teachings of Yāmuna (Yāmunācārya; 10th century), his predecessor at Śrīraṅgam.

Like many Hindu thinkers, he is reported to have made an extended PILGRIMAGE, circumambulating India. In Mysore he converted numbers of Jains, as well as King Bitideva of the Hoyśāla dynasty; this led to the founding in 1099 of the town Milukote (Melcote, present Karnataka state) and the dedication of a temple to Śelva Piḷḷai (Sanskrit, Saṃpatkumāra, the name of a form of Vishnu). He returned after 20 years to Śrīraṅgam, where he reorganized the temple worship and, reputedly, founded 74 centers to disseminate his doctrine. After a life that supposedly lasted 120 years—its length reflecting his eminence—Rāmānuja died in 1137.

Rāmānuja's chief contributions to Indian philosophy follow from his conviction that discursive thought is necessary in the human search for ultimate truth, that the phenomenal world is real and provides real knowledge, and that the exigencies of daily life are not detrimental or even contrary to the life of the spirit. His conception that this world constitutes the body of Vishnu established a metaphysic consonant with bhakti. Rāmānuja's explication of the necessity of religious worship as a means of salvation gave systematic meaning to the devotional outpourings of the Ālvārs, the 7th–10th-century poet-mystics of southern India, justifying the incorporation of their verse into formal temple worship.

Rāmānuja's worldview accepts the ontological reality of three distinct orders: matter, soul, and God. He admits that there is nonduality (advaita), an ultimate identity of the three orders, but this nonduality for him is asserted of God, who is modified (viśiṣṭa) by the orders of matter and soul; hence his doctrine is known as VIŚIṢṬĀDVAITA (“modified nonduality”). Just as the body modifies the soul, has no separate existence from it, and yet is different from it, just so the orders of matter and soul constitute God's “body,” modifying it, yet having no separate existence from it. The goal of the human soul, therefore, is to serve God just as the body serves the soul.

All the phenomenal world is a manifestation of the glory of God (vibhūti), and to detract from its reality is to detract from divine glory. Rāmānuja aimed at transforming ritual practice into divine worship and meditation into a continuous pondering of God's qualities; thus both become aspects of loving bhakti. Release is not merely a shedding of the bonds of transmigration but a positive quest for the contemplation of God.

RĀMATĪRTHA \rā-mə-'tir-tə\, also spelled Rama Tirtha, original name Tirath Ram [b. 1873, Mirāliwāla, Punjab province, India [Pakistan]—d. Oct. 17, 1906, Tehri, United Provinces of Agra and Oudh [India]], Hindu religious leader who taught what he styled “Practical VEDĀNTA,” using common experiences to illustrate the divine nature of human beings. For Rāmatīrtha, any object whatever could be approached as a “mirror to God.”

Educated at the Foreman Christian College and Government College, Lahore, in 1895 Tirath Ram was appointed a professor of mathematics at Foreman Christian College. A meeting with the Bengali ascetic VIVEKANANDA strengthened his inclination toward religious study and the desire to spend his life in the propagation of the system of ADVAITA Vedānta. He helped to found an Urdu journal, Alif, in which many of his articles on Vedānta appeared.

In 1901 Tirath Ram went into seclusion in the HIMALAYAS, but later he emerged to travel to Japan and the United States. Rāmatīrtha (the name by which he then became known) advocated a “wholesale liberation of mankind, beginning with the personal liberation of the individual.” His mystical leanings were coupled with an appreciation of Western science and technology as a means of solving India's social and economic problems, and he never failed to support public education in all forms. He died by drowning in the Gaṅgā River; whether by accident or design is still a matter of conjecture among his followers.

RĀMĀYAṆA \rā-'mä-yə-nə\ (Sanskrit: "Story of Rāma"), great epic poem of India, whose oldest extant form, attributed to the poet Vālmiki, was composed in Sanskrit, probably not before 300 BCE. In its present "Vulgate" form it consists of some 24,000 couplets.

Vālmiki's poem describes the royal birth of RĀMA in the kingdom of AYODHYĀ (Oudh), his tutelage under the sage Viśvāmitra, and his success in bending Shiva's mighty bow at the bridegroom tournament of SĪTĀ, the daughter of King Janaka, thus winning her for his wife. After Rāma is banished from his position as the result of a family intrigue, he retreats to the forest with his wife and his favorite half brother, Lakṣmaṇa, to spend 14 years in exile. There RĀVAṆA, the demon-king of Laṅkā, carries off Sītā, while her two protectors are busy pursuing a golden deer sent to the forest to mislead them. After numerous adventures Rāma and his brother enter into alliance with Sugrīva, king of the monkeys; and with the assistance of the monkey-general HANUMĀN and Rāvaṇa's own brother, Vibhīṣana, they attack Laṅkā. Rāma slays Rāvaṇa and rescues Sītā, who in a later version undergoes an ordeal by fire to clear herself of any suspicion of infidelity while in Rāvaṇa's domain. When Rāma and Sītā return to Ayodhyā, however, the people question the queen's chastity, and Rāma banishes her to the forest. There she meets the sage Vālmiki (the reputed author of the Rāmāyaṇa) and at his hermitage gives birth to Rāma's two sons. The family is reunited when the sons come of age, but Sītā, after again protesting her innocence, asks to be received by the earth, who initially bore her, and the earth swallows her up.

Exploring perennial tensions between humanity and divinity, duty (DHARMA) and devotion (BHAKTI), civilization and wilderness, rulership and renunciation, the Rāmāyaṇa enjoys immense popularity in India. Its recitation is considered an act of great merit. It is even better known in India's spoken languages than in Sanskrit, and it functions less as a single text than as an encompassing narrative complex that encourages constant acts of questioning, interpretation, and reshaping. For many devotees Sītā and Hanumān are its focus as much or more than Rāma.

Throughout North India the events of the poem are enacted in an annual pageant, the Rām LĪLĀ, which may last as long as a month, and in South India the two epics, the Rāmāyaṇa and the MAHĀBHĀRATA, make up the ancient story repertoire of the kathakali dance-drama of Kerala. The story has spread in various forms throughout Southeast Asia (especially Cambodia, Indonesia, and Thailand), where Rāma and Sītā are held up as exemplars with every bit the intensity that one finds in India. Their romance—tragic in many of its aspects—is one of the world's great love stories.

RĀMCHARITMĀNAS \rām-çhə-rit-'mä-nəs\ ("Sacred Lake of the Acts of Rāma"), 16th-century version of the RĀMĀYAṆA, written by the poet TULSĪDĀS in Avadhī, an eastern dialect of Hindi. Distinguished by its expression of love for a personal god; its exemplification of the ideal conduct of a husband and ruler (RĀMA), wife (SĪTĀ), brother (Lakṣmaṇa), and servant-devotee (HANUMĀN); and its incorporation of SHIVA and PĀRVATĪ as narrators of this Vaiṣṇava epic, the Rāmcāritmānas has had a remarkable influence on modern HINDUISM. It has proved even more popular than the Bhagavad Gītā and was sometimes perceived by British missionaries as the BIBLE of North India—the primary SCRIPTURE to be reckoned with if Christian evangelism was to succeed. It is sung, recited, and enacted in numerous contexts, both in India and abroad, and served as the basis for the most widely watched television series in India's history, the 1987–88 Rāmāyana of Ramanand Sagar.

RĀMDĀS \ˈrām-ˈdās\ (b. 1534, Lahore, Punjab, India [now Pakistan]—d. 1581, Amritsar), fourth Sikh GURŪ (1574–81) and founder of the great Sikh center of AMRITSAR. Unlike Goindvāl, the seat of his predecessor Gurū Amardās (1552–74), the location of Amritsar lay at a distance from the direct Mughal gaze, providing the Sikhs a period of 30 or so years to organize themselves into an effective unit. RĀMDĀS wrote over 400 hymns of great beauty that appear in the ĀDI GRANTH. He nominated his younger son, ARJAN (1563–1606), as his successor.

RĀMPRASĀD SEN \ˈrām-prə-ˈsād-ˈsen\, 18th-century Śākta poet-saint of Bengal. Not much is known with certainty about his life. Legends abound, however, all of which are meant to highlight Rāmprasād's all-encompassing love for and devotion to the goddess ŚAKTI. One such tale concerns the poet's early career as a clerk for an accountant in a wealthy household in Calcutta. Rāmprasād's obsession with the Goddess precluded paying much attention to his work; every day he would sit at his desk and fill his account book with the name of the deity or with a song like this one: "Make me your accounts clerk, O Mother, I will never betray your trust. . . . Let me die at those feet of yours which dispel all misfortunes, In that position I will be safe from all dangers." According to the story, when the master of the household saw this poem he released Rāmprasād from his duties and supplied him with a stipend so that the poet could devote himself fully to service to the Goddess. Rāmprasād is said to have been later associated with the court of Raja Krishnachandra of Krishnagore and to have composed a work called Bidyasundar, containing both erotic and Tantric elements, under the Raja's patronage.

Rāmprasād is reputed to have composed some 100,000 songs, some of which became extremely popular among his followers, who regard them as sacred MANTRAS. The Goddess Rāmprasād portrays is sometimes beautiful, nurturing, and even erotic and at other times grotesque, dangerous, and fickle. Rāmprasād contributed to a revival of ŚĀKTISM and Tantricism in Bengal and also, in the wake of increased Western presence in India, identified the Goddess with MOSES and JESUS as well as with the Hindu deities.

RANJIT SINGH \rən-ˈjit-ˈsiŋ-gə, ˈrən-jit, -ˈsiŋg\, also spelled Runjit Singh (b. Nov. 13, 1780, Budrukhan, or Gujrānwāla, India—d. June 27, 1839, Lahore [now in Pakistan]), founder and maharaja (1801–39) of the Sikh kingdom of the Punjab.

At the turn of the 19th century, Ranjit Singh created a large Sikh kingdom that included the Mughal provinces of Lahore, Kashmir, and parts of Multan and Kabul. A great warrior and an able administrator, he helped materialize the 18th-century Sikh dream of the KHĀLSĀ Rāj, the Kingdom of God on earth. In the process, he built a large Sikh army trained along European lines. His descendants, however, failed to keep control of his vast kingdom, which ultimately fell to the British in 1849.

Ranjit Singh believed in benevolent monarchy. There was no capital punishment in his administration. Even when there were attempts on his life, his attackers were let go. He donated 7 percent of his revenue to charitable grants. A large number of new grants came to the Sikhs, but the existing grants to non-Sikh establishments were permitted to continue. It was during his reign that the GOLDEN TEMPLE (Darbār Sāhib) in AMRITSAR attained the features that have made it famous as a physical structure: its domes were covered with gold-plated copper, and its walls were rebuilt in marble inlaid with precious stones. Ranjit Singh's reign is often seen as a golden chapter in the history of SIKHISM.

RAPITHWIN \ˈrā-pith-wīn, rā-ˈpith-\, in ZOROASTRIANISM, personification of summer and noonday, the time of the mid-day meal. The NEW YEAR FESTIVAL, NORUZ, is celebrated in Rapithwin's honor as a solemn and joyful celebration of new life in nature and the anticipated RESURRECTION of the body at the end of times.

RASA \ˈrə-sə\ (Sanskrit: "aesthetic flavor"), concept developed by Indian philosophers in their theoretical treatments of Hindu temple artwork. Rasa consists of a kind of contemplative abstraction in which the inwardness of human feelings irradiates the surrounding world of embodied forms. The theory of rasa is attributed to Bharata, a sage-priest who may have lived about 500 CE. It was developed by the rhetorician and philosopher ABHINAVAGUPTA (c. 1000 CE), who applied it to all varieties of theater and poetry. The principal human feelings, according to Bharata, are delight, laughter, sorrow, anger, fear, disgust, heroism, and astonishment, all of which may be recast as contemplative rasas: erotic, comic, pathetic, furious, terrible, odious, marvelous, and quietistic. These rasas comprise the components of aesthetic experience. The power to taste rasa is a reward for merit in some previous existence.

RASHI \ˈrā-shē\, acronym of Rabbi Shlomo Yitzḥaqi \ʃhlō-ˈmō-yis-ˈhā-kē\ (b. 1040, Troyes, Champagne—d. July 13, 1105, Troyes), renowned medieval French commentator on the BIBLE and TALMUD. His commentary is considered a landmark in Talmudic EXEGESIS, and his work still serves among Jews as the most substantive introduction to biblical and postbiblical JUDAISM. Rashi also composed some penitential hymns (seliḥot), which revolve around the harsh reality of exile and the comforting belief in redemption.

Shlomo (Solomon) Yitzḥaqi (son of Isaac) studied in the schools of Worms and Mainz, the old Rhenish centers of Jewish learning, where he absorbed the methods, teachings, and traditions associated with RABBI GERSHOM BEN JUDAH (c. 960–1028/40), who was called the "Light of the Exile" because of his preeminence as the first great scholar of northern European Judaism. Rashi then left for the valley of the Seine (c. 1065), where he was the unofficial head of the small Jewish community (about 100–200 people) in Troyes.

In his Bible commentary, which was the first book printed in Hebrew (1475), Rashi seeks the literal meaning, deftly using rules of grammar and syntax and carefully analyzing both text and context, but does not hesitate to mount Midrashic explanations, utilizing ALLEGORY, PARABLE, and SYMBOLISM, upon the underlying literal interpretation. As a result, some of his successors have been critical of his searching literalism and deviation from traditional Midrashic exegesis, while others find his excessive fondness for nonliteral homilies uncongenial. The commentary had a significant influence on Christian Bible study from the 12th-century Victorines to the FRANCISCAN scholar Nicholas of Lyra (c. 1270–1349), who, in turn, was a major source of MARTIN LUTHER'S Bible work. Its influence continues in contemporary exegesis and revised translations.

Rashi's commentary on the Talmud, sometimes referred to as kuntros (literally, "notebook"), seeks to explain the text in its entirety, guides the student in methodological and substantive matters, resolves linguistic difficulties, and indicates the normative conclusions of the discussion. Unlike Maimonides' commentary on the MISHNAH, which may be read independently of the underlying text, Rashi's commentary is interwoven with the underlying text.

Rashi's work was epochal, and the agreement of subsequent scholars that the basic needs of text commentary had been fulfilled stimulated the rise of a new school of writers known as tosafists, who composed TOSAFOT (glosses), refining, criticizing, expanding, or qualifying Rashi's interpretations and conclusions.

RASHĪD RIḌĀ, MUHAMMAD \rā-ˈshēd-rē-ˈdā\ (b. 1865, Syria—d. 1935, Syria), Syrian scholar who helped Muslims formulate an intellectual response to the problem of reconciling the heritage of ISLAM to the modern world.

Rashīd Riḍā was educated in Islamic religion and the Arabic language. He was profoundly influenced in his early years by the writings of MUHAMMAD ʿABDUH and JAMĀL AL-DĪN AL-AFGHĀNĪ, Muslim reformist and nationalist thinkers, and he became ʿAbduh's biographer and the leading exponent and defender of his ideas. Rashīd Riḍā founded the newspaper al-Manār in 1898 and published it throughout his life. To a limited extent, he also participated in the political affairs of Syria and Egypt.

He was concerned with the backwardness of the Muslim countries, which he believed resulted from a neglect of the true principles of ISLAM. He believed that these principles could be found in the teachings of the Prophet MUHAMMAD and in the practices of the first generation of Muslims, before corruptions began to spread among the religious practices of the faithful (c. 655). He was convinced that positive effort to improve the material basis of the community was of the essence of Islam.

Rashīd Riḍā urged Arabs to emulate the scientific and technological progress made by the West. In the political affairs of the Muslim community, he wanted rulers to respect the authority of the men of religion and to consult with them in the formulation of governmental policies. He sanctioned the bending of Islam to fit the demands of modern times in other important respects; for example, the Prophet had forbidden the taking of interest, but Rashīd Riḍā believed that, to combat effectively the penetration of Western capitalism, Muslims had to accept the practice.

To realize a political and cultural revival, Rashīd Riḍā saw the need to unify the Muslim community. He advocated the establishment of a true CALIPH, who would be the supreme interpreter of Islam and whose prestige would enable him to guide governments in the directions demanded by an Islam adapted to the needs of modern society.

RASHĪDŪN \rā-shi-ˈdūn\ (Arabic: "Rightly Guided"), first four CALIPHS of the Islamic community, known in Muslim history as the orthodox or patriarchal caliphs: Abū Bakr (reigned 632–634), ʿUmar (reigned 634–644), ʿUTHMĀN (reigned 644–656), and ʿALĪ (reigned 656–661).

The 29-year rule of the Rashīdūn was Islam's first experience without the leadership of the Prophet MUHAMMAD. His example, however, in both private and public life, came to be regarded as the norm (SUNNA) for his successors, and a large and influential body of aṣṣārah (COMPANIONS OF THE PROPHET) kept close watch on the caliphs to ensure their strict adherence to the QUR'AN and the sunna. The Rashīdūn thus assumed all of Muhammad's duties except the prophetic: as IMAMS, they led the congregation in prayer at the mosque; as khatībs, they delivered the Friday sermons; and as umarā' al-mu'minīn ("commanders of the faithful"), they commanded the army.

The caliphate of the Rashīdūn, in which virtually all actions had religious import, began with the wars of the rida ("apostasy"; 632–633), tribal uprisings in Arabia, and ended with the first Muslim civil war (fitna; 656–661). It effected the expansion of the Islamic state beyond Arabia into Iraq, Syria, Palestine, Egypt, Iran, and Armenia. The Rashīdūn were also responsible for the adoption of an Islamic calendar, dating from Muhammad's emigration (HIJRA) from MECCA to MEDINA (622), and the establishment of an authoritative reading of the Qur'an, which strengthened the Muslim community and encouraged religious scholarship. The controversy over 'Alī's succession split ISLAM into two divisions, the SUNNI (traditionalists) and the SHI'ITE (shī'at 'Alī, "party of 'Alī"), which have survived to modern times.

The religious and very traditionalist strictures on the Rashīdūn were somewhat relaxed as Muhammad's contemporaries, especially the anṣār, began to die off, and the conquered territories became too vast to rule along theocratic lines; thus the Umayyads, who followed the Rashīdūn as caliphs, were able to secularize the operations of the state.

RASHNU \ˈrəsh-nü, ˈrəsh-ə\, in ZOROASTRIANISM, the deity of justice, who with MITHRA, the god of truth, and SRAOSHA, the god of religious obedience, determines the fates of the souls of the dead. Rashnu is praised in a yasht, or hymn, of the AVESTA; the 18th day of the month is sacred to Rashnu.

The name Rashnu originally may have referred to AHURA MAZDĀ, the supreme Iranian god, and to Mithra, in their capacities as judges. Rashnu eventually took over their functions and now stands on the Bridge of the Requiter (Rashnu himself), where, assisted by Mithra and Sraosha, he weighs on his golden scales the deeds of the souls that wish to pass in order to determine their futures. The divine triad may attempt to intercede for souls and obtain forgiveness for their SINS.

RASHTRIYA SEVA SANGH \ˈrəsh-trē-yā-ˈsā-vā-ˈsəŋ-gə, -ˈsəŋ\, also called Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh \-svə-yəm-ˈsā-vək-\ ("National Volunteer Organization") or RSS, organization founded in 1925 by Keshav Baliram Hedgewar (1889–1940), a physician living in the Mahārāshtra region of India, as part of the movement against British rule and as a response to rioting between Hindus and Muslims.

Hedgewar was heavily influenced by the writings of the Hindu nationalist ideologue VINAYAK DAMODAR SAVARKAR and adopted much of his rhetoric concerning the need for the creation of a "Hindu nation." Hedgewar formed the RSS as a disciplined cadre consisting mostly of upper-caste Brahmins who were dedicated to independence and the protection of Hindu political, cultural, and religious interests. Upon Hedgewar's death, leadership of the group was assumed by Madhava Sadashiv Golwalkar and later by Madhukar Dattatray Deoras.

The RSS presents itself as a cultural, not a political, organization that nevertheless advocates a Hindu nationalistic agenda under the banner of HINDUTVA, or "Hindu-ness." The group is structured hierarchically under the guidance of a national leader, while regional leaders are charged with overseeing the local branches. A major emphasis is placed on dedication and discipline, both mental and physical, as a means to restore strength, valor, and courage in Hindu youth and to foster unity among Hindus of all CASTES and classes. Paramilitary training and daily exercise and drills are part of this discipline.

The RSS has historically played a major role in the Hindu nationalist movement. On several occasions it has been banned by the Indian government, led by the Congress Party, for its alleged role in communal violence. Some of the major political leaders of India's Bharatiya Janatā Party were or still are members of the RSS.

RASTAFARIAN \ˌrəs-tə-ˈfer-ē-ən, ˌrəs-tə-ˈfär-ə\, also spelled Ras Tafari, member of a politico-religious movement among the black population of Jamaica and several other countries. Rastafarians worship Haile Selassie I, former emperor of Ethiopia, under his precoronation name, Ras (Prince) Tafari. They believe him to have been a divine being and the champion of the black race. According to the Rastafarians, blacks are the Israelites reincarnated and have been subjected to the evil and inferior white race in divine punishment for their sins; they will eventually be redeemed by repatriation to Africa, their true home and heaven on earth, and will compel the whites to serve them.

These beliefs, first enunciated in 1953, can be traced to several independent prophets and particularly to the Back to Africa movement led by Marcus Garvey in the early 20th century. The various groups that make up the Rastafarians rejected Jamaica's European-oriented culture and Christian revivalist religion and developed their own identity while awaiting the exodus. From the early 1950s the Rastafarian movement grew in complexity. The identification with Africa remained, but repatriation received less emphasis and the Rastafarians began to lean toward either political black militancy or a MYSTICISM supported by the OLD TESTAMENT and incorporating African forms. Rastafarian lifestyle may include dietary rules (often vegetarianism), the wearing of uncombed locks and beards, and the smoking of ganja (marijuana).

RATANA CHURCH \rə-ˈtā-nə\, 20th-century religious awakening among the New Zealand Maori and a national political influence, especially during the period 1943–63, when its members held all four Maori parliamentary seats in the national capital.

The Ratana church was founded by Tahupotiki Wiremu Ratana, a Methodist Maori farmer who acquired a reputation as a visionary and faith healer, preaching a doctrine of moral reform under the one God of the BIBLE that drew Maori (and some whites) from all parts of New Zealand. In 1920 he established an interdenominational church at the village of Ratana Pa. Ratana's movement gave new hope and a trans-tribal unity to the Maori, who had many grievances against the New Zealand government.

The association of Ratana's movement with other Christian denominations ended in 1925. The self-proclaimed Ratana church had developed a syncretic Maori CHRISTIANITY, marked by heterodox rituals and an elaborate hierarchy of religious officials; HYMNS and prayers glorified Ratana as God's mangai ("mouth-piece"). Displeased by these developments, several of New Zealand's Anglican bishops denounced the new religion. Furthermore, the doctrine of FAITH HEALING discouraged the taking of medicines, a fact that alienated religious and secular authorities alike.

Combining political activism with its RELIGIOUS BELIEFS, the Ratana church began to sponsor political candidates in 1922. Although it was not until 1931 that a Ratana candidate was elected, the church eventually established a position in which it could exercise some political power.

In the 1960s the church renewed relationships with other Christian churches in New Zealand and reemphasized the original biblical principles of Ratana.

RATHAYĀTRĀ \rə-tə-ˈyā-trə\, festival of India, observed by taking an image of a deity in a procession through the streets. This affords darśan (auspicious viewing) of the deity to worshipers who, because of CASTE or sectarian restrictions, are not admitted to the SANCTUARY. It also dramatizes the Hindu conviction that however much the power of an image deity may be associated with a particular, familiar place, that power has a wider orbit as well. The most famous Rathayātrā festival is that of KRISHNA worshiped as JAGANNĀTHA, which takes place at Puri in Orissa and at Shīrāmpur in West Bengal, but many similar festivals for other deities are observed in India and Nepal. Important images may be carried on elaborately carved wooden chariots, which are often extremely large and heavy, requiring hundreds of worshipers to pull them, while village deities may travel on far simpler, lighter palanquins.

RATIONALISM, also called intellectualism, mode of analysis that, with respect to religion, regards religion as a more or less systematic and comprehensive attempt to explain the world or the experience of the world. Thus, rationalism views religion as primarily a cognitive, explanatory phenomenon. This view of religion was especially popular during the late 19th and early 20th century and aroused interest again at the close of the 20th century.

The classic texts on the intellectualist theory of the nature of religion can be found in the work of Sir Edward Burnett Tylor (Primitive Culture, 1871) and SIR JAMES GEORGE FRAZER (The Golden Bough, 1890). For them, religion, like science, is an attempt to explain the world. Both were at pains to point out that to say religion is rational is not to claim that religion is true. Robin Horton (Patterns of Thought in Africa and the West, 1993) and Melford E. Spiro (Burmese Supernaturalism, 1967) are contemporary exponents of this approach to religion.

RAUSCHENBUSCH, WALTER \ˈraü-shən-büsh\ (b. Oct. 4, 1861, Rochester, N.Y., U.S.—d. July 25, 1918, Rochester), clergyman and theology professor who led the SOCIAL GOSPEL movement in the United States.

Rauschenbusch was the son of a Lutheran missionary. On June 1, 1886, he was ordained a minister of the Second German BAPTIST Church in New York City, where he became aware of social problems because of the personal distress he encountered in a depressed neighborhood and because of the mayoral campaign based on a social-welfare platform by the economist Henry George. Even more influential, however, were two young Baptist preachers, Leighton Williams and Nathaniel Schmidt. Together with Rauschenbusch they formed a Society of Jesus, which was later expanded into the Brotherhood of the Kingdom. For the Right, a monthly periodical "in the interests of the working people," was launched in November 1889 in an effort to reach the working classes and to aid in the formulation of a Christian socialist program. Publication ceased in March 1891 when Rauschenbusch left for a year of study in Germany and a visit to England, where he became interested in Fabian socialism. In 1897 he joined the faculty of Rochester Theological Seminary and in 1902 became professor of church history.

Upon the publication of Christianity and the Social Crisis (1907), Rauschenbusch gained recognition as the major spokesman of the Social Gospel movement in the United States. He believed that the KINGDOM OF GOD required social as well as individual salvation, and he demanded "a new order that would rest on the Christian principles of equal rights and democratic distribution of economic power."

RĀVAṆA \ˈrā-və-nə\, in HINDUISM, ferocious, fabulously wealthy demonic (rākṣasa) king. His abduction of Sītā and eventual defeat by her husband RĀMA are the central incidents of the RĀMĀYĀṆA. Rāvaṇa ruled in the kingdom of Laṅkā, believed by some to be modern Sri Lanka, from which he had expelled his brother KUBERA. The Rām LĪLĀ festival, popular particularly in northern India, is climaxed with the defeat of Rāvaṇa and the burning of huge effigies of the DEMONS on the festival day called DASSEHRA.

Rāvaṇa is described as having 10 heads and 20 arms and is vividly portrayed in painting and sculpture throughout India. Glorification of Rāvaṇa is not unknown. According to a minor tradition, the demons of VISHNU are successive REINCARNATIONS of his attendants, who take this form in order to be near him. In modern times, Tamil groups who oppose what they believe to be the political domination of southern India by the north have come to view the story of Rāma as exemplifying the ARYAN invasion of the south and consequently express their sympathies for Rāvaṇa and against Rāma.

RAVIDĀS \rə-vi-'dās\, also known as Raidas, mystic and poet-saint of the 15th or 16th centuries. Ravidās was born in VARANASI as a member of an UNTOUCHABLE leather-working CASTE and became one of the most renowned of the saints of the North Indian BHAKTI movement. His poems and songs often revolve around his low social position. While objecting to the notion that caste plays a fundamental role in an individual's relationship to God, Ravidās contrasted his own lowliness to the exalted place of the divine: God, he said, was finer than he, as silk was to a worm, and more fragrant than he, as sandalwood was to the stinking castor oil plant. In relation to God, all persons, no matter what their castes, are "untouchables," and "A family that has a true follower of the Lord is neither high caste nor low caste, lordly nor poor." Ravidās' CHARISMA and reputation were such that Brahmins were said to have bowed before him.

Some 40 of the poems attributed to Ravidās were included in the Ādi Granth, the Sikh SCRIPTURE, and it is generally accepted that Ravidās met NĀNAK, the founding GURŪ of the Sikh tradition. In the 19th and 20th centuries a new religious movement formed around his figure; a temple was built in his hometown where he was worshiped, his HYMNS were recited every morning and night, and his birthday was celebrated as a religious event. His egalitarian teachings made him a figure of veneration and pride among various DALIT social reform movements of the 20th century.

RE \rā\, also spelled Ra \rā\, or Phre, in ancient EGYPTIAN RELIGION, god of the sun and creator god. He was believed to travel across the sky in his solar bark and, during the night, to make his passage in another bark through the underworld, where, in order to be born again for the new day, he had to vanquish the evil serpent APOPI. As the creator, he rose from the ocean of CHAOS on the primeval hill, creating himself and then engendering eight other gods.

By the 4th dynasty (c. 2575–c. 2465 BCE), Re had taken his leading position. Many syncretisms were formed between Re and other gods, producing such names as Re-Harakhty, Amon-Re, Sebek-Re, and Khnum-Re. Re's falcon-headed appearance as Re-Harakhty originated through association with HORUS. The influence of Re was spread from On (HELIOPOLIS), which was the center of his worship. From the 4th dynasty, kings held the title "Son of Re," and "Re" later became part of the throne name they adopted at accession. As the father of MA'AT, Re was the ultimate source of right and justice in the cosmos.

At Thebes, by the late 11th dynasty (c. 1980 BCE), Re was associated with AMON as Amon-Re, who was for more than a millennium the principal god of the pantheon and the patron of kings. The greatest development of solar religion was during the New Kingdom (1539–c. 1075 BCE). The revolutionary worship of the sun disk ATON during the abortive Amarna period (1353–1336 BCE) was a radical simplification of the cult of Re. During the New Kingdom, beliefs about Re were harmonized with those concerning OSIRIS, the ruler of the Underworld.

REANIMATION RITE, in EGYPTIAN RELIGION, rite to prepare the deceased for afterlife, performed on statues of the deceased, the MUMMY itself, or statues of a god located in a temple. An important element of the ceremony was the ritual opening of the mouth so the mummy might breathe and eat. The rite, which symbolized the death and regeneration concept of the OSIRIS myth (in which the dismembered god Osiris was pieced together again and infused with life), was performed on a statue in the sculptor's workshop, but on a mummy it was performed at the tomb entrance. By this rite the statue or mummy was endowed with life and power so that he might enjoy the daily funeral service conducted before his tomb. In the case of temple statues, the ceremony was included in the daily temple ritual.

RECHABITE \re-kə-bit\, member of a conservative, ascetic Israelite sect that was named for Rechab, the father of Jehonadab. The Rechabites apparently were related to the KENITES (a tribe eventually absorbed into JUDAH in the 10th century BCE) according to 1 Chronicles 2:55.

The Rechabites were separatists who refused to participate in agricultural pursuits, drink wine, or engage in any practices associated with the Canaanites or the worship of their god BAAL. Believing that the seminomadic way of life was a religious obligation, they herded their flocks over much of Israel and Judah. They are best known for their connection with the slaughter of the worshipers of Baal during the revolt led by JEHU, a 9th-century-BCE king of Israel. According to later tradition, the Rechabites intermarried with the LEVITES.

RECONSTRUCTIONISM, American Jewish religious movement based on the teachings of RABBI Mordecai Kaplan. All of its institutions—the Jewish Reconstructionist Federation (founded 1954, with 100 affiliates in 1998), the Reconstructionist Rabbinical College (founded 1968), and the Reconstructionist Rabbinical Association (founded 1974)—are based in Philadelphia.

Following Kaplan's definition of JUDAISM as the evolving religious civilization of the Jewish people, Reconstructionists emphasize the formation of intensive, participatory decision-making communities in which contemporary Jews can embrace their Jewish heritage. Rabbis serve as teachers who enable communities of Jews to immerse themselves in Jewish learning and practice and thus to decide democratically the policies of their communities.

Beginning with the introduction of the first bat mitzvah (see BAR MITZVAH) ceremony in 1922, Reconstructionist communities have been committed to full gender equality. Women play a prominent role in the movement's leadership, and the movement's prayer books are gender neutral and include alternative, feminist God language. The initial inclusion of women has led to the inclusion of all Jews who have traditionally been excluded, including lesbian and gay Jews, and intermarried families.

While Reconstructionist theology pictures God in naturalistic terms, Reconstructionist communities are known for their spirited, fervent prayer and singing, and for their embrace of Jewish meditation and other practices that deepen one's internal, contemplative life. High percentages of Reconstructionists observe the dietary laws and other ritual practices—not because they believe that such practice is commanded by God but rather because of the meaning they find in it and the way that ritual and prayer open up the treasures of the tradition. In this regard as in all others, pluralism and respect for diversity are the norm.

Reconstructionist communities are also known for their emphasis on social action that provides Jewish contexts for addressing injustice and for adapting Jewish ethical teachings to contemporary moral dilemmas. While Reconstructionists have always been Zionists, they tend to align themselves with progressive forces who work for justice and peace in the Middle East.

RECUSANT \ˈre-kyə-zənt, ri-ˈkyü-, English ROMAN CATHOLIC from the period about 1570 to 1791 who refused to attend services of the Church of England and thereby committed a statutory offense.

RED HEIFER, Hebrew para adumma, in Jewish history, unblemished, never-before-yoked animal that was slaughtered and burned to restore ritual purity to those who had become unclean through contact with the dead (Numbers 19). Certain spoils of war and captives were also purified in this way. After the blood had been sprinkled by a priest, the carcass was immolated with cedarwood, hyssop, and a scarlet thread. The ashes were carried to a clean place and mixed with water in an earthen vessel. A sprinkling of the mixture restored purity to all who had taken part in the ritual.

In SYNAGOGUES the command to sacrifice a red heifer to restore ritual purity is read on Shabbat Para, a special SABBATH that precedes by a few weeks the festival of PASSOVER.

REDUCTIONISM, theory that asserts that entities of a given kind are collections or combinations of entities of a simpler or more basic kind or that expressions denoting such entities are definable in terms of expressions denoting the more basic entities. Thus, the ideas that physical bodies are collections of atoms or that thoughts are combinations of sense impressions are forms of reductionism. Within religious studies, the reductionist position would be one in which RELIGIOUS BELIEFS are explained by reference to basically nonreligious sentiments, sociopsychological circumstances, and other factors.

Two very general forms of reductionism have been held by philosophers in the 20th century: (1) Logical positivists have maintained that expressions referring to existing things or to states of affairs are definable in terms of directly observable objects, or sense-data, and, hence, that any statement of fact is equivalent to some set of empirically verifiable statements. In particular, it has been held that the theoretical entities of science are definable in terms of observable physical things, so that scientific laws are equivalent to combinations of observation reports. (2) Proponents of the unity of science have held that the theoretical entities of particular sciences, such as biology or psychology, are definable in terms of those of some more basic science, such as physics; or that the laws of these sciences can be explained by those of the more basic science.

The logical positivist version of reductionism also implies the unity of science insofar as the definability of the theoretical entities of the various sciences in terms of the observable would constitute the common basis of all scientific laws. Although this version of reductionism is no longer widely accepted, primarily because of the difficulty of giving a satisfactory characterization of the distinction between theoretical and observational statements in science, the question of the reducibility of one science to another remains controversial.

REFORMATION, religious revolution that took place in the Western Christian church in the 16th century. Having far-reaching political, economic, and social effects, the Reformation became the basis for the founding of PROTESTANTISM, one of the three major branches of CHRISTIANITY.

Over the centuries, the church had become deeply involved in the political life of western Europe. The resulting intrigues and political manipulations, combined with the church's increasing power and wealth, led to such abuses as SIMONY (the sale of INDULGENCES, or spiritual privileges) and corruption of the clergy.

The Reformation of the 16th century was not unprecedented. Reformers within the medieval church such as ST. FRANCIS, Peter Waldo, JAN HUS, and JOHN WYCLIFFE addressed abuses in the life of the church in the centuries before 1517. In the 16th century, ERASMUS of Rotterdam was the chief proponent of liberal Catholic reform that attacked moral abuses and popular superstitions in the church. These movements reveal an ongoing concern for reform within the church in the years before MARTIN LUTHER is said to have posted his NINETY-FIVE THESES on the door of the Castle Church, Wittenberg, on Oct. 31, 1517, the eve of All Saints' Day—the traditional date for the beginning of the Reformation.

Luther sought to attack what he considered to be the theological root of corruption in the life of the church—the perversion of the church's doctrine of redemption and GRACE. A pastor and professor at the University of Wittenberg, he attacked the indulgence system in his Ninety-five Theses, insisting that the POPE had no authority over PURGATORY and that the doctrine of the merits of the saints had no foundation in the GOSPEL. Here lay the key to Luther's concerns for the ethical and theological reform of the church; SCRIPTURE alone is authoritative (sola scriptura) and JUSTIFICATION is by faith (sola fide), not by works. While he did not intend to break with the Catholic church, in 1521 Luther was tried before the Imperial DIET OF WORMS and was eventually excommunicated; thus, what had begun as an internal reform movement had become a fracture in western Christendom.

Other reform movements arose independently of Luther. HULDRYCH ZWINGLI built a Christian theocracy in Zürich in which CHURCH AND STATE were combined. Zwingli agreed with Luther in the centrality of the doctrine of justification by faith, but he espoused a more radical understanding of the EUCHARIST. Luther had rejected the Catholic Church's doctrine of TRANSUBSTANTIATION, according to which the bread and wine in the Eucharist became the actual body and blood of Christ. According to Luther's doctrine of the Eucharist, the body of Christ was truly present in the elements because Christ is present everywhere, but Zwingli went further to claim that the Eucharist was simply a memorial of the death of Christ and a declaration of faith by the recipients.

From the group surrounding Zwingli emerged those more radical than himself—the Radical Reformers, who insisted that the principle of scriptural authority be applied without compromise. They broke with Zwingli over the issue of infant BAPTISM, thereby receiving the nickname “ANABAPTISTS” on the grounds that they rebaptized adults who had been baptized as children. The Swiss Anabaptists sought to follow the example of JESUS found in the Gospels. They refused to swear OATHS or bear arms, taught the strict separation of church and state, and insisted on the visible church of adult believers—distinguished from the world by its disciplined, regenerated life.

Another important form of Protestantism is CALVINISM, named for JOHN CALVIN, a French lawyer who fled France after his conversion to the Protestant cause. In Basel, Calvin brought out the first edition of his Institutes of the Christian Religion in 1536, the first systematic theological treatise of the reform movement. Calvin agreed with Luther's teaching on justification by faith. However, he found a more positive place for law within the Christian community than did Luther. In Geneva, Calvin was able to experiment with his ideal of a disciplined community of the ELECT in a combination of church and state under Calvin's forceful leadership.

The Reformation spread to other European countries over the course of the 16th century. By mid-century, LUTHERANISM dominated northern Europe, and eastern Europe offered a seedbed for even more radical varieties of Protestantism. Spain and Italy were to be the great centers of the COUNTER-REFORMATION, and Protestantism never gained a strong foothold there.

In England the Reformation's roots were primarily political. Henry VIII, incensed by Pope Clement VII's refusal to grant him a divorce, repudiated papal authority and in 1534 established the Anglican Church with the king as the supreme head (see ANGLICAN COMMUNION). Henry's reorganization of the church permitted the beginning of religious reform in England, which included the preparation of a liturgy in English, THE BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER. In Scotland, JOHN KNOX, who was greatly influenced by John Calvin, led the establishment of Presbyterianism, which made possible the eventual union of Scotland with England.

REFORMED CHURCH, any of several major representative groups of classical PROTESTANTISM that arose in the 16th-century REFORMATION. Originally, all of the Reformation churches used this name (or the name Evangelical) to distinguish themselves from the “unreformed” ROMAN CATHOLIC church. After the controversy among these churches over the Lord's Supper (after 1529), the followers of Luther began to use the name Lutheran as a specific name, and the name Reformed became associated with the Calvinistic churches (and also for a time with the Church of England). Eventually the name PRESBYTERIAN, which denotes the form of church polity used by most of the Reformed churches, was adopted by the Calvinistic churches of British background. The modern Reformed churches thus trace their origins to the Continental Calvinistic churches that retained the original designation of “reformed in accordance with the word of God.”

REFORM JUDAISM, religious movement that has modified or abandoned many traditional Jewish beliefs, laws, and practices in an effort to adapt JUDAISM to the changing conditions of the modern world.

The movement began in early 19th-century Germany, when the liberation of Jews from their ghettos led many to question their allegiance to such traditions as dietary laws, prayers in Hebrew, and special clothing that set them apart as Jews. Many felt that Judaism would lose Jews to other religions if it was not brought into the 19th century.

Israel Jacobson (1768–1828), a layman, established a school in Seesen, Brunswick, in 1801, where he held the first Reform services in 1809, attended by adults as well as children. Jacobson's liturgy, which was in German rather than Hebrew, omitted all references to a personal MESSIAH who would restore ISRAEL. Men and women sat together, the service featured organ and choir music, and CONFIRMATION for both boys and girls replaced the traditional boys' BAR MITZVAH ceremony. Jacobson held Reform services in Berlin in 1815; and from there Reform practices spread to Denmark, Hamburg, Leipzig, Vienna, and Prague. Although the Prussian government issued prohibitions under pressure from Orthodox leaders, the movement grew. Reform worshipers were no longer required to cover their heads or wear the prayer shawl (TALLIT). Daily public worship was abandoned; work was permitted on the Sabbath; and dietary laws (KASHRUTH) were declared obsolete.

RABBI ABRAHAM GEIGER (1810–74), one of the leading ideologists of the Reform movement, concluded that the essence of Judaism is belief in the one true God of all mankind, the practice of eternally valid ethical principles, and the communication of these truths to all nations of the world. SAMUEL HOLDHEIM (1806–60) rejected Jewish marriage and divorce laws as obsolete, arguing that such codes fell outside the ethical and doctrinal functions of Judaism and were superseded by the laws of the state.

Reform Judaism took root in the United States in 1841 when a congregation in Charleston, S.C., joined the movement. Rabbi ISAAC MAYER WISE (1819–1900), a German emigrant, issued a widely influential prayer book (1857) and established the UNION OF AMERICAN HEBREW CONGREGATIONS (1873), the Hebrew Union College (1875) for the education of Reform rabbis, and the CENTRAL CONFERENCE OF AMERICAN RABBIS (1889). Two other emigrants, David Einhorn (1809–79) and SAMUEL HIRSCH (1815–89), provided the theoretical foundations of American Reform. Hirsch was chairman of the first conference of American Reform rabbis, which met in Philadelphia in 1869. It rejected belief in bodily RESURRECTION after death and declared that Jews should no longer expect a return to Palestine. The question of ZIONISM was controversial within the Reform movement until the establishment of the state of Israel in 1948.

In 1937 a conference of Reform rabbis issued the COLUMBUS PLATFORM, supporting the use of traditional customs and ceremonies and the liturgical use of Hebrew. In the late 20th century the Central Conference of American Rabbis issued several new prayer books and continued to consider such issues as inclusion of single parents in the congregation, the position of women in the congregation and in the rabbinate, and homosexuality.

REINCARNATION, also called transmigratio, or metempsychosis, belief in the rebirth of the soul in one or more successive existences, which may be human, animal, or, in some instances, vegetable. While belief in reincarnation is most characteristic of Asian religions and philosophies, it also appears in the religious and philosophical thought of indigenous religions, in some ancient Middle Eastern religions (e.g., the Greek Orphic mysteries), MANICHAISM, and some Gnostic movements, as well as in such modern religious movements as THEOSOPHY.

In indigenous religions, belief in multiple souls is common. The soul is frequently viewed as being capable of leaving the body through the mouth or nostrils and of being reborn, for example, as a bird, butterfly, or insect. The Venda of southern Africa believe that, when a person dies, the soul stays near the grave for a short time and then seeks a new resting place or another body—human, mammalian, or reptilian.

Among the ancient Greeks, Orphism held that there is a preexistent soul that survives bodily death and is later reincarnated in a human or other mammalian body, eventually receiving release from the cycle of birth and death and regaining its former pure state. Plato, in the 5th–4th century BCE, believed in an immortal soul that participates in frequent incarnations.

The Asian religions, especially HINDUISM, JAINISM, BUDDHISM, and SIKHISM (all of which arose in India) hold in common a doctrine of KARMA (“act”), the law of cause and effect, which states that what one does in this present life will have its effect in the next life. In Hinduism the process of birth and rebirth—i.e., transmigration of souls—is endless until one achieves MOKSHA, or salvation, by realizing the truth that liberates—i.e., that the individual soul (ĀTMAN) and the absolute soul (BRAHMAN) are one. Thus, one can escape from the wheel of birth and rebirth (SAMSAARA).

Jainism, reflecting a belief in an absolute soul, holds that karma is affected in its density by the deeds that a person does. Thus, the burden of the old karma is added to the new karma that is acquired during the next existence until the soul frees itself by religious disciplines, especially by AHIMSA (“noninjury”), and rises to the place of liberated souls at the top of the universe.

Although Buddhism denies the existence of an unchanging, substantial soul, it holds to a belief in multiple existences. A complex of psycho-physical elements and states changing from moment to moment, the self, composed of the five SKANDHAS (“groups of elements”)—i.e., body, sensations, perceptions, impulses, and consciousness—ceases to exist at the individual’s death, but the karma of the deceased conditions the birth of a new self. By becoming a monk and practicing discipline and meditation, one can stop the wheel of birth and rebirth and achieve NIRVANA, the extinction of desires and suffering.

Sikhism teaches a doctrine of reincarnation based on the Hindu view but in addition holds that, after the LAST JUDGMENT, souls—which have been reincarnated in several existences—will be absorbed in God.

REINDEER SACRIFICE, Upper Paleolithic and Mesolithic religious practice among various northern European and Asian peoples, consisting primarily of submerging a young doe in a lake or pond or burying it in the ground. The submerging or burial of these reindeer may indicate that prehistoric man believed that the god of the hunt resided underground. Other personal possessions often were thrown into the water or buried near the reindeer. On special occasions, Mesolithic hunters set up the skull and antlers of an older reindeer on a pole at the edge of the pool.

RELATIVISM, view that what is right or wrong and good or bad is not absolute but is instead variable and relative, depending on the person, circumstances, or social situation. Relativism is the view that what is really right depends solely upon what the individual or the society thinks is right. Because what one thinks will vary with time and place, what is right will also vary accordingly. Relativism is, therefore, a view about the truth status of cognitive and moral principles, according to which changing and even conflicting moral principles are equally true, so that there is no objective way of justifying any principle as valid for all people and all societies.

The sociological argument for relativism proceeds from the diversity of different cultures. Ruth Benedict, an American anthropologist, suggested, for example, in Patterns of Culture (1934) that the differing and even conflicting moral beliefs and behavior of the North American Indian Kwakiutl, Pueblo, and Dobu cultures provided standards that were sufficient within each culture for its members to evaluate correctly their own individual actions. Thus, relativism does not deprive one of all moral guidance. However, some anthropologists, such as Clyde Kluckhohn and Ralph Linton, have pointed out certain “ethical universals,” or cross-cultural similarities, in moral beliefs and practices—such as prohibitions against murder, incest, untruth, and unfair dealing—that are more impressive than the particularities of moral disagreement, which can be interpreted as arising within the more basic framework that the universals provide. Some critics point out, further, that a relativist has no grounds by which to evaluate the social criticism arising within a free or open society, that such views, in fact, appear to undercut the very idea of social reform.

A second argument for relativism holds that moral utterances are not cognitive statements, verifiable as true or false, but are, instead, emotional expressions of approval or disapproval or are merely prescriptions for action. In this view, variations and conflicts between moral utterances are relative to the varying conditions that occasion such feelings, attitudes, or prescriptions, and there is nothing more to be said. Critics of this view may observe that, even if moral utterances are not cognitive, it does not follow that they are related, as the relativist suggests, only to the changeable elements in their background; they may also be related in a special way to needs and wants that are common and essential to human nature and society everywhere and in every age. If so, these needs can provide good reasons for the justification of some moral utterances over others. The relativist will then have to reply either that human nature has no such common, enduring needs or that, if it does, they cannot be discovered and employed to ground man’s moral discourse.

The basic problem with all relativist claims is that at least one assertion is not relative to some context; the claim that all truth is relative.

RELIC, in religion, strictly, the mortal remains of a saint; in the broad sense, any object that has been in contact with the saint. Among the major religions, CHRISTIANITY, almost exclusively in ROMAN CATHOLICISM, and BUDDHISM have emphasized the veneration of relics.

The basis of Christian cult veneration of relics is the conception that reverence for the relics redounds to the honor of the saint. While expectation of favors may accompany the devotion, it is not integral to it. The first Christian reference to relics speaks of handkerchiefs carried from the body of ST. PAUL to heal the sick. During the 2nd century CE, in the Martyrdom of Polycarp, the bones of the martyred bishop of Smyrna are described as “more valuable than precious stones." The veneration of relics continued and grew in Christianity. Generally, the expectation of miracles increased during the Middle Ages, while the flood of Oriental relics into Europe during the Crusades raised serious questions as to their authenticity and ethical procurement. ST. THOMAS AQUINAS, however, considered it natural to cherish the remains of the saintly dead and found sanction for the veneration of relics in God's working of miracles in the presence of relics.

Roman Catholic thought, defined in 1563 at the COUNCIL OF TRENT and subsequently affirmed, maintained that relic veneration was permitted and laid down rules to assure the authenticity of relics and exclude vernal practices. Among the most venerated of Christian relics were the fragments of the TRUE CROSS. In EASTERN ORTHODOXY, devotion is focused on ICONS rather than upon relics, though the antimention (the cloth upon which the divine liturgy is celebrated) always contains a relic. The veneration of relics has not been widely accepted in PROTESTANTISM.

Like Christianity, ISLAM has had a cult of relics associated with its founder and with saints. In Islam, however, the use of relics has had no official sanction; indeed, Muslim theologians have frequently denounced the veneration of relics and the related practice of visiting the tombs of saints as conflicting with the Prophet Muhammad's insistence on his own purely human, nondivine nature and his stern condemnation of IDOLATRY and the worship of anyone other than God himself.

Relic worship was canonically established in Buddhism from its earliest days. Tradition (Mahāparinibbāna Sutta) states that the cremated remains of the BUDDHA GOTAMA (d. c. 483 BCE) were distributed equally among eight Indian kings in response to a demand for his relics. Commemorative mounds (STUPAS) were built over these relics, over the vessel from which the bones were distributed, and over the collective ashes of the funeral pyre. The emperor AŚOKA (3rd century BCE) is said to have redistributed some of the relics among the innumerable stupas he had erected. Such shrines became important centers of PILGRIMAGE.

According to legend, seven bones (the four canine teeth, the two collarbones, and the frontal bone) were exempted from the primary distribution, and these have been the object of widespread devotion, with a number of shrines dedicated to them throughout Asia. Most famous of these sarīra ("corporeal relics") is the left canine tooth, honored at the TEMPLE OF THE TOOTH at Kandy, Sri Lanka. Other shrines reportedly have housed certain personal possessions of the Buddha, such as his staff or alms bowl. In addition, the bodily remains and personal effects of the great Buddhist saints and heroes are also venerated. In TIBETAN BUDDHISM, worship is accorded the carefully preserved bodies of the DALAI LAMAS, who are regarded as REINCARNATIONS of a heavenly being, the Bodhisattva AVALOKITEŚVARA.

RELIGION, ANTHROPOLOGY OF, STUDY OF RELIGION via the methods of anthropology.

Anthropology began with an interest in questions of origins and evolution. One early attempt was that of the English anthropologist John Lubbock (1834–1913). His book, The Origin of Civilisation and the Primitive Condition of Man (1870), outlined an evolutionary scheme, beginning with ATHEISM and continuing with fetishism, nature worship, TOTEMISM, shamanism, ANTHROPO-

MORPHISM, MONOTHEISM, and, finally, ethical monotheism. The English ethnologist SIR EDWARD BURNETT TYLOR (1832–1917) expounded, in his book Primitive Culture (1871), the thesis that ANIMISM is the earliest and most basic religious form. Out of this evolves fetishism, belief in DEMONS, POLYTHEISM, and, finally, monotheism, which derives from the exaltation of a great god in a polytheistic context. A somewhat similar system was advanced by Herbert Spencer (1820–1903) in his The Principles of Sociology (1876–96), though he stresses ANCESTOR WORSHIP rather than animism as the basic consideration.

Another important figure in the development of theories of religion was the British folklorist SIR JAMES FRAZER (1854–1941), in whose major work, The Golden Bough (1890), is set forth a mass of evidence to establish the thesis that humans must have begun with magic and progressed to religion and from that to science. He owes much to Tylor but places magic in a phase anterior to belief in supernatural powers that have to be propitiated—this belief being the core of religion. Because of the realization that magical rituals do not in fact work, primitive man then turns, according to Frazer, to reliance on supernatural beings that are outside his control, beings who need to be treated well and with respect if they are to cooperate with human purposes. With further scientific discoveries and theories, such as the mechanistic view of the operation of the universe, religious explanations gave way to scientific ones. Frazer's scheme is reminiscent of that of the French "father of sociology," Auguste Comte.

The German Roman Catholic priest and ethnologist Wilhelm Schmidt (1868–1954) brought anthropological expertise to bear in a series of investigations of such indigenous societies as those of the Tierra del Fuegians (South America), the Negrillos of Rwanda (Africa), and the Andaman Islanders (Indian Ocean). The results were assembled in his Der Ursprung der Gottesidee ("The Origin of the Idea of God"), which appeared in 12 volumes from 1912 to 1955. Not surprisingly, Schmidt and his collaborators saw in various HIGH GODS a sign of a primordial monotheistic revelation that later became overlaid with other elements. While controversial, Schmidt's approach produced grounds for rejecting the earlier rather naive theory of evolutionism. Modern scholars do not, on the whole, accept Schmidt's scheme; it is a very long jump from the premise that primitive tribes have high gods to the conclusion that the earliest humans were monotheists.

Functional and structural studies of religion. Through the course of the 20th century, anthropologists became more concerned with functional and structural accounts of religion in society and relinquished the apparently futile search for origins. Notable among these accounts was the theory of the French sociologist ÉMILE DURKHEIM (1858–1917). According to Durkheim, totemism was fundamentally significant (he wrongly supposed it to be virtually universal), and in this he shared the view of some other 19th-century savants, notably Salomon Reinach (1858–1932), Robertson Smith (1846–94), and SIGMUND FREUD (1856–1939). Because Durkheim treated the totem as symbolic of the god, he inferred that the god is a representation of the clan. This conclusion, if generalized, suggested that all the objects of religious worship symbolize social relationships and, indeed, play an important role in the continuance of the social group.

Various forms of FUNCTIONALISM in anthropology—which understood social patterns and institutions in terms of their function in the larger cultural context—proved illuminating for religion. The Polish-British anthropologist BRONISLAW MALINOWSKI (1884–1942), for instance, emphasized in his work on the Trobriand Islanders (New Guinea) the close relationship between myth and ritual—a point also made emphatically by the "myth and ritual" school of the history of religions. Also, many anthropologists, notably Paul Radin (1883–1959), moved away from earlier categorizations of so-called primitive thought and pointed to the crucial role of creative individuals in the process of mythmaking.

A rather different approach to myths was made by the 20th-century French anthropologist Claude Lévi-Strauss, whose structuralist analysis tended to reinforce analogies between "primitive" and sophisticated thinking and also provided a new method of analyzing myths and stories. His views had wide influence, though they are by no means universally accepted by anthropologists.

Specialized studies. The impact of Western culture, including missionary CHRISTIANITY, and technology upon a wide variety of primitive and tribal societies has had profound effects and represents a specialized area of study closely related to religious anthropology. One pioneering work is The Religions of the Oppressed (1963) by the Italian anthropologist and historian of religion Vittorio Lanternari. Among a number of contemporary anthropologists, including the American Clifford Geertz, there is a concern with exploring more deeply and concretely the symbolism of cultures. The English social anthropologist E.E. Evans-Pritchard (1902–73), noted among other things for his work on the religion of Nuer people (of The Sudan), produced in his Theories of Primitive Religion (1965) a penetrating critique of many earlier anthropological stances.

RELIGION, DEFINITION OF, any attempt to formulate a description of religion that is adequate for all religions, past and present. Most introductions to the STUDY OF RELIGION stress the difficulty of defining religion and then append a list of definitions as illustrative of the problem. In fact, defining religion is not difficult at all—the list demonstrates only that there is little agreement among scholars, whose definitions reflect their particular interests. Thus, a definition of religion that specifies religion as a representation of social relations is obviously rooted in the social sciences. If one were interested in psychology, one might define religion as a symbolic representation of mental, or unconscious, reality. If one were more theologically or metaphysically minded, one might insist on defining religion as the ultimate concern, as a feeling of absolute dependence, or as a representation of the sacred. Since the first two definitions are dependent on a theory of religion, the adequacy of the sociological or psychological theory concerned will determine the adequacy of the definition. Since theological and metaphysical definitions refer to a transcendental reality, the means for checking their adequacy is lacking; we accept them on faith or as a commitment to a tradition.

Most definitions of religion are not helpful largely because they are vague or ambiguous. For instance, suppose religion to be defined as "worldview"; are all worldviews religions? If so, it would seem that just about anything can become a religion. Similarly, if religion is defined as the "ultimate concern," is concern with holding onto a job religious? If religion is defined as "the sacred," the question usually asked is "What is the sacred?"—a sure sign that the definition is not very helpful.

Other definitions of religion are too restrictive. The definition "belief in God" is a good example. Although it includes all monotheistic religions, it excludes all polytheistic religions, and those religions that do not believe in a god at all. To define religion as belief in the "supernatural" or "transcendental" reality is also too restrictive, since some cultures deny such realities. These examples demonstrate that empirical evidence is available to test the adequacy of our definition of religion.

A definition that has received reasonable acceptance among scholars is as follows: religion is a system of communal beliefs and practices relative to superhuman beings. This definition moves away from defining religion as worldview or as some kind of special experience. It emphasizes that religion is a communal system or structure related to superhuman beings. Superhuman beings are beings that can do things we cannot do. Their miraculous powers set them apart from ordinary mortals. They can be either male or female, neither, or both, and they can take the form of ancestors, gods, goddesses, or spirits. They can be malevolent or benevolent or both. What is important is the relation of these beings to specific communal beliefs and practices, the myths and rituals of particular human beings. This definition excludes Nazism, Marxism, SECULARISM, humanism, and other -isms, including nationalism and other quasi-religious movements. Except for its stress on system or structure this definition is theoretically neutral and empirically verifiable.

RELIGION, ORIGIN OF, subject within the STUDY OF RELIGIONS. The quest for the origin of religion was a popular academic enterprise at the beginning of the 20th century and is to be seen in the works of the economist and historian Karl Marx, of the sociologist ÉMILE DURKHEIM, and of the psychologist SIGMUND FREUD. This quest is directly related to the quest for the meaning of religion; that is, if we can determine the origin of religion we might be able to determine its meaning. Thus, for Freud, in the beginning was "the deed"—religion grew out of experiences surrounding certain primal actions. For Durkheim it was the appearance of the "collective conscience," as society itself was deified in symbolic, totemic form. For the anthropologist SIR EDWARD BURNETT TYLOR the origin of religion was to be found in the first human attempts to explain experience. For other scholars MYSTICISM was the origin, indeed the very essence, of religion.

Two counterarguments seek to put an end to the quest for origins. The first argues from the basis that the quest is sheer conjecture: none of these claims can ever hope to be proven. The second argues from linguistic grounds: the meaning of religion, like the meaning of language, cannot be explained by a study of its history or origin, even if we could discover them. That is, to know the meaning of English is to know something other than its history or origin. Nevertheless, in the late 20th century conjectures concerning the origin once again came to the fore in the study of religion, as they did in linguistics.

RELIGION, PHENOMENOLOGY OF \fi-nä-mə-nä-lə-jē\, approach to the STUDY OF RELIGION that is descriptive rather than historical or a causal explanation of its existence. Phenomenologists of religion also contrast their study of religion from normative approaches to religion such as theology, metaphysics, or PHILOSOPHY OF RELIGION. Gerardus van der Leeuw's Phänomenologie der Religion (1933; Religion in Essence and Manifestation) remains the classic text of this movement in the study of religion. Van der Leeuw describes the method as (1) entailing a suspension of one's beliefs and preconceptions about the reference of religion; (2) perceiving religion on its own terms, or essence; (3) using a comparative approach to reveal what is essential in religion; and (4) maintaining a proper understanding or empathy of religion to prevent a reduction of religion to another plane of explanation. Most phenomenologists of religion have claimed that the proper understanding of religion views the essence of religion as a manifestation of "the Sacred" or "the Holy." Rudolf Otto's Das Heilige (1917; The Idea of the Holy) is considered a classic account of this position. Mircea Eliade's Das Heilige und das Profane (1957; The Sacred and the Profane) is a good example of a contemporary statement of this approach to the study of religion.

Critics of this approach have focused on the claims of neutrality and "value-free" descriptions of religion, pointing out that the concept of "the Sacred" or "the Holy" are for the most part reinterpretations of Christian theology.

RELIGION, PHILOSOPHY OF, academic discipline which attempts to (1) analyze and describe the nature of religion in the framework of a general view of the world; (2) defend or attack various religious positions in terms of philosophy; and (3) analyze RELIGIOUS LANGUAGE. Thus, much of philosophy of religion is concerned with questions not so much of the description of religion (historically and otherwise) as with the truth of religious claims. For this reason philosophy can easily become an adjunct of theology or of antireligious positions; thus, it is often difficult to disentangle descriptive problems from those bearing on the truth of the content of what is being described. The following brief account of philosophical trends leans toward those theories that have a stronger content of, or relevance to, descriptive claims about religion.

Theories of Hume and Kant. Studies of religion in the late 17th and 18th centuries reflected the growing RATIONALISM of the epoch. The Scottish philosopher David Hume (1711–76) argued in such works as Enquiry Concerning Human Understanding (first published in 1748 under another title), Natural History of Religion (1757), and the posthumous Dialogues Concerning Natural Religion (1779) that there can be no true knowledge of anything beyond direct experience. These considerations dispose of all the classical arguments for the existence of God, as such arguments are not based on the requisite empirical evidence. Whatever order man discerns in the world around him, he argued, should be attributed to the universe itself and not to any postulated outside cause. Hume's distinctive contribution was methodological: the contention that the principles and presuppositions upon which the critical historian must rely, in first interpreting the remains of the past as historical evidence and in then building up from this evidence his account of what actually happened, are such as to make it impossible for him "to prove a miracle and make it a just foundation for any such system of religion."

The culmination of 18th-century rationalism was found in the works of the German philosopher Immanuel Kant (1724–1804), but it was a rationalism modified to leave room for religion, which he based essentially on ethics. He held that all men in their awareness of the categorical imperative (i.e., the notion that one must act as though what one does can become the universal law for mankind) and reverence for it share in the one religion and that the preeminence of CHRISTIANITY lay in the conspicuous way in which JESUS CHRIST enshrined the moral ideal.

Theories of Schleiermacher and Hegel. Kant's system depended on drawing certain distinctions, such as that between pure and practical reason, which were open to challenge. One reaction that attempted to place religion as neither primarily to do with pure nor with practical reason was that of the German theologian and philosopher FRIEDRICH SCHLEIERMACHER (1768–1834), who, in his On Religion: Speeches to Its Cultured Despisers, written in 1799, attempted to carve out a territory for RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE distinct from both science and morality. For him the central attitude in religion is "the feeling of absolute dependence." In drawing attention to the affective and experiential side of religion, Schleiermacher set in motion the modern concern to explore the subjective or inner aspect of religion. Schleiermacher's main goal was the construction of a new type of theology—the "theology of consciousness." In so doing he relegated doctrines to a secondary role, their function being to express and articulate the deliverances of religious consciousness.

Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel (1770–1831) argued that religion arises as the relation between man and the Absolute (the spiritual reality that undergirds and includes the whole universe), in which the truth is expressed symbolically, and so conveyed personally and emotionally to the individual. As the same truth is known at a higher—that is, more abstract—level in philosophy, religion is ultimately inferior to philosophy. The Hegelian account of religion was worked out in the context of the dialectical view of history, according to which opposites united in a synthesis, which in turn produced its opposite, and so on.

Empiricism and logical positivism. In the 19th century the Hegelian school was very influential, particularly in the study of early Christianity, but it attracted some radical criticism (see also KIERKEGAARD, SØREN). Hegelianism entered a period of rapid decline in the early part of the 20th century. The common sense and scientifically oriented philosophy of G.E. Moore (1873–1958) and Bertrand Russell (1872–1970) introduced a period of EMPIRICISM in Britain, while William James's PRAGMATISM had a similar effect in the United States. (On the continent of Europe, the increasing influence of existentialism after World War I was also hostile to the old type of metaphysics.) British empiricism was expressed very strongly in logical positivism (maintaining the exclusive value of scientific knowledge and the denial of traditional metaphysical doctrines). This stimulated the analysis of religious language, and the movement was complicated by the transformation in the thought of Ludwig Wittgenstein (1889–1951), who in his later work was very far removed from his early, rather formalistic treatment of language.

Though Wittgenstein stressed the idea of “forms of life,” according to which the meaning of RELIGIOUS BELIEFS would have to be given a practical and living contextualization, little has been done to pursue the idea empirically. The analytic attempt to exhibit the nature of religious language has generally occurred in the context of questions of truth—thus some scholars have been concerned with exhibiting how it is possible to hold religious beliefs in an empiricist framework, and others with showing the meaninglessness or incoherence of belief.

Existentialist and phenomenological studies. The most influential modern existentialists have been Martin Heidegger (1889–1976) and Jean-Paul Sartre (1905–80); the former was especially important in the development of modern European theology, particularly for the use made of some of his ideas by RUDOLF BULTMANN. According to Heidegger, human existence is characterized as “care.” This care is shown first in possibility: one makes things instrumental to one's concerns and so projects forward. Secondly, there is one's facticity, for a person exists as a finite entity with particular limitations. Heidegger's term for this limit on existence is Geworfenheit (“thrownness”), by which he means, for instance, that one does not choose to have existence, does not choose the time one finds oneself in, but is instead thrown into that existence or time without choice. Thirdly, humans seek to avoid the anxiety of their limitations and thus seek what Heidegger termed “inauthentic” existence. Authenticity, on the other hand, involves a kind of stoicism (positive attitude toward life and suffering) in which death is taken up as a possibility and one faces the “nothing.” The structure of the world as analyzed by Heidegger is revealed, in a sense, affectively—i.e., through care, anxiety, and other existential attitudes and feelings.

Sartre's thought has had less direct impact on the study of religion, partly because his account of human existence represents an explicit alternative to traditional religious belief. Sartre's analysis begins, however, from the human desire to be God: but God is, on Sartre's analysis, a self-contradictory notion, for nothing can contain the ground of its own being. In searching for an essence humans fail to see the nature of their freedom, which is to go beyond definitions, whether laid down by God or by other human beings.

Edmund Husserl (1859–1938) has been the main exponent of phenomenology, and his program of describing experience and “bracketing” the objects of experience, in the pursuit of essences of types of experience, was in part taken up in the PHENOMENOLOGY OF RELIGION. Husserl distinguished phenomenology from psychology, in that the latter concerns facts in a spatiotemporal setting, whereas phenomenology intends to uncover timeless essences.

RELIGION, PSYCHOLOGY OF, study of religious psychology involves both the gathering and classification of data and the building and testing of various (usually rather wide-ranging) explanations. The former activity overlaps with the PHENOMENOLOGY OF RELIGION, so it is to some extent an arbitrary decision under which head one should include descriptive studies of RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE.

Psychological studies. Notable among investigations by psychologists was The Varieties of Religious Experience (1902), by the American philosopher and psychologist William James (1842–1910), in which he attempted to account for experiences such as conversion through the concept of invasions from the unconscious. Because of the clarity of his style and his philosophical distinction, the work has had a lasting influence, though it is dated in a number of ways and his examples come from a relatively narrow selection of individuals, largely within the sphere of Protestant CHRISTIANITY. This points to a recurring problem in the field—that of relating individual psychology to the institutions and symbols of different cultures and traditions.

More radical, but drawing from a rather larger range of examples, was the American psychologist J.H. Leuba (1868–1946). In A Psychological Study of Religion (1912) he attempted to account for mystical experience psychologically and physiologically, pointing to analogies with certain drug-induced experiences. Leuba argued forcibly for a naturalistic treatment of religion, which he considered to be necessary if religious psychology was to be looked at scientifically. Others, however, have argued that psychology is in principle neutral, neither confirming nor ruling out belief in the transcendent.

Psychoanalytical studies. More influential than James and Leuba and others in that tradition were the psychoanalysts. SIGMUND FREUD gave explanations of the genesis of religion in various of his writings. In Totem and Taboo (1918) he applied the idea of the OEDIPUS complex (involving unresolved sexual feelings of, for example, a son toward his mother and hostility toward his father) and postulated its emergence in the primordial stage of human development. This stage he conceived to be one in which there were small groups, each dominated by a father. According to Freud's reconstruction of primordial society, the father is displaced by a son (probably violently); further attempts to displace the new leader bring about a truce in which incest taboos (proscriptions against intrafamily sexual relations) are formed. The slaying of a suitable animal, symbolic of the deposed and dead father, connected TOTEMISM with taboo. His ideas were also developed in Moses and Monotheism (1939) and The Future of an Illusion (1928).

The Swiss psychoanalyst C.G. Jung (1875–1961) adopted a very different posture, one that was more sympathetic to religion and more concerned with a positive appreciation of religious symbolism. Jung considered the question of the existence of God to be unanswerable by the psychologist and adopted a kind of AGNOSTICISM. Yet he considered the spiritual realm to possess a psychological reality that cannot be explained away. Jung postulated, in addition to the personal unconscious (roughly as in Freud), the collective unconscious, which is the repository of human experience and which contains “archetypes” (i.e., basic images that are universal in that they recur in independent cultures). The irruption of these images from the unconscious into the realm of consciousness he viewed as the basis of religious experience and often of artistic creativity. Religion can thus help people, who stand in need of the mysterious and symbolic, in the process of individuation—of becoming individual selves. Some of Jung's writings have been greatly influential in stimulating the investigations of other interested scholars. Thus, the Eranos circle, a group of scholars meeting around the leadership of Jung, contributed considerably to the history of religions. Associated with this circle of scholars have been MIRCEA ELIADE, the eminent Romanian-French historian of religion, and the Hungarian-Swiss historian of religion Károly Kerényi (1897–1973). This movement has been one of the main factors in the modern revival of interest in the analysis of myth.

Among other psychoanalytic interpreters of religion, the American scholar Erich Fromm (1900–80) modified Freudian theory and produced a more complex account of the functions of religion. Part of the modification is viewing the Oedipus complex as based not so much on sexuality as on the childish desire to remain attached to protecting figures. The right religion, in Fromm's estimation, can, in principle, foster an individual's highest potentialities, but religion in practice tends to relapse into being neurotic.

Other studies. Apart from Jung's work, there have been various attempts to relate psychoanalytic theory to comparative material. Thus, the English anthropologist Meyer Fortes, in his Oedipus and Job in West African Religion (1959), combined elements from Freud and Durkheim; and G.M. Carstairs (a British psychologist), in The Twice-Born (1957), investigated in depth the inhabitants of an Indian town from a psychoanalytic point of view and with special reference to their RELIGIOUS BELIEFS and practices. Among the more systematic attempts to evaluate the evidences of the various theories is Religious Behaviour (1958), by Michael Argyle, another British psychologist.

A certain amount of empirical work in relation to the effects of meditation and mystical experience—and also in relation to drug-induced “higher” states of consciousness—has also been carried on. Investigation of religious responses as correlated with various personality types is another area of enquiry; and developmental psychology of religion, largely under the influence of the French psychologist Jean Piaget (1896–1980), has played a prominent part in educational theory in the teaching of religion.

RELIGION, SOCIOLOGY OF, approach to the STUDY OF RELIGION grounded in the methods and assumptions of sociology. Auguste Comte (1798–1857) is usually considered the founder of modern sociology. His general theory hinged substantially on a particular view of religion, and this view has somewhat influenced the sociology of religion since that time. In his The Positive Philosophy of Auguste Comte (1853) Comte expounded a naturalistic positivism and sketched out the following stages in the evolution of thought. First, there is what he called the theological stage, in which events are explained by reference to supernatural beings; next, there is the metaphysical stage, in which more abstract unseen forces are invoked; finally, in the positivistic stage, humans seek causes in a scientific and practical manner. Among the leading figures in the development of sociological theories were Herbert Spencer (1820–1903), in his work The Principles of Sociology (1876–96), and EMILE DURKHEIM (1858–1917), in his classic work The Elementary Forms of the Religious Life (1915).

A rather separate tradition was created by the German economic theorist Karl Marx (1818–83). A number of Marxists, notably Lenin (1870–1924) and K. Kautsky (1854–1938), have developed social interpretations of religion based on the theory of the class struggle. Whereas sociological functionalists posited the existence in a society of some religion or a substitute for it, the Marxists implied the disappearance of religion in a classless society. Thus, in their view, religion in the human primordial communist condition, at the dawn of the historical dialectic, reflects ignorance of natural causes, which are explained animistically. The formation of classes leads, through alienation, to a projection of the need for liberation from this world into the transcendental or heavenly sphere. Religion, both consciously and unconsciously, thus becomes an instrument of exploitation. Since the theory was a product of a rather early and unsophisticated stage of theorizing about religion, it did not deal particularly well with the role of religion in other cultures—which led to a considerable debate in China on the status of Chinese religion in the light of Marxism, some holding that Marx's critique did not, for example, fit BUDDHISM.

Comparative studies. One of the most influential theoreticians of the sociology of religion was the German scholar MAX WEBER (1864–1920). He observed that there is an apparent connection between PROTESTANTISM and the rise of capitalism, and in The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism (1930) he accounted for the connection in terms of Calvinism's inculcating a this-worldly asceticism—which created a rational discipline and work ethic, together with a drive to accumulate savings that could be used for further investment. Weber noted, however, that such a thesis ought to be tested; and a major contribution of his thinking was his systematic exploration of other cultural traditions from a sociological point of view. He wrote influentially about ISLAM, JUDAISM, and Indian and Chinese religions and, in so doing, elaborated a set of categories, such as types of PROPHECY, the idea of CHARISMA (spiritual power), routinization, and other categories, which became tools to deal with the comparative material; he was thus the real founder of comparative sociology.

Other sociological studies. Coordination between sociology and the history of religions is not usually very close, since the two disciplines operate as separate departments in most universities and often in different faculties. From the sociological end, Weber represents one kind of synthesis; from the history-of-religions end, the writings of the German-American scholar JOACHIM WACH were quite influential. In his book Sociology of Religion (1944) he attempted to exhibit the ways in which the community institutions of religion express certain attitudes and experiences. This view was in accordance with his insistence on the practical and existential side of religion, over against the intellectualist tendency to treat the correlate of the group as being a system of beliefs.

Among the more recent theorists of the sociology of religion is the influential and eclectic American scholar Peter Berger. In The Sacred Canopy (1967; also published as The Social Reality of Religion, 1969) he draws on elements from Marx, Durkheim, Weber, and others, creating a lively theoretical synthesis. One problem is raised by his method, however; despite Berger's sympathy in dealing with religious phenomena, the methodological stance adopted in this book seems to imply a reductionist position—namely, one in which religious beliefs are explained by reference to basically nonreligious sentiments, sociopsychological circumstances, and other factors. Although the study of religion cannot rule out a priori the thesis that religion is a projection—e.g., that it rests upon an illusion—the question arises as to whether or not the methods espoused in the scientific study of religion have already secretly prejudged the issue.

On the whole, modern sociology is largely geared to dealing with Western religious institutions and practices, although there is some notable work that has been done, especially since World War II, in Asian sociology of religion. Emphasis has been placed upon the process of secularization in a number of Western sociological studies (which have had some impact on the formation of modern Christian theology), notably in The Secular City (1965) of the American theologian Harvey Cox. There are indications, however, that the process of secularization does not occur in the same degree or occurs in a different manner in non-Western cultures.

In general, the main question of the sociology of religion concerns the effectiveness with which it can relate to other studies of religion. This question is posed in The Scientific Study of Religion (1970), by the American sociologist J. Milton Yinger. A similar tendency is noted in the synthesis between the history and the sociology of religion in a new-style evolutionism propounded by another American scholar, Robert Bellah.

RELIGIONSGESCHICHTLICHE SCHULE \,re-li-'gyōns-gə-'shikt-li-kə-'shü-lə\ (German: "history of religions"), also called Religionswissenschaft \-'vi-sən-'shäft\ ("science of religion"), comparative, historical method in the STUDY OF RELIGION. The Religionsgeschichtliche Schule developed in German biblical studies during the 19th century and emphasized the degree to which biblical ideas were the product of the cultural milieu. Important in this line of development was ALBERT SCHWEITZER, in whose Quest of the Historical Jesus (1906) the eschatological teachings of Jesus are emphasized, together with the dissimilarity of his thought world from our own. The history of religions is generally understood to be nonnormative—that is, it attempts to delineate facts, whether historical or structural, without judging them from a Christian or other religious standpoint.

The modern history of religions came into its own from about the time of MAX MÜLLER. During the latter part of the 19th century an attempt was made to place the methodology of COMPARATIVE RELIGION and mythology on a systematic basis. During this period, various lectureships and chairs in the subject were instituted in Western Europe and the United States. The first congress of Religionswissenschaft took place in Stockholm in 1897, and a similar one in the history of religions was held at Paris in 1900. Later, the International Association for the History of Religions was formed.

A great amount of the work of scholars in the field has been devoted to exploring particular histories—piecing together, for instance, the history of GNOSTICISM or of early BUDDHISM. In principle, CHRISTIANITY is considered from the same point of view, but much significant work has also been comparative and structural. This can range from the attempt to establish rather particular comparisons, such as RUDOLF OTTO's comparison (in his MYSTICISM East and West) of the medieval German mystic Meister Eckehart and the medieval Hindu philosopher Śankara, to a systematic typology, as in Religion in Essence and Manifestation by Gerardus van der Leeuw.

There have been many significant scholars in the history and PHENOMENOLOGY OF RELIGION since Müller. In the 20th century, Rudolf Otto (1869–1937) made a profound impression on the scholarly world with the publication of The Idea of the Holy (in its German edition of 1917), which delineated a central experience and sentiment and elucidated the concept of the Holy. The German-American historian of religions JOACHIM WACH (1898–1955) established Religionswissenschaft at the University of Chicago and was thus the founder of the modern "Chicago school." Wach was concerned with emphasizing three aspects of religion—the theoretical (or mental; i.e., religious ideas and images), the practical (or behavioral), and the institutional (or social); and because of his concern for the study of RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE, he interested himself in the SOCIOLOGY OF RELIGION, attempting to indicate how religious values shaped the institutions that expressed them.

MIRCEA ELIADE (1907–1986), a Romanian scholar who immigrated to the United States after World War II, had a wide influence, partly because of his substantive studies on YOGA and on shamanism and partly because of his later writings, which attempt to synthesize data from a wide variety of cultures. The synthesis incorporates a theory of myth and history. Two important elements in the theory of Eliade are, first, that the distinction between the sacred and the profane is fundamental to religious thinking and is to be interpreted existentially (the symbols of religion are, typically, profane in literal interpretation but are of cosmic significance when viewed as signs of the sacred); and, second, that archaic religion is to be contrasted with the linear, historical view of the world. The latter essentially comes from biblical religion; the former viewpoint tends to treat time cyclically and mythically—referring to foundational events, such as the creation, the beginning of the human race, and the Fall of man, on to illud tempus (the sacred primordial time), which is reenacted in the repetitions of the ritual and in the retelling of the myth.

Since the days of Wach and Eliade, the history of religions has been identified primarily with the University of Chicago. Scholars who are associated with the "Chicago school" have included Joseph Kitagawa, Jonathan Z. Smith, Charles Long, Wendy Doniger, Frank Reynolds, and Lawrence Sullivan.

RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE

to define religious experience have included such concepts as wonder at the infinity of the cosmos, the sense of awe and mystery in the presence of the holy, feelings of dependence on a divine power or an unseen order, the sense of guilt and anxiety accompanying belief in a divine judgment, and the feeling of peace that follows faith in divine forgiveness. Some thinkers also argue that the purpose of life and the destiny of the individual have a religious aspect.

Religious experience has been variously identified in the following ways: the awareness of the holy, which evokes awe and reverence; the feeling of absolute dependence that reveals man's status as a creature; the sense of being at one with the divine; the perception of an unseen order or of a quality of permanent rightness in the cosmic scheme; the direct perception of God; the encounter with a reality "wholly other"; the sense of a transforming power as a presence. Sometimes, as in the striking case of the OLD TESTAMENT prophets, the experience of God has been seen as a critical judgment on man and as the disclosure of his separation from the holy. Those who identify religion as a dimension or aspect of experience point to man's attitude toward an overarching ideal, to a total reaction to life, to an ultimate concern for the meaning of one's being, or to a quest for a power that integrates human personality. In all these cases, it is the fact that the attitudes and concerns in question are directed to an ultimate object beyond man that justifies their being called religious. All interpreters are agreed that religious experience involves what is final in value for man and concerns belief in what is ultimate in reality.

"Religious experience" was not widely used as a technical term in the academic STUDY OF RELIGION prior to the publication of The Varieties of Religious Experience (1902) by William James, an American psychologist and philosopher, but the interpretation of religious concepts and doctrines in terms of individual experience reaches back at least to the 16th-century Spanish mystics and to the age of the Protestant Reformers. A special emphasis on the importance of experience in religion is found in the works of such thinkers as JONATHAN EDWARDS, FRIEDRICH SCHLEIERMACHER, and RUDOLF OTTO. Basic to the experiential approach is the belief that it allows for a firsthand understanding of religion as an actual force in human life, in contrast with religion taken either as church membership or as belief in authoritative doctrines. The attempt to interpret such concepts as God, faith, conversion, sin, salvation, and worship through personal experience and its expressions opened up a wealth of material for the investigation of religion by psychologists, historians, anthropologists, and sociologists as well as the more traditional examination by theologians and philosophers. A focus on religious experience is especially important for phenomenologists (who seek the basic structures of human consciousness) and existentialist philosophers.

Proponents of MYSTICISM, such as Rudolf Otto, Rufus Jones, and W.T. Stace, have maintained the validity of immediate experience of the divine, and theologians such as Emil Brunner have stressed the self-authenticating character of man's encounter with God, while naturalistically oriented psychologists, such as Freud and J.H. Leuba, have rejected such claims, explaining religion in psychological and genetic terms as a projection of human wishes and desires. Philosophers such as William James, Josiah Royce, William E. Hocking, and Wilbur M. Urban have represented an idealist tradition in interpreting religion, stressing the concepts of purpose, value, and meaning as essential for understanding the nature of God. Naturalist philosophers, of whom John Dewey was typical, have focused on the "religious" as a quality of experience and an attitude toward life that is more expressive of the human spirit than of any supernatural reality. Theologians Douglas Clyde Macintosh and Henry N. Wieman sought to build an "empirical theology" on the basis of religious experience understood as involving a direct perception of God. Unlike Macintosh, Wieman held that such a perception is sensory in character. Personalist philosophers, such as Edgar S. Brightman and Peter Bertocci, have regarded the person as the basic category for understanding all experience and have interpreted religious experience as the medium through which God is apprehended as the cosmic person. Existential thinkers, such as SØREN KIERKEGAARD, Gabriel Marcel, and PAUL TILLICH, have seen God manifested in experience in the form of a power that overcomes estrangement and enables man to fulfill himself as an integrated personality. Process philosophers, such as Alfred North Whitehead and Charles Hartshorne, have held that the idea of God emerges in religious experience but that the nature and reality of God are problems calling for logical argument and metaphysical interpretation, in which emphasis falls on the relation between God and the world being realized in a temporal process. Logical empiricists, of whom A.J. Ayer is typical, have held that religious and theological expressions are without literal significance because there is no way in which they can be either justified or falsified (refuted). On this view, religious experience is entirely emotive, lacking all cognitive value. Analytic philosophers, following the lead of Ludwig Wittgenstein, approach religious experience through the structure of RELIGIOUS LANGUAGE, attempting to discover exactly how this language functions within the community of believers who use it.

A number of controversial issues have emerged from these studies, involving not only different conceptions of the nature and structure of religious experience but also different views of the manner in which it is to be evaluated and the sort of evaluation possible from the standpoint of a given discipline. Four such issues are basic: (1) whether religious experience points to special experiences of the divine or whether any experience may be regarded as religious by virtue of becoming related to the divine; (2) the kinds of criteria that can serve to distinguish religion or the religious from both secular life and other forms of spirituality, such as morality and art; (3) whether religious experience can be understood and properly evaluated in terms of its origins and its psychological or sociological conditions or is sui generis, calling for interpretation in its own terms; and (4) whether religious experience has cognitive status, involving encounter with a being, beings, or a power transcending human consciousness, or is merely subjective and composed entirely of ideas that have no reference beyond themselves. The last issue, transposed in accordance with either a positivist outlook or some types of EMPIRICISM, which restrict reality to the realm of sense experience, would be resolved by the claim that the problem cannot be meaningfully discussed, since key terms, such as "God" and "power," are strictly meaningless.

Cutting across all theories of experience is the basic fact that experience demands expression in language and symbolic forms. To know what has been experienced and how it is to be understood requires the ability to identify things, persons, and events through naming, describing, and interpreting, which involve appropriate concepts and language. No experience can be the subject of analysis while it is being undergone; communication and critical inquiry require experiences to be cast into symbolic form that preserves them for further scrutiny. The uses of language—political, scientific, moral, religious, aesthetic, and others—represent many purposes through which experience is described and interpreted.

RELIGIOUS SCIENCE, movement founded in the United States by Ernest Holmes (1887–1960). Holmes and his brother Fenwicke were drawn to NEW THOUGHT teachings and to a belief in the power of the mind for healing and fulfillment of life. In 1926 Holmes's major work, The Science of Mind, was published, and the following year he established the Institute of Religious Science and Philosophy in Los Angeles, Calif., to teach his principles. Some of the graduates established churches based on Holmes's teachings, and in 1949 he reluctantly agreed to the establishment of a Religious Science denomination. There are now two branches: the United Church of Religious Science and the smaller Religious Science International, which prefers a less centralized polity. The two organizations have identical doctrines. The United Church publishes the magazine Science of Mind.

Like the New Thought tradition, Religious Science is basically monistic. The individual human mind is an expression of the Universal Mind, and the universe is its material manifestation. Man and nature are, therefore, like the God who is their true being, considered to be fundamentally good, and apparent evil stems from ignorance of the highest identity. The mind, working with creative faith and knowledge of its identity with the infinite, draws on infinite resources in what is called "affirmative prayer." When directed to a particular end, such as healing of mind or body, this employment of mind is called "spiritual mind treatment" and its results a "demonstration." Religious Science trains both ministers and practitioners, who are qualified to give spiritual mind treatments. Services are generally similar in format to those of mainstream Protestant churches, but they are conducted with an especially affirmative, optimistic tone.

REMONSTRANT, any of the Dutch Protestants who, following the views of JACOBUS ARMINIUS, presented to the States General in 1610 a "remonstrance" setting forth their points of divergence from stricter CALVINISM. The Remonstrants were expelled from the Netherlands by the Protestant SYNOD OF DORT (1618–19) but were officially recognized in 1798. The movement is still strong, and its liberal school of theology has been a powerful influence both on the Dutch state church and on other Christian denominations.

RENUKETET \,re-ne-'nü-tet\, also called Rannut, Greek name Thermuthis, in EGYPTIAN RELIGION, goddess of fertility and of the harvest, sometimes depicted in the form of a snake. In addition to her other functions, she was also counted as the protector of the king.

RENNYO \ren-nyō, Angl 'ren-yō\, posthumous name Kenju Daishi, assumed name Shinshō-in (b. April 4, 1415, Kyōto, Japan—d. May 5, 1499, Kyōto), important figure in the development of the Japanese True Pure Land (Jōdo Shinshū) sect of BUDDHISM, which was founded in the mid-13th century by SHINRAN.

Rennyō was the eighth patriarch of the Hongan Temple in Kyōto, where his success at proselytizing provoked warrior-monks from the competing Tendai (see T'ŪEN-T'AI) sect to destroy the original temple. Rennyō's success continued, however, and he proved to be a superb leader and organizer. His writings (including a compilation of the poems and hymns of Shinran, as well as many of his own pastoral letters and sayings) have become an integral component in the subsequent True Pure Land tradition. Before his death he was able to return to the Kyōto area to oversee the building of the magnificent new Hongan Temple, which has remained a major center of True Pure Land activity. See also PURE LAND BUDDHISM.

REORGANIZED CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER DAY SAINTS, now called Community of Christ, church that claims to be the legal continuation of the church founded by JOSEPH SMITH at Fayette in Seneca County, N.Y., in 1830. It is headquartered in Independence, Mo. In the early 21st century its membership numbered more than 250,000, with congregations in more than 50 countries. The church does not accept the appellation MORMON because of the association with polygamy.

After Joseph Smith's death in 1844, the church that he founded broke into factions. Rejecting the leadership of BRIGHAM YOUNG, who led the majority group to Utah, a number of members, who held that the son of the founder had been designated his successor, reorganized under the original name, the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, at Beloit, Wis., in 1852. The word Reorganized was added to the title in 1869. Joseph Smith III accepted the leadership of this body in 1860 and was elected president. He was succeeded by his sons, and all later successors were descendants of the founder until the seventh president, W. Grant McMurray, assumed the post in 1996. In 2001 the church changed its name to Community of Christ.

The Community of Christ rejects the practice of polygamy and denies that it was taught by Joseph Smith. It claims that polygamy was introduced by Brigham Young and his associates and that the revelation on polygamy, made public in 1852 by Young in Utah and attributed to Smith, was not in harmony with the original tenets of the church or with the teachings and practices of Smith.

The church's system of belief is based on the teachings of the BIBLE, the BOOK OF MORMON, and the Doctrine and Covenants, a book of revelations received by the prophets of the Latter Day Saints and accepted by the vote of the general conference. The Community of Christ believes in the TRINITY; the doctrines of faith in God, repentance of SIN, BAPTISM by immersion, laying on of hands, and RESURRECTION of the dead; graded reward or punishment after death according to conduct in this life; the continuity of divine revelation and the open canon of scripture; the restoration of Christ's church on the NEW TESTAMENT pattern; and the doctrine of stewardship in personal and economic life. It anticipates the return of Christ and a millennial reign (see MILLENNIUM).

Local congregations are grouped for administrative purposes into two types of area organization: district and stake. The district organization ties the individual congregations of an area into a fellowship presided over by officers elected at district conferences. The stake organization consists of a number of congregations administered by a central authority: the stake presidency, stake bishopric, and stake high council. The business of the stake is conducted in conferences at which all members of the stake are permitted to vote.

The World Conference, which meets biennially in Independence, is the supreme legislative body of the church, and all general administrative officers, including those of the first presidency, must receive its endorsement.

The church conducts Graceland College in Lamoni, Iowa, and Park College in Kansas City, Mo. Temple School, a ministerial and leadership seminary, is in Independence.

RESHEPH \ˈre-shef, ˈrē-\ (akin to Hebrew reshaf, "The Burner," or "The Ravager"), ancient West Semitic (Syrian) god of war, the plague, and the Underworld, the companion of ANATH.

Resheph was represented as a bearded man, brandishing an ax, holding a shield, and wearing a tall, pointed headdress with a goat's or gazelle's head on his forehead. Resheph was worshiped especially at Ras Shamra, Byblos, and Arsūf (later Apollonia, near modern Tel Aviv–Yafo). Under the title Mikal (or Mekal), he was also worshiped at Beth-shean in eastern Palestine and at Ialium in Cyprus. Resheph's associations also seem to have included well-being, plenty, and fertility.

RESPONSA \ri-'spän-sə\, Hebrew she'elot u-teshubot ("questions and answers"), replies made by rabbinic scholars in answer to submitted questions about Jewish law, written since the 6th century after final redaction of the TALMUD. Published responsa range in length from a few words to lengthy monographs and compendia and number from 250,000 to 500,000. The responsa frequently deal with such practical questions as rulings on which activities may or may not be done on the SABBATH.

RESURRECTION, rising from the dead of a divine or human being who still retains his own personhood, or individuality, though the body may or may not be changed. The belief in the resurrection of the body is usually associated with CHRISTIANITY, because of the doctrine of the Resurrection of Christ, but it also is associated with later JUDAISM, which provided basic ideas that were expanded in Christianity and ISLAM.

The expectation of the resurrection of the dead is found in several OLD TESTAMENT works. In the Book of Ezekiel, there is an anticipation that the righteous Israelites will rise from the dead. The Book of Daniel further developed the hope of resurrection with both the righteous and unrighteous Israelites being raised from the dead, after which will occur a judgment, with the righteous participating in an eternal messianic kingdom and the unrighteous being excluded from that kingdom. In some intertestamental literature, such as The Syriac Apocalypse of Baruch, there is an expectation of a universal resurrection at the advent of the MESSIAH.

The Resurrection of Christ, a central doctrine of Christianity, is based on the belief that JESUS CHRIST was raised from the dead on the third day after his CRUCIFIXION and that through his conquering of death all believers will subsequently share in his victory over "sin, death, and the Devil." The celebration of this event, called EASTER, or the Festival of the Resurrection, is the major feast day of the church.

Islam also teaches a doctrine of the resurrection. First, at Doomsday, all humans will die and then be raised from the dead. Second, each person will be judged according to the record of his life that is kept in two books, one listing the good deeds, the other the evil deeds. After the Judgment the unbelievers will be placed in hell and the faithful Muslims will go to paradise, a place of happiness and bliss.

ZOROASTRIANISM holds a belief in a final overthrow of evil, a general resurrection, a LAST JUDGMENT, and the restoration of a cleansed world to the righteous.

REUBENI, DAVID

After the EXODUS out of Egypt, the tribe of Reuben apparently settled east of the Dead Sea (Joshua 13:8–23). The 10 northern tribes formed the Kingdom of Israel under Jeroboam I that in 721 BCE fell to Assyrian conquerors (2 Kings 18:9–12). In time these tribes were assimilated to other peoples, and thus the tribe of Reuben became known as one of the legendary TEN LOST TRIBES OF ISRAEL.

REUBENI, DAVID \rū-'bā-nē\ (d. after 1532), Jewish adventurer whose grandiose plans inspired the messianic visions of the martyr SOLOMON MOLCHO (d. 1532). Reubeni claimed to be a prince descended from the tribe of REUBEN (hence his name) of a Jewish state in Arabia. He gained the favor and protection of Pope Clement VII and King John III of Portugal with his plan to lead a Jewish army against the Turks in Palestine. Eventually losing his royal support in Portugal, Reubeni and Molcho were brought before the Inquisition. Molcho was burned at the stake and Reubeni died in a Spanish prison. It is believed that he was poisoned.

REVELATION, transmission of knowledge from a god or the gods to humans. Revelation in this sense is an essential aspect of all religions, although the specific forms it takes in particular traditions vary widely. In the three great religions of the West—JUDAISM, CHRISTIANITY, and ISLAM—revelation is the basic category of religious knowledge. Man knows God and his will because God has freely revealed himself—his qualities, purpose, or instructions.

The forms of revelation can generally be portrayed as lying somewhere along a spectrum between two contrasting types. On the one hand, in religious traditions that posit a high degree of conformity between temporal and transcendent reality, the cosmos itself is viewed as the primary medium through which the transcendent is disclosed. In religions of this general type, revealed reality is usually conceived of as more or less nonpersonal. Revelation in this context may be characterized as “cosmic.” A notable example of this is the inspired poetry of the ancient Indian VEDAS, which portray the natural world as a system of interconnecting powers that ultimately express the single underlying divine power, BRAHMAN. Buddhist enlightenment and many of the forms of “hierophany,” or manifestations of the sacred, that characterize the archaic religions described by the religious historian MIRCEA ELIADE also constitute cosmic revelation.

On the other hand, in traditions emphasizing the discontinuity between the profane realm and the sacred, revelation occurs as historical event, signifying the transmission of divine will through a human receiver. Such revelation, in which the divine is perceived as a personal entity, is generally termed “prophetic.” Oracular pronouncements and the teachings of ZOROASTER and MUHAMMAD are examples of this prophetic revelation. This type of revelation is found in Judaism, Christianity, and Islam, as well.

The Israelite faith looked back to the Pentateuch (the first five books of the OLD TESTA-MENT) for its fundamental revelation of God. God was believed to have revealed himself to the PATRIARCHS and prophets by various means not unlike those known to the primitive religions—theophanies (visible manifestations of the divine), dreams, visions, auditions, and ecstasies—and also, more significantly, by his mighty deeds, such as his bringing the Israelites out of Egypt and enabling them to conquer the Holy Land. MOSES and the prophets were viewed as the chosen spokesmen who interpreted God’s will and purposes to the nation. Their inspired words were to be accepted in loving obedience as the Word of God. Thus, all of Judaic and subsequent Christian biblical literature is regarded as, to a greater or lesser extent, revealed.

The NEW TESTAMENT took its basic notions of revelation from the contemporary forms of Judaism (1st century BCE and 1st century CE)—i.e., from both normative RABBINIC JUDAISM and the esoteric doctrines current in Jewish apocalyptic circles in the Hellenistic world. Accepting the Hebrew SCRIPTURES as preparatory revelation, Christianity maintains that revelation is brought to its unsurpassable climax in the person of JESUS CHRIST, who is God’s own Son (Hebrews 1:1–2), his eternal Word (John 1:1), and the perfect image of the Father (Colossians 1:15). The Christian revelation is viewed as occurring primarily in the life, teaching, death, and RESURRECTION of Jesus, all interpreted by the apostolic witnesses under the illumination of the HOLY SPIRIT. Commissioned by Jesus and empowered by the divine spirit at PENTECOST, the Apostles, as the primary heralds, hold a position in Christianity analogous to that of the prophets in ancient Israel.

Christianity has traditionally viewed God's revelation as being complete in Jesus Christ, or at least in the lifetime of the Apostles. Further development is understood to be a deeper penetration of what was already revealed, in some sense, in the 1st century. Periodically, in the course of Christian history, there have been sectarian movements that have attributed binding force to new revelations occurring in the community, such as the 2nd-century Montanists (a heretical group that believed they were of the Age of the Holy Spirit), the 16th-century ANABAPTISTS (radical Protestant sects), and the 17th-century Quakers (see SOCIETY OF FRIENDS). In the 19th century the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (popularly known as MORMONS) recognized, alongside the BIBLE, additional canonical scriptures (notably, the BOOK OF MORMON) containing revelations made to the founder, JOSEPH SMITH.

Islam, the third great prophetic religion of the West, has its basis in revelations received by Muhammad (c. 7th century CE). These were collected shortly after his death into the QUR'AN, which is regarded by Muslims as the final, perfect revelation—a human copy of the eternal book, dictated to the Prophet. While Islam accords prophetic status to Moses and Jesus, it looks upon the Qur'an as a correction and completion of all that went before. More than either Judaism or Christianity, Islam is a religion of the Book. Revelation is understood to be a declaration of God's will rather than his personal self-disclosure.

Such a typology is useful for indicating the degree of diversity to be found among world religions, but it can also lead to misunderstanding if applied as a norm rather than as a heuristic device. Although the Vedas, for example, were cited above as an example of cosmic revelation, the texts also contain elements of prophetic disclosure, namely a discourse that does not merely describe the cosmos but enjoins transformative action within it. Conversely, the Scriptures of the ancient Hebrews include cosmic elements, as evinced most notably in the so-called wisdom literature.

REVELATION TO JOHN, also called Book of Revelation, or Apocalypse of John, last book of the NEW TESTAMENT. It is the only book of the New Testament classified as apocalyptic literature rather than didactic or historical, indicating thereby its extensive use of visions, symbols, and ALLEGORY, especially in connection with future events. Revelation to John appears to be a collection of separate units composed by unknown authors who lived during the last quarter of the 1st century, though it purports to have been written by JOHN, "the beloved disciple" of JESUS CHRIST, at Patmos, in the Aegean Sea.

The book comprises two main parts, the first of which (chapters 2–3) contains moral admonitions (but no visions or symbolism) in individual letters addressed to the seven Christian churches of Asia Minor. In the second part (chapters 4–22:5), visions, allegories, and symbols (to a great extent unexplained) so pervade the text that exegetes necessarily differ in their interpretations. Many scholars, however, agree that Revelation deals with a contemporary crisis of faith, probably brought on by Roman persecutions.

Christians are consequently exhorted to remain steadfast in their faith and to hold firmly to the hope that God will ultimately be victorious over his (and their) enemies. Because such a view presents current problems in an eschatological context, the message of Revelation also becomes relevant to future generations of Christians who would likewise suffer persecution. The victory of God over SATAN (in this case, the perseverance of Christians in the face of Roman persecution) typifies similar victories over persecution and evil in ages still to come and God's final victory at the end of time.

An understanding of Revelation presupposes familiarity with OLD TESTAMENT language and concepts, especially those taken from the books of Daniel and Ezekiel. References to "a thousand years" (chapter 20) have led some to expect that the final victory over evil will come after the completion of some millennium.

REVEREND, ordinary English prefix of written address to the names of ministers of most CHRISTIAN denominations. In the 15th century it was used as a general term of respectful address, but it has been habitually used as a title prefixed to the names of ordained clergymen since the 17th century. In the Church of England (see ANGLICAN COMMUNION) and in most other denominations in English-speaking countries, prefects apostolic who are not in episcopal orders (e.g., deans, provosts, cathedral canons, rectors of seminaries and colleges, and priors and prioresses) are addressed as "very reverend." Bishops, ABBOTS, abbesses, and vicars-general are addressed as "right reverend," and archbishops "most reverend." See also MONSIGNOR.

REVIVALISM, generally, renewed religious fervor within a CHRISTIAN group, church, or community, but primarily a movement in some PROTESTANT churches to revitalize the spiritual ardor of their members and win new adherents. Revivalism in its modern form can be attributed to a shared emphasis within ANABAPTISM, PURITANISM, GERMAN PIETISM, and METHODISM during the 16th, 17th, and 18th centuries on personal RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE, the priesthood of all believers, and holy living, in protest against ESTABLISHED CHURCH systems that seemed excessively sacramental, priestly, and worldly.

In England, the Puritans protested against the sacramentalism and ritualism of the Church of England (see ANGLICAN COMMUNION) in the 17th century, and many migrated to America, where they continued their fervor for experiential religion and devout living. The Puritan fervor waned toward the end of the 17th century, but the GREAT AWAKENING (c. 1720–50), America's first great revival, under the leadership of JONATHAN EDWARDS, George Whitefield, and others, revitalized religion in the North American colonies. The Great Awakening was a part of a larger religious revival that was also influential in Europe and Great Britain. In Germany and Scandinavia, LUTHERANISM was revitalized by the movement known as Pietism. The British revival led by JOHN WESLEY and others eventually resulted in the Methodist church.

Toward the end of the 18th century another revival, known as the Second Great Awakening (c. 1795–1835), began in the United States. The Second Great Awakening produced a great increase in church membership, made soul winning the primary function of the ministry, and stimulated several moral and philanthropic reforms, including temperance, the emancipation of women, and the establishment of foreign MISSIONS.

After 1835 professional revivalists traveled through the towns and cities of the United States and Great Britain, organizing annual revival meetings at the invitation of local pastors who wanted to reinvigorate their churches. In 1857–58 a “prayer meeting revival” swept American cities following a financial panic. It indirectly instigated a revival in Ulster and England in 1859–61.

The preaching tour of the American lay evangelist Dwight L. Moody through the British Isles in 1873–75 marked the beginning of a new surge of Anglo-U.S. revivalism. The interdenominationally supported revivalism of Moody and his imitators in 1875–1915 constituted, in part, a conscious cooperative effort by the Protestant churches to alleviate the unrest of urban industrial society by evangelizing the masses. It was also, in part, an unconscious effort to counter the challenge to Protestant orthodoxy brought on by the new critical methods of studying the BIBLE and by scientific ideas concerning the evolution of the human species. After an initial decline at the outset of the 20th century, a renewed interest in mass evangelism appeared in America to greet the revival “crusades” of the Southern BAPTIST evangelist BILLY GRAHAM and various regional revivalists.

RG VEDA \rɪg-ˈvā-də\, also spelled Rig Veda, collection of hymns that forms the oldest part of the Vedas of ancient India and their central core. See VEDA.

RHEA \ˈrē-ə\, in GREEK RELIGION, ancient goddess who was worshiped sporadically throughout the Greek world. She was associated with fruitfulness and had affinities with GAEA (Earth). A daughter of OURANUS (Heaven) and Gaea, she married her brother CRONUS, who, having been warned that one of his children would be fated to overthrow him, swallowed his children HESTIA, DEMETER, HERA, HADES, and POSEIDON soon after they were born. Rhea concealed the birth of ZEUS in a cave on Mount Dicte in Crete and gave Cronus a stone wrapped in swaddling clothes. This he swallowed in the belief that it was Zeus. Subsequently, Cronus was vanquished by Zeus and was forced to disgorge the swallowed children.

RHIANNON \hrē-ˈä-nōn\, in CELTIC RELIGION, Welsh horse goddess. She is best known from the MABINOGION, a collection of medieval Welsh tales, in which she appears on horseback and meets King PWYLL, whom she marries. Later she was unjustly accused of killing her infant son, and in punishment she was forced to act as a horse and to carry visitors to the royal court. According to another story, she was made to wear the collars of asses about her neck in the manner of a beast.

RICCI, MATTEO \ˈrēt-chē\, Chinese (Wade-Giles romanization) Li Ma-tou \ˈlĕ-ˈmä-ˈdō\, (Pinyin) Li Madou (b. Oct. 6, 1552, Macerata, Papal States—d. May 11, 1610, China), Italian JESUIT missionary who introduced CHRISTIAN teaching to the Chinese Empire in the 16th century. By adopting the language and culture of the country, he gained entrance to the interior of China, which was normally closed to foreigners.

Early life and education. Ricci was from a noble family in Macerata, in central Italy, and, after preliminary studies at home, he entered the school that the Jesuit priests opened there in 1561. After completing his classical studies, he set out at the age of 16 for Rome to study law. There he was attracted to the life of the Jesuits, and on Aug. 15, 1571, he requested permission to join the order.

Approved by the pope in 1540, the Society of Jesus (Jesuits) was already well known for its spirit of apostolic initiative. Its members were distinguishing themselves in scientific research as well as in their voyages to Asia, Africa, and the New World. Stimulated by the examples of his seniors, Ricci dedicated himself to efforts in both fields. Shortly after beginning his study of science under the noted mathematician Christopher Clavius, Ricci volunteered for mission work overseas in the Far East. In May 1577 he left Italy and set off for Portugal, and in the following year he arrived at Goa, the Portuguese outpost on the central west coast of India. Ricci carried on his studies for the PRIESTHOOD and was ordained in 1580 at Cochin, on the Malabar Coast in southwestern India. In April 1582 Ricci was ordered to proceed to China.

With its huge population, China was an area that Christian missionaries, especially the Jesuits, greatly wished to enter. When Ricci arrived, China was still closed to outsiders; but the missionary strategy of the Jesuits had undergone modification and great stress was put on the importance of learning the Chinese language and of acquiring knowledge of the culture. (This practice eventually raised the issue of whether rites honoring CONFUCIUS and family ancestors were allowable within the ROMAN CATHOLIC framework; the issue became highly politicized during the 17th–18th century in a conflict known as the CHINESE RITES CONTROVERSY.)

Mission to China. Ricci arrived at Macau, a small peninsula on the east coast of China, in August 1582, and he began at once his study of Chinese. The following year he and another Jesuit, Michele Ruggieri, were given permission to settle in Chao-ch'ing, then the capital of Kwangtung province. Ruggieri published the first Catholic CATECHISM in Chinese, and Ricci produced the first edition of his remarkable map of the world, the "Great Map of Ten Thousand Countries," which showed to the Chinese intelligentsia China's geographic relation to the rest of the world.

In 1589 Ricci moved from Chao-ch'ing to Shao-chou (Shiuhing), where he became a close friend of the Confucian scholar Ch'ü T'ai-su. It was from Ch'ü that Ricci received an introduction into the circles of the mandarins (high civil or military officials of the Chinese Empire) and of the Confucian scholars.

Feeling increasingly at home, Ricci decided to make an attempt to enter the Imperial city of Beijing. His effort in 1595, however, was not successful because a Sino-Japanese conflict in Korea had made all foreigners suspect. He had to return from Beijing to stop first at Nan-ch'ang and then Nanking. He settled at Nanking in February 1599, where he studied astronomy and geography.

Encouraged by the reception he received at Nanking, Ricci made a second attempt to reach Beijing. He entered the city in January 1601, accompanied by his Jesuit colleague, the young Spaniard Diego Pantoja. Although Ricci was not received by the emperor, he was given permission to remain in the capital. From then on, he never left Beijing, and he dedicated the rest of his life to its people, teaching them science and preaching the gospel. His efforts to attract and convert the Chinese intelligentsia brought him into contact with many outstanding personalities, among them Li Chih-tso, Hsü Kuang-ch'i, and Yang T'ing-yün (who became known as the "Three Pillars of the Early Catholic Church" in China and who assisted the missionaries, especially in their literary efforts) and Feng Ying-ching, a scholar and civic official who was imprisoned in Beijing. During his years in Beijing, Ricci wrote several books in Chinese: "The Secure Treatise on God" (1603), "The Twenty-five Words" (1605), "The First Six Books of Euclid" (1607), and "The Ten Paradoxes" (1608).

RICE MOTHER, widely distributed and variegated figure in the MYTHOLOGY of the peoples of Indonesia. There are three main types of Rice Mother, which are found either separately or combined.

The first is that of a goddess from whose body rice was first produced. The second is that of an all-nourishing Mother Rice (Me Posop), who is the guardian of crops and good fortune and whose milk is rice—it is considered to be the substance that makes up the souls of all living things. The third is the last sheaf of harvested rice, which is ritually cut and dressed as a woman. This is believed to contain the concentrated soul-stuff of the field (analogous customs occur in peasant Europe, where the last sheaf is designated Wheat Mother, Barley Mother, and other grain names).

In other traditions a particular rice plant is designated as Mother Rice from the time of planting, and its vitality is believed to influence the growth of all of the other plants in the field.

RIFĀ'ĪYA \,ri-fā-'ē-ə\, fraternity of Sufi mystics, known in the West as howling dervishes, found primarily in Egypt and Syria and in Turkey until outlawed in 1925. Established in the marshlands around Basra, Iraq, by Aḥmad al-

Rifā'ī (d. 1187), the order stressed poverty, abstinence, and self-mortification. It also performed the Sufi ritual prayer (DHIKR) in a distinct manner: to the accompaniment of music, members linked arms to form a circle and threw the upper parts of their bodies back and forth until ECSTASY was achieved. Then the mystics fell on fire or a dangerous object, such as sword or snake, though such extremes probably appeared under Mongol influence during their 13th-century occupation of Iraq and have always been rejected by the majority of Muslim authorities.

The Syrian branch of the order, the Sa'dīya (or Jibāwīya), was given its form by Sa'd al-Dīn al-Jibāwī in Damascus sometime during the 14th century. Among the Sa'dīya, ecstasy was induced by physical motion—whirling around on the right heel—and the SHAYKH, or head of the order, rode on horseback over the prone bodies of the members. The order achieved its greatest popularity in the 15th century, but after that time it was superseded by the QĀDIRIYA. See also SUFISM.

RIGHT-LEFT, SYMBOLISM OF, symbolic opposition found among most religions. ÉMILE DURKHEIM pointed out that the ability to classify is one of our primary social and religious abilities. The right-left opposition seems to be a near-universal category that provides the framework for various complex classifications. It is almost universally the case that the right is sacred, pure and auspicious, while the left is profane, impure and inauspicious. We generally circle sacred objects clockwise, that is from the right side. In the West people greet each other, exchange and make vows with the right hand. Male is usually associated with the right, female with the left; accordingly the image of the Hindu god SHIVA is often half male (right side) and half female (left side).

It might seem natural to think of the right-left opposition (and others of a similar nature) as being caused by natural experiences or perceptions. Robert Hertz, however, in "The Preeminence of the Right Hand" (1907), demonstrates in a convincing way that these sets of oppositions and classification systems are cultural systems and cannot be reduced to simple biology.

RIN-CHEN-BZANG-PO \ˈrin-chen-,sāŋ-bō\ (b. 958—d. 1055), Tibetan Buddhist monk, called the "Great Translator" for his extensive translations of Indian Buddhist texts into Tibetan, thus furthering the development of BUDDHISM in that country. Sent to India in the late 10th century, Rin-chen-bzang-po eventually succeeded in bringing back to Tibet a number of Indian Buddhist monks with whom he then collaborated both in the new translation of Indian Buddhist texts and in the revision of 8th-century translations.

RINGATU \,riŋ-gə-'tū\, oldest Maori prophetic movement in New Zealand. It was founded in 1867 by the Maori guerrilla leader Te Kooti (1830–93) while he was imprisoned on the Chatham Islands. His BIBLE study produced a new religion that included traditional TABOOS and FAITH HEALING. The movement spread following Te Kooti's escape to the mainland in 1868 and his pardon in 1883.

Services are held in tribal meetinghouses on Saturdays and on the 12th day of each month, when a love feast and a communion without bread or wine is celebrated. The memorized liturgy includes thematic medleys of Bible verses, songs, chants, and prayers and ends with members raising their right hands in homage (hence Ringatu, or "Upraised Hand"). Te Kooti is celebrated as a prophet and a martyr, and Ringatu is identified with suffering Israel. The liturgy was first printed in the 1960s as The Book of the Eight Covenants of God and Prayers of the Ringatu Church.

RINZAI \ˈrēn-ˈzī, Angl ˈrin-zi\, Chinese Lin-chi \ˈlĕn-ˈjĕ, ˈlin-\, one of two major Ch'an (ZEN) Buddhist sects that developed in eastern Asia. It stresses the abrupt awakening of transcendental wisdom. Among the methods it practices are shouts (katsu) or blows delivered by the master to the disciple, question-and-answer sessions (mondō), and meditation on paradoxical statements (KOAN), all intended to accelerate a breakthrough of the normal boundaries of consciousness and to awaken insight that transcends logical distinctions.

The sect was founded in China, where it is known as Lin-chi, in the 9th century by I-hsüan, and it was transmitted to Japan in 1191 by the priest EISAI. The celebrated master HAKUIN was a major reformer of Rinzai during the 18th century.

Modern Rinzai is divided into 15 subsects. Among its great temples are the Tenryū and the Myōshin temples in Kyōto and the Kenchō and the Engaku temples in Kamakura.

RISING SUN, in EGYPTIAN RELIGION, AMULET conveying life to its wearer. It was made in the shape of a sun disk rising on the horizon and was the symbol of Harmakhis, the epithet of HORUS as god of the horizon. This amulet, often found with or on the MUMMY, provided the dead person with the assurance of RESURRECTION in the afterlife.

RISSHŌ-KŌSEI-KAI \,rĕ-ˈshō-,kō-ˈsā-kī\ (Japanese: "Society for Establishing Righteousness and Friendly Relations"), lay religious group in Japan based on the teachings of the NICHIREN school of BUDDHISM. The Risshō-Kōsei-kai is an offshoot of the Reiyū-kai, from which it separated in 1938. It was founded by Niwano Nikkyō and Naganuma Myōkō. It emphasizes devotion to the LOTUS SUTRA and the efficacy of chanting its name. Daily services in the Tokyo headquarters of the sect are attended by up to 10,000 people who chant in unison. This service is followed by daily hōza, or group counseling sessions, in which the application of faith to the problems of daily life is stressed.

rites of passage, any of numerous ritual events, existing in all historically known societies, that mark the passage of an individual from one social or religious status to another. Many of the most important and common rites are connected with the biological stages of life—birth, maturity, reproduction, and death; other rites celebrate changes that are wholly cultural, such as initiation into special societies or groups.

The worldwide distribution of passage rites first attracted the attention of the French anthropologist and folklorist Arnold van Gennep, who coined the term rite de passage in 1909. Van Gennep emphasized the structural analogies among such various rites by demonstrating that all are characterized by three phases: separation, transition, and reincorporation. Though van Gennep cautioned that these three categories are not developed to the same extent by all peoples or in every set of ceremonies, he declared them to constitute a universal pattern.

The first phase, separation, entails symbolic behavior that severs the individual from a previously fixed point in the social structure. The old status is erased in preparation for a new one. During the middle phase the ritual subject, or "passenger," stripped of all manifestations of rank or role, enters into a suspended, or liminal, state between past and future identities eluding the usual cultural categories of classification. This phase is frequently likened to death, or to being in the darkness of the womb awaiting a rebirth. Victor Turner first applied the term communitas to describe this middle stage of a passage rite. In the final phase the ritual subject is reincorporated in society in his new social or religious role.

Rites of passage are characteristically rich in symbolism. In the widespread ritual reenactment of death and rebirth, initiates are often ceremonially "killed" to remove them from their former life, treated as infants in the transitional period, and made to mature into their new status. Successful passage of ordeals form a regular feature of the transitional requirements, and doorways are often used to signify entry into the new domain. The new status is usually indicated by some alteration of the body (e.g., CIRCUMCISION, removal of teeth, tattooing and scarification, dressing of the hair, etc.) or by the addition of special clothing and ornaments.

Most scholarly explanations of passage rites view them in terms of sociological function. Social systems require a certain amount of equilibrium in order to function smoothly. Changes in either individuals or groups threaten to disrupt this equilibrium. Thus, the primary sociological function of rites of passage may be to foster the achievement of a new state of equilibrium after such changes, to restore social order and thereby maintain the society as a system of congruent parts. As a dramatization of the individual's entry into the new order, it provides instruction to the individual and allows the community to demonstrate support of its constituents. The equally important psychological function of passage rites has received less scholarly attention. According to some interpretations, these rites serve to bridge critical stages in the life process and, by providing a predictable, communal context for individual experience, to help the individual confront certain uncontrollable aspects of the world he or she inhabits, thereby alleviating the inevitable anxiety that accompanies change.

For one treatment of rites of passage, see FUNCTIONALISM.

RITSCHL, ALBRECHT \ˈri-çəl\ (b. March 25, 1822, Berlin—d. March 20, 1889, Göttingen, Ger.), German Lutheran theologian who synthesized the teaching of the Christian SCRIPTURES and the Protestant REFORMATION with some aspects of modern knowledge. Most of the results of Ritschl's scholarship were presented in his major work, Die christliche Lehre von der Rechtfertigung und Versöhnung, 3 vol. (1870–74; The Christian Doctrine of Justification and Reconciliation), which deals with the historical and biblical materials (vols. 1–2) and with Ritschl's own reconstruction (vol. 3).

The son and grandson of LUTHERAN clergymen, Ritschl was trained in theology and philosophy at the universities of Bonn (1839–41) and Halle (1841–43). After receiving his doctorate in 1843, Ritschl joined the ranks of the Tübingen school, a theological movement involved in reconstructing the origins of CHRISTIANITY and the early history of the church and its theology. Ritschl's youthful biblical conservatism was shaken by the Hegelianism of the Tübingen theologian Ferdinand Christian Baur. In his earliest writings he agreed with Baur that Christianity is a historical development of perfectly logical pattern rather than a dogma revealed once and for all. By the time the second edition of his first significant publication, Die Entstehung der alt-katholischen Kirche ("The Origin of the Old Catholic Church"), appeared in 1857, he had abandoned this position completely. Henceforth, he refused to force the results of historical research into preconceived speculative patterns. Ritschl's was a theology of revelation based on a unity of history with practical moral or value judgments. Influenced heavily by Immanuel Kant, Ritschl viewed religion as the triumph of the spirit (or moral agent) over humanity's natural origins and environment. But he rejected for use in theology what he understood to be the impersonal generalizations of metaphysics and the natural sciences. The mystical and intuitive elements of the religious life were also completely foreign to his activist outlook; the goal of Christian life, he maintained, is work in and for the KINGDOM OF GOD. Against Protestant PIETISM, which emphasized the spiritual piety of the individual, Ritschl argued for the ethical development of man in the context of his community, which for Ritschl took precedence even over the church itself.

Ritschl shared with FRIEDRICH SCHLEIERMACHER the belief that for Christianity God is not known as self-existent; he is known only insofar as he conditions human trust in his self-revelation through Christ. Ritschl rejected such doctrines as ORIGINAL SIN, the miraculous birth of Christ, the TRINITY, and the INCARNATION. His attempt to apply the tenets of Kantian philosophy to Protestant Christianity was typical of an era that had little feeling for the mystery of religion and no dread of a divine judgment. His effort to maintain a theology of divine revelation without the faith in miracles underlying the older dogma was bitterly attacked by both liberal and conservative critics, but his influence on German Protestant theology in the second half of the 19th century was nevertheless immense.

Ritschl taught at the University of Bonn (1846–64) and at Göttingen from 1864 until his death.

RITUAL

Ceremonial

acts prescribed by tradition or by sacerdotal decree are rituals. Just as language is a system of symbols that is based upon arbitrary rules, ritual may be viewed as a system of symbolic acts that is based upon arbitrary rules. In most explanations of ritual behavior, language becomes a necessary factor in the theory concerning the nature of ritual, and the specific form of language that is tied to explanations of ritual is the language of myth. Both myth and ritual remain fundamental to any analysis of religions. Ritual, however, can also be studied as nonverbal communication disclosing its own structure and semantics. A complete analysis of ritual would also include its relation to art, architecture, and the specific objects used in ritual such as specific forms of ritual dress.

TYPES OF RITUAL

Imitative. All rituals are dependent upon some belief system for their complete meaning. A great many rituals are patterned after myths. Such rituals can be typed as imitative rituals in that the ritual repeats the myth or an aspect of the myth. Some of the best examples of this type include rituals of the New Year, which very often repeat the story of creation. Rituals of this imitative type can be seen as a repetition of the creative act of the gods, a return to the beginning.

This type of myth has led to a theory that all rituals repeat myths or basic motifs in myths. A version of this line of thought, often called the MYTH AND RITUAL SCHOOL, is that myth is the thing said over ritual. In other words, myths are the librettos for ritual. The works of such scholars as Jane Harrison and S.H. Hooke are examples of this theory. Some rituals do repeat the story of a myth (e.g., a myth of creation) and this represents an important type of ritual behavior, but the type cannot be universalized as a description of all ritual action.

Positive and negative. Rituals may also be classified as positive or negative. Most positive rituals are concerned with consecrating or renewing an object or an individual, and negative rituals are always in relation to positive ritual behavior. Avoidance is a term that better describes the negative ritual; the Polynesian word tabu (English, TABOO) also has become popular as a descriptive term for this kind of ritual. The word taboo has been applied to those rituals that concern something to be avoided or forbidden. Thus, negative rituals focus on rules of prohibition, which cover an almost infinite variety of rites and behavior. The one characteristic they all share, however, is that breaking the ritual rule results in a dramatic change in the ritual participant, usually bringing him some misfortune.

Variation in this type of ritual can be seen from within a culture as well as cross-culturally. What is prohibited for a subject, for example, may not be prohibited for a king, chief, or SHAMAN. Rituals of avoidance also depend upon the belief system of a community and the ritual status of the individuals in their relation to each other. Contact with the forbidden or transgression of the ritual rule is often offset by a ritual of purification.

Sacrificial. Another type of ritual is classified as sacrificial. One of the best descriptions of the nature and structure of sacrifice is to be found in Sacrifice: Its Nature and Function (1899), by the French sociologists Henri Hubert and MARCEL MAUSS, who differentiated between sacrifice and rituals of oblation, offering, and consecration. They argued that the distinctive feature of sacrificial ritual is to be found in the destruction, either partly or totally, of a victim. The victim need not be human or animal; vegetables, cakes, milk, and the like are also "victims" in this type of ritual. The total or partial destruction of the victim may take place through burning, dismembering or cutting into pieces, eating, or burying.

Hubert and Mauss have provided a very useful structure for dividing this type of ritual into subtypes. Though sacrificial rituals are very complex and diverse throughout the world, nevertheless, they can be divided into two classes: those in which the participant or participants receive the benefit of the sacrificial act and those in which an object is the direct recipient of the action. This division highlights the fact that it is not just individuals who are affected by sacrificial ritual but in many instances objects such as a house, a particular place, an action (such as a hunt or war), a family or community, or spirits or gods that become the intended recipients of the sacrifice. The variety of such rituals is very extensive, but the unity in this type of ritual is maintained in the "victim" that is sacrificed.

Life crisis. Any typology of rituals would not be complete that did not include a number of very important rites that can be found in practically all religious traditions and mark the passage from one domain, stage of life, or vocation into another. Such rituals have often been classified as RITES OF PASSAGE, and the French anthropologist Arnold van Gennep's study Les Rites de Passage (1909; The Rites of Passage) remains the classic book on the subject.

The basic characteristic of the life-crisis ritual is the transition from one mode of life to another. Rites of passage have often been described as rituals that mark a crisis in individual or communal life. They include rituals of birth, puberty (entrance into the full social life of a community), marriage, conception, and death. Many of these rituals mark a separation from an old situation or mode of life, a transition rite celebrating the new situation, and a ritual of incorporation. Rituals of passage do not always manifest these three divisions; many such rites stress only one or two of these characteristics.

One of the dominant motifs of the life-crisis ritual is the emphasis on separation, as either a death or a return to infancy or the womb. Rituals such as BAPTISM in CHRISTIANITY and the complex puberty rituals among North American Indian cultures (see NATIVE AMERICAN RELIGIONS) exemplify this motif of death and rebirth in rites of passage.

Rituals of crisis and passage are often classified as types of initiation. From this point of view (exemplified in the work of MIRCEA ELIADE), rituals, especially initiation rituals, are related both to the history and structure of a particular society and to an experience of the sacred that is both transhistorical and transcendent of a particular social or cultural context. Culture, from this perspective, can be viewed as a series of rituals that transform natural experiences into cultural modes of life. This transformation involves both the transmission of social structures and the disclosure of the sacred and spiritual life of man.

Initiation rituals can be classified in many ways. The patterns emphasized by Eliade all include a separation or symbolic death, followed by a rebirth. They include rites all the way from separation from the mother to the more complex and dramatic rituals of CIRCUMCISION, or deals of suffering, or a descent into hell, all of which are symbolic of a death followed by a rebirth. Rites of withdrawal and quest, as well as rituals characteristic of shamans and religious specialists, are typically initiatory in theme and structure. Some of the most dramatic rituals of this type express a death and return to a new period of gestation and birth and often in terms that are specifically embryological. Finally, there are the actual rituals of physical death itself, a rite of passage and transition into a spiritual or immortal existence.

The various typologies of ritual that can be found in texts on religion and culture exhibit a striking contrast in the uses to which they are put in the interpretation of ritual. In general, this contrast can be described in terms of two positions: the first emphasizes the sociopsychological function of ritual; the second, although not denying the first, asserts the religious value of ritual as a specific expression of a transcendental reality.

FUNCTIONS OF RITUAL

In the study of ritual behavior, the terms SACRED (the transcendent realm) and profane (the realm of time, space, and cause and effect) have remained useful in distinguishing ritual behavior from other types of action. Although there is no consensus on a definition of the sacred and the profane, there is common agreement on the characteristics of these two realms by those who use the terms to describe religions, myth, and ritual.

For the French sociologist ÉMILE DURKHEIM and others who use these terms, ritual is a determined mode of action. According to Durkheim, the reference, or object, of ritual is the belief system of a society, which is constituted by a classification of everything into the two realms of the sacred and the profane. This classification is taken as a universal feature of religion. Belief systems, myths, and the like, are viewed as expressions of the nature of the sacred realm in which ritual becomes the determined conduct of the individual in a society expressing a relation to the sacred and the profane. The sacred is that aspect of a community's beliefs, myths, and sacred objects that is set apart and forbidden. The function of ritual in the community is that of providing the proper rules for action in the realm of the sacred as well as supplying a bridge for passing into the realm of the profane.

Although the distinction between the sacred and profane is taken as a universal concept, there is very nearly an infinite variation on how this dichotomy is represented—not only between various cultures but also within a culture. What is profane for one culture may be sacred to another. This may also be true, however, within a culture. The relative nature of things sacred and the proper ritual conducted in relation to the sacred as well as the profane varies according to the status of the participants. What is set apart, or holy, for a sacred king, priest, or shaman, for example, will differ from the proper ritual behavior of others in the community who are related to them, even though they share the same belief systems. The crucial feature that both sustains these relations and sets their limits is the ritual of initiation.

Three further characteristics are generally used to specify ritual action beyond that of the dichotomy of sacred and profane thought and action. The first characteristic is a feeling or emotion of respect, awe, fascination, or dread in relation to the sacred. The second characteristic of ritual involves its dependence upon a belief system that is usually expressed in the language of myth. The third characteristic is that it is symbolic in relation to its reference. Agreement on these characteristics can be found in most descriptions of the functions of ritual.

The scholarly disputes that have arisen over the functions of ritual center around the exact relation between ritual and belief or the reference of ritual action. There is little agreement, for example, on the priority of ritual or myth. In some cases, the distinction between ritual, myth, and belief systems is so blurred that ritual is taken to include myth or belief.

The function of ritual depends upon its reference. Once again, although there is common agreement about the symbolic nature of ritual, there is little agreement with respect to the reference of ritual as symbolic. Ritual is often described as a symbolic expression of actual social relations, status, or the roles of individuals in a society. Ritual is also described as referring to a transcendent, numinous (spiritual) reality and to the ultimate values of a community.

Whatever the referent, ritual as symbolic behavior presupposes that the action is nonrational. That is to say, the means–end relation of ritual to its referent is not intrinsic or necessary. Such terms as latent, unintended, or symbolic are often used to specify the nonrational function of ritual. The fundamental problem in all of this is that ritual is described from an observer's point of view. Whether the participant in ritual is basically nonrational or rational, as far as his behavior and his belief system are concerned, is largely dependent upon whether he also understands both his behavior and belief to be symbolic of social, psychological, or numinous realities. It is difficult to imagine a Buddhist, a Christian, or an Australian Aborigine agreeing that his ritual action and beliefs are nothing but symbols for social, psychological, or ultimate realities. The idea of the sacred as a transcendent reality may, however, come closest to the participant's own experience. The universal nature of the sacred–profane dichotomy, however, remains a disputed issue.

THE STUDY OF RITUAL

The origin approach. The earliest approach to the study of ritual was an attempt to explain ritual, as well as religion, by means of a theory concerned with historical origin. In most cases, this theory also assumed an evolutionary hypothesis that would explain the development of ritual behavior through history. The basic premise, or law, for this approach is the biological theory that ontogeny (development of an individual organism) recapitulates phylogeny (evolution of a related group of organisms), just as the human embryo recapitulates, at least to an extent, the stages of human evolutionary history in the womb—e.g., the gill stage. tion to explaining the apparently universal scope of ritual depended upon the success in locating the oldest cultures and cults. Scholars believed that if they could discover this origin, they would be able to explain the contemporary rituals of the human species.

There are almost as many solutions as authors in this approach. In the search for an origin of ritual, research turned from the well-known literate cultures to those that appeared to be less complex and preliterate. The use of the terms primitive religion and primitive cultures comes from this approach in seeking an answer to the meaning of ritual, myth, and religion. Various cultures and rituals were singled out, sacrifice of either humans or animals becoming one of the main topics for speculation, though the exact motivation or cause of sacrificial ritual was disputed among the leading authors of the theory. For the British biblical scholar W. Robertson Smith, sacrifice was motivated by the desire for communion between members of a primitive group and their god. The origin of ritual, therefore, was believed to be found in totemic (animal symbolic clan) cults; and TOTEMISM, for many authors, was thus believed to be the earliest stage of religion and ritual. The various stages of ritual development and evolution, however, were never agreed upon. Given this origin hypothesis, rituals of purification, gift giving, piacular (expiatory) rites, and worship were viewed as developments, or secondary stages, of the original sacrificial ritual. The Christian EUCHARIST (Holy Communion), along with contemporary banquets and table etiquette, were explained as late developments or traits that had their origin and meaning in the totemic sacrifice.

The influence of Smith's theory on the origin of ritual can be seen in the works of Durkheim, the British anthropologist Sir JAMES FRAZER, and SIGMUND FREUD, the father of psychoanalysis. Although they were not in complete agreement with Smith, sacrifice and totemism remained primary concerns in their search for the ORIGIN OF RELIGION. For Frazer, the search led to magic, a stage preceding religion. Both Smith and Frazer led Durkheim to seek the origin of ritual and religion in totemism as exemplified in Australia. Durkheim believed that in totemism scholars would find the original form of ritual and the division of experience into the sacred and the profane. Ritual behavior, they held, entails an attitude that is concerned with the sacred; and sacred acts and things, therefore, are nothing more than symbolic representations of society. In his last major work, Moses and Monotheism (1939), Freud also remained convinced that the origin of religion and ritual is to be found in sacrifice.

Among modern scholars, the origin-evolutionary hypothesis of ritual behavior has been rejected as quite inadequate for explaining human behavior because no one can verify any of these bold ideas; they remain creative speculations that cannot be confirmed or denied.

The functional approach. Turning from origin hypotheses, scholars next emphasized empirical data gathered by actual observation and moved toward the position that the nature of ritual is to be defined in terms of its function in a society.

Most functional explanations of ritual attempt to explain ritual behavior in relation to the needs and maintenance of a society. Ritual is thus viewed as an adaptive and adjustive response to the social and physical environment. Many leading authorities on religion and ritual have taken this approach as the most adequate way to explain rituals, including BRONISŁAW MALINOWSKI, A.R. RADCLIFFE-BROWN, E.E. EVANS-PRITCHARD, Clyde Kluckhohn, Talcott Parsons, and Edmund Leach. While FUNCTIONALISM has had some success in describing the role of ritual within its social environment, it has difficulty accounting for ritual's origins.

The history of religions approach. A third approach to the study of ritual is centered on the studies of historians of religion. Historians of religions, such as Gerardus van der Leeuw in The Netherlands, RUDOLF OTTO in Germany, JOACHIM WACH and Eliade in the United States, and E.O. James in England, have traditionally held the view that ritual behavior signifies or expresses the sacred (the realm of transcendent or ultimate reality). This approach, however, has never been represented as an explanation of ritual, and the theory cannot be confirmed unless scholars agree beforehand that such a transcendent reality exists.

RITUAL BATH

RITUAL BATH, ceremony involving the use of water to immerse or anoint a subject's body. Ritual baths may be taken while the subject is dressed or nude, in churches or other buildings, in rivers, streams, or ponds; but often the bath and the locus have mutually reinforcing symbolic meanings, as in the tīrthayātrā, the typical Hindu PILGRIMAGE bath in a holy river or stream. To bring rain, the Zande of Central Africa poured water over a person accused of delaying or preventing rain. The Hebrew MIKVEH sought ritual purification through the use of prescribed amounts and kinds of water, and SHINTŌ followers practiced water ablution—a kind of ritual bath in microcosm—to prepare for visits to shrines. Christian foot-washing, signifying humility, took place in the early church on MAUNDY THURSDAY, to the accompaniment of HYMNS.

Rizalists believe that he is still alive and will return to deliver his followers from poverty and oppression. Rizal has been identified as God, as the second (or Filipino) Christ, and as the god of the pre-Spanish Malay religion. Rizalist cults, such as the Iglesia Sagrada ni Lahi (Holy Church of the Race) and the Banner of the Race Church, synthesize ROMAN CATHOLIC rituals, images, and organization with traditional Filipino elements. They had some 300,000 members in the early 21st century.

He converted to BUDDHISM and had Buddhist lessons carved into stone in the hope that he could provide guidance to the people of his kingdom. The rock edicts are important sources for understanding ancient Indian political and religious history, particularly with regard to the influence of Buddhism on the king and his people.

ROMAN CATHOLICISM, Christian church characterized by its uniform, highly developed doctrinal and organizational structure that traces its history to the APOSTLES of JESUS CHRIST in the 1st century CE. Along with EASTERN ORTHODOXY and PROTESTANTISM, it is one of the three major branches of CHRISTIANITY. In the early 21st century there were more than 1.1 billion Roman Catholics worldwide.

The history of the church in the early period is essentially that of a small sect composed of recruits attracted from the lower classes of the Roman Empire. Its continued existence during these years can be attributed to the relatively tolerant attitude of the imperial authorities and to the influx of converts attracted by the CHARITY and morality of the church's members. The 3rd century witnessed an upsurge in Roman alarm at the spread of the church and the opposition between traditional Roman piety and the apparent misanthropic and unpatriotic atheism of the Christians. Even in this period, various structures of the church were being defined: a scriptural canon emerged; the threefold ministry (bishop, priest, and deacon) established itself and displaced other forms of leadership; and the See of Rome began to exercise care over other churches.

The reign of CONSTANTINE ushered in a new era in the life of the church. The EDICT OF MILAN (313) legalized Christianity, and by the end of the 4th century it was the state religion of the empire. During this period, the hierarchical structure of the church was further elaborated, and the emergence of heretical elements was met with a more exact definition of Christological beliefs. In the centuries following the fall of the Western Empire in 476, the PAPACY allied itself with the Frankish Carolingian dynasty and, with the assistance of an active monastic community, Christianized the barbarian invaders and cemented the ties between a distinctly Roman form of Christianity and western European culture.

The break (1054) with the Eastern churches marked yet another turning point in the history of Roman Catholicism. From the reign of Pope GREGORY VII (1073–85) to the REFORMATION, the papacy claimed authority in both the spiritual and temporal realms. Both secular rulers and scholars challenged the papal position. The prestige and power of the papacy reached a low ebb during the 14th and 15th centuries, when the humiliation of BONIFACE VIII (reigned 1294–1303), the AVIGNON PAPACY (1309–77), and the Western SCHISM (1378–1417) followed one another in quick succession. By the mid-15th century HERESY, CONCILIARISM, and corruption had taken their toll on the church.

During the 16th century a general demand for reform swept through the Christian West as MARTIN LUTHER, JOHN CALVIN, HULDRYCH ZWINGLI, and others attacked the corruption and lack of spiritual vitality in the church. The Reformation destroyed Rome's spiritual hegemony in the West at the same time that it forced the Roman church to undertake a program of internal renewal. The COUNTER-REFORMATION reached its high point at the COUNCIL OF TRENT (1545–63). Trent's decrees, which were to govern church life for four centuries, effected some pastoral reforms but also hardened the church's traditional doctrinal stance. Moreover, in the aftermath of the council, in order to press the church's program of reconquest, the papacy and its newly reorganized and more efficient ROMAN CURIA assumed more and more control over the life and government of the church. The Tridentine church was thus a centralized, authoritarian, and traditional church.

The momentum of the Counter-Reformation was lost when, following the wars of religion, Europe entered a period of religious decline. During the 18th century, the age of reason and revolution, the church faced challenges to its teaching authority and to its very right to exist. During the 19th century the church responded to these threats by assuming a posture of hostility to the modern world and by stressing uniformity of belief and strict obedience to authority. In the century following the FIRST VATICAN COUNCIL (1869–70), the church continued to suffer crises. The Papal States were lost in 1870; the church's tardiness in committing itself to the cause of social justice in industrial relations led large segments of the working classes in Europe to turn away from it; and anticlerical regimes reduced the political power and freedom of the church. In 1962–65, the church convened the SECOND VATICAN COUNCIL in an attempt to modernize its message and its structure.

In subsequent decades the church's attempts to implement the decisions of the council proved divisive; some Catholics criticized the council for going too far and others for not going far enough. Many theologians, clerics, and laypersons were disappointed when Pope PAUL VI (reigned 1963–78) prohibited clerical marriage in Sacerdotalis caelibatus (1967, "Priestly Celibacy") and artificial contraception in Humanae vitae (1968, "Of Human Life").

Pope JOHN PAUL II (reigned 1978–2005) revived the prestige of the church. He actively promoted better ties with other faiths, especially JUDAISM, and preached messages of nonviolence and respect for human rights that contributed to the fall of communism in eastern Europe and the Soviet Union in 1990–91. He remained popular despite controversies over his conservative positions on the ordination of women, clerical celibacy, divorce, contraception, homosexuality, and abortion. During his reign the church was plagued by revelations of widespread sexual abuse committed by priests; the scandal gravely damaged the church's reputation.

Theologically, Roman Catholicism differs from other Christian churches with regard to its understanding of the sources of revelation and the channels of GRACE. Roman Catholicism, together with Eastern Orthodoxy, asserts that both SCRIPTURE and church tradition are revelatory of the basis of Christian belief and church polity; it thus sets the number of SACRAMENTS at seven (BAPTISM, penance, EUCHARIST, marriage, holy orders, CONFIRMATION, and the anointing of the sick). Catholicism's rich sacramental life is supplemented by other devotions, chiefly paraliturgical eucharistic services and devotions to the saints. Liturgical reforms after the Second Vatican Council made the celebration of the Eucharist the central act of worship; in it Catholics believe that the events of the LAST SUPPER and the death of Jesus are repeated and that Christ is present in the communion elements by virtue of TRANSUBSTANTIATION.

ROMAN RELIGION

The term Roman religion is used in this article to describe the religious beliefs and practices of the inhabitants of the Italian peninsula from ancient times until the ascendancy of CHRISTIANITY in the 4th century CE.

The Romans, according to Cicero, excelled all other peoples in the wisdom that made them realize that everything is subordinate to the rule and direction of the gods. Their religion was based on mutual trust (fides) between divine and human, and its object was to secure the cooperation, benevolence, and “peace” of the gods (pax deorum). They believed that this divine help would allow them to master the unknown forces around them that inspired awe and anxiety (religio), and thus they would be able to live successfully. Consequently, they developed a body of rules, the jus divinum (“divine law”), ordaining what had to be done or avoided. Roman religion is singularly free of mythology (apart from what they borrowed from Greece) or CREED. Instead, Roman religion laid almost exclusive emphasis on cult acts, endowing them with all the sanctity of patriotic tradition.

EARLY ROMAN RELIGION

Early in the 1st millennium BCE, two villages at Rome were founded by Latin and Sabine shepherds and farmers from the Alban Hills and the Sabine Hills. About 620 the two communities merged. It appears that these early Romans, like many other Italians, sometimes saw divine force operating in pure function and act, such as in human activities like opening doors or giving birth to children, and in nonhuman phenomena such as the movements of the sun and seasons of the soil. They multiplied functional deities of this kind to an extraordinary degree, so that countless powers or forces were identified with one phase of life or another. Their functions were sharply defined, and in approaching them it was important to use their right names and titles. If the names and titles were unknown, it was often best to cover every contingency by admitting that the deity was “unknown” or adding the precautionary phrase, “or whatever name you want to be called” or “if it be a god or goddess.”

Veneration of objects. The same sort of anxious awe was extended to certain objects that inspired a belief that they were in some way more than natural:

springs and woods, for instance, or stones that were believed to be of uncanny origin, or products of human action such as burial places and boundary stones. To describe the powers in these objects and functions that inspired the horror, or sacred thrill, the Romans eventually employed the word numen, suggestive of a god's nod, nutus; though so far there is no evidence that this usage was earlier than the 2nd century BCE. The Romans believed that such forces had to be propitiated and made allies, which necessitated sacrifice. The sacrifice would activate, revitalize, and nourish the divinity, whose force might otherwise run down. And so the sacrifice was accomplished by the phrase macte esto ("be you increased!"). Prayer was a normal accompaniment of sacrifice, and it contained varying ingredients of flattery, cajolery, justification, and sometimes attempts at coercion.

The earliest divinities. The early Roman, like other Italians, also worshiped certain more universal gods. Chief among them was the god JUPITER. The Romans gave Jupiter his own priest (FLAMEN), and the fact that there were two other senior flamines, devoted to MARS and QUIRINUS, indicates that the cults of these three divinities were of very early date. Mars, whose name may or may not be Indo-European, was an important god of many Italian peoples, protecting them in war and defending their agriculture and animals against disease. Later, he was identified with the Greek god of war, ARES, and also was regarded as the father of ROMULUS AND REMUS. Mars Gradivus presided over the beginning of a war and Mars Quirinus over its end, but early Quirinus had apparently, as a separate deity, been the patron of a Quirinal village; subsequently he was believed to be the god that Romulus became when he ascended into heaven.

Two other ancient gods were JANUS and VESTA, the powers of the door and the hearth, respectively. Janus was worshiped beside the Forum in a small shrine with double doors at either end and originated either from a divine power that regulated the passage over running water or, perhaps, from sacred doorways. The gates of Janus' temple were formally closed when the state was at peace, a custom going back to the early martial ritual that required armies to march out to battle by this properly sanctified route. Vesta's circular temple recalled, perhaps, a primitive hut, and her shrine contained the eternal fire; its correspondence with the Indian garhapatya, "house-father's fire," suggests an origin prior to the time of the differentiation of the Indo-European-speaking peoples. The cult of Vesta, tended by her Virgins (see VESTAL VIRGIN) and honored by an annual festival, continued to flourish until the end of antiquity, endowed with an important role in the divine protectorship of Rome.

The Di Manes, collective powers of the dead, may mean "the good people," an anxious euphemism intended to mollify dangerous powers. As a member of the family or clan, however, the deceased would be one of the Di Parentes; reverence for ancestors was the core of Roman religious and social life. Di Indigetes was a name given collectively to these forebears, as well as to other deified powers or spirits who controlled the destiny of Rome.

The Lares originally may have been regarded as divine ancestors, but in historical times they presided over the farmland. They were worshiped wherever properties adjoined, and inside every home their statuettes were placed in the domestic shrine (lararium). Under state control they moved from boundaries of properties to crossroads and were worshiped as the guardian spirits of the whole community (Lares Praestites).

The Di Penates (see PENATES), the powers that ensured that there was enough to eat, were worshiped in every home. Like the Lares, they also came to be regarded as national protectors, the Penates Publici.

Two other deities traditionally regarded as dating to the royal period were DIANA and Fors FORTUNA. Diana, an Italian wood goddess prayed to by women who wanted children, came to be identified with the Greek ARTEMIS. Her temple on the Aventine Hill (c. 540 BCE) with its statue, an imitation of a Greek model from Massilia (Marseille), was based on the Temple of Artemis of Ephesus. Fors Fortuna's temple, across the Tiber River from the city, was one of the few that slaves could attend. Originally a farming deity, she came to represent luck and was identified with Tyche, the patroness of cities and goddess of fortune among the Hellenistic Greeks.

Tradition states that there were two Etruscan KINGS OF ROME, Tarquinius Priscus and Tarquinius Superbus. The Etruscan kings began and perhaps finished the most important Roman temple, devoted to the cult of the Capitoline Triad, Jupiter, JUNO, and MINERVA. Such triads, housed in temples with three chambers (cellae), were an Etruscan institution. But the grouping of these three Roman deities seems to depend on Greek mythology, since HERA and ATHENA, with whom Juno and Minerva were identified, were respectively the wife and daughter of ZEUS (Jupiter). In Italy, Juno (Uni in Etruscan) was sometimes the warlike goddess of a town (e.g., Lanuvium [Lanuvio] in Latium), but her chief function was to supervise the life of women, and particularly their sexual life. Minerva concerned herself with craftsmen. Two gods with Etruscan names, both worshiped at open altars before they had temples in Rome, were VULCAN and SATURN, the former a fire god identified with the Greek HEPHAESTUS, and the latter an agricultural god identified with CRONUS, the father of Zeus. Saturn was worshiped in Greek fashion, with head uncovered.

The focal point of the cult of Hercules was the Great Altar (Ara Maxima) in the cattle market, just inside the boundaries of the original Palatine settlement. The altar may be traced to a shrine of Melkart established by traders from Phoenicia in the 7th century BCE. The name of the god was derived from the Greek HERACLES, whose worship arrived with traders via southern Italy. The Greek cult, at first private, perhaps dates from the 5th century BCE.

THE DIVINITIES OF THE REPUBLIC

An important series of temples was founded early in the 5th century BCE, including the temple of the Etruscan Saturn and a shrine dedicated to the twin horsemen, the DIOSCURI, the cult of whom spread from Greece to southern Italy and from there to Rome. In legend, the Dioscuri had helped Rome to victory in a battle against the Latins at Lake Regillus, and on anniversaries of that engagement they presided over the annual parade of knights (equites). From southern Italy, too, came the cult of CERES, an old Italian deity who presided over the generative powers of nature and came to be identified with DEMETER. She owed her installation in Rome to the influence of the Greek colony of Cumae, from which the Romans imported grain during a threatened famine. At this temple Ceres was associated with two other deities, Liber (a fertility god identified with DIONYSUS) and Libera (his female counterpart); this association was based on the triad at Eleusis in Greece. The Roman temple, built in the Etruscan style but with Greek ornamentation, became a rallying ground for the plebeians, a section of the community who were hard hit by the grain shortage at this time and who were pressing for their rights against the patricians.

Cumae also played a part in the introduction of APOLLO. The Sibylline oracles housed in Apollo's shrine at Cumae allegedly were brought to Rome by the last Etruscan kings. The importation of the cult (431 BCE) was prescribed by the Sibylline Books (see SIBYL) at a time when Rome had asked Cumae for help with grain. The Cumaean Apollo was primary prophetic, but the Roman cult was concerned principally with his gifts as a healer. Later, Augustus elevated Apollo as the patron of himself and his regime.

When APHRODITE arrived in Rome, she took on the name VENUS, possibly derived from the idea of venus, "blooming nature." Her significance was largely based on the myth that named her the mother of AENEAS, the ancestor of Rome. Accordingly, the 1st-century-BCE dictators Sulla and Caesar both claimed Venus as their ancestor.

A number of gods possessed accompaniments, which were often feminine—e.g., Lua Saturni and Moles Martis. Sometimes spoken of as cult partners, these attachments were not the wives of the male divinities but rather expressed a special aspect of their power or will. Likewise for the divine powers worshiped as representing divine qualities: FIDES ("Faith" or "Loyalty"), for example, may at first have been an attribute of a Latin-Sabine god of OATHS, Semo Sanctus Dius Fidius, and Victoria may have come from Jupiter Victor. Some of these concepts were worshiped in a very early period, such as Ops ("Plenty," later associated with Saturn and equated with the Greek HEBE), and Juventas (who watched over the men of military age). CONCORDIA was the first of these to receive a temple (367), in celebration of the end of civil strife. SALUS (health or well-being) followed in c. 302 BCE, Victoria in c. 300 BCE, PIETAS (dutifulness to family and gods, later exalted by Virgil as the foundation of Roman religion) in 191 BCE. These divine qualities were not thought of as possessing anthropomorphic shape. They were things, objects of worship, like many other functions that were venerated. Later on, under philosophical (particularly Stoic) influences, they duly took their place as moral concepts, the Virtues and Blessings which abounded for centuries and were depicted in human form on Roman coinage as part of the imperial propaganda.

THE IMPERIAL CULT

Octavian, the adopted son of the dictator Julius Caesar and founder of the imperial regime, took for himself the name Augustus, a term indicating a claim to reverence. This act did not make him a god in his lifetime, but, combined with the insertion into certain cults of his numen and his GENIUS (originally the power that preserves a family through the generations), it prepared the way for his posthumous deification, just as Caesar had been deified during Augustus' reign. Both were deified by the state because they seemed to have given Rome gifts worthy of a god. It was a very old idea in Greece that, if someone saved you, you should pay him the honors you would offer to a god. Alexander the Great and his successors had demanded reverence as divine saviors, and Ptolemy II Philadelphus of Egypt introduced a cult of his own living person. Moreover, the 3rd-century-BCE mythographer EUHEMERUS had elaborated a theory that the gods themselves had once been human; the Romans applied this idea to the gods Saturn and Quirinus, the latter identified with the national founder, Romulus, risen to heaven. And so it became customary—if emperors (and empresses) were approved of in their lives—to raise them to divinity after their deaths. They were called divi, not dei like the Olympian gods, and were regarded with veneration and gratitude but not prayed to.

As the empire proceeded and successive national emergencies were faced, the cult of the divi remained foremost among the patriotic cults that were increasingly encouraged as unifying forces. Concentrating on the protectors of the emperor and the nation, they included the worship of Rome herself, and of the genius of the Roman people. The ruling emperors were more and more frequently treated as divine, and officially they were often compared with gods. As monotheistic tendencies grew, however, this custom led to the doctrine that they were the elect of the divine powers, who were defined as their companions (comites). As the traditional religion approached its last days, the emperors Diocletian and Maximian took the names Jovius and Herculius, respectively, after their companions and patrons Jupiter and Hercules.

THE SUN AND STARS

A complicated geocentric concept of the solar system held sway in Rome and is summed up in Cicero's Dream of Scipio. It formed the basis for the popular conceptions on which ASTROLOGY was based, the Sun being regarded as the center of the concentric planetary spheres encircling the Earth. From the 5th century BCE onward this solar god was identified with Apollo in his role as the supreme dispenser of agricultural wealth. Possessor of a sacred grove at Lavinium, SOL Indiges was regarded as one of the divine ancestors of Rome. During the last centuries before the Christian era, worship of the Sun spread throughout the Mediterranean world; closely associated with this cult was that of MITHRA, the Sun's ally and agent who was elevated to partake of communion and the love feast as the god's companion. SUN WORSHIP was popular in the army, and particularly on the Danube. The emperor Aurelian built a magnificent temple of Sol Invictus (the "Unconquered Sun") at Rome (274 CE), and Constantine the Great declared the Sun his comrade on empire-wide coinages and devoted himself to the cult. His later adoption and practice of Christianity was probably influenced significantly by the cult of Sol Invictus.

PRIESTS

Of the various Roman priests, precedence belonged to the rex sacrorum ("king of the sacred rites"), who, after the expulsion of the kings, took over those religious duties and powers that had not been assumed by the Republican officers of state. Very early origins can also be attributed to some of the flamines, the priests of certain specific cults, and particularly to the flamines of Jupiter, Mars, and Quirinus. Jupiter's priest, the flamen dialis, was required to observe an extraordinary series of ritual prohibitions, some possibly dating to the Bronze Age.

The power of the rex sacrorum and his colleagues was weakened c. 451–450 BCE by the Law of the Twelve Tables, which extended political control over sacral law. As late as c. 275 BCE the religious calendar was still dated by the rex sacrorum, but by this time he was fading into the background. Except for the rex sacrorum and flamen dialis, almost all Roman priesthoods were held by men prominent in public life. The social distinction and political prestige carried by these part-time posts caused them to be keenly fought for.

There were four chief colleges, or boards, of priests: the pontifices, augures, quindecimviri sacris faciundis, and epulones. Originally 3, and finally 16 in number, the pontifices had assumed control of the religious system by the 3rd century BCE. The chief priest, the pontifex maximus (the head of the state clergy; see PONTIFEX), was an elected official. The augures had the task of discovering whether or not the gods approved of an action. This they performed mainly by interpreting divine signs in the movements of birds (auspicia). Such DIVINATION was elevated into an indispensable preliminary to state acts, though the responsibility for the decision rested with the presiding state officials, who were said to "possess the auspices." In private life too, even as late as the 1st century BCE, important courses of action were often preceded by consultation of the heavens. The Etruscan method of divining from the liver and entrails of animals (haruspicina) became popular in the Second Punic War, though its practitioners (who numbered 60 under the empire) never attained an official priesthood.

Of the other two major colleges, the quindecimviri ("Board of Fifteen," who earlier had been 10 in number) sacris faciundis looked after foreign rites, and the epulones supervised religious feasts. There were also fetiales, priestly officials who were concerned with various aspects of international relationships, such as treaties and declarations of war. Also six Vestal Virgins, chosen as young girls from the old patrician families, tended the shrine and fire of Vesta and lived in the House of Vestals nearby, subject to an array of ancient ritual prohibitions.

Festivals. The Roman calendar, as introduced or modified in the period of the Etruscan kings, contained 58 regular festivals. These included 45 Feriae Publicae, celebrated on the same fixed day every year, as well as the Ides of each month, which were sacred to Jupiter, and the Kalends of March, which belonged to Mars. Famous examples of Feriae Publicae were the LUPERCALIA (February 15) and Saturnalia (December 17, later extended). There were also the Feriae Conceptivae, the dates of which were fixed each year by the proper authority and which included the FERIAE LATINAE ("Latin Festival") celebrated in the Alban Hills, usually at the end of April.

Shrines and temples. Templum is a term derived from Etruscan divination. Initially it meant an area of the sky defined by the priest for his collection and interpretation of the OMENS. Later it came to signify a piece of ground set aside and consecrated to the gods. At first such areas did not contain sacred buildings, but there often were altars on such sites, and later shrines. In Rome, temples have been identified from c. 575 BCE onward, including the round shrine of Vesta and a group in a sacred area (S. Omobono), close to the Tiber River beside the cattle market (Forum Boarium). The great Etruscan temples, made of wood with terracotta ornaments, were constructed later and culminated in the temple of the Capitoline Triad. Subsequently, more solid materials, such as tuff (tufa), travertine, marble, cement, and brick, gradually came into use.

Sacrifice and burial rites. The characteristic offering was a sacrifice accompanied by a prayer or vow. Animal sacrifices were regarded as more effective than anything else, the pig being the most common victim, with sheep and oxen added on important occasions. Best of all were the heart, liver, and kidneys. HUMAN SACRIFICE was extraneous to Roman custom, though if it was practiced among the Etruscans it may have contributed to the later institution of gladiatorial funeral games, and legend states that it was resorted to in major crises, such as the Second Punic War (216 BCE).

Ancestors were meticulously revered, but most Romans' ideas of the afterlife, unless they believed in the promises of the MYSTERY RELIGIONS, were vague. Such ideas often amounted to a cautious hope or fear that the spirit in some sense lived on, and this was sometimes combined with an anxiety that the ghosts of the dead, especially the young dead who bore the living a grudge, might return and cause harm. Graves and tombs were inviolable, protected by supernatural powers. In the earliest days of Rome both CREMATION and inhumation (burial) were practiced simultaneously, but by the 2nd century BCE the former had prevailed. Some 300 years later, however, there was a massive reversion to inhumation, probably because of the feeling that the future welfare of the soul depended on comfortable repose of the body. The designs on these tombs reflect the soul's survival as a personal entity that has won its right to paradise.

ROMANTICISM, attitude or intellectual orientation that characterized many works of literature, painting, music, architecture, criticism, and historiography in Western civilization from the late 18th to the mid-19th century.

Among the attitudes of Romanticism were a deepened appreciation of the beauties of nature; the exaltation of emotion over reason and of the senses over intellect; a turning in upon the self and a heightened examination of human personality and its moods and mental potentialities; an emphasis on imagination as a gateway to transcendent experience and spiritual truth; an interest in folk culture, national and ethnic cultural origins, and the medieval era; and a predilection for the exotic, the mysterious, the occult, the monstrous, the diseased, and even the satanic.

Romanticism is visible within THEOLOGICAL LIBERALISM from the late 18th century to the end of the 19th. Marked by the discovery of the uniqueness of the individual and the consequent significance of individual experience as a distinctive source of infinite meaning, this premium on personality and on individual creativity exceeded every other value. In this vein, the German FRIEDRICH SCHLEIERMACHER seized upon the feeling of absolute dependence as being simultaneously that which "signifies God for us" and that which is distinctive in the religious response. Thus, self-consciousness in this deep religious sense becomes God-consciousness. According to Schleiermacher, the Christian is brought to this deeper vein of self-consciousness through the man Jesus, in whom the God-consciousness had been perfected. The nurture of God-consciousness in relation to JESUS CHRIST, Schleiermacher believed, led to the creation of the church as a fellowship of believers.

The Romantic movement had implications for the study of myth. Romantics regarded myths as repositories of experience far more vital than those obtainable from the art and poetry of contemporary Europe. This is illustrated in the work of Johann Gottfried von Herder. He believed that the more "savage"—that is, the more "alive" and "freedom-loving"—a people was, the more alive and free its songs would be. In opposition to the culture of the educated, Herder exalted the Kultur des Volkes ("culture of the people"). For Herder, ancient myths were expressions of the concerns that had confronted the ancients and still confronted the common people.

ROMULUS AND REMUS \ˈräm-yə-ləs . . . ˈrē-məs\, legendary founders of Rome. Traditionally, they were the sons of Rhea Silvia, daughter of Numitor, king of Alba Longa.

The legend of Romulus and Remus probably originated in the 4th century BCE and was set down at the end of the 3rd century BCE. Numitor, it stated, had been deposed by his younger brother Amulius, who forced Rhea to become a VESTAL VIRGIN (and thereby vow chastity) in order to prevent her from giving birth to potential claimants to the throne. Nevertheless, Rhea bore the twins Romulus and Remus, fathered by the god MARS. Amulius ordered the infants drowned in the Tiber, but the trough in which they were placed floated down the river and came to rest at the site of the future Rome, near a sacred fig tree. There a she-wolf and a woodpecker—both sacred to Mars—suckled and fed them until they were found by the herdsman Faustulus. Reared by Faustulus and his wife, the twins became leaders of a band of youths, eventually restoring their grandfather to the throne. They then founded a town on the site where they had been saved. When Romulus built a city wall, Remus jumped over it and was killed by his brother.

Romulus consolidated his power, and the city was named for him. He increased its population by offering asylum to fugitives and exiles. He abducted the women of the Sabines; the women married their captors and intervened to prevent the Sabines from seizing the city. Romulus accepted the Sabine king Titus Tatius as his co-ruler. Tatius' death left Romulus sole king again, and after a long rule he disappeared in a storm. Believing that he had been changed into a god, the Romans worshiped him as QUIRINUS.

ROSARY (from Latin: rosarium, "rose garden"), in CHRISTIANITY, religious exercise in which prayers are recited and counted on a string of beads or a knotted cord. By extension, the beads or cord may also be called a rosary. This practice also occurs in HINDUISM, BUDDHISM, and ISLAM.

In Christianity, the practice was adopted in the 3rd century by monks, and various forms of the rosary were developed. In ROMAN CATHOLICISM, the rosary became a popular method of public and private prayer. The most common rosary is that of the Blessed Virgin MARY, the prayers of which are recited with the aid of a chaplet, or rosary. The beads of the chaplet are arranged in five decades (sets of 10), each decade separated from the next by a larger bead. The two ends of the chaplet are joined by a small string holding a crucifix, two large beads, and three small beads.

Traditionally, the Rosary of the Blessed Virgin requires three turns around the chaplet. It consists of the recitation of 15 decades of HAIL MARYS (150 Hail Marys), each one said while holding a small bead. On the larger beads separating the decades, different prayers are said (the Gloria Patri and the Our Father) and particular mysteries are meditated upon. The 15 mysteries are events from the life, death, and glorification of Jesus Christ and Mary; they are divided into three sets of five—the joyous, the sorrowful, and the glorious mysteries. The introductory and concluding prayers of the rosary vary.

In 2002 POPE JOHN PAUL II added a fourth set of mysteries, the "luminous mysteries," or mysteries of light. The five new mysteries celebrate events in JESUS' ministry, including his baptism; his miracle at Cana, where he turned water into wine; his proclamation of the Kingdom of God; the Transfiguration, in which he revealed his divinity to three of his Apostles; and his establishment of the EUCHARIST at the LAST SUPPER.

The origin of the rosary of the Blessed Virgin is not certain, though it has been associated with ST. DOMINIC. The devotion probably developed gradually among the unlettered as a substitute for the recitation of the psalms or the divine office. It reached its definitive form in the 15th century through the preaching of the Dominican Alan de la Roche and his associates, who organized Rosary Confraternities at Douai in France and at Cologne. In 1520 Pope Leo X gave the rosary official approbation, and it was repeatedly commended by the Roman Catholic church. But after the 1960s, public recitation of the rosary became rare.

In EASTERN ORTHODOXY the rosary is almost exclusively a monastic devotion. The kombologion ("string of beads") used among the Eastern Orthodox of Greece and Turkey has 100 beads of equal size. The Russian Orthodox vervitsa (from the root verv- "string"), chotki (from chet- "count"), or lestovka (from lest- "ladder") is made of 103 beads, separated into irregular sections by 4 large beads and joined together so that the lines of beads run parallel, thus suggesting the form of a ladder. In the Romanian church, the chaplet is called matanie ("reverence") because the monk makes a profound bow at the beginning and end of each prayer counted on the beads. Compare SUBĤA.

ROSENZWEIG, FRANZ \ˈrō-zən-tsvik\ (b. Dec. 25, 1886, Kassel, Ger.—d. Dec. 10, 1929, Frankfurt am Main), German-Jewish religious Existentialist. Rosenzweig began his academic career studying medicine but switched to modern history and philosophy at Berlin and Freiburg. While writing his doctoral dissertation (1912) and his later Hegel und der Staat (“Hegel and the State”), he became critical of G.F.W. Hegel’s emphasis on history and his treatment of the individual’s life as irrelevant to the “whole.” Increasingly, Rosenzweig’s thought moved toward an “existential” philosophy that emphasized the experience and concerns of the individual.

In July 1913 Franz had decided to convert to CHRISTIANITY, but in October of that year he reversed his decision after attending a YOM KIPPUR service in Berlin. He then turned his studies to an intensive reading of classical Hebrew sources. With the outbreak of World War I, Rosenzweig joined the German armed forces, and in 1916–17 he engaged in an exchange of letters from the Balkan front with jurist and historian Eugen Rosenstock-Huessy on core theological problems in JUDAISM and Christianity, published in Judentum und Christentum (Judaism Despite Christianity, 1969). In 1918 he began composing his major work Der Stern der Erlösung (“The Star of Redemption”) on postcards that he sent home. This work proposed a new history of culture and a new philosophical theology of Christianity and Judaism. The central point of the work is God’s loving act of revelation, which awakens within humanity the consciousness of an “I”. The work was highly regarded by Existentialist and younger Jewish theologians.

After the war Rosenzweig wrote Bildung und kein Ende (included in On Jewish Learning as “Towards a Renaissance of Jewish Learning”). He later organized the Freies Juedisches Lehrhaus (“Free Jewish House of Learning”), where students were encouraged to examine classical Hebrew sources. The school became a model for similar institutions elsewhere in Germany. During the 1920s he produced important essays and an annotated German version of the medieval Hebrew poetry of JUDAH HA-LEVI. He also joined with MARTIN BUBER to produce a new German translation of the Hebrew BIBLE. He died in 1929. His influence on Jewish religious thought grew remarkably in the decades after his death.

ROSH HASHANAH \ˌrōsh-hä-shä-ˈnä; ˌrōsh-hə-ˈshō-nə, ˌrāsh-, -ˈshä-\ (Hebrew: “Beginning of the Year”), Hashanah also spelled Ha-Shanah, also called Day of Judgment, or Day of Remembrance, major Jewish observance that begins the religious New Year on Tishri 1 (September or October). Because the New Year ushers in a 10-day period of self-examination and penitence, Rosh Hashanah is also called the Day of Judgment. It is also known as the Day of Remembrance, for on this day Jews commemorate the creation of the world, and the Jewish nation recalls its responsibilities as God’s chosen people. The ram’s horn (SHOFAR) is blown, as prescribed in Numbers 29:1, calling the people to a spiritual awakening associated with the revelation to MOSES on MOUNT SINAI. During the SYNAGOGUE service, the shofar is sounded after the recital of each of three groups of prayers.

ROSICRUCIAN \ˌrō-zə-ˈkrü-shən, ˌrā-\, member of a worldwide brotherhood claiming to possess esoteric wisdom from ancient times. The name is from the order’s symbol, a combination of a rose and a cross. Rosicrucianism combines elements of OCCULTISM similar to several RELIGIOUS BELIEFS and practices.

The earliest extant document that mentions Rosicrucianism is the Fama Fraternitatis (“Account of the Brotherhood”), first published in 1614, which may have given the movement its initial impetus. It recounts the journeys of Christian Rosenkreuz, the reputed founder of Rosicrucianism, who was said to have been born in 1378 and lived for 106 years, though probably he was a symbolic rather than a real character. According to the Fama, Rosenkreuz acquired secret wisdom on trips to Egypt, Damascus, Arabia, and Morocco, which he imparted to three others after his return to Germany. The number of his disciples was later increased to eight, who went to different countries.

Paracelsus, a Swiss alchemist who died in 1541, may have been the real founder of Rosicrucianism, though some contend that Rosicrucian doctrines not only flourished in ancient Egypt but were espoused by such figures as Plato, Jesus, Philo of Alexandria, and Plotinus. There is no reliable evidence to date the order's history earlier than the 17th century.

ROY, RAM MOHUN \ˈrɔɪ\, Ram Mohun also spelled Rammohun, Rammohan, or Ram Mohan (b. May 22, 1772, Rādhānagar, Bengal, India—d. Sept. 27, 1833, Bristol, Gloucestershire, Eng.), Indian religious, social, and educational reformer who challenged traditional HINDU culture and proposed new directions for Indian society under British rule. He is sometimes called the father of modern India.

He was born in Bengal to a prosperous family of the BRAHMIN CASTE. He seems to have developed unorthodox religious ideas at an early age. As a youth he traveled widely outside Bengal and mastered several languages—Sanskrit, Persian, Arabic, and later Hebrew, Greek, and English, in addition to his native Bengali and Hindi.

In 1803 Roy composed a tract denouncing India's religious divisions and superstition, in its place advocating a monotheistic Hinduism in which reason guides the adherent to "the Absolute Originator who is the first principle of all religions." He sought a basis for his RELIGIOUS BELIEFS in the UPANISHADS and VEDAS, translating them into Bengali, Hindi, and English (violating a long-standing tradition against their vernacular translation) and writing treatises on them. The central theme of these works, for Roy, was the worship of the Supreme God, beyond human knowledge, who supports the universe. His interest in ISLAM inspired him to learn Arabic, and he learned Hebrew and Greek to read the Old and New Testaments. In 1820 he published the ethical teachings of Christ, excerpted from the four Gospels, under the title Precepts of Jesus, the Guide to Peace and Happiness.

In 1823, when the British imposed censorship on the Calcutta press, Roy organized a protest, arguing in favor of freedom of speech and religion as natural rights. In his newspapers, treatises, and books, Roy likewise denounced the caste system and the practice of SATI.

In 1826 Roy founded the Vedānta College, in order to teach his Hindu monotheistic doctrines. In August 1828 he formed the BRAHMO SAMAJ (Society of Brahman), a Hindu reformist sect that adopted Unitarian and other liberal Christian elements in its beliefs. The Brahma Samaj played an important part, later in the century, as a Hindu reform movement. In 1829 he journeyed to England as the unofficial representative of the titular king of Delhi. He was well received in England, especially by Unitarians there and by King William IV. Roy died of a fever while in the care of Unitarian friends at Bristol, Eng., where he was buried.

Roy was a tireless social reformer, yet he revived interest in the ethical principles of the VEDĀNTA school as a counterpoise to the Western assault on Indian culture. He was the first Indian to apply to his country the fundamental ideas of the French and American revolutions.

RUDRA \ˈrʊ-drə\ (Sanskrit: "Howler"), minor Vedic god associated with frightful, howling storms, and one of the names of SHIVA. In the VEDAS, Rudra is known as the divine archer, who shoots arrows of death and disease. As a healer and a source of 1,000 remedies, he has also a beneficent aspect. He is the father of the storm gods, the Rudras, and is often closely paired with AGNI (Fire), who shares his devastating power and brilliance.

RULE OF THE COMMUNITY, also called Manual of Discipline, one of the most important documents from the caves at QUMRĀN, produced, according to most scholars, by an ESSENE community of Jews who settled at Qumrān in the Judean desert in the early 2nd century BCE. The major manuscript of this work was discovered in Cave I at Qumrān in 1947; fragments of other manuscripts—10 in Cave IV and 1 in Cave V—were all discovered in 1952. These fragments do not all show an identical arrangement of the contents, and it is clear that the document existed in different editions. While the Cave I manuscript has the oldest script, judging by paleographic study, it is apparently the longest, and most scholars think the latest, edition. It was also copied by two different scribes, the second of whom made additions and corrections to the text of the first scribe.

The heading to the Rule shows it to be intended for the Essene leader called the Maskil. The document contains an explanation of the sect's religious ideals, a description of its admission ceremony, a discourse on its dualistic theology of two spirits of truth and falsehood (or light and darkness), and organizational and disciplinary statutes.

The Cave I edition also has a final HYMN or psalm praising obedience and setting forth the sacred seasons. In the same manuscript (but none of the others) are contained two other works: the Rule of the Congregation, or "Messianic Rule" (1QSa), with information about the composition of the congregation of Israel and its messianic feast; and a liturgical collection of BENEDICTIONS, the Blessings (1QSb).

Even before the publication of the Cave IV fragments, scholars (notably Jerome Murphy-O'Connor and Jean Pouilly) had detected signs that the Manual was composed in four stages and later edited into its present order:

- (1) A Manifesto for a community of 12 men, plus 3 priests, who "shall separate from the congregation of the men of injustice and shall unite, with respect to the Law and possessions, under the authority of the sons of Zadok" (1QSV). These men were to act on behalf of the land to expiate its SIN through spiritual sacrifices.
- (2) Penal legislation integrated into the founding document to deal with the problems of community life.
- (3) Increasing institutionalization, incorporating more democratic processes into the selection of new members and administrating the community.
- (4) An account of a covenant renewal ceremony and Instruction on the Two Spirits, which called for a revival of the initial enthusiasm of the community and a renewed stress on study of the law and rigorous scrutiny of new recruits.

Although the supposed founder of this community, known as the Teacher of Righteousness, is widely thought to have been responsible for the original form of the Rule, he is nowhere mentioned. The purpose of the Rule, and the reason different editions were preserved side-by-side, remains disputed, as does its relationship to the DAMASCUS DOCUMENT and its community.

RUNCIE, ROBERT, in full Robert Alexander Kennedy Runcie, Baron Runcie of Cuddesdon (b. Oct. 2, 1921, Liverpool, Eng.—d. July 11, 2000, St. Albans, Hertfordshire), archbishop of Canterbury and titular head of the ANGLICAN COMMUNION from 1980 to 1991.

Runcie's education at Oxford was interrupted by his service in the British military in World War II. After obtaining his degree he was ordained in 1951. Thereafter he held a number of mostly academic positions before becoming bishop of St. Albans in 1970. As archbishop of Canterbury, he became known for his outspoken liberal views, though his humor and intelligence made him a popular figure. He often publicly criticized the military and economic policies of the British government of Margaret Thatcher. Although he conferred with Pope JOHN PAUL II on several occasions, his efforts to create greater unity between the Anglican and ROMAN CATHOLIC churches were largely unsuccessful. Runcie was created a life peer in 1991.

RŪPA GOSVĀMĪ \ˈrū-pə-gō-ˈsvā-mē, -ˈswā-\, Gosvāmī also spelled Gosvāmin (fl. 1500–50), scholar, poet, and author of many Sanskrit works; he was one of the most influential and remarkable of the medieval saints of India.

Rūpa Gosvāmī was the most eminent of the six gosvāmīs appointed as his successors by the founder of Gauḍīya VAIṢṆAVISM, the Bengali saint CAITANYA. Rūpa established the theological foundation of the sect Caitanya founded, emphasizing ecstatic devotion to KRISHNA and techniques for participation in the deity's infinite bliss. One of the themes of Rūpa's theology is bhakti-rasa, the "aesthetic enjoyment of participatory devotion." He developed the philosophical underpinnings for cultivating emotional love for God. This practice centers around dramatic enactments whereby the devotee enters into Krishna's divine "play" (LĪLĀ)—which for this tradition is ultimate reality. Various "roles" (bhāvas) are identified as paradigms for the devotee's encounters with the divine, including erotic love, which is the most important and is based on the roles played by RĀDHĀ and Krishna's other lovers in the sect's mythology.

Rūpa thus presents religious life in terms of drama, using the language of aesthetics and redirecting it toward the development and expression of devotion, or BHAKTI. It is through participation in the absolute, eternal drama of Krishna's play that salvation occurs in this sect, and Rūpa Gosvāmī was instrumental in systematizing this practice.

RUSALKA \rū-ˈsāl-kə\, plural rusalki \-kə\, in Slavic mythology, lake-dwelling soul of a child who died unbaptized or of a virgin who was drowned. Around the Danube River, where they are called vile, they are beautiful, charming girls, dressed in light robes of mist, singing bewitching songs to passersby. The rusalki of northern Russia are ugly, unkempt, wicked, invariably naked, and always eager to ambush humans. All rusalki love to entice men—the vile to enchant them and the northern rusalki to torture them.

During rusalki week, at the beginning of the summer, the NYMPHS are supposed to emerge from the water and climb into weeping willow and birch trees until night, when they dance in rings in the moonlight. Anyone joining them must dance until he dies. After that week, grass grows thicker where they trod.

RUSSELL, CHARLES TAZE \ˈtāz-ˈrə-səl\, byname Pastor Russell (b. Feb. 16, 1852, Pittsburgh, Pa., U.S.—d. Oct. 31, 1916, Pampa, Texas), founder of the International Bible Students Association, forerunner of the JEHOVAH'S WITNESSES.

At the age of 20, an encounter with some ADVENTISTS introduced Russell to the idea that the BIBLE could be used to predict God's plan of salvation, especially as it related to the end of the world.

He formed his first Bible classes in 1872. Basing his judgment on complex biblical calculations, he preached from 1877 that Christ's "invisible return" had occurred in 1874 and that the end of the Gentile times would come in 1914, followed by war between capitalism and communism or socialism, after which God's kingdom by Christ would rule the earth. Russell (who was never ordained) dedicated his life and his fortune to preaching Christ's millennial reign. In 1879 he started a Bible journal, which later came to be called The Watchtower, and in 1884 he founded the Watch Tower Bible and Tract Society, which became a flourishing business. His books and booklets (notably seven volumes of Studies in the Scriptures) achieved a wide circulation.

Russell's movement survived the embarrassment caused by the failure of his apocalyptic prediction, his separation from his wife, and numerous lawsuits.

RUYSBROECK, JAN VAN \ˈrois-,brük\, Jan also rendered Johannes, Ruysbroeck also spelled Ruusbroec \ˈrūs-,brük\ (b. 1293, Ruisbroek, near Brussels, Brabant [now in Belgium]—d. Dec. 2, 1381, Groenendaal, Brabant), Flemish mystic whose writings influenced JOHANN TAULER, Gerhard Groot, and others.

After 1343, Ruysbroeck founded the AUGUSTINIAN abbey at Groenendaal. He viewed the relationship of the soul to God as similar to the relationship of the lover to the beloved. Die Chierheit der gheesteliker Brulocht (1350); The Spiritual Espousals), considered his masterpiece, which develops his view of the TRINITY, is a guide for the soul in search of God. Although his writings were produced for his contemporary Augustinians, they anticipated the 15th-century DEVOTIO MODERNA. He was beatified in 1908; his feast is celebrated on December 2.

RYŌBU SHINTŌ \ˈryō-bū-ˈshēn-tō\, Angl rē-ˈō-bū-ˈshin-tō\, also called Shingon Shintō \ˈshēŋ-gōŋ-, Angl \ˈshīŋ-gän-\ (Japanese: "Dual Aspect Shintō"), in Japanese religion, syncretic school that combined SHINTŌ with the teachings of the SHINGON sect of BUDDHISM. The school developed during the late Heian (794–1185) and Kamakura (1192–1333) periods. It argued that Shintō deities (KAMI) were manifestations of Buddhist divinities and identified the sun goddess AMATERASU with the Buddha Mahāvairocana (Japanese name Dainichi Nyorai: "Great Sun Buddha"). The Shingon belief in the two realms of Dainichi was interpreted as corresponding to the two kami at the Ise Shrine: Amaterasu was considered the equivalent of taizō-kai ("womb world"), and Toyuke Ōkami, the kami of food, clothing, and shelter, was equated with kongō-kai ("diamond world"). Her shrines at Ise were identified with the two MANDALAS used to represent the dual nature of Dainichi.

Ryōbu Shintō was highly influential in the development of other syncretic schools, notably Sannō Ichijitsu Shintō.

SA'ADIA BEN JOSEPH \sá-dē-á-ben-'jō-səf, -zəf\, Arabic Sa'īd ibn Yūsuf al-Fayyūmī (b. 882, Dilaz, al-Fayyūm, Egypt—d. September 942, Sura, Babylonia), Jewish exegete, philosopher, and polemicist whose influence on Jewish literary and communal activities made him one of the most important Jewish scholars of his time.

As a young man, Sa'adia left Egypt, living in Palestine and, later, Babylon. His early works include a Jewish-Arabic dictionary and a work intended to refute the Jewish heresy KARAIISM. In 921 Sa'adia was appointed by the exilarch (head of Babylonian Jewry) David ben Zakkai as the GAON ("head") of the academy of Sura, which had been transferred to Baghdad. (See also JUDAISM: RABBINIC JUDAISM: THE GAONATE OF SA'ADIA.) Upon assuming this office, he recognized the need to systematize Talmudic law and canonize it by subject. Toward this end he produced Kitāb al-mawāriṭh ("Book on the Laws of Inheritance"); Aḥkam al-waḍ'ī'ah ("The Laws on Deposits"); Kitāb ash-shahādah wa al-wathā'iq ("Book Concerning Testimony and Documents"); Kitāb at-ṭerefot ("Book Concerning Forbidden Meats"); and the SIDDUR, a complete arrangement of the prayers and the laws pertaining to them. In the Siddur he included his original religious poems.

His accomplishments intensified his sense of chosenness and made him more unyielding and less willing to compromise. In 932, when Sa'adia refused to endorse a decision issued by the Exilarch in a litigation, the Exilarch excommunicated him, and Sa'adia retaliated by excommunicating the Exilarch. After three years of embittered struggle, Ben Zakkai succeeded in having the Muslim ruler al-Qāhir remove Sa'adia from office. The Gaon then went into seclusion.

In the years that followed he composed his major philosophical work, Kitāb al-amānāt wa al-ṭiqādāt. The objective of this work was the harmonization of revelation and reason. In structure and content it displays the definite influence of Greek philosophy and of the theology of the MU'TAZILA (a great Islamic sect of speculative theology, which emphasized the doctrines of God's uniqueness and absolute justice). The introduction refutes skepticism and establishes the foundations of human knowledge. Chapter one seeks to establish creatio ex nihilo (creation out of nothing) in order to ascertain the existence of a Creator-God. Sa'adia then discusses God's uniqueness, justice, revelation, FREE WILL, and other doctrines accepted both by JUDAISM and by the Mu'tazila. The second part of the book deals with the essence of the soul and with various eschatological problems and presents guidelines for ethical living.

After a reconciliation with the Exilarch, Sa'adia was reinstated as gaon. In 940 Ben Zakkai died. Sa'adia himself died in September 942.

Many of Sa'adia's works cannot be definitely dated. In philology his most important works are Kutub al-lughah ("Books on Grammar") and Tafsīr as-sab' in lafzah ("The Explanation of the Seventy Hapaxlegomina"). His opus magnum was on EXEGESIS. He prepared an Arabic translation of the whole PENTATEUCH (published by Joseph Derenbourg) and a translation with an extensive commentary on GENESIS 1–28, EXODUS, and Leviticus. His translation and commentaries on Isaiah, Proverbs, Job, and Psalms are extant in their entirety. Fragments of his commentaries on Daniel and Canticles, Esther, and Lamentations are preserved in the GENIZAH collection (which consists of fragments of medieval texts discovered in an old synagogue in Cairo and transferred to various libraries).

Sa'adia's anti-Karaite works include Kitāb ar-radd 'alā Ibn Sākawayhī ("Refutation of Ibn Sākawayhī") and Kitāb taḥṣīl ash-sharā'ī' as-samā'iyah ("Book Concerning the Sources of the Irrational Laws"). In the latter work he contends that matters pertaining to the irrational commandments of the Mosaic Law may never be decided by means of analogy but only by the regulations transmitted through ORAL TRADITION. Talmudic tradition is therefore indispensable. The Maqālah fī sirāj as-sabt ("Treatise on the Lights of Sabbath") refutes the Karaite injunction against the preparation of light for the SABBATH.

SABBATH \sá-bəth\, Hebrew Shabbat \shä-'bät\ (from shavat, "cease," or "desist"), day of holiness and rest observed by Jews from sunset on Friday to nightfall of the following day.

The Sabbath marks the celebration of creation's perfection (GENESIS 2:1–3). Food for the day is to be prepared in advance (EXODUS 16:22–26; 29–30); fire is not to be kindled, thus there is no cooking (Exodus 34:2–3); and servile labor is not to be carried on by the householder and his dependents (Exodus 20:5–11; 31:12–17; 34:21).

On the Sabbath the "where" matters as much as the "when" and the "how"; people are supposed to stay in their place. "Let each person remain in place, let no one leave his place on the seventh day" (Exodus 16:29–30), understanding by place the private domain of the household.

In RABBINIC JUDAISM, the advent of the Sabbath transforms creation, specifically reorganizing space and time and reordering the range of permissible activity. First comes the transformation of space that takes effect at sundown at the end of the sixth day and that ends at sundown of the Sabbath day. At that time, for holy ISRAEL, the entire world is divided into the public domain and the private domain, and what is located in the one may not be transported into the other. What is in the public domain may be transported only four cubits—that is, within the space occupied by a person's body. What is in the private domain may be transported within the entire demarcated space of that domain. The net effect of these restrictions is to move nearly all permitted activity to the private domain and to close off the public domain for all but the most severely limited activities.

Regarding the matter of time, objects may be handled on the Sabbath only if they are designated in advance for the purpose for which they will be utilized. Tools that are ordinarily used for a purpose that is licit on the Sabbath are deemed ready at hand and do not require reclassification; the accepted classification applies. What requires designation for Sabbath use in particular is any tool that may serve more than a single purpose or that does not ordinarily serve the purpose for which it is wanted on the Sabbath.

The activity most affected by the advent of the Sabbath is constructive labor. On the Sabbath one may not carry out entirely on his own a completed act of constructive labor—that is, work that produces enduring results. The Sabbath prohibits activities carried out in ordinary time in a way deemed natural: acts that are complete, consequential, and in accord with their accepted character. There is, however, no prohibition against performing an act of labor in an other than normal way. In principle, it is permissible to go out into the fields and plough, so long as one does so in an odd or unusual manner. (Indeed, one may build an entire house, so long as it collapses promptly.)

To act like God on the Sabbath of Creation is what Israel is enjoined to do; thus, on the Sabbath, the Israelite rests. Furthermore, the traits of an act of labor for God in Creation define the prohibited conditions of an act of labor on the Sabbath, when Israel goes home to Eden. On the Sabbath Israel gives up the situation of human beings in ordinary time and space—destructive, selfish, dissatisfied, and doing—and enters the situation of God in that initial, perfected, and sanctified then and there of creation: the activity that consists in sustaining life and perfecting repose through acts of restraint and sufficiency.

ŚABDA \ˈshəb-də\ (Sanskrit: “sound”), in Indian philosophy, verbal testimony as a means of obtaining knowledge.

In the orthodox philosophical systems (DARŚAN), śabda is equated with the authority of the VEDAS as the only infallible testimony. These are deemed eternal, authorless, and without contradiction. The exegetic Mimāṃsā school defines the authoritativeness as applying bindingly only to scriptural statements that exhort to purposive action and whose efficacy would not be known by any other means of knowledge. The VEDĀNTA school extends this authoritativeness to suprasensual objects, especially BRAHMAN, the ultimate reality. The school of logic, NYĀYA, accepts verbal testimony, both human and divine, as a valid means of knowledge but notes that only the divine knowledge conveyed in the Vedas is infallible.

The systems of BUDDHISM and JAINISM reject the authoritativeness of the Vedas but appeal to the authority of their own SCRIPTURES.

SABZAVĀRĪ, HĀJĪ HĀDĪ \sab-ze-ˈvā-ˈrē\, also spelled Sabzevārī (b. 1797/98, Sabzavār, Iran—d. 1878, Sabzavār), Iranian teacher and philosopher who advanced the ḥikma (wisdom) school of Islamic philosophy. His doctrines—composed of diverse elements of esoteric spiritual knowledge, philosophy, and revelation—are an exposition and clarification of the philosophical concepts of MULLĀ ṢADRĀ. But he classified knowledge as an essence, rather than an outward quality, of the human soul.

After spending his early childhood in Sabzavār, a center for Shiʿi and Sufi studies (see SHIʿITE; SUFISM), Sabzavārī was educated in MASHHAD, and in Iṣfahān, where he was first influenced by the teachings of the ḥikmat. On completing his studies, he returned to his native city, where he founded a MADRASA (school) that attracted students of philosophy from as far away as Arabia and India.

The fame of Sabzavārī was such that Nāṣir al-Dīn Shāh, the fourth Qājār king of Iran, visited him in 1857/78. At the request of the Shāh, he wrote the Asrār al-ḥikma (“The Secrets of Wisdom”), which, together with his Arabic treatise Sharḥ manzūma (“A Treatise on Logic in Verse”), remains a basic text for the study of ḥikmat doctrines in Iran. He also wrote poetry under the name of Asrār and completed a commentary on the Māsnavī of JĀLĀL AL-DĪN AL-RŪMĪ, the great mystic poet of ISLAM.

Devout and pious, Sabzavārī led the ascetic life of a mystic. Miracles were attributed to him, and he is said to have cured the sick. On his death the Shāh ordered that a mausoleum be constructed for him in Mashhad. See also MĪR DĀMĀD.

SACRAMENT, religious sign or symbol, especially associated with the Christian church, in which a sacred or spiritual power is believed to be transmitted through material elements viewed as channels of divine GRACE.

Among early agriculturalists and herders, the fertility of the soil, beneficence of the weather, and succession of the seasons became the focuses of sacramental practices designed to ensure their continuation, such as the rites of spring and feasts of harvest. Inasmuch as the cycle of the individual life was seen to reflect the natural order, sacramental ceremonies were conducted to promote successful passage from one status to another.

In CHRISTIANITY, the sacramental principle became the fundamental system and institution for the perpetuation of the union of God and man in the person of JESUS CHRIST through the visible organization and constitution of the church, which was viewed as the mystical body of Christ. According to the NEW TESTAMENT, Jesus instituted and commanded various practices, among them BAPTISM, a common meal, the washing of feet, anointing, and the casting out of DEMONS. Some of these practices were continued by Christians; some were dropped; still others were adopted and attributed to the institution of Christ. Consideration of all these rites led to the development of the concept "sacrament," but both the definition and the exact number remained fluid well beyond the end of the 1st millennium of church history.

As set forth by PETER LOMBARD, codified by THOMAS AQUINAS, and promulgated by the COUNCIL OF TRENT, the sacraments were said to be seven in number (baptism, CONFIRMATION, EUCHARIST, penance, anointing or extreme unction, holy orders or ORDINATION, and matrimony) and to be efficacious signs of the grace of God instituted by Christ. Part of almost every definition of a sacrament, however, is the requirement that it have been, in some sense, "instituted by Christ." Of these seven, only two are incontrovertibly documented from the New Testament, baptism and the Eucharist.

The REFORMATION, and the Protestant denominations that derived from it, accordingly questioned both the definition and the number of sacraments in scholastic theology, as well as the use of sacraments in medieval piety, liturgy, and churchmanship. Protestant biblical scholarship eventually came to recognize that even the accounts of the institution of the Eucharist by Christ are, in their present form at least, products of the recollection of the early Christian community rather than verbatim transcripts of the sayings of the historical Jesus. ROMAN CATHOLIC theology likewise surrendered the effort to find explicit historical support for each of the seven sacraments and concentrated instead on the implicit significance of the very establishment of the church: Christ instituted the sacraments in a theological sense, even though there is no way of proving that the historical Jesus instituted them.

SACRED, THE, power, being, or realm understood by religious persons to be at the core of existence and to have a transformative effect on their lives and destinies. Other terms that have been used for this domain are divine, transcendent, ultimate being (or reality), mystery, and perfection (or purity).

Basic characteristics. The term sacred comes from Latin sacer ("set off, restricted"). A person or thing was designated as sacred when it was unique or extraordinary. Various terms from different traditions have been recognized as correlates of sacer: Greek hagios, Hebrew qadosh, Polynesian tapu (tabu), and Arabic ḥarām.

Set off from the profane world, the sacred in many cultures is extraordinary, prohibited for daily use or contact, and often powerful. In ancient Rome the word sacer could mean that which would pollute someone or something that came into contact with it, as well as that which was restricted for divine use. Similarly, the Polynesian tapu designated something as not "free" for common use. It might be someone or something specially blessed for being full of power, or it might be something accursed, such as a corpse. Whatever was tapu had special restrictions attached to it, for it was full of extraordinary energy that could destroy anyone unprotected with special power himself.

Because the sacred contains notions both of a positive, creative power and a danger that requires stringent prohibitions, a common reaction is a mixture of fear and fascination. On the one hand, the sacred is the limit of human effort, in the sense of both that which meets human frailty and that which prohibits human activity; on the other hand, it is the unlimited possibility that draws humankind beyond the limiting temporal and spacial structures that characterize human existence.

The emergence of the concept of the sacred. The concept of the sacred (or holy) became dominant in the comparative STUDY OF RELIGIONS in the first quarter of the 20th century. Nathan Söderblom, an eminent Swedish churchman and historian of religions, asserted in 1913 that the central notion of religion was "holiness" and that the distinction between sacred and profane was basic to "real" religious life. RUDOLF OTTO, a German historian of religions, exercised a great influence on the study of religion through his The Idea of the Holy (1917), which argued that the religious person's experience of the "numinous"—a mysterious, majestic presence inspiring dread and fascination—cannot be derived from anything other than an a priori sacred reality. In The Elementary Forms of the Religious Life (1915), the French sociologist ÉMILE DURKHEIM described the sacred as referring to those things in society that are forbidden or set apart; since these sacred things are set apart by society, the sacred force, he concluded, is society itself.

Since the first quarter of the 20th century many historians of religions have accepted the notion of the sacred and of sacred events, places, people, and acts as being central in religious life, if not indeed the essential reality in religious life. For example, phenomenologists of religion such as Gerardus van der Leeuw and W. Brede Kristensen considered the sacred (holy) as central and organized the material in their systematic works around the (transcendent) object and (human) subject of sacred (cultic) activity, together with a consideration of the forms and symbols of the sacred. Significant contributions to the analysis and elaboration of the sacred were made by Roger Caillois, a sociologist, and by MIRCEA ELIADE, an eminent historian of religions.

Critical problems. Phenomenologists of religion who use the concept “sacred” as a universal term for the basis of religion differ in their estimation of the nature of the sacred manifestation. Otto and Gerardus van der Leeuw hold that the sacred is a reality that transcends the apprehension of the sacred in symbols or rituals. The forms (ideograms) through which the sacred is expressed are secondary and are simply reactions to the “wholly other.” Kristensen and Eliade, on the other hand, regarded the sacred reality to be available through the particular symbols or ways of apprehending the sacred.

A second problem is the continuing question of whether or not the sacred is a universal category. There is a serious question regarding the usefulness of this term in interpreting a large part of Chinese religion, the social relationships (DHARMA) in HINDUISM, the effort to achieve superconscious awareness in Hinduism (YOGA), JAINISM, BUDDHISM (ZEN), some forms of TAOISM, and some contemporary options of total commitment that, nevertheless, reject the notion of an absolute source and goal essentially different from human existence. If one takes the notion of sacred as something above (beyond, different from) the religious structure dominated by divine or transcendent activity, then this suggests that the notion of sacredness should not be limited to that structure. Thus, some scholars have found it confusing to use the notion of sacred as a universal religious quality, for it has been accepted by many religious people and by scholars of religion as referring to only one (though important) type of religious consciousness.

SACRED ARCHITECTURE, within the religious sphere, the art and the technique of building. The history of architecture is concerned more with religious buildings than with any other type because in many cultures the appeal of religion made the church or temple the most expressive, the most permanent, and the most influential building in the community. Since a wide range of considerations—theological, technological, social, political, artistic, and economic—enter into the design and construction of sacred edifices, the historical roles they have played also tend to be broad and diverse.

Throughout history, sacred architecture has been of critical social and economic importance. Within a community defined by shared beliefs, architecture may provide the house of worship, the meeting place, the pivot-point around which the entire society turns. Thus, many communities have devoted large portions of their available resources to the construction of magnificent sacred edifices. In return, however, these CATHEDRALS, STUPAS, and TEMPLES often become centers of PILGRIMAGE and tourism, and can thereby become a source of wealth and prestige for the community for centuries, or even millennia. For example, Muslims performing the HAJJ (a PILGRIMAGE to MECCA, one of the FIVE PILLARS OF ISLAM) are required to walk seven times around the KA'BA, a small shrine that houses the BLACK STONE OF MECCA. The focus of religious energies on this location, and the shrine that marks it, has ensured the importance of Mecca even as ISLAM has become a world religion.

On a social level, architecture can often provide the focal point of a community's energies. Thus the GOLDEN TEMPLE (Darbār Sāhib) of SIKHISM or the HAGIA SOPHIA in Istanbul, Turkey (formerly Constantinople), serve as the symbolic center of their respective religious communities, no matter how far-flung those communities have become. Likewise, the TEMPLE OF JERUSALEM, though destroyed by the Romans in 70 CE, still stands as the emotional center of JUDAISM for a large number of Jews throughout the world. In ancient communities it was common to conceive of the world as roughly circular, with one's country at the center of the world, one's city at the center of the country, and a temple at the center of the city.

Frequently the sacredness of a piece of architecture can be the result of something that it contains: an important sculpture, a piece of especially hallowed ground, or a RELIC of a SAINT or religious leader. Thus in Sri Lanka the TEMPLE OF THE TOOTH was built to house a tooth of the BUDDHA GOTAMA, and the medieval cathedrals of Europe were often built to house the relics of a saint. In some religions the temple was felt to be the actual residence of the god, as in ancient Egypt; in such cases entrance to the temple is usually restricted to a special priestly caste. In these ways, sacred architecture marks a point of intersection between the divine and the human, between the natural and the supernatural. The two elements—the building and that which it contains—are mutually supportive; the beauty of the edifice underscores how special the place or the object is, while the perceived holiness of the relic magnifies the sacredness of the building that houses it.

On a symbolic level, sacred architecture provides an opportunity to impose a logical scheme on physical space. Creation myths and cosmologies often describe the physical world as being laid out in a meaningful way: heaven above earth, hell beneath all, certain symbolic attributes attached to the four cardinal directions, and so on. The construction of a building allows the builders to create a space along the same lines; on a microcosmic level they can reproduce the ideal structure of the cosmos. Thus sacred architecture often takes on the form of space—not as it is but as RELIGIOUS BELIEF dictates that it should be.

In medieval HINDUISM, every aspect of the design of temples was thought to be symbolic of some feature of the cosmos. Temples were laid out geometrically to mirror the structure of the universe, with its four geometric quarters and a celestial roof. The temple itself represented the mountain at the navel of the world, and accordingly it often somewhat resembled a mountain. Likewise, the ZIGGURATS of ancient Mesopotamia may have been intended to represent a sacred mountain at the center of the world. In this way, the construction of a temple can symbolically mirror the creation of the world itself, and the building thereby becomes a mirror and signifier of all that is important in this world.

SACRED CLOWN, ritual or ceremonial figure, in various cultures throughout the world, who represents a reversal of the normal order, especially during NEW YEAR FESTIVALS.

In certain traditions clowning is apotropaic (i.e., designed to avert evil), a way of deflecting demonic attention from serious religious activities. In other contexts it serves as an initiatory ordeal in which the initiate must persevere through the jests and insults hurled at him.

The dancing clowns of the Pueblo Indians (see NATIVE AMERICAN RELIGIONS), the Koyemshi, punctuate the most important religious ceremonies with obscene and sacrilegious actions; they serve as a sign of the presence of the powerful primordial beings and as a means of social control through their satire of the antisocial behavior of particular individuals.

SACRED KINGSHIP, religious and political concept that views a ruler as an incarnation, mediator, or agent of the transcendent or supernatural powers believed to be the source of the existence of a community.

Various types of sacred kingship have prevailed in different cultures. It was found in the ancient Middle East, in Hellenistic and European cultures, in pre-Columbian Meso-America and South America, and in various present-day indigenous cultures. While important features may be described as common to these traditions, each individual variety can be properly understood only in its particular social, historical, and religious context.

There are three basic types of sacred kings: (1) the receptacle of divine power; (2) the divine or semidivine ruler; and

(3) the agent or mediator of the sacred. The first views the king as an ICON of the sacred realm. The ruler's power may be both malevolent and beneficial, and it is believed to be essential in all dimensions of communal life—particularly in agriculture, where the ruler's influence over the weather and the land's fertility ensure the harvest necessary for the community's survival. In this concept of sacred kingship, the ruler's power is supported by or identical to his own divine body.

Some societies, particularly those of ancient China, the Middle East, and South America, exhibited the second type of sacred kingship. There the ruler is identified with a particular god or as a god himself. A similar type of divine king is the one regarded as the son of a god, an idea found in the cultures of Japan, Peru (among the Incas), Mesopotamia, and the larger Greco-Roman world, among others. In this form the queen mother may be referred to as mother of god, though the future sacred king may be adopted, rather than begotten, by the reigning monarch. Finally, a king or ruler can become deified after his death, though this transformation seems more akin to ANCESTOR WORSHIP than to sacred kingship in its fullest sense.

The third form of sacred kingship is that of the ruler as mediator, servant, or executive agent of a god. In this form it is the institution of kingship, more than an individual ruler, that bears the mark of the sacred. The deity remains the true lord, while the king seeks to do the will of this god in the community; the king is the link between divine and human, the spiritual and the material.

Religious duties are frequently connected with sacred kingship, and the king may often be a seer or priest as well. This priestly function is particularly important to communities who regard the king as a mediator or divine executive, and his oracles, dreams, or prophecies are believed to hold the divine commands. Another ritual function of the sacred king is as the center of a cult, which may help him to unify his people and so consolidate his power; such cults may arise from political motivations. Ruler cults were known in ancient Egypt and were especially widespread throughout the Greco-Roman world.

Among the more important ceremonies of sacred kingship are those involving succession, legitimation, and coronation. A king may be selected on the basis of a number of criteria including birth, adoption, omens, and divination; the new king may take power before or after the death of his predecessor. A new king often legitimates his right to rule by pointing to his selection as king, by possessing such symbols of kingship as the crown and scepter, and by ascending to the throne. Frequently, the new ruler chooses a royal or throne name and declares a new era.

Sacred kings also take part in the religious rites of the community, particularly in the great festivals and cultic dramas. Sometimes their participation is designed to atone for the misdeeds of the community but more often it serves to ensure fertility, harmony, and order in society and the cosmos.

SACRED PIPE, also called peace pipe, or calumet \ˈkæl-yə-met, -mət\, one of the central ceremonial objects of North American Indian culture (see NATIVE AMERICAN RELIGIONS). Although smoked for relaxation, it was primarily an object of veneration and was used on all ceremonial occasions. The pipe was revered as a major means of communication between the spiritual and human worlds. The parts, colors, and motifs used in its decoration—and in the attached pendants of feathers or horsehair—correspond to the essential parts of the universe, according to this belief system. The pipe was smoked in personal prayer as well as in collective rituals. Its most common use was in invocations to the six directions. Some tribes (e.g., the Pawnee, Omaha, Crow) developed complex pipe dances that presented smoke offerings to the Great Spirit.

SACRED SPACE AND TIME, set of categories used by many scholars to interpret religion. ÉMILE DURKHEIM regarded them as essential to the DEFINITION OF RELIGION. MIRCEA ELIADE turned them into a fundamental ontology that defined all religions as the sacred opposite of the profane. Most scholars of religion find the terms useful as methodological categories for describing religion.

Both sacred space and sacred time provide a means for describing a specific religious orientation or structure. Durkheim and Eliade agreed that all significant human acts are encompassed, if not constituted by, sacred space and time. Eliade argued that the great myths of creation, which tell us how the cosmos was formed “in the beginning,” provide the model for sacred space and time; thus every meaningful structure is a sacred space, in that it is a microcosm of the great cosmogonic act of creation itself. By this definition, all great monuments to a particular religion are examples of sacred space, as are traditional towns and cities, houses, sacred places of PILGRIMAGE, and other forms of SACRED ARCHITECTURE.

To build—to make or produce something of significance—usually entails an act that imitates a sacred model. The primary structure of this model is usually the four cardinal points with a sacred center. Sacred places such as Jerusalem, VRINDĀBAD, VARANASI, MECCA, Beijing, and Rome mark a sacred center, the center of the cosmos in microcosmic terms. As sacred spaces they are holy places and tend to become places of pilgrimage. Most religious structures and geography emphasize a particular orientation from the center; in ISLAM, HINDUISM, and BUDDHISM the East is endowed with particular significance.

Sacred time is generally cyclical: it has a beginning and an end usually marked by great cosmological time spans. The Christian BIBLE is an excellent example of such a span, beginning with creation (GENESIS) and ending with de-creation (REVELATION TO JOHN). Other examples are the huge Hindu and Buddhist cosmic cycles through which all life migrates. Each SABBATH in JUDAISM signifies the cosmic act of creation and rest. In Hinduism each month, fortnight, and day represents either the dark or bright half of the day of BRAHMĀ, the god of creation. The ritual year of all religions begins and ends with a periodic new year ritual, and most RITES OF PASSAGE are marked by a specific time in the ritual calendar of a religion. The auspicious and inauspicious times for certain activities, rituals, and plans also are defined by sacred time: significant acts take place in sacred time.

SACRIFICE (“to make sacred”), act of offering objects to a divinity, thereby making them holy. There are many theories about the nature of sacrifice, including the theory that sacrifice is the origin and the very foundation of religion. “Essai sur la nature et le fonction du sacrifice” (1899; Sacrifice: Its Nature and Function, 1964), by Henri Hubert and MARCEL MAUSS, remains the classic study.

SACRILEGE, originally, the theft of something sacred; as early as the 1st century BCE, however, the Latin term for sacrilege came to mean any injury, violation, or profanation of sacred things. Legal punishment for such acts was sanctioned in the Levitical code of ancient ISRAEL, and the Israelites also had extensive rules to safeguard whatever was considered to be holy or consecrated.

In GREEK RELIGION sacrilege was closely connected with treason: a temple was regarded as the home of a protector of the state, and thievery of temple property was consequently a crime against the state. Roman cults were protected by ritual prohibitions, and there was no precise term in Roman law equivalent to sacrilege. Early Christians most frequently used sacrilege in the restricted sense of theft of sacred things; but by the mid-4th century the broader meaning had been adopted. In the Theodosian Code (published 438 CE) of the Eastern Roman Empire, the term sacrilege applied to APOSTASY (from CHRISTIANITY), HERESY, SCHISM, JUDAISM, adherence to pre-Christian religions, actions against the immunities of churches and clergy or the privileges of church courts, the desecration of SACRAMENTS, and the violation of the SABBATH. The Frankish SYNODS of the Middle Ages emphasized the crime of seizing church property. The worst sacrilege of all was to defile the Host of the EUCHARIST, an act generally punishable by torture and death.

During the Protestant REFORMATION, sacrilege was a cause of great enmity between Roman Catholics and Protestants. Contemporary Protestants generally deny the inherent sacredness of objects and give little attention to the notion of sacrilege. In ROMAN CATHOLICISM sacrilege is dealt with in the Code of CANON LAW and extends to persons as well as to objects.

SADDUCEE \ˈsɑ-jə-sē, -dyə-, Hebrew Tzedoq, plural Tzedoqim, member of a Jewish priestly sect that flourished for about two centuries before the destruction of the Second TEMPLE OF JERUSALEM in 70 CE. The Sadducees' name may be derived from that of Zadok, who was HIGH PRIEST in the time of kings DAVID and SOLOMON. Zadokites formed the Temple hierarchy from the time of EZEKIEL to the 2nd century BCE.

The Sadducees were the party of high priests, aristocratic families, and merchants—the wealthier elements of the population. They came under the influence of Hellenism, tended to have good relations with the Roman rulers of Palestine, and generally represented the conservative view within JUDAISM. While their rivals, the PHARISEES, claimed the authority of piety and learning, the Sadducees claimed that of birth and social and economic position.

A Hindu sadhu, or holy person

J. Allan Cash

The Sadducees and Pharisees were in constant conflict with each other, most importantly over the content and extent of God's revelation to the Jewish people. The Sadducees refused to go beyond the written TORAH and thus, unlike the Pharisees, denied the immortality of the soul, bodily resurrection after death, and the existence of angels. For the Sadducees, the Oral Law—i.e., the body of post-biblical Jewish legal traditions—meant next to nothing.

Although the Sadducees were conservative in religious matters, their wealth and their willingness to compromise with the Roman rulers aroused the hatred of the common people. Their lives and political authority were so intimately bound up with Temple worship that after Roman legions destroyed the Temple, the sect ceased to exist.

SĀDHANA \ˈsā-də-nə\, or sādhanā (Sanskrit: “realization”), in TANTRIC HINDUISM and Buddhist Tantrism (VAJRAYĀNA), a spiritual exercise by which practitioners evoke a divinity, identifying and absorbing it into themselves. Sādhana involves the body in MUDRAS (sacred gestures), the voice in MANTRAS (sacred utterances), and the mind in the visualization of sacred designs and the figures of divinities. One collection of sādhanas is the Sādhanamālā (Sanskrit: “Garland of Realization”), composed c. 400–1000 CE, which includes those designed for practical results as well as those intended to further spiritual realization.

SADHU \ˈsā-dü\, Sanskrit sādhu, feminine sādhvī, in India, religious ascetic or holy person. The class of sadhus includes renunciants of many types and faiths. They are sometimes designated by the term swami (Sanskrit svāmī, “master”), which refers it is especially to an ascetic who has been initiated into a specific religious order; the term has come to be applied particularly to monks of the Ramakrishna mission. The corresponding term in ŚAIVISM is SANNYĀSI; in VAIŚNAVISM it is VAIRĀGI.

Sadhus may live together in monasteries (maṭhas) usually belonging to a particular order; they may wander throughout the country alone or in small groups; or they may isolate themselves in small huts or caves. They generally take vows of poverty and CELIBACY and depend on the CHARITY of householders for their food. Their dress and ornaments differ according to sectarian allegiances and personal tastes, but they usually wear ochre-colored (more rarely, white) robes. (See also SANGHA.) They shave their heads, or they allow their hair to lie matted on their shoulders or twist it in a knot on top of their heads. They usually retain only the few possessions they carry with them: a staff (daṇḍa), a waterpot (kamaṇḍalu), an alms bowl, PRAYER BEADS, and perhaps an extra cloth or a fire tong.

ŠAFĪ AL-DĪN \sā-ˈfē-āl-ˈdēn\ (b. 1253, Ardabil, Iran—d. Sept. 12, 1334, Ardabil), mystic and founder of the Šafavid order of mystics.

Šafi al-Dīn, a descendant of a family of provincial administrators, obtained his early education in Ardabil. Later, in Shiraz, he was influenced by Sufi teachings (see SUFISM). He then traveled to the province of Gilan (the Iranian Caspian province), where he spent 25 years as a follower of Shaykh Zāhid, whose daughter Bībī Fātima he married. After Shaykh Zāhid's death, his other spiritual followers transferred their allegiance to Šafi al-Dīn, who then returned to Ardabil, where he formed the Šafavid order.

The fame of Šafi al-Dīn increased as the new order gained recruits. Its popularity can be attributed in part to Šafi al-Dīn's policy of hospitality, especially to all who sought refuge. One of the shaykh's appellations was Khalīl-e ʿAjam (a figure noted for hospitality in Iranian FOLKLORE). The Šafavids were apparently a SUNNI order of mystics that made concessions to the followers of ʿALĪ (the fourth CALIPH of ISLAM) without actually adhering to the doctrines of his party, that of the SHĪʿITES. The claim made by Šafavid court historians that Šafi al-Dīn was a Shiʿite and a SAYYID (descendant of ʿALĪ) is false and misleading. Šafi al-Dīn himself was a Sunni of the SHĀFIʿĪ LEGAL SCHOOL.

SAGUṆA \ˈsə-gü-nə\ (“with qualities or attributes”), position within Hindu philosophy and theology that God (or the impersonal Cosmic One known as the BRAHMAN) is manifest and describable. Its conceptual opposite is NIRGUṆA, the notion that God or Brahman is “without qualities” and therefore wholly indescribable.

The saguṇa position underwrites the Hindu practice of creating and worshiping images of the deity. For some, the saguṇa form of God is primarily a support for meditation: “Without a form, how can God be meditated upon? If he is without any form, where will the mind fix itself?” For others, the position allows for the notion that God willingly takes on attributes and qualities out of his love for human beings and in order to make himself accessible to them. The deity can incarnate in human or animal form (this is the doctrine of the AVATAR) or in a properly consecrated image or icon.

SAHAJIYĀ \sə-hə-ˈjē-yā, shə-\, member of an esoteric cult of TANTRIC HINDUISM, centered in Bengal, that sought RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE through the world of the senses, specifically human sexual love. The Sahajiyā cult developed from the 17th century onward through a meeting of the Tantric sahaja (Sanskrit: “easy,” or “natural”) system of worship (prevalent in Bengal as early as the 8th–9th centuries), with mystic explorations of the parallels between human love and divine love such as were pursued by CAITANYA and his followers in devotion to KRISHNA and RĀDHĀ.

The Sahajiyās elevated parakīyā-rati (the love of a man for a woman who legally belongs to another) above svakīyā-rati (conjugal love) as the more intense of the two, as it was felt to be without consideration for the conventions of society or for personal gain and thus was more analogous to divine love. Rādhā, Krishna's lover, is conceived as the ideal of the parakīyā woman.

The Sahajiyās were looked upon with disfavor by other religious groups and operated in secrecy. Because of the extreme privacy of the cult, little is known about its prevalence or its practices today. See also BĀUL.

SAICHŌ \ˈsī-çhō\, posthumous name Dengyō Daishi \ˈdɛŋ-gyō-ˈdī-shē\ (b. 767, Ōmi province, Japan—d. 822, Mount Hiei), monk who established the Tendai sect in Japan.

Saichō became a priest at the age of 13. In 804 he was sent to China to study; he returned with the highly eclectic teachings of Tendai (T'ĪEN-T'AI) BUDDHISM. Unlike other Buddhist sects then in existence in Japan, the Tendai taught that there could be meaning and value in the external material world and that the teachings of the BUDDHA are accessible to all, not just to a select few.

Saichō built his monastery on MOUNT HIEI. He soon became a favorite of the emperor, and his monastery became one of the most powerful centers of Buddhist learning. While the monks of the older Buddhist sects lived in the cities, Saichō required his monks to spend 12 years in seclusion under strict discipline. He foreshadowed later Japanese Buddhist trends in his reverence for the SHINTŌ deities and his emphasis on the patriotic mission of Buddhism.

SAINT, person believed to be connected in a special manner with what is viewed as sacred, such as a divinity or divinities, spiritual powers, mythical realms, and other aspects of the sacred or holy.

Throughout history and in many religions of the world, various types of religious personages have been recognized as saints both by popular acclaim and by official pronouncement, and their influence on the broad spectrum of religious believers has been of considerable significance.

In CONFUCIANISM, saintliness was a state of ethical perfection best exemplified in the lives of certain ideal "holy rulers of primal times." TAOISM posits a more mystical sainthood, characterized by a passionless acceptance of the Way (TAO) of nature. Practicers of SHINTŌ venerate a number of mythical saints but regard all members of the human community, whether good or evil, as attaining a supernatural existence after death.

In THERAVĀDA BUDDHISM, all disciples of the BUDDHA GOTAMA who have attained NIRVANA, specifically monks, are recognized as ARHATS (roughly equivalent to "saint"). MAHĀYĀNA BUDDHISM, by contrast, views all people as capable of buddhahood—and thus of sainthood. Those who postpone their own enlightenment in order to further the spiritual progress of others are known as BODHISATTVAS and are also regarded as saints. The Tantric Buddhism of Tibet enlarges the range further still with the inclusion of numerous REINCARNATIONS of past saints.

The Jains of India venerate the founder of JAINISM, MAHĀVĪRA, as the 24th in a line of saintly prophets known as TĪRTHĀNKARAS. HINDUISM, the predominant religion of India, abounds in figures regarded as SADHUS ("good ones") and AVATARS, which are incarnations of a deity in human or animal form. The avatars include some saints of other religions. ZOROASTRIANISM AND PARSIIISM recognize numerous FRAVASHIS, or preexistent souls that are good by nature.

The term saint is applied in the Hebrew BIBLE to any Israelite as one of the CHOSEN PEOPLE of God. In the NEW TESTAMENT it is used of any member of the Christian churches. It was not until about the 6th century that the word became a title of honor given specially to the dead whose cult was publicly celebrated in the churches.

SAIVA \ˈsī-vü\, one of the Sami regions of the dead, where the deceased, called saivoolmak, lead happy lives with their families and ancestors, in every way acting as they did on earth (see FINNO-UGRIC RELIGION). In Norway the saiva world was thought to exist in the mountains, whereas in Finland it was usually believed to be under special double-bottomed lakes connected by a small hole. The saiva localities were regarded as sacred and as sources of power that could be used by the SHAMAN, or NOAIDE.

ŚAIVA SIDDHĀNTA \ˈshī-və-si-ˈdān-tə\, religious and philosophical system of South India in which SHIVA is worshiped as the supreme deity. It draws primarily on the Tamil devotional hymns written by Śaiva saints from the 5th to the 9th centuries, known in their collected form as Tirumūṟai (see ŚAIVISM).

Śaiva Siddhānta posits three universal realities: the individual soul (paśu), the Lord (patī—i.e., Shiva), and the soul's bondage (pāśa) within the fetters of existence. These fetters comprise ignorance, KARMA, and the delusory nature of phenomenal reality (MĀYĀ). Acts of service and good conduct (caryā), structured worship (kriyā), spiritual discipline (YOGA), and deep learning (JĀNĀNA) enable the soul to be freed from bondage.

ŚAIVISM \ˈshī-vi-zəm\, also spelled Shaivism, worship of the Indian god SHIVA, with VAIṢNAVISM and ŚĀKTISM, one of the three principal forms of modern HINDUISM. Śaivism includes such diverse movements as the highly philosophic ŚAIVA SIDDHĀNTA and KASHMIR schools, the socially distinctive VĪRĀŚAIVA (or Liṅgāyat), ascetic orders such as the daśnāmī sannyāsīs and KĀPĀLIKAS AND KĀLĀMUKHAS, and innumerable folk variants.

While scholarly speculation that the worship of Shiva predates ARYAN religion has not been conclusive, it is clear that the Vedic god RUDRA ("the Howler") had been amalgamated with the figure of Shiva ("Auspicious One") by the period of the later UPANISHADS. The Śvetāśvatara Upanishad treats Shiva as the paramount deity, but it is not until sometime between the 2nd century BCE and the 2nd century CE, with the rise of the PĀŚUPĀTA sect, that we are able to observe sectarian worship of Shiva. See also VĪRĀŚAIVA.

ŚAKTI \ˈshək-tē\, in HINDUISM, "creative energy" that is inherent in and proceeds from God, also sometimes imagined as a female deity; see ŚĀKTISM. Śakti is the deciding factor in the salvation of the individual and in the processes of the universe because God (SHIVA) acts only through his energy, which, personified as a goddess, is his spouse. Her role is very different in the various systems: she may be considered the central figure in a philosophically established doctrine, the dynamic aspect of BRAHMAN, producing the universe through her MĀYĀ, or mysterious power of illusion; a capricious demoniac ruler of nature in its destructive aspects; a benign mother goddess; the queen of a celestial court; or even the source of all things, including Shiva himself. Iconographically she is represented by the YONI.

ŚĀKTISM

In TANTRIC HINDUISM, Śakti represents mental activity and the female aspect of Supreme Reality and is paired with Shiva, the representative of the male aspect. Within the human body, the blissful realization of supreme nonduality is realized by awakening Śakti, conceived of as lying coiled around the lowest chakra of the body, and drawing her upward along the spinal cord to be united with Shiva at the top of the head. See also TANTRA; KUNḌALINĪ.

ŚĀKTISM \ˈshək-ti-zəm\, also spelled Shaktism (“The Worship of the Goddess Śakti”), major form of worship in HINDUISM. The millennia-old river of what is now called “Hinduism” can be divided into three broad, interflowing, overlapping currents: VAIṢṆAVISM, the worship of the god VISHNU; ŚAIVISM, the worship of the god SHIVA; and Śāktism, the worship of the Goddess as ŚAKTI (“Power”). Śāktism is thus a general term used to designate a wide variety of traditions in South Asia whose general focus is the worship of the Goddess. As an academic or popular religious category, Śāktism is a reflection of the common Hindu belief that the innumerable goddesses of village and Sanskrit lore are all manifestations of a single Mahādevī, or “Great Goddess.” Although usually held to be ancient, the concept of a Great Goddess probably dates to the medieval period, when it was used to fuse the wildly disparate local and pan-Indian traditions into an ideologically unifying theology. As a theological category the term Śāktism is helpful but imprecise, since it can refer to various historically and doctrinally distinct traditions—from the mythologies of goddesses that appear in the medieval PURĀNAS, to the two major goddess-branches, or “families” (kula), of Śākta Tantrism (the Srī-kula and the Kālī-kula), to the virtually endless number of local village goddesses past and present.

Followers of Śāktism are often called Śāktas (“Empowered Ones”). Śāktas not only worship the Śakti as Goddess but also attempt to enhance, control, and transform the Goddess’ power-manifestations in the śakti, or “energy,” of the human body and the living cosmos. Specifically, the Goddess is believed to dwell at the anal base of the human body in the form of a sleeping coiled serpent (KUNḌALINĪ). Through complex meditations and sexual-yogic rituals, this “serpent power” can be aroused or awakened, at which time she moves up the central channel (śuṣumnā) of the subtle body (usually superimposed upon the spinal column), piercing the various energy centers (CHAKRAS) located along the way until she enters the final chakra at the top of the head and ecstatically unites there with her husband-lover SHIVA. This mythological union of the Goddess and the God is experienced psycho-physiologically as an ecstatic-mystical trance whose exploding bliss is said to overflow from the cranial region and flow down the entire body in a flood of ECSTASY and intense pleasure.

Historically, Śāktism has been popular on the geographic peripheries of South Asia, particularly in Kashmir, South India, Assam, and Bengal, though its Tantric symbols and rituals have been omnipresent within the Hindu traditions since at least the 6th century CE. More recently, various forms of traditional, philosophical, and popular Śāktism have entered the West with traditional immigrant Indian populations, among some Indological academic communities, and with various “New Age” and feminist-oriented traditions, usually under the more popular rubric of Tantrism or TANTRA.

SALAFIYAH \sā-lā-ˈfē-ə\, also spelled Salafiyya, Islamic reform movement that originated in the late 19th century and aimed at a regeneration of ISLAM by a return to the tradition of the “pious forefathers” (al-salaf al-ṣāliḥ). In most locations the movement was opposed to the process of secularization and Western imperialism, while in some areas (e.g., Egypt) it came to be associated with Arab nationalism. See also ʿABDUH, MUHAMMAD; RASHĪD RIḌĀ, MUHAMMAD.

ṢALĀT \sə-ˈlāt\ (Arabic), also spelled salah \-ˈlā\, daily ritual prayer enjoined upon all Muslims as one of the FIVE PILLARS OF ISLAM (arkān al-Islam). There is disagreement among Islamic scholars as to whether some passages about prayer in the QURʾAN are actually references to the ṣalāt. Within MUHAMMAD’S lifetime five ritual prayers, each preceded by ABLUTION, were observed: ṣalāt al-fajr (dawn), al-ẓuhr (midday), al-ʿaṣr (afternoon), al-maghrib (sunset), and al-ʿishā (evening). Under such special circumstances as illness, a journey, or war, a modification or limited postponement of these ṣalāts is allowed.

Though individual performance of ṣalāt is permissible, collective worship in the mosque has special merit. With their faces turned in the direction (QIBLA) of the shrine of the KAʿBA in MECCA, the worshipers align themselves in parallel rows behind the IMAM, or prayer leader, who directs them as they execute the rakʿas (physical postures coupled with Qurʾanic recitations).

On Fridays, instead of the prayer just after noon, a congregational prayer (ṣalāt al-jumʿa) is offered; it includes two sermons (KHUTBAS) delivered from the pulpit. Special congregational prayers are offered in the middle of the morning on the two festival days (īds), one immediately following the month of fasting, RAMADĀN, and the other following the PILGRIMAGE, or HAJJ. Although not obligatory, individual devotional prayers, especially during the night, are emphasized and are a common practice among pious Muslims.

SALII \ˈsā-lē-ī\ (Latin: “Dancers”), in ancient Italy, PRIESTHOOD associated with the worship of MARS. Chapters existed in Rome and in other central Italian cities. The Salii, who were all born patricians, were usually young men whose parents were still living. They commonly resigned the priesthood on the assumption of high political office; vacancies were filled by a vote of the remaining Salii. The chief Salii festivals were held at the opening (March) and closing (October) of the summer campaigning season.

SĀLIMĪYA \sā-li-ˈmē-ə\, school of Muslim theologians founded by the Muslim scholar and mystic Sahl at-Tustarī (d. 896 CE). The school was named after one of his disciples, Muhammad ibn Sālim (d. 909 CE). Even though the Sālīmīya were not a Sufi group in the strict sense of the word, they utilized many Sufi terms and ideas in their doctrines.

The Sālīmīya spoke of God’s tajallī (appearance) in human form on the day of judgment for all his creatures to see. When this happens, God’s light will overwhelm the scene, and salvation will be granted to everyone and everything. Upon the doctrine that God created humans after his image, they hold that ittiḥād (mystical union) with God can be achieved through contemplation of one’s own personality until complete consciousness of it is achieved, as every human has an element of divinity that he or she must try to realize through constant contemplation.

SALMĀN AL-FĀRISĪ \sāl-ˈmān-əl-fā-rē-ˈsē\ (fl. 7th century; b. near Iṣfahān, Iran), popular figure in Muslim legend and a national hero of Iran. He was a COMPANION OF THE PROPHET.

While still a boy he converted from ZOROASTRIANISM to CHRISTIANITY and began a long religious quest. He traveled to Syria and then to central Arabia, seeking the prophet who, he was told, would revive the religion of ABRAHAM. On the way he was sold into slavery. In MEDINA he met MUHAMMAD, with whose aid he purchased his freedom. According to tradition, when the Meccans came to besiege Muhammad in Medina, it was Salmān who suggested that, instead of the usual practice of the besieged sallying out to meet their opponents, a ditch be dug across the city’s approaches as a form of protection. This innovation in Arabian warfare, which led to the BATTLE OF THE DITCH in 627, was instrumental in Muhammad’s successful defense.

Salmān al-Fārisī’s fame is due largely to his nationality—he was a prototype of the Persians who were converted to ISLAM and who played a central role in the course of Muslim history. Salmān also has been important in Muslim religious thought. The SHĪʿITE moderates gave him special respect because of his nearness to the Prophet, and the extreme Shīʿites count him as one of the divine emanations recognized by their theology.

SALUS \ˈsā-ləs\, in ROMAN RELIGION, the goddess of safety and welfare, later identified with the Greek Hygieia. Her temple on the Quirinal at Rome, dedicated in 302 BCE, was the scene of an annual sacrifice on August 5.

The augurium salutis was an annual ascertainment of the acceptability to the gods of prayers for the public salus. Because it was required to be performed on a day of peace, the constant warfare of the late republic caused its interruption, but it was revived by the emperor Augustus. In the empire, the goddess appeared both as Salus Publica and Salus Augusti.

SALVATION, also called redemption, in religion, deliverance of humankind from fundamentally negative conditions, such as suffering, evil, finitude, and death; also, in some religions, the restoration or raising up of the natural world to a higher realm, or state. The notion is not present in some religions.

Divine agents of salvation are known from the ancient world, particular in the person of the DIOSCURI, who often were termed Sotēr (“Savior”). The doctrine is, however, perhaps most characteristic of CHRISTIANITY, in which context it signifies the action of God within history whereby humanity is delivered from SIN and death through the life, death, and RESURRECTION of JESUS CHRIST.

JUDAISM posits a collective salvation for the people of ISRAEL. In the Hebrew BIBLE, redemption is usually described as deliverance from material disasters, but in Psalms 130 it is promised that God “will redeem Israel from all his iniquities.” The restoration of the holy nation and the vindication of the Jews as God’s chosen people in the LAST JUDGMENT are regarded as the salvatory culmination of history.

The concept of salvation from future punishment by submission to ALLĀH appears as the ultimate aim of the faithful in ISLAM. ZOROASTRIANISM AND PARSISM envision a universal salvation of mankind through the ultimate triumph of good over evil.

Although religions of the East tend to regard salvation or deliverance from the bondage of life and death as a matter of self-effort through practice and discipline, there have appeared in these contexts notions of intervening divine aid. In MAHĀYĀNA BUDDHISM, the figure of AMITĀBHA, or Amida, Buddha is an important example. The AVATARS of VISHNU are also a means of deliverance and restoration.

SALVATION ARMY, international Christian religious and charitable movement organized on a military pattern. The Army is established in more than 109 countries; it preaches in about 175 languages in more than 15,000 evangelical centers and operates more than 3,000 social welfare institutions, hospitals, schools, and other agencies. Its continuing concerns include a relief program in postwar Rwanda, programs for helping the homeless, rehabilitation centers, and aid to victims of disasters. Its international headquarters are in London.

William Booth, a Methodist minister, established mission stations in London’s East End to feed and house the poor. In 1878 he changed the name of his organization, the Christian Mission, to the Salvation Army. He and his son, William Bramwell Booth, gradually established the Army on a military pattern, with the elder Booth as general for life. It spread quickly over Britain and then expanded internationally.

In 1884 the U.S. organization sought to establish its independence of General Booth. Upon being expelled, its leaders set up the American Salvation Army, which soon declined. In 1896 Ballington Booth, another son of the general and national commander in the United States, resigned after a dispute and set up the Volunteers of America, which endured as a national organization with headquarters in New York.

The basic unit of organization within the Army is the corps, commanded by an officer of a rank ranging from lieutenant to brigadier, who is responsible to a divisional headquarters. Divisions are grouped into territories (usually a territory is a country, except in the United States, where there are four territories).

Converts who desire to become soldiers in the Army are required to sign Articles of War and volunteer their services. The officers are the equivalent of ministers of other Protestant churches. Training for each officer consists of a two-year residence at one of the schools, followed by a five-year plan of advanced studies. Women have absolute equality with men.

The doctrines of the Army include the basic principles common to most evangelical denominations of PROTESTANTISM. William Booth believed that the SACRAMENTS were not necessary to the salvation of the soul. He sought to bring into his worship services an informal atmosphere that would put new converts at ease. Joyous singing, instrumental music, clapping of hands, personal testimony, free prayer, and an open invitation to repentance characterize the services.

SAMĀ' \sā-'ma\ (Arabic: "listening"), in SUFISM, the practice of listening to music and chanting to reinforce ECSTASY and induce mystical trance. The scripturalists regarded such practices as un-Islamic, and the more puritanical among them associated the Sufis' music, song, and dancing with drinking parties and immoral activities. The Sufis countered such attitudes by pointing out that MUHAMMAD himself permitted the QUR'AN to be chanted and that the ADHĀN (call for prayer) was also chanted.

Sufis maintain that melodies and rhythms prepare the soul for a deeper comprehension of the divine realities and a better appreciation of divine music. Music, like other beautiful things, draws the Sufis closer to God, who is the source of beauty. Many Sufis have held that a true mystic does not lose himself in such forms as music but uses them only to bring himself into a spiritual realm, after which he must experience deeper meanings and realities. While Muslim conservative legalists reprobated samā' as an innovation (BID'Ā), some Muslim scholars held that it was a useful innovation since it might bring souls nearer to God.

Many Sufis—e.g., the MAWLAWĪYA dervishes—combined dancing with samā'. Often Sufis requested that after their death there should be no mourning at their funerals, insisting instead that samā' sessions be held to celebrate their entrance into eternal life. The Sufis warned, nevertheless, that the full appreciation of samā' requires strong ascetic training. An individual must be pure in heart and strong in character before indulging in samā'; otherwise music and song would arouse his base instincts instead of elevating his spirituality. Some Sufis reject the practice of samā' altogether. See also DHIKR.

SAMĀDHI \sā-'mā-dē\ (Sanskrit: "total self-collectedness"), in HINDUISM and BUDDHISM, the highest state of mental concentration that a person can achieve while still bound to the body. Samādhi is a state of profound and utterly absorptive contemplation of the Absolute that is undisturbed by desire, anger, or any other ego-generated thought or emotion. According to some Hindus, the power to attain samādhi is a precondition of attaining release from the cycle of rebirths (SAMSĀRA). Hence the death of a person having this power is also considered to be his entrance into samādhi, as is the site where a person believed to be so empowered was buried. The adept is buried in a seated pose, marking the meditative state, and the very practice of burial sets the samādhi apart from ordinary mortals, whose less pure bodies are appropriately cremated, according to the Hindu norm. Shrines honoring the samādhis of well-known saints often serve as sites of PILGRIMAGE for Buddhists and Hindus.

SAMARITAN \sə-'mar-ə-tən\, member of a community of Jews, now nearly extinct, that claims to be descended from those Jews of ancient Samaria who were not deported by the Assyrian conquerors of the kingdom of Israel in 722 BCE. The Samaritans call themselves Bene-Yisrael ("Children of Israel"), or Shamerim ("Observant Ones"), for their sole norm of religious observance is the PENTATEUCH. Other Jews call them simply Shomronim (Samaritans); in the TALMUD, they are called Kutim, suggesting that they are rather descendants of Mesopotamian Cuthaeans, who settled in Samaria after the Assyrian conquest.

Jews who returned to their homeland after the BABYLONIAN EXILE would not accept the help of the Samaritans in the building of the Second TEMPLE OF JERUSALEM. Consequently, in the 4th century BCE, they built their own temple in Nābulus (Shechem), at the base of Mount Gerizim, some 25 miles north of Jerusalem. Nābulus is the residence of the HIGH PRIEST, and a SYNAGOGUE is maintained in the city of Holon, just south of Tel Aviv-Yafo. All live in semi-isolation, marrying only within their own community. They pray in Hebrew but adopted Arabic as their vernacular after the Muslim conquest of 636 CE.

SĀMA VEDA \sā-mə-'vā-də\ (Sanskrit: "Veda of Chants"), in HINDUISM, Vedic text made up of a selection of verses (drawn almost wholly from the ṚG VEDA) that are provided with musical notation and are intended as an aid to the performance of sacred songs. The hymns are sung by priests in a melodic and melismatic (one word to two or more notes) style, with a range of six or more tones. See also VEDA.

SAMBATION \sām-bā-'tyōn\, legendary "Sabbath River" beyond which the TEN LOST TRIBES OF ISRAEL were exiled in 721 BCE by Shalmaneser V, king of Assyria. Legends describe it as a roaring torrent (of water or of stones), the turbulence of which ceases only on the SABBATH, when Jews are not allowed to travel.

The ancient Jewish historian FLAVIUS JOSEPHUS located the river in Syria and Pliny asserted it was in Judaea, while the Spanish-Jewish scholar NAHMANIDES identified it with the River Habor (al-Khābūr River) of the BIBLE (2 Kings 17:6). The 17th-century Jewish scholar MANASSEH BEN ISRAEL carefully studied Eldad ha-Dani's 9th-century account of his reputed discovery of the "sons of Moses" beyond the river.

From the Middle Ages to the 19th century, the river was sought in India, Africa, China, Japan, and Spain. Legends of the river produced a vast Jewish literature that eventually entered into Arabic and Christian writings. Among eastern European Jews, an unruly child was sometimes referred to as a "Sambation."

SAMHAIN \ˈsɑ-vən, ˈsɑʊn/, also spelled Samain (Old Irish Samain: "first day of November," or "the festival held on that day"), in CELTIC RELIGION, one of the most important calendar festivals of the year. At Samhain, held on November 1, the world of the gods was believed to be made visible to mankind, and the gods played many tricks on mortals. Sacrifices and propitiations of every kind were thought to be vital, for without them the Celts believed they could not prevail over the perils of the season or counteract the activities of the deities. Samhain was a precursor to HALLOWEEN.

ŚAMKARA \ˈʃəŋ-kə-rə/, also spelled Saṅkara, or Shaṅkara, (fl. late 7th–early 8th centuries; traditionally b. Kālaḍi, Kerala, India—d. Kedārnāth, HIMALAYAS), philosopher and theologian, the most renowned exponent of the ADVAITA VEDĀNTA school of philosophy. Works indisputably written by him include his Brahma-sūtra-bhāṣya, his commentaries on the Bṛhadāraṇyaka and Taittirīya UPANISHADS, and his systematic treatise Upadeśasāhasrī. Many scholars also accept his authorship of a commentary on the BHAGAVAD GĪTĀ and a subcommentary on Gauḍapāda's analysis of the Māṇḍūkya Upanishad. The schematic works Vivekacūḍāmaṇi and Ātmabodha, however, almost certainly have to be rejected as Śamkara's, though they are widely accepted as authentic by Advaitans. Śamkara's writings affirm his belief in an unchanging, nondual reality (BRAHMAN) distinct from the illusion of plurality and differentiation that characterizes waking consciousness, but his "illusionism" (māyāvāda) is far less thoroughgoing than works like the Vivekacūḍāmaṇi make it appear.

It has been customary to assign Śamkara the birth and death dates 788–820, but the approximate dates 700–750, or slightly earlier, are more probable. According to one tradition, Śamkara was born into a BRAHMIN family in a village called Kālaḍi. After his father's death he became a SANNYĀSĪ (ascetic) against his mother's will. He studied under Govinda, a pupil of Gauḍapāda. Gauḍapāda is notable as the author of an important Vedānta work, Māṇḍūkya-kārikā, in which the influence of MAHĀYĀNA BUDDHISM is evident.

A tradition says that SHIVA was Śamkara's family deity and that he was, by birth, a Śakta, or worshiper of ŚAKTI. Although his Dakṣiṇāmūrti-stotra presents him as a worshiper of Shiva, other apparently authentic texts, such as his commentary on the Gītā, align him more closely with VAIŠNAVISM. Nonetheless, he is widely regarded as the founder of the daśanāmī order of ascetics, which was Śaivite in orientation (see ŚAIVISM).

Śamkara is said to have traveled all over India, holding discussions with philosophers of different creeds. His legendary debate with Maṇḍana Mīśra, a philosopher of the Mīmāṃsā (Investigation) school, may reflect the historical conflict between Śamkara, who regarded the knowledge of Brahman as the only means to final release, and followers of the Mīmāṃsā school, which emphasized the performance of ordained duty and the Vedic rituals.

Śamkara is said to have founded four monasteries: at Sringeri (south), Puri (east), Dvaraka (west), and Badarinath (north). Whether or not this is literally true, the foundation of these institutions was doubtless one of the most significant factors in according to Śamkara's teachings the leading role they have played in the history of Indian philosophy.

More than 300 works—of commentary, exposition, and poetry—written in Sanskrit, are attributed to him, but few are regarded as authentic. His Brahma Sūtra Bhāṣya, the commentary on the Brahma Sūtra, is a fundamental text of the Vedānta school. The Upadeśasāhasrī is a good introduction to Śamkara's philosophy, because it is the only noncommentative work that is certainly authentic.

In marked contrast to these, because of its clearly devotional tone, is the Dakṣiṇāmūrti-stotra. In this work worship and philosophy merge, since the "south-facing" (dakṣiṇāmūrti) Shiva being praised by Śamkara is the Himalayan yogi who contemplates the nondual nature of (his own) reality. Śamkara's works reveal that he was not only versed in the orthodox Brahminical traditions but also was well acquainted with Mahāyāna Buddhism; he made full use of his knowledge of Buddhism to attack Buddhist doctrines severely and to transmute them into his own Vedāntic nondualism. Thus philosophically as well as institutionally, Śamkara is often credited with having laid the basis for Hindu orthodoxy in India, after centuries of challenge from the heterodox systems of JAINISM and especially Buddhism.

SĀMKHYA \ˈsəŋ-kyä, ˈsəm-,/, also spelled Sāṅkhyā (Sanskrit: "Enumeration," or "Number"), one of the six orthodox systems (DARŚANS) of Indian philosophy. Sāmkhya adopts a consistent DUALISM of matter (prakṛti) and soul, or self (puruṣa).

Although many references to the system are given in earlier texts, Sāmkhya received its classical form and expression in the Sāmkhya Kārikās ("Stanzas of Sāmkhya") by Īśvarakṛṣṇa (c. 3rd century CE).

According to Sāmkhya, there are an infinite number of similar but separate puruṣas ("selves"), no one of which is superior to any other. Since PRAKṚTI AND PURUṢA are sufficient to explain the universe, there is no need to hypothesize the existence of a god. The puruṣa is ubiquitous, all-conscious, all-pervasive, motionless, unchangeable, immaterial, and without desire. Prakṛti is the universal and subtle (i.e., unmanifest) matter, or nature, and as such is determined only by time and space.

When the puruṣa impinges on prakṛti, it becomes focused on prakṛti, and out of this evolves mahat ("great one") or buddhi ("spiritual awareness"). Next to evolve is the individualized ego consciousness (ahaṃkāra, "I-maker"), which imposes upon the puruṣa the misapprehension that the ego is the basis of the puruṣa's objective existence.

The ahaṃkāra is divided into the five gross elements (space, air, fire, water, earth), the five fine elements (sound, touch, sight, taste, smell), the five organs of perception (with which to hear, touch, see, taste, smell), the five organs of activity (with which to speak, grasp, move, procreate, evacuate), and mind, or thought (manas). The universe is the result of the combinations and permutations of these various principles, from which puruṣa remains separate. This thoroughgoing distinction between psychological and physical functions on the one hand and pure "personhood" on the other is one of Sāmkhya's enduring contributions to Indian thought. It has been matched from earliest times by disciplines associated with YOGA, whose purpose is to create in the adept a realization of the singular puruṣa apart from the manifoldness of prakṛti.

Another broadly influential idea first encountered in Sāmkhya is the parsing of matter (prakṛti) into three guṇas ("qualities") that cross-cut the elements listed above; these are sattva (associated with illumination), rajas (energy and passion), and tamas (obscurity and ignorance).

SAMMATĪYA \səm-mə-ˈtē-yə\; see PUDGALAVĀDIN.

SAMPO \ˈsəm-pō\, mysterious object often referred to in the mythological songs of the Finns, most likely a cosmological pillar or some similar support holding up the vault of heaven. In a cycle of songs, referred to by scholars as the sampo-epic, the sampo is forged by the creator-smith ILMARINEN for Louhi, the hag-goddess of the underworld, and is then stolen back by Ilmarinen and the shaman-hero VÄINÄMÖINEN. They are pursued by Louhi, and in the ensuing battle sampo is smashed into little pieces, which still preserve enough potency to provide for “sowing and reaping” and other forms of prosperity.

The comments of early informants reveal that the songs were part of a ritual cycle that was sung at a spring sowing ceremony to further the growth of grain. Scholars are more or less in agreement that sampo refers to the support holding up the firmament, a concept found in many early cosmologies. The name sampo may even be a cognate of words such as Sanskrit skambha, “pillar,” and Altaic sumbur, the “world mountain.” Because it is the mythical axis mundi, the axis around which the heavens revolve, all life is dependent on the sampo, which the Finnish songs depict as the source of all good.

SAMPRADĀYA \səm-prə-ˈdā-yə\, in HINDUISM, school of religious thought and practice, transmitted from one teacher to another. From about the 11th century onward, several sects emerged out of VAIṢṆAVISM in South India. They include the Sanaka Sampradāya (also known as Nimbārkiś, the followers of NIMBĀRKA); the Śrī Sampradāya (or Śrī Vaiṣṇavas, following the teaching of RĀMĀNUJA); the Brahmā Sampradāya (or Madhvas, the followers of MADHVA); and the Rudra Sampradāya (or Viṣṇusvāmīś, the followers of Viṣṇusvāmī). Each school is named after a distant and perhaps mythological founder, such as Śrī (the goddess LAKṢMĪ), from whom it has been transmitted through a succession of teachers to the earthly founders of the sects. More recently established sampradāyas, such as those associated with CAITANYA, VALLABHA, or RĀMĀNANDA, have typically claimed philosophical lineages, rooting them in one of the four earlier sampradāyas, which they are then held to have fulfilled and, in effect, superseded.

SAMŚĀRA \səm-ˈsär-ə, səŋ-\ (Sanskrit: “the running around”), in Indian philosophy, the central conception of metempsychosis: the soul, finding itself awash in the “sea of saṃsāra,” strives to find release (MOKṢA) from the bonds of its own past deeds (KARMA), which form part of the general web of which saṃsāra is made. BUDDHISM, which does not assume the existence of a permanent soul, accepts a semipermanent personality core that goes through the process of saṃsāra.

The SĀMĀKHYA school of Hindu philosophy assumes the existence of two bodies, a “gross” one (sthūla), which is the material body, and a “subtle” one, which is immaterial. When the gross body has perished, the subtle one survives and migrates to another one; this subtle body consists of the higher psychomaterial functions of buddhi (“consciousness”), ahaṃkāra (“I-consciousness”), manas (“mind as coordinator of sense impressions”), and PRĀṆA (“breath”), the principle of vitality.

The range of saṃsāra stretches from insects (and sometimes vegetables and minerals) to the generative god BRAHMĀ. A variety of explications of the workings of the karmic process within saṃsāra have been proposed. According to several, the soul after death first goes to a heaven or hell until it has consumed most of its good or bad karma. Then it returns to a new womb, the remainder of its karma having determined the circumstances of its next life. The so-called JĀTAKA stories record the Buddha’s previous lives and illustrate the moral and salvific potential that comes with an accurate, enlightened appraisal of the vast network of interconnections described by the idea of saṃsāra.

SAMSKĀRA \səm-ˈskär-ə, səŋ-\, any of the personal sacraments traditionally observed at every stage of a Hindu’s life, from the moment of conception to the final scattering of one’s funeral ashes. The observance of the saṃskāras is based on custom and on texts such as the Gṛhya Sūtras, the epics, or the PURĀṆAS and differs considerably according to region, CASTE, or family. Most rites prescribed in the Brahminical texts are performed by the father in the home and tend to be more carefully observed in the case of male children. The most generally accepted list of 16 traditional saṃskāras begins with the prenatal ceremonies of garbhādhāna (for conception); pūṃsavana (to favor a male birth); and śimantonnayana (“hair-parting,” to ensure safe delivery). The rites of childhood begin before the severing of the cord, with the ceremony of jātakarman (birth); followed at a later date by nāmakaraṇa (name-giving); niṣkramaṇa (the child’s first view of the sun); annaprāśana (first feeding of solid food); cūḍākaraṇa (first TONSURE of the boy’s head); and karṇavedha (boring of the ears for the wearing of ornaments). The educational saṃskāras can commence as early as the fifth year with the vidyārambha (the learning of the alphabet). The UPANAYANA (initiation) confers the sacred thread on male children of the three upper social classes; the vedārambha signals the beginning of the student’s study of the VEDAS; the keśānta, or godāna (first shaving of the beard), marks the approach of manhood; and the samāvartana (returning home from the house of the GURU) or snāna (“bathing”), the completion of his student life. The sacrament of marriage is known as vivāha. The final saṃskāra to be performed is the ANTYEṢṬI, the funeral rite.

In modern times the full saṃskāras are not generally performed, and this may always have been the case beyond the observant Brahminical communities assumed in the ancient texts. At present the ceremonies most commonly observed are those of initiation, marriage, and death.

While certain of the above-mentioned saṃskāras, including even tonsure and upanayana, have been and are increasingly observed for both sexes, there exists an additional set of Hindu life-cycle rituals that are specifically appropriate to women. These are usually not inscribed in Brahminical texts and vary significantly by region and community, commonly focusing on various aspects of childbirth. Other rites, such as vows and austerities aimed at securing a good husband, may have both life-cycle and calendrical associations. Many such rites—e.g., the cleansing and blessing ceremony called cauk or chatī that is performed in middle India about a week after childbirth—cast women themselves in the role of ritual specialists and vary minimally, if at all, as to the sex of the newborn child.

SAMSON \ˈsam-sən\, Hebrew Shimshon, Israelite hero portrayed in an epic narrative in the OLD TESTAMENT (Judges 13–16). He was a NAZIRITE and a warrior whose incredible exploits hint at the weight of Philistine pressure on Israel during much of the early, tribal period of Israel in CANAAN (1200–1000 BCE).

In a French manuscript illumination, Samuel exhorts the Israelites to put away Baal and Ashtaroth and to serve the Lord only (1 Samuel 7), c. 1250

The Granger Collection

Before Samson's birth his parents, peasants of the tribe of DAN at Zorah, near Jerusalem, learned through a THEOPHANY that he was to be dedicated to the life of a Nazirite. Credited with remarkable exploits—e.g., slaying a lion and moving the gates of Gaza—he first broke his Nazirite vow by feasting with a woman from the neighboring town of Timnah who was a Philistine, one of Israel's mortal enemies. On another occasion he repulsed the Philistines' assault on him at Gaza, where he had gone to visit a harlot. He finally fell victim to his foes through love for DELILAH, a woman of the valley of Sorek, who beguiled him into revealing the secret of his strength: his long Nazirite hair. As he slept, Delilah had his hair cut and betrayed him. He was captured, blinded, and enslaved by the Philistines, but in the end his strength was returned, whereupon he demolished the great Philistine temple of the god Dagon at Gaza, destroying his captors and himself (Judges 16:4–30).

SAMUEL \ˈsam-yū-wəl\, Hebrew Shmu'el (fl. c. 11th century BCE, Israel), religious hero in the history of Israel, represented in the OLD TESTAMENT as seer, priest, judge, prophet, and military leader. His greatest distinction was his role in the establishment of the monarchy in Israel.

Biblical accounts of his life. Information about Samuel is contained in 1 Samuel (called in the ROMAN CATHOLIC canon 1 Kings). Samuel, the son of Elkanah (of EPHRAIM) and HANNAH, was born in answer to the prayer of his previously childless mother. In gratitude she dedicated him to the service of the chief SANCTUARY of SHILOH, in the priest Eli's charge. As a boy Samuel received a divine oracle in which the fall of the house of Eli was predicted (1 Samuel 1–3). When he became an adult he inspired Israel to victory over the Philistines at Ebenezer (chapter 7). The proposal of the elders of Israel to install a king was rejected by Samuel as infidelity to God (chapter 8). By the revelation of YAHWEH, however, he anointed and installed SAUL (chapters 9–10). Saul was vindicated as king by his leadership of Israel in a campaign against the AMMONITES (chapter 11); after this, Samuel retired from the leadership of Israel (chapter 12). He reappeared, however, to announce the oracle of Yahweh rejecting Saul as king, once for arrogating to himself the right of sacrifice (chapter 13) and a second time for failing to carry out the law of the ban against the AMALEKITES (chapter 15). By the oracle of Yahweh, Samuel secretly anointed David as king (chapter 16). After he died, his ghost was evoked by a necromancer at the request of Saul; he then announced a third time the rejection of Saul (chapter 28).

Conflicting traditions about Samuel. Samuel thus appears as a leader of all Israel; his authority is basically religious, mostly prophetic, although with some features of priestly authority. He is the spokesman of Yahweh in the election of both Saul and David. Yet he appears at first as hostile to the monarchy and then as favorable to it.

The two major divergences in 1 Samuel lie in those passages that critics call the "pro-monarchic" source (1 Samuel 9:1–10:16) and those passages called the "antimonarchic" source (1 Samuel 8 and 10:17–27). In the pro-monarchic account, Samuel is an obscure village seer (with distinct evidence of occult practices). The institution of the monarchy and the election of the king occur according to the will of Yahweh as revealed to Samuel. Saul is chosen king by a charismatic display of military courage and leadership: his victory over the Ammonites.

In the antimonarchic account Samuel is a figure known through "all Israel"; his authority rests on his position as judge. The institution of kingship comes from the request of the elders of Israel, and this request is treated by Samuel as rebellion against Yahweh. Samuel is clearly presented as the last of the judges; it is indicated that the system of the judges was rejected by the Israelites because of their worldliness.

Significance. There must have been some reason why Samuel was important enough to be remembered for a major role in the establishment of the monarchy, yet the conflicting features of the story surrounding him are not easily resolved. Clearly, those behind the narrative must have been torn between the protection that the royal political system offered against the Philistines and the threat they posed to religious and national traditions. This internal division in Israel is reflected in the person of Samuel, who stood with most Israelites on both sides of the question.

SAMUEL HA-NAGID \hä-'nä-gēd\, Arabic Ismail ibn Nagrel'a (b. 993, Córdoba, Spain—d. 1055/56, Granada), Talmudic scholar, grammarian, philologist, poet, warrior, and statesman who for two decades was the power behind the throne of the caliphate of Granada.

As a youth Samuel received a thorough education in all branches of Jewish and Islamic knowledge (see JUDAISM; ISLAM). When Córdoba was sacked in 1013 by the Berbers, Samuel fled to Málaga, at that time part of the Muslim kingdom of Granada. He soon became the private secretary and political adviser to the Granadan vizier, who, at his death, commended Samuel to the CALIPH Ḥabbūs. The caliph made Samuel the new vizier, and as such he assumed direction of Granada's diplomatic and military affairs. When Ḥabbūs died in 1037, Samuel became the de facto caliph. He steered Granada through years of continuous warfare and actively participated in all major campaigns. His influence became so great that he was able to arrange for his son Joseph to succeed him as vizier.

Samuel was also nagid (Hebrew: "chief") of Granadan Jewry. As such, he appointed all the judges and headed the TALMUDIC academy. He is generally believed to be the author of Mevo ha-Talmud ("Introduction to the Talmud"), a long-lived Talmudic manual. He also wrote a concordance to the Hebrew BIBLE, encouraged learning in all fields, and became a respected figure among both Arabs and Jews.

SANATANA DHARMA \,sən-'tā-nə-'dər-mə, sə-'nā-tə-nə-\, in HINDUISM, term used to denote the "eternal" or absolute set of duties or religiously ordained practices incumbent upon all Hindus, regardless of class, CASTE, or sect. Different texts give different lists of the duties, but in general sanatana dharma consists of virtues such as honesty, refraining from injuring living beings, purity, goodwill, mercy, patience, forbearance, self-restraint, generosity, and ASCETICISM. Sanatana dharma is contrasted with svadharma, one's "own duty" or the particular duties enjoined upon an individual according to his or her class or caste and stage of life. The potential for conflict between the two types of DHARMA (e.g., between the particular duties of a warrior and the general injunction to practice non-injury) is addressed in Hindu texts such as the BHAGAVAD GĪTĀ, where it is said that in such cases SVADHARMA must prevail.

The term has also more recently been used by Hindu leaders, reformers, and nationalists to refer to Hinduism as a unified world religion. Sanatana dharma has thus become a synonym for the "eternal" truth and teachings of Hinduism, the latter conceived of as not only transcendent of history and unchanging but also as indivisible and ultimately nonsectarian.

SĀNCĪ \ˈsān-čē\, also spelled Sāncī, historic site, west-central Madhya Pradesh state, central India, location of the best-preserved group of BUDDHIST monuments in India. Most noteworthy is the Great Stupa, which was probably begun by the emperor AŚOKA in the mid-3rd century BCE and later enlarged. The STUPA consists of a base bearing a hemispherical dome (aṇḍa) representing the dome of heaven enclosing the Earth; it is surmounted by a squared rail unit, or harmikā, the world mountain, from which rises a mast (yaṣṭi) to symbolize the cosmic axis. The mast bears umbrellas (chatras) that represent the various heavens (devaloka). The stupa is enclosed by a massive stone railing pierced by four gateways on which are elaborate carvings depicting the life of the BUDDHA. Other remains include several smaller stupas, an assembly hall (caitya), an Aśokan pillar with inscription, and several monasteries (4th–11th century CE). Several relic baskets and more than 400 epigraphical records have also been discovered.

SAN-CHIAO \ˈsān-'jyäu\, Pinyin Sanjiao (Chinese: "Three Religions"), Chinese SYNCRETISTIC movement that became popular in Sung and Ming China. Its composite moral teachings, drawn from a mixture of CONFUCIAN ethics, the TAOIST system of merits, and the BUDDHIST concept of REINCARNATION, are represented by popular tracts, the so-called "books on goodness" (SHAN-SHU), which have been in extremely wide circulation since the 14th century. San-chiao was rejected by most Confucians and Buddhists but received wide support in Taoist circles. Many Taoist masters of those periods transmitted techniques of inner cultivation to their disciples while at the same time preaching the moralism of the "Three Religions" to outsiders.

SAN-CH'ING \ˈsän-'chīŋ\, Pinyin Sanqing (Chinese: "Three Pure Ones"), highest triad of deities in the generalized pantheon of sectarian religious TAOISM. First in evidence during the T'ang dynasty, the triad represented a ranking of three deities associated with the three highest heavens (or "pure" realms) in the Taoist COSMOLOGY. Today the deities are identified as: Yüan-shih t'ien-tsun (Original Beginning Heavenly Worthy), Ling-pao t'ien-tsun (Numinous Jewel Heavenly Worthy; also known as T'ai-shang tao-chün, or Grand Lord of the TAO), and Tao-te t'ien-tsun (Tao and Its Power Heavenly Worthy; also known as T'ai-shang Lao-chün, or Grand Lord Lao). In contemporary Taoism, these deities are often invoked during community renewal rituals that are known as chiao.

SANCTUARY, in religion, sacred place, set apart from the profane, ordinary world. Originally, sanctuaries were natural locations, such as groves or hills, where the divine or sacred was believed to be especially present. The concept was later extended to include man-made structures—e.g., the TABERNACLE (tent) of the ancient Hebrews, the later TEMPLE OF JERUSALEM, the sacred lodge of the Algonquin and Sioux, or, especially, sacred parts of such structures. Sanctuaries were reserved for special religious functions, and a state of purity was required of participants. Special TABOOS and rules prevented the profanation of sanctuaries. It was because of this special sacred quality and the protection that it afforded that the sanctuary became a place of asylum for fugitives or criminals. In addition to the fear of shedding blood in a holy place, a dominant motive in protecting the fugitive was the fear of the evil force that would emanate from his curse, believed dangerous to gods as well as men.

Christian sanctuaries, first recognized by Roman law toward the end of the 4th century, developed through recognition of the office of bishop as intercessor. Sanctuary privileges were gradually extended to wider areas of and around churches. JUSTINIAN, however, limited the privilege to persons not guilty of serious crimes. In the Germanic kingdoms, a fugitive was usually surrendered to authorities after an OATH had been taken not to put him to death.

In English common law a person accused of a felony might take refuge in a sanctuary; once there, he had a choice between submitting to trial or confessing the crime to the coroner and swearing to leave the kingdom (abjuration of the realm) and not return without the king's permission. If he would neither submit to trial nor abjure the realm after 40 days, he was starved into submission. In continental Europe the right of sanctuary (called asylum), though much restricted in the 16th century, survived until the French Revolution.

The institution of sanctuary, whatever its origin and meaning, appears to have performed a social function. Although often abused, it prevented excessive use of capital punishment and safeguarded against uncontrolled blood vengeance and execution without trial. The sanctuary was also the source of parliamentary immunities and the custom of diplomatic asylum in embassies.

SAND PAINTING, also called dry painting, type of art that exists in highly developed forms among the Navajo and Pueblo Indians of the American Southwest and in simpler forms among several Plains and California Indian tribes. Although sand painting is an art form, it is valued primarily for religious rather than aesthetic reasons. Its main function is in connection with healing ceremonies.

Sand paintings are stylized, symbolic pictures prepared by trickling small quantities of crushed, colored sandstone, charcoal, pollen, or other dry materials in white, blue, yellow, black, and red hues on a background of clean, smoothed sand. About 600 different pictures are known, consisting of various representations of deities, animals, lightning, rainbows, plants, and other symbols described in the chants that accompany various rites. In healing, the choice of the particular painting is left to the curer. Upon completion of the picture, the patient sits on the center of the painting (i.e., a microcosm of the cosmos), and sand from the painting is applied to parts of his or her body. When the ritual is completed, the painting is destroyed.

SANGHA \ˈsəŋ-ɡə\, Buddhist monastic order, traditionally composed of four groups: monks, nuns, laymen, and laywomen. The sangha is a part—together with the Buddha and the DHARMA (teaching)—of the Threefold Refuge, a basic creed of BUDDHISM.

The sangha is thought to have originated in the group of disciples of the BUDDHA GOTAMA. After the Buddha's death his disciples continued to live together as a community, wandering from place to place and living off the receipt of alms. At the time of the full and new moon (the uposatha days), followers of the Buddha would gather to reaffirm their sense of community and purpose by reciting their basic beliefs, such as the Threefold Refuge and the codes of conduct. The custom of spending the rainy season in one place in a study retreat led gradually to the settling of the community.

The modern sangha is governed by disciplinary rules (vinaya) that form part of the sacred canon and by the traditions of interpretation that have developed over the centuries. Generally, the monastic order is dependent on the lay community for economic support in the form of alms or large gifts of money and property, since Buddhist monks in many sects—in particular those of the THERAVĀDA tradition in Southeast Asia—are discouraged from engaging in either commerce or agriculture.

SANHEDRIN \ˈsən-ˈhe-drən, sän-; san-ˈhē-\, also spelled Sanhedrim \-drəm\, supreme Jewish administrative body from the 1st century BCE through the 5th or 6th century CE. Although the term refers to a court and seems usually to have applied to the highest court, the Sanhedrin's exact composition and powers—religious, judicial, and legislative—are reported variously in different sources. The Gospels and the historian JOSEPHUS describe the Sanhedrin primarily as a judicial council headed by the HIGH PRIEST or king and active in various locales in the promotion of Jewish political programs. The term becomes most prominent in the rabbinic literature, where a complete tractate of law dedicated to this topic pictures the Sanhedrin primarily as a legislative body, centered in Jerusalem and headed by the preeminent rabbinic authority of each age—the Pharisaic schools while the Temple stood and the rabbinic PATRIARCH thereafter. Here the Sanhedrin is depicted as concerned, among other matters, with religious issues.

Despite scholars' attempts to reconcile these contradictory descriptions, there is no coherent picture of the legal and judicial institutions in this period, and thus the actual role of the Sanhedrin remains unclear. It is most likely that diverse groups in early Judaism—PHARISEES, SADDUCEES, and others—had their own judicial and legislative organizations, so that a variety of structures existed simultaneously. It is equally likely that forms of Temple-based administration that existed while the Temple stood gave way to new and different institutions after its destruction. Therefore, just as the confusion of the sources seems to suggest, no single conception of the Sanhedrin can accurately convey its historical diversity and development.

In the MISHNAH, the term Sanhedrin overlaps with the term bet din, that is, "house of judgment" or "court." While the Mishnah-tractate Sanhedrin is concerned for the most part with judicial courts that try capital cases, it performed a wide range of other functions. A Sanhedrin of 71 members, referred to as a Great Sanhedrin, judged tribes, false prophets, and high priests; declared war; permitted additions to the city of Jerusalem; and declared a city to be "apostate." This Sanhedrin is distinguished from a "small" Sanhedrin of 23 members, which judged cases involving the death penalty, and from courts of 3 judges, which adjudicated civil and criminal issues.

Constraints on Jewish self-government meant that from the end of the Talmudic period or earlier, no supreme Jewish judicial court was convened. An exception occurred in 1806–07, when Napoleon called an Assembly of Notables to determine whether or not the Jews of France deserved French citizenship. To answer these questions, the Assembly established a Sanhedrin of 71 members, two-thirds of them RABBIS and one-third lay people. This Sanhedrin declared that its right to speak for all French Jewry derived specifically from ancient custom and law, which vested in such a court the power to pass legislation that would promote the welfare of the people of Israel.

SAN-KUAN \ˈsän-ˈgwän\, Pinyin Sanguan, in Chinese mythology, the Three Officials: T'ien-kuan, official of heaven who bestows happiness; Ti-kuan, official of earth who grants remission of sins; and Shui-kuan, official of water who averts misfortune.

SAN-LUN \ˈsän-ˈlün\ (“Three Treatises,” or Middle Doctrine), school of Chinese BUDDHISM derived from the Indian MĀDHYAMIKĀ school.

SANNYĀSĪ \sən-ˈyā-sē\, also spelled sannyāsīn \-ˈyā-sin\, feminine sannyāsīnī (Sanskrit: “abandoning,” or “throwing down”), in HINDUISM, religious ascetic who has renounced the world by performing his or her own funeral and abandoning all claims to social or family standing. Since the 5th century CE major texts have associated this achievement with the fourth ASHRAM, or stage, of life. It is uncertain how many SADHUS have exemplified this ideal; the philosopher ŚAMKARA did not, and he is regarded as the archetypal sannyāsī. The name sannyāsī also designates an ascetic who is devoted to the god SHIVA, especially one who belongs to the daśanāmī order said to have been established in the 8th century CE by Śamkara.

Among sannyāsīs, the highest stage of achievement is recognized by the title paramahansa (“great swan”). This honorific is given only after a probation of at least 12 years as an ascetic and only to those who have achieved full self-knowledge. The 19th-century saint RAMAKRISHNA is sometimes regarded as the great paramahansa of modern times, in part because his behavior transcended any fixed expectation. Sannyāsīs, like other sadhus, are not cremated but are buried in a seated posture of meditation. See SAMĀDHI.

SANTERÍA \sän-tə-ˈrē-ə, ˌsan-\, religious movement that began in Cuba and spread to neighboring islands and the United States, principally among Africans and Hispanics. It developed out of the traditions of the Yoruba people (of modern Nigeria and Benin), who, from the 16th to the 19th century, were transported to Cuba to work as slaves.

Like other traditions brought to the New World by Africans (e.g., the VOUDOU of Haiti or the MACUMBA of Brazil), Santería blends elements of CHRISTIANITY and West African religions (see AFRICAN RELIGIONS). It includes belief in one Supreme Being and in saints or spirits known as orisha, in each of which is found a force of nature and a set of humanlike characteristics. Priests or advocates known as santeros are said to possess ache, the magical power of the orisha. Ritual devotions usually involving drumming and dancing, offerings of food and animal sacrifice, DIVINATION with fetishes made of bones or shells, trancelike seizures, and other rites are thought to reveal the sources of day-to-day problems and point the way to their resolution. Adherents believe that orisha can intervene on one's behalf or may enter into one's being, becoming part of one's personality.

In Santería, elements of ROMAN CATHOLICISM are mixed with African traditions; e.g., St. Peter is Oggun, the Yoruba patron of miners and workers. Such SYNCRETISM enabled Africans to retain their faith while appearing to have converted to Catholicism.

SANTIAGO, in full Santiago de Compostela, city, La Coruña provincia, capital of the comunidad autónoma (“autonomous community”) of Galicia, Spain, and a popular site for Christian pilgrims. Santiago is the Spanish for St. James, whose shrine is in the city. In 1985 UNESCO designated the city a World Heritage site.

In AD 813 a tomb discovered at nearby Padrón was said to be that of the apostle St. James, who was martyred at Jerusalem about AD 44. His bones had been taken to Spain, where, according to legend, he had formerly evangelized. The discovery of the relics was an inspiration to Christian Spain, then confined to the northern Iberian Peninsula. Alfonso II of Asturias built a church over the tomb, and in the Middle Ages the town around it was the most important Christian pilgrimage site after Jerusalem and Rome. The whole town, except the tomb, was destroyed in 997 by Abū ʿĀmir al-Manṣūr (Almanzor), military commander of the Moorish caliphate of Córdoba. In 1078 the present cathedral was begun by order of Alfonso VI of Leon and Castile. The Monastery of San Martín Pinario, now a seminary, was founded in the 10th century and rebuilt in the 17th. The Monastery of San Francisco was supposedly founded by ST. FRANCIS OF ASSISI when he made a pilgrimage to Santiago in 1214. Noteworthy secular buildings are the colegios ("schools") and the University (founded 1501, though the building dates from 1750).

The Route of Santiago de Compostela, designated a World Heritage site in 1993, was traveled each year in the Middle Ages by thousands of pilgrims; tourism, spiritual and otherwise, remains an important source of income.

ŚĀNTIRAKṢITA \,shān-tē-'rək-shi-tə\ (fl. 8th century), Indian BUDDHIST teacher and saint. Invited to Tibet by its king, Śāntirakṣita was forced to flee to Nepal after adherents of the indigenous BON religion blamed him for the outbreak of an epidemic. After his return to Tibet, according to accounts, he urged the king to invite the Indian Buddhist teacher PADMASAMBHAVA to help him.

Śāntirakṣita became the first ABBOT of the monastery at Samye (Bsam-yas), teaching the doctrines associated with the YOGĀCĀRA and Tantric forms of BUDDHISM. He ordained the first seven Tibetan Buddhist monks and is credited with incorporating several elements of Bon, including its pantheon, into the lowest level of Tantric Buddhism and with instituting Buddhist rituals to take the place of Bon animal sacrifices.

SANŪSĪ, AL- \əl-sā-'nū-sē\, in full Sīdī Muhammad ibn 'Alī al-Sanūsī al-Mujāhīrī al-Ḥasanī al-Idrīsī (b. c. 1787, Tursh, near Mostaganem, in northern Africa—d. Sept. 7, 1859, Jaghbūb, Cyrenaica), North African ISLAMIC theologian who founded the Sanūsīya, a militant mystical order that helped Libya win its independence in the 20th century.

During his formative years in his native country, which was part of the Ottoman Empire, al-Sanūsī observed the corruption of the Ottoman administrators. To continue his religious studies, in 1821 he went to Morocco, which was nominally independent but actually a colony of France. Al-Sanūsī's experiences under foreign rule and his observation of the weakness of the Islamic states convinced him of the need for a revitalized Islamic community.

After a PILGRIMAGE to MECCA in 1828, al-Sanūsī visited Egypt. He had been attracted to MYSTICISM in Morocco, and in Egypt he joined many different religious orders. In 1837, while in the Hijaz (now in Saudi Arabia), he founded his own order, which became known as the Sanūsīya. He limited his activities to the Bedouin tribes of the area, and he made no effort to challenge tribal authority or RELIGIOUS BELIEFS. In 1841 he was expelled from the Hijaz by Ottoman authorities, and in 1843 he moved the order to Cyrenaica, where he used the same tribal tactics to create an instrument for challenging the existing power structure. In about 1856 the order was moved to Jaghbūb, also in Cyrenaica but beyond Egyptian and Ottoman political control.

The Sanūsīya was popular among the tribes of Cyrenaica. In the 20th century it spearheaded the liberation movement against Italian colonization. Al-Sanūsī's grandson Idrīs I was king of Libya from 1951 to 1969. See also SUFISM.

SAOSHYANT \saūsh-'yānt, sōsh-, '-yāns\, in Zoroastrian ESCHATOLOGY, final savior of the world; the Saoshyant Astvatereta is the foremost of three saviors who are posthumous sons of ZOROASTER. One will appear at the end of each of the three last millennia of the world, miraculously conceived by a virgin who swims in a lake where Zoroaster's seed was preserved. Astvatereta, aided by 30 of the dead, will break demonic power and resurrect the bodies of the dead. Astvatereta and six helpers will then work in the seven zones of the world. When all souls have been cleansed, including those of the damned, Astvatereta will prepare for them white HAOMA—the ritual drink of the Zoroastrians—which will bestow eternal perfection on their bodies.

SAPTAMĀTRKĀ \ˈsəp-tə-'mä-tri-kä\ (Sanskrit: "Seven Mothers"), in HINDUISM, group of seven mother-goddesses, each of whom is the śakti, or female counterpart, of a god. They are Brahmānī, Māheśvarī, Kaumārī, Vaiṣṇavī, Vārāhī, Indrānī, and Cāmuṇḍā, or Yamī. (The Varāha-Purāna states that they number eight, including Yogeśvarī.)

Representations of the goddesses are found in shrines throughout India, frequently flanked by Virabhadra (a form of Shiva) on the left and GAṆEŚA on the right. They can be identified by their weapons, ornaments, VAHANAS ("mounts"), and banner emblems, which are in each case the same as that of their corresponding male deities. Saptamātrkā cults disappeared by the 11th century, perhaps having been absorbed by the growing worship of ŚAKTI.

SARAH \ˈsar-ə\, also spelled Sarai \ˈsar-ī, -ā-ī\, in the OLD TESTAMENT, wife of ABRAHAM and mother of ISAAC. Sarah was childless until she was 90 years old. God promised Abraham that she would be "a mother of nations" (GENESIS 17:16) and that she would conceive and bear a son. Isaac was the fulfillment of this promise. Sarah had not believed that the promise would be fulfilled; thus she embodies the themes of fear and doubt, Abraham those of faith and hope. Her doubt drives Sarah to devise her own way of realizing the promise—she gives Abraham her maidservant, HAGAR, so that Hagar might bear a child for them. When the promise is repeated, Sarah expresses her doubt in sarcastic laughter (Genesis 18:12). And when the promise is kept, Sarah, overcome by joy, still implies her doubt had been reasonable (Genesis 21:6–7). Her tomb at Hebron (Genesis 23) was a sign of Abraham's faith that God's promise of the land would also be kept.

SARAPEUM \,sar-ə-'pē-əm, ,ser-\, also spelled Serapeum, or Sarapieion, either of two temples of ancient Egypt, dedicated to the worship of the Greco-Egyptian god SARAPIS (Serapis). The original temple was located on the west bank of the Nile near Ṣaqqārah and originated as a monument to the deceased APIS bulls, sacred animals of the god PTAH. Although the area was used as a cemetery for the bulls as early as 1400 BCE, Ramses II (1279–13 BCE) designed a gallery and subsidiary chambers (enlarged by later kings) to serve as a CATACOMB for the Apis bulls who, in death, became assimilated to the god OSIRIS as Osiris-Apis. The Greeks living near Ṣaqqārah worshiped this god as Osorapis, which under the Ptolemaic dynasty became Sarapis, and the temple was thereafter called the Sarapeum.

Another Sarapeum was built at Alexandria, the new Ptolemaic capital. Ptolemy I Soter (reigned 305–284 BCE) chose Sarapis as the official god of Egypt, ordering his architect Parmeniscus to design one of the largest and best known of the god's temples. There Sarapis was worshiped in a Greek ritual until 391 CE, when the Sarapeum was destroyed by the PATRIARCH Theophilus. In Roman times Sarapeums were built throughout the empire.

SARAPIS \sə-'ra-pis, -rā-\, also spelled Serapis, Greco-Egyptian deity of the sun first encountered at Memphis, where his cult was celebrated in association with that of the sacred Egyptian bull APIS (who was called Osorapis when deceased). He was originally a god of the underworld but he was reintroduced as a new deity with many Hellenic aspects by Ptolemy I Soter (reigned 305–284 BCE), who centered the worship of the deity at Alexandria.

The SARAPEUM at Alexandria was the largest and best known of the god's temples. The cult statue there represented Sarapis as a robed and bearded figure regally enthroned, his right hand resting on Cerberus (the three-headed dog who guards the gate of the underworld), while his left held an upraised sceptre. Gradually Sarapis became revered not only as a sun god ("Zeus Sarapis") but also as a lord of healing and of fertility. His worship was established in Rome and throughout the Mediterranean, being particularly prominent in the great commercial cities. Among the Gnostics he was a symbol of the universal godhead. The destruction of the Sarapeum at Alexandria by the PATRIARCH Theophilus and his followers in 391 CE signaled the final triumph of CHRISTIANITY throughout the Roman Empire.

SARASVATĪ \ˈsə-rəs-,və-tē\, Hindu goddess of learning and the arts, especially music. First appearing as the personification of the sacred river Sarasvatī and also identified with Vāc, the goddess of speech, later she is named the consort, daughter, or granddaughter of BRAHMĀ. She is regarded as the patroness of art, music, and letters and as the inventor of the Sanskrit language and the Devanāgarī script in which it is written. She is usually represented as riding on a hamsa bird and holding a lute and a manuscript or book. The hamsa bird is a goose notable for its pure white color and its ability to undertake very long flights to Himalayan altitudes; in modern times it has frequently come to be represented as a swan. Sarasvatī is worshiped at the advent of spring (January–February in the Hindu year), when her image is taken out in jubilant procession, but she is also invoked perennially and at examination times by students, and by artists and performers of all kinds. Sarasvatī is also popular in Jain and Buddhist mythology.

The river Sarasvatī is revered above all others in the VEDAS and is by far the one most frequently mentioned. Because it corresponds to none of the major rivers of modern South Asia, it has for centuries been regarded as subtle or mythic, depending on one's perspective, converging unseen with the GAṄGĀ (Ganges) and JAMUNĀ rivers when they flow together at Prayāg (Allahabad). The millions of pilgrims who participate in the KUMBH MELA every 12 years at this site are thus said to bathe in the triveṇī ("triple confluence"), as do all pilgrims to Prayāg, which is therefore sometimes called "king of TRITHAS."

A major debate at the end of the 20th century focused on whether the Vedic Sarasvatī corresponds to a major dry riverbed forming part of the Indus complex and containing many as yet unexcavated archaeological sites. If so, this forgotten Sarasvatī might promise to provide a major link between Vedic and Indus Valley cultures.

SARCOPHAGUS, stone COFFIN. The original term is of doubtful meaning; Pliny explains that the word denotes a coffin of limestone which had the property of dissolving the body quickly (Greek sarx, "flesh"; phagein, "to eat"). This explanation is questionable; religious and folkloristic ideas may have been involved in calling a coffin a body-eater. The word came into general use as the name for a large coffin in imperial Rome and is now used as an archaeological term.

ŚĀRIPUTRA \,shār-ē-'pū-trə\ (Sanskrit), Pali Sariputta \,sār-ē-'pūt-tə\, given name Upatissa, BRAHMIN ascetic and famous early disciple of the BUDDHA GOTAMA. Śāriputra first heard of the Buddha and his new teaching from Assaji, one of the original 60 disciples. Quickly achieving Enlightenment, he developed a reputation as a master of the Abhidharma; his disciples included ĀNANDA, the Buddha's personal attendant; Rā, the Buddha's son; and Moggallāna. The Niddesa ("Exposition") is attributed to him; its two parts give a philological exegesis of the last two (fourth and fifth) sections of the Suttanipāta. He is said to have died shortly before the Buddha, and his relics were taken to Sāvathī.

SARPEDON \sār-'pē-dən\, in Greek mythology, son of ZEUS and Laodameia, the daughter of Bellerophon; he was a Lycian prince and a hero in the Trojan War. After he was killed by the Greek warrior Patroclus, a struggle took place for the possession of his body until APOLLO rescued it from the Greeks, washed it, anointed it with ambrosia, and handed it over to HYPNOS ("Sleep") and Thanatos ("Death"), by whom it was conveyed for burial to Lycia. There a SANCTUARY (Sarpedoneum) was erected in his honor.

In later tradition Sarpedon was the son of Zeus and EUROPA and the brother of King MINOS of Crete. Expelled from Crete by Minos, he and his comrades sailed for Asia Minor, where he finally became king of Lycia.

SARVĀSTIVĀDA \sər-,vās-ti-'vā-də\, important school of HĪNAYĀNA Buddhism. The Sarvāstivāda school is generally considered to be one of the 18 Hīnayāna schools that developed during the first four to five centuries following the death of the BUDDHA GOTAMA. During the 1st millennium of the Common Era the Sarvāstivādins and Sarvāstivāda offshoots exerted a strong influence in many parts of the Buddhist world, particularly in northwest India and portions of Southeast Asia.

The term Sarvāstivāda literally means the teaching that everything exists, and it was especially associated in the Sarvāstivāda tradition with the notion that the past, the present, and the future all exist. The major work that expounded Sarvāstivāda teaching was the Mahāvibhāṣa ("Great Elucidation"), which was written in the late 2nd century CE. The importance of this text is suggested by the fact that the Sarvāstivādins were often called the Vaibhāṣikas, a name that means followers of the (Mahā) Vibhāṣa.

SARVODAYA \sər-ˈvō-də-yə\ (Hindi, literally, “uplifting of all,” from Sanskrit sarva, “all” + udaya, “rise, coming up”), MAHATMA GANDHI’S philosophy, which advocated community sharing of all resources for the mutual benefit and enhancement of peasant life.

SA-SKYA-PA \ˈsä-gʻä-bä\, also spelled Sakyapa, Tibetan Buddhist sect named for the great Sa-skya (Sakya) monastery founded in 1073 some 50 miles north of Mount Everest. The sect follows the teachings of Brog-mi (992–1072), who translated into Tibetan the important Tantric work called the Hevajra Tantra, which remains one of the basic texts of the order (see TANTRA). He also transmitted the teachings of the lam-’bras (“way and effect”), which uses the symbolism of sexual union as a means of achieving mystical reintegration of the self.

The tutelary deity of the sect is the fierce, protective Hevajra. Abbots are permitted to marry, and succession passes from father to son or from uncle to nephew.

A major phase in the history of the Sa-skya-pa sect came in the 13th–14th century when its members, with the help of their Mongol military allies, established the first theocratic state in Tibet and maintained their control for more than a hundred years.

SATAN \ˈsä-tən\, in JUDAISM and CHRISTIANITY, the adversary of God.

The word Satan is the transliteration of a Hebrew word for “adversary.” In THE BOOK OF JOB, “the adversary” comes to the heavenly court with the “sons of God.” His task is to roam through the earth seeking out acts or persons to be reported adversely. Satan is cynical about disinterested human goodness and is permitted to test it under God’s authority and within the limits that God sets.

In the NEW TESTAMENT the Greek transliteration Satanas is used, and this usually appears as Satan in English translations. He is spoken of as the prince of evil spirits, the inveterate enemy of God and of Christ, who takes the guise of an ANGEL of light. Through his subordinate DEMONS Satan can take possession of men’s bodies, afflicting them or making them diseased. According to the Book of Revelation, when the risen Christ returns from heaven to reign on earth, Satan will be bound with a great chain for a thousand years. He is then to be released, but he will almost immediately face final defeat and thereafter be cast into eternal punishment. His name, Beelzebul, used in the Gospels mainly in reference to demonic possession, comes from the name of the god of Ekron, Baalzebul (2 Kings 1). He is also identified with the DEVIL (diabolos), and this term occurs more frequently in the New Testament than does Satan. In the Qur’an the proper name Shaitan (“Satan”) is used.

SATANISM \ˈsä-tən-i-zəm\, also called devil worship, worship of SATAN, or the DEVIL, personality or principle regarded by the Judeo-Christian tradition as embodying absolute evil in complete antithesis to God. This worship may be regarded as a gesture of extreme protest against Judeo-Christian spiritual hegemony. Satanic cults have been documented in Europe and the Americas as far back as the 17th century; but their earlier roots are difficult to trace, just as the number of real satanists in any period is frequently overestimated. Churchmen have readily attributed satanism to witches and to such heretics as Gnostics, Cathari, and Bogomils, but that charge does not correspond with those groups’ own understanding of their beliefs. By the same token, devil worship ascribed to non-Christian religions is usually based on polemic or misunderstanding. Modern WITCHCRAFT and NEO-PAGANISM are not to be confused with satanism, since these groups worship not Satan but pre-Christian gods. Satanism, as devotion to the Judeo-Christian source of evil, can only exist in symbiosis with that tradition, for it shares but inverts its worldview.

Satanist worship has traditionally centered on the “black mass,” a corrupted rendition of the Christian EUCHARIST, and ritual magic evocations of Satan. Some recent satanist groups have supplanted those practices with rites of self-expression reminiscent of psychodrama and hyperventilation.

SATHYA SAI BABA \ˈsä-tə-ˈsä-ē-ˈbä-bä\, originally Sathya Narayana Raju (b. 1926, Puttaparthi, India), Indian spiritual leader. Born into a BRAHMIN family, at an early age Sathya Narayana Raju began to perform miracles, and at 14 he declared himself an incarnation of SHIRDI SAI BABA. Soon after, he took up residence in the garden of a sympathizer, where he led prayers and devotional singing until his first ashram, Prasanthi Nilayam, was completed in 1950. In 1960, Baba revealed his identity further, claiming to be an incarnation of both SHIVA and his consort SAKTI in one, as well as the second in a succession of three incarnations of Shiva of whom the first was Shirdi Sai Baba.

Sathya Sai Baba was revered by his many followers for his healing of the sick and his ability to read minds and foretell the future. He offered basic HINDU teachings with little concern for specific doctrines, and his devotees ranged from the ascetics in his ashrams to lay believers. Devotees also included many non-Indians, especially from Europe and the United States. While his detractors criticized his flamboyance and dismissed his dramatic miracle-working as the antics of a charlatan, his ashram sponsored the construction of a hospital, schools, and colleges, and ashram workers frequently engaged in community service. In addition to Prasanthi Nilayam, he had a large Sathya Sai Baba ashram in Whitefield, outside of Bangalore in Karnāṭaka, and numerous smaller centers in other Indian cities and around the world.

SATĪ \ˈsə-,tē-,sə-,tē\, also spelled suttee (Sanskrit: “good woman”), in English usage, the custom of a Hindu widow burning herself to death, either on the funeral pyre of her dead husband or soon after his death. In Indic languages, satī refers less to the action than to the woman herself, who thereby demonstrates her truthfulness (sat) and her virtue. This is sometimes said to blaze forth so intensely at the moment of her impending death that it alone is responsible for igniting the pyre. Strictly speaking, such a woman avoids the inauspicious status of widowhood, which religious law calculates as commencing with the ritual of the husband’s death, not its physical occurrence. In fact, her courage, purity, and auspiciousness are held in certain parts of India (e.g., Rajasthan) to generate a protective power that makes a satī worthy of veneration as a “satī mother” (satīmātā). Opponents of the practice of satī reject such notions as horrifying indices of a deeply misogynic value system and therefore prefer to use the term satī as meaning widow immolation.

The word satī can also be employed as a proper noun to designate the consort of SHIVA, who protested her father Dakṣa’s failure to include Shiva among the guests at a sacrifice by throwing herself into the fire. The myth of Satī does not involve the death of her husband. Rather, he rescues her body from the flames and carries it, grief-stricken, throughout India, dismembering it as he goes. Thus the connection between the mythical Satī and the practice called satī is indirect. Critics of satī have often pointed this out, but many Hindus continue to assume it, nonetheless.

Numerous satī stones, memorials to women who died in this way, are found all over India, the earliest dated 510 CE. The first reference to the practice in a Sanskrit text is in the MAHĀBHĀRATA, in which some queens undergo satī; but it is mentioned by the 1st-century-BCE Greek author Diodorus Siculus in his account of the Punjab in the 4th century BCE. In the medieval period certain Rājputs practiced jauhar (probably from jīvahar, “taking one’s life”) to save women from dishonor by foes, most notably at Chitorgarh. BRAHMINS may have adopted this practice from warrior classes, modifying it over time to suit their own gender ideology of pure womanhood and producing the phenomenon the British saw as “suttee.” The considerable incidence of satī among the Brahmins of Bengal also undoubtedly followed from the dāyabhāga system of law (c. 1100), which prevailed in Bengal and which gave inheritance to widows—an economic threat to sons, who would otherwise have been the sole heirs. Satī was often committed voluntarily, if one allows that such a term can be meaningful given the patriarchal context, but cases of compulsion, escape, and rescue are also known. Steps to prohibit satī were taken by the Mughal rulers Humāyūn and his son AKBAR, and it was abolished in British India in 1829. In spite of this, however, frequent instances of satī continued to occur in Indian states for more than 30 years, and, in fact, occasional instances in remote areas are still reported, as in the famous case of 18-year-old Roop Kanwar of Deorala in the Shekhāvātī region of Rajasthan in 1987. Many students of Roop Kanwar’s death have concluded it was murder. Satī has never been at all as frequent as travelers’ accounts made it seem, but its symbolic importance is great. Hence the right of satī temples (often founded by Shekhāvāt communities), shrines, and rituals to exist in India today is a matter of continued and heated debate.

SATNĀMĪ SECT \sət-ˈnā-mē\, any of several groups in India that have challenged political and religious authority by rallying around an understanding of God as satnām (“whose name is truth”).

The earliest Satnāmīs were a sect of mendicants and householders founded by Bīrbhan in Narnaul, eastern Punjab, in 1657 that defied the Mughal emperor Aurangzeb in 1672 and were crushed by his army. Remnants of this sect or group may have contributed to the formation of another known as Sadhs (i.e., sādhu, “pure”) in the early 19th century, who also designated their deity as satnām. A similar and roughly contemporary group gathered under the leadership of Jagjīvandās of Barabanki district, near Lucknow, that was said to have been formatively influenced by a disciple of the SŪFĪ mystic Yārī Shāh (1668–1725). He projected an image of an overarching creator God as NĪRGUṆA, devoid of sensible qualities and best worshiped through a regimen of self-discipline and by use of “the true name” alone. Yet Jagjīvandās also wrote works about Hindu deities, and the elimination of CASTE was not part of his message.

The most important Satnāmī group was founded in 1820 in the Chattisgarh region of middle India by Ghāsīdās, a CAMĀR farm servant. His Satnām Panth (“Path of the True Name”) succeeded in providing a religious and social identity for large numbers of Chattisgarhi camārs (who formed one-sixth of the total population), defying their derogatory treatment by upper-caste Hindus and exclusion from Hindu temple worship. Ghāsīdās is remembered as having thrown images of Hindu gods onto a rubbish heap. He preached a code of ethical and dietary self-restraint and social equality. Connections with the KABĪR Panth have been historically important at certain stages, and over time Satnāmīs have negotiated their place within a wider Hindu order in complex, even contradictory ways.

SATORI \ˈsä-tō-,rē, Angl sə-ˈtōr-ē, sä-, -ˈtōr-\ (Japanese), Chinese Wu \ˈwü\, in Zen BUDDHISM, the inner, intuitive experience of Enlightenment; Satori is said to be unexplainable, indescribable, and unintelligible to reason and logic. It is comparable to the experience undergone by the BUDDHA GOTAMA when he sat under the Bo tree and, as such, is the central ZEN goal. Satori constitutes a complete reordering of the individual in his relation to the universe; it usually is achieved only after a period of concentrated preparation and may occur spontaneously as a result of a chance incident, such as a sudden noise. The relative importance of the period of concentrated attention to the sudden “breaking through” is weighed differently by the two major branches of Zen: the SŌTŌ sect emphasizes quiet sitting (zazen), whereas the RINZAI sect devotes more attention to the various methods of bringing about an abrupt awakening. (See also KOAN.)

SATSANĠ \sət-ˈsəŋ-gä, ˈsət-,səŋ\, in SIKHISM, “the assembly of true believers,” a practice that dates back to the first GURŪ of the religion, NĀNAK. While not unique to Sikhism, the convention of gathering together and singing the compositions of the Gurū was understood in peculiarly Sikh terms, at first as a sign of loyalty to the Gurū and the community that formed around him and later as a means of participating in the power of the divine Word that emanated from the hymns and songs of the Gurūs. Such gatherings take place in a dharamsalas or GURDWARĀS (Sikh places of worship), are open to men and women of all CASTES, and allow all assembled to share in the merit of the Gurū and the divine word.

SATURN \ˈsa-tər-n\, Latin Saturnus \sa-ˈtər-nəs\, in ROMAN RELIGION, god of sowing or seed. The Romans equated him with the Greek deity CRONUS. Saturn's temple at the west end of the Roman Forum at the foot of the Clivus Capitolinus served as the state treasury (aerarium Saturni). Saturn's cult partner was the obscure goddess Lua, whose name is connected with lues ("plague," or "affliction"); but he was also associated with Ops, another obscure goddess, the cult partner of CONSUMS, probably a god of the storage bin.

Saturn's great festival, the Saturnalia, became one of the most popular of Roman festivals, and its influence is still felt in the celebration of CHRISTMAS and the Western world's New Year. The Saturnalia was originally celebrated only on December 17, but it was later extended to seven days. All work and business were suspended, slaves were given a measure of freedom to say and to do what they liked, moral restrictions were eased, and presents were exchanged. The weekday Saturday (Latin: Saturni dies) was named for Saturn.

SATYĀGRAHA \sət-ˈyā-grə-hə, -ˈyā-greh\ (Hindi: "insistence on, or zeal for, truth," from Sanskrit satya, "true, truth" + āgraha, "insistence, obstinance," or "zeal, assiduity"), concept introduced in the early 20th century by Mahātmā GANDHI to designate a determined but nonviolent resistance to evil. Gandhi's satyāgraha became a major tool in the Indian struggle against British imperialism and has since been adopted by protest groups in other countries.

According to this philosophy, satyāgrahīs—practitioners of satyāgraha—achieve correct insight into the real nature of a situation by seeking truth in a spirit of peace and love and undergoing a rigorous process of self-scrutiny. By refusing to submit to the wrong or to cooperate with it in any way, satyāgrahīs assert the overarching truth bearing on that situation, a truth that transcends the narrower interest of any one party in a struggle. To keep this truth in view, NONVIOLENCE is essential, since violence would preclude the assent of at least one combatant. Thus satyāgraha seeks to conquer through conversion; in the end, there is no defeat and no victory but rather a new harmony.

Satyāgraha appeals to the ancient Indian ideal of AHIMŚĀ ("not desiring to harm"), which is pursued with particular rigor by Jains; Gandhi's great friend Rajchandra Rajivbhai was Jain. In developing ahimsā into a modern concept with broad political consequences, as satyāgraha, Gandhi also drew from the writings of Leo Tolstoy and Henry David Thoreau, from the BIBLE, and from the BHAGAVAD GĪTĀ. Gandhi first conceived satyāgraha in 1906 in response to a law discriminating against Asians that was passed by the British colonial government of the Transvaal in South Africa. In 1917 the first satyāgraha campaign in India was mounted in the indigo-growing district of Champaran. Over the following years, fasting and economic boycotts were employed as methods of satyāgraha, until the British left India in 1947.

Critics of satyāgraha, both in Gandhi's time and subsequently, have argued that it is unrealistic and incapable of universal success since it relies upon a high standard of ethical conduct in the opponent, the representative of "evil," and demands an unrealistically strong level of commitment from those struggling for social amelioration. Nonetheless satyāgraha played a significant role in the Civil Rights Movement led by Martin Luther King, Jr., in the United States and has spawned a continuing legacy in South Asia itself.

SATYR AND SILENUS \ˈsā-tər, ˈsa-...sī-ˈlē-nəs\, in Greek mythology, creatures of the wild, part man and part beast, who in classical times were closely associated with the god DIONYSUS. Satyrs and Sileni were at first represented as uncouth men, each with a horse's tail and ears and an erect phallus, and they later came to be represented as men having a goat's legs and tail. The relation of the two names is not certain; Silenus may have been slightly earlier, but Satyr became the dominant term by the Classical period. In the Great Dionysia festival at Athens three tragedies were followed by a Satyr play (e.g., Euripides' Cyclops), in which the chorus was dressed to represent Satyrs. Silenus, although bibulous like the Satyrs in the Satyr plays, also appeared in legend as a dispenser of homely wisdom. In art the Satyrs and Sileni were depicted in company with NYMPHS or Maenads whom they pursued.

SAUL \ˈsól\, Hebrew Sha'ul \shä-ˈül\ (fl. 11th century BCE, Israel), first king of Israel (c. 1021–1000 BCE). His chief contribution was to defend Israel against its many enemies, especially the Philistines.

Biblical account of his life. The account of Saul's life comes from the OLD TESTAMENT book of 1 Samuel. The son of Kish, a well-to-do member of the tribe of BENJAMIN, he was made king by the league of 12 Israelite tribes to meet the growing Philistine threat. Two literary strands are discernible in the accounts in 1 Samuel involving Saul. One of these (9:1–10:16), reflecting a favorable attitude toward the monarchy, relates how the son of Kish was initially selected by SAMUEL and how he delivered the town of Jabesh-Gilead from oppression by the AMMONITES, an act that brought him to the attention of all Israel and resulted in his acclamation as king in a public ceremony at Gilgal. A second body of tradition (1 Samuel 8; 10:17–27; 12), however, stresses Samuel's misgivings about the kingship.

Saul's reign. Saul's chief service to Israel lay in the sphere of military defense. He won significant victories over the Philistines and waged a successful campaign against the AMALEKITES in the south (1 Samuel 15). Saul's subsequent disintegration, however, was largely caused by his break with Samuel. Separate accounts attributed this to Saul's failure in religious duties—presumption in offering unauthorized sacrifice before battle and a reluctance to devote Amalek to destruction according to the principle of HOLY WAR. Samuel's rejection of Saul withdrew from the king the religious sanctions essential for popular support.

David came into Saul's court because of either his military prowess or his skill as a harpist, according to varying accounts in 1 Samuel. Jealous of David's military successes, Saul declared his intention to slay David, and only David's flight to Philistia saved him. Saul's progressive mental deterioration culminated in the slaughter of the 85 priests at Nob (1 Samuel 22).

When the Philistines mounted new attacks on the Israelite heartland, Saul gathered his forces at Mount Gilboa. On the eve of the fateful battle he sought, through a necromancer at Endor, some word of encouragement from the dead Samuel (1 Samuel 28). The oracle of Samuel's ghost, however, could foretell only the defeat of the Israelite forces and the death of Saul and of his sons.

SAULE \ˈsɑː-le\, in BALTIC RELIGION and mythology, the sun goddess, who determines the well-being and regeneration of all life on earth.

According to Baltic myth, Saule rides each day through the sky on a horse-drawn chariot with copper wheels. Toward evening Saule washes the horses in the sea, sitting on top of a hill, holding the golden reins in her hand. Then she goes beyond the silver gates into her castle at the end of the sea. The red ball of the setting sun, one aspect of Saule, is portrayed in Baltic art as a ring, a falling red apple, or a crown. As the full light of the sun, she is also represented by a daisy, a wheel, or a rosette.

One myth says that Saule's daughters were courted by the moon god, MĒNESS. Another myth, found in both Lithuanian and Latvian traditions, tells that MĒness married the sun goddess, but he soon began to court the goddess of the dawn, the morning star. PĒRKONS (Lithuanian: Perkūnas), the Thunderer, cut the moon god to pieces in revenge for this slight to Saule.

Because of her association with growth and fertility, Saule was remembered in prayers by the farmers at both sunrise and sunset. The major event in her honor was the LĪGO FEAST, a midsummer festival celebrated on June 23 (now St. John's Eve). On that day, the sun, wreathed in a garland of red flowers, was said to observe the summer solstice by dancing on a silver hill while wearing silver shoes. Great fires were lit on the hills to ward off evil spirits who might threaten health and fertility. Young people, wearing wreaths of flowers, danced and sang Ligo songs and leaped over the fires.

A harmless green snake, ŽALTYS, was a special favorite of Saule's, and, because of that, it was considered to be good luck to have a žaltys in the house—and, conversely, bad luck to kill one.

SAUTRĀNTIKA \sɑu-ˈträn-ti-kə\, ancient school of HĪNAYĀNA Buddhism that emerged in India about the 2nd century BCE as an offshoot of the SARVĀSTIVĀDA. The school is so called because of its reliance on the SŪTRAS, or words of the Buddha, and because of its rejection of the authority of the Abhidharma.

The Sautrāntikas maintained that, although events (DHARMAS) have only momentary existence, there is a transmigrating substratum of consciousness that contains the goodness that exists in every person. The Sautrāntika sometimes is characterized as a transitional school that pointed in the direction of MAHĀYĀNA thought and eventually came to influence the YOGĀCĀRA branch of Mahāyāna philosophy.

SAVARKAR \sə-vər-ˈkär\; see HINDUTVA.

SĀVITRĪ \ˈsɑ-vi-,trē\, goddess in Hindu mythology, the daughter of the SOLAR DEITY Savitr and the wife of the creator god BRAHMĀ. The more common use of the term sāvitrī is to designate one of the most important MANTRAS in HINDUISM, taken from RG VEDA 3.62.10, which is also known as the gayatri: "We contemplate the excellent glory of the divine Savitr; may he inspire our intellect."

This mantra is employed in several ritual contexts, the most important of which is the initiation ceremony (UPANAYANA) traditionally incumbent upon boys of all the "twice-born" CASTES (i.e., excluding ŚŪDRAS and UNTOUCHABLES). Depending on the class or caste of the young initiate, the verse would be recited in different meters; this was done at the instruction of the teacher or GURU after the imparting of the sacred thread, the symbol of the "second birth." The Sāvitrī verse inaugurated the period of study of the VEDA under the guidance of this teacher and was meant to inspire the boy to success in his endeavor.

Another principal ritual context in which this mantra is featured is the morning prayer, or samdhya, that forms a part of the daily religious practice of millions of Hindus. Some SCRIPTURES recommend that this verse be repeated several times during the course of this ceremony and that the recitation be drawn out as long as possible, for it is through this prolonged recitation that the ancestors supposedly attained long life, understanding, honor, and glory.

SAVONAROLA, GIROLAMO \sə-və-nə-ˈrō-lə, Italian \sə-vō-nä-ˈrō-lä\ (b. Sept. 21, 1452, Ferrara, Duchy of Ferrara—d. May 23, 1498, Florence), Italian Christian preacher, reformer, and martyr. After the overthrow of the Medici in 1494, Savonarola was the sole leader of Florence, setting up a democratic republic.

Early years. Girolamo Savonarola was born at Ferrara. He was educated by his paternal grandfather, Michele, a celebrated doctor and a man of rigid moral and religious principles. Even at an early age, as he wrote in a letter to his father, Savonarola found unbearable the humanistic paganism that corrupted manners, art, poetry, and religion itself. He saw as the cause of this spreading corruption a clergy that was corrupt even in the highest levels of the church hierarchy. On April 24, 1475, he entered the DOMINICAN order at Bologna. Returning to Ferrara four years later, he taught SCRIPTURE in the Convento degli Angeli. The subject had always been, together with the works of THOMAS AQUINAS, his great passion.

Career in Florence. In 1482 Savonarola was sent to Florence to take up the post of lecturer in the convent of San Marco, where he gained a great reputation for his learning and ASCETICISM. At San Gimignano in LENT 1485 and 1486, he put forward his famous propositions: the church needed reforming; it would be scourged and then renewed. The following year (1487) he left Florence to become master of studies in the school of general studies at Bologna. Returning to Florence in 1490, Savonarola preached boldly against the abuses of the government, and popular enthusiasm for Savonarola's preaching began to grow.

Medici rule in Florence did not long survive Lorenzo and was overthrown by the invasion of Charles VIII (1494). Two years before, Savonarola had predicted the coming of Charles and his easy victory. These authenticated prophecies and the part he had played in negotiations with the king enormously increased his authority, and he found himself Florence's master. He introduced a democratic government; he wanted to found his city of God in Florence as a well-organized Christian republic that might initiate the reform of Italy and of the church.

Political intrigues. Savonarola's triumph soon aroused opposition. A Florentine party called the Arrabbiati formed an alliance with the duke of Milan and the pope, who had joined in the Holy League against the king of France and saw in Savonarola the main obstacle to Florence's joining them. It was then that the pope sent to Savonarola the brief of July 21, 1495, in which he praised Savonarola's work and called him to Rome to pronounce his prophecies from his own lips. As that pope was the corrupt Alexander VI, Savonarola saw a trap and asked to be allowed to put off his journey. On September 8 the pope sent him a second brief in which he ordered him to go to Bologna under pain of EXCOMMUNICATION, which met with another refusal. The brief was replaced by another of October 16, in which he was forbidden to preach. After a few months, as Lent 1496 drew near, Alexander VI verbally revoked the ban. Thus Savonarola was able to give his sermons on AMOS, in which he attacked the Roman Court with renewed vigor. He also appeared to refer to the pope's scandalous private life, and the latter took offense at this. A college of theologians found nothing to criticize in what the FRIAR had said, and after Lent he was able to begin further sermons.

As Savonarola's authority grew, the pope tried to win him over by offering him a cardinal's hat, which he declined. Then Alexander VI, in a brief of Nov. 7, 1496, incorporated the Congregation of San Marco, of which Savonarola was VICAR, with another in which he would have lost all his authority. If he obeyed, his reforms would be lost. If he disobeyed, he would be excommunicated. As no one came forward to put the brief into force, Savonarola went on unperturbed in ADVENT 1496 and Lent 1497 with another series of sermons.

Events in Italy now turned against Savonarola, however, and even in Florence his power was lessened by unfavorable political and economic developments. A government of Arrabbiati forced him to stop preaching and incited riots against him on Ascension Day. The Arrabbiati obtained from the Roman Court a bull of excommunication against their enemy. In effect the excommunication was full of such obvious errors of form and substance as to render it null and void, and the pope himself had to disown it. When Rome proposed an arrangement that made withdrawal of the censure dependent on Florence's entry into the League, Savonarola was finally silenced by the interdict with which the city was threatened.

Trial and execution. With public opinion turning against Savonarola, the Arrabbiati raised a mob, marched to San Marco, and took Savonarola prisoner along with two of his followers. After formal examination, torture, and a perfunctory ecclesiastical trial, he was handed over to the secular arm to be hanged and burned. Before mounting the scaffold he received the pope's ABSOLUTION and plenary INDULGENCE.

Assessment. After Savonarola's death a cult was dedicated to him, which had a long history. He was venerated as a saint, an office was said for him, and miracles he had performed were recorded. In the ACTA SANCTORUM he was included among the praetermissi. When the 500th anniversary of his birth came around in 1952, there was again talk of his CANONIZATION. Savonarola's greatest work is the Triumphus crucis, a clear exposition of Christian APOLOGETICS. His Compendium revelationum, an account of visions and prophecies that came true, went through many editions in several countries.

ŞAWM \ˈsɑʊm\ (Arabic: "fasting"), also spelled ṣiyām, in ISLAM, any religious fast, but particularly the fast of the month of RAMAḌĀN. See also FIVE PILLARS OF ISLAM.

SAYYID \ˈsī-yid, ˈsā-\ (Arabic: "master," or "lord"), Arabic title of respect, sometimes restricted, as is the title SHARĪF, to the Banū Hāshim, members of MUHAMMAD'S clan—in particular, to the descendants of Muhammad's uncles al-ʿAbbās and Abū Ṭālib and of ʿAlī ibn Abī Ṭālib by Muhammad's daughter FĀṬĪMA. In the Hijaz, sayyid is further restricted to the descendants of Ḥusayn, who was the younger son of ʿAlī and Fāṭima.

In Pakistan and India sayyids are numerous, being one of the four main groups of Muslims. They also constitute an influential extratribal class in Yemen, claiming descent from the Prophet through an ancestor who came south from Iraq more than a millennium ago. Many dynasties have also claimed to be sayyids in the restricted sense. See also ISLAMIC CASTE.

SCAPEGOAT, Hebrew saʿir la-ʿAzaʿzel ("goat for Azazel"), in the OLD TESTAMENT ritual of YOM KIPPUR (Leviticus 16:8–10), a goat symbolically burdened with the SINS of the Jewish people. Some scholars believe that the animal was chosen by lot to placate AZAZEL, a wilderness DEMON, then thrown over a precipice outside Jerusalem to rid the nation of its iniquities.

The use of scapegoats has a long and varied history involving many kinds of animals, as well as human beings. In ancient Greece, human scapegoats (pharmakoi) were used to mitigate a calamity. The Athenians chose a man and woman for the festival of THARGELIA. After being feasted, the couple was led around the town, beaten with green twigs, driven out of the city, and possibly even stoned.

During the Roman feast of LUPERCALIA, priests (Luperci) cut narrow strips of hide (thongs) from the sacrificial animals (goats and a dog), then raced around the walls of the old Palatine city, striking women (especially) as they passed with the thongs. A blow from the hide of the scapegoat was said to cure sterility.

SCARAB \ˈskar-əb\, Latin scarabaeus \,skar-ə-ˈbē-əs\, in ancient EGYPTIAN RELIGION, important symbol in the form of the dung beetle (Scarabaeus sacer). This beetle may be seen on sunny days forming a ball of dung and rolling it over the sand to its burrow, where the ball is consumed in the following days. The Egyptians apparently shared the widespread belief that the beetle lays its eggs in this ball of dung and saw in the life cycle of the beetle a microcosm of the daily rebirth of the sun; the ancient sun-god Khepri was conceived as a great scarab beetle rolling the sun across the heavens. The scarab became a symbol of the enduring human soul as well—hence its frequent appearance, often with wings spread, in funerary art. Quantities of dead beetles have been discovered in burials of the earliest period; the later mummification of scarabs stems from the fact that they were sacred to Khepri at HELIOPOLIS.

Scarabs of various materials, glazed steatite being most common, form an important class of Egyptian antiquities. Such objects usually have the bases inscribed or decorated with designs and are simultaneously AMULETS and seals. Though they first appeared in the late Old Kingdom (c. 2575–c. 2130 BCE), scarabs remained rare until Middle Kingdom times (1938–c. 1600? BCE), when they were fashioned in great numbers. Some were used simply as ornaments, while others were purely amuletic in purpose, as the large basalt “heart scarabs” of the New Kingdom (1539–1075 BCE) and later times, which were placed in the bandages of mummies and were symbolically identified with the heart of the deceased. A winged scarab might also be placed on the breast of the MUMMY, and later a number of other scarabs were placed about the body.

SCÁTHACH \ˈskä-thək\ (Gaelic: “The Shadowy One”), in Celtic mythology, female warrior, especially noted as a teacher of warriors.

Scáthach was the daughter of Árd-Greimne of Lethra. She lived on an island (thought to be the Isle of Skye) in an impregnable castle, the gate of which was guarded by her daughter Uathach. At this fortress Scáthach trained numerous Celtic heroes in the military arts. Her best-known student was CÚ CHULAINN, who stayed with her for a year. A number of other heroes of Celtic mythology also owed their prowess to the training of Scáthach.

SCHISM, in CHRISTIANITY, break in the unity of the church.

In the early church, schism was used to describe those groups that broke with the church and established rival churches. The terms HERESY and schism were originally almost synonymous, but later schism came to refer to those divisions that were caused by disagreement over something other than basic doctrine. Thus, the schismatic group was not necessarily heretical. Eventually, however, the distinctions between schism and heresy became less clear, and all disruptions in the church came to be referred to as schismatic.

The most significant medieval schism was the East-West schism that divided Christendom into Western (ROMAN CATHOLIC) and Eastern (EASTERN ORTHODOX) branches. It began in 1054, and it has never been healed, although in 1965 Pope Paul VI and the ecumenical patriarch Athenagoras I abolished the mutual EXCOMMUNICATIONS of 1054 of the pope and the patriarch of Constantinople. Another important medieval schism was the Western Schism between the rival popes of Rome and Avignon and, later, even a third pope. The greatest Christian schism in the West was that involving the Protestant REFORMATION and the division from Rome.

According to Roman Catholic CANON LAW, a schismatic is a baptized person who, though continuing to call himself a Christian, refuses submission to the pope or fellowship with members of the church. Other churches have similarly defined schism juridically in terms of separation from their own communion.

In the 20th century the ecumenical movement worked for cooperation among and reunion of churches, and the greater cooperation between Roman Catholics and Protestants after the SECOND VATICAN COUNCIL (1962–65) resulted in more flexible attitudes within the churches concerning the problems of schism.

SCHLEIERMACHER, FRIEDRICH (ERNST DANIEL) \ˈshli-ar-,mä-kər\ (b. Nov. 21, 1768, Breslau, Silesia, Prussia—d. Feb. 12, 1834, Berlin), German theologian, preacher, and classical philologist. He is generally recognized as being the founder of modern Protestant theology. His major work, Der christliche Glaube (1821–22; 2nd ed. 1831; The Christian Faith), is a systematic interpretation of Christian dogmatics.

Schleiermacher's father, a Reformed (Calvinist) military CHAPLAIN, and his mother both came from families of clergymen. From 1783 to 1785 he attended a school of the Moravian Brethren (Herrnhuters; see MORAVIAN CHURCH), an influential Pietistic (see PIETISM) group, at Niesky. In this milieu, individualized study was combined with a piety based on the joy of salvation and a vividly imaginative relation with Jesus as savior. Here Schleiermacher developed his lifelong interest in the Greek and Latin classics and his distinctive sense of the religious life. Later he called himself a Herrnhuter “of a higher order.” Feeling constricted by the lifeless and dogmatic narrowness of the Moravian seminary at Barby, which he attended from 1785 to 1787, he left it with his father's reluctant permission and at EASTER he matriculated at the University of Halle.

A diligent and independent student, Schleiermacher began the study of theology and Immanuel Kant's philosophy. In his epistemology (theory of knowledge) he remained a Kantian throughout his life. After two years he moved to Drossen (Ošno), and began preparing for his first theological examinations. Though he read more in ethics than in theology, he took his examinations in Reformed theology in 1790, achieving marks of “very good” or “excellent” in all fields except dogmatics, the one in which he was later to make his most original contribution.

Schleiermacher then took a position as tutor for the family of the Graf (count) zu Dohna in Schlobitten, East Prussia. Besides tutoring, he preached regularly, chiefly on ethical themes, and continued his philosophical study, particularly of the question of human freedom. After taking his second theological examinations in 1794, Schleiermacher became assistant pastor in Landsberg and then, in 1796, pastor of the Charité, a hospital and home for the aged just outside Berlin. In that city he found his way into the circle of the German Romantic writers through the creator of early ROMANTICISM, Friedrich von Schlegel, with whom he shared an apartment for a time, began a translation of Plato's works, and became acquainted with the new Berlin society.

In Über die Religion. Reden an die Gebildeten unter ihren Verächtern (On Religion: Speeches to Its Cultured Despisers), written in 1799, Schleiermacher addressed the Romantics with the message that they were not as far from religion as they thought; for religion is the "feeling and intuition of the universe" or "the sense of the Infinite in the finite," and CHRISTIANITY is one individual shaping of that feeling. This work, perennially attractive for its view of a living union of religion and culture, greatly impressed the young theologians of the time. The Monologen (1800; Soliloquies) presented a parallel to religion in the view of ethics as the intuition and action of the self in its individuality. The individuality of each human being is in this work seen as a unique "organ and symbol" of the Infinite itself.

In Die Weihnachtsfeier (1805; Christmas Celebration), which was written in the style of a Platonic dialogue, Schleiermacher adopted the DEFINITION OF RELIGION he later incorporated into Der christliche Glaube. Instead of speaking of religion as "feeling and intuition," he now called it simply "feeling"—namely, the immediate feeling that God lives and works in us as finite human beings.

In 1807 Napoleon's invasion of Prussia forced Schleiermacher to move to Berlin, giving lectures on his own and traveling about to encourage national resistance; he also assisted Wilhelm von Humboldt in laying plans for the new university to be founded in Berlin. He married Henriette von Willich, the widow of a close friend of his, in 1809. In that same year he became pastor of Dreifaltigkeitskirche (Trinity Church) in Berlin and, in 1810, professor of theology at the new university. This latter position he retained to the end of his life.

His activities in the years following were many and varied. He lectured on theology and philosophy; he preached in Dreifaltigkeitskirche almost every Sunday until the end of his life; he was a member (from 1800) and permanent secretary of the Berlin Academy of Sciences; he carried on an extensive correspondence; and he was active in promoting the Prussian Union, which brought Lutheran and Calvinist churches into one body. His major publications during this period were the Kurze Darstellung des theologischen Studiums (1811; Brief Outline of the Study of Theology), presenting a curriculum in which the function of theology is to shape and direct the church as a religious community, and Der christliche Glaube.

In 1834 there were an estimated 20,000 to 30,000 people in his long funeral procession through the streets of Berlin. He was buried in the cemetery of Dreifaltigkeitskirche.

Schleiermacher's thought continued to influence theology throughout the 19th century and the early part of the 20th. Between about 1925 and 1955 it was under severe attack by followers of the "kerygmatic" theology of the Word of God (founded by KARL BARTH and Emil Brunner) as leading away from the Gospel toward a religion based on human culture. Since then, however, there has been a renewed study and appreciation of Schleiermacher's contributions, partly because the critique was one-sided, and partly because of a new interest in 19th-century theology.

SCHMALKALDIC ARTICLES \shmäl-'kal-dik, -'käl-, also called Smalcald Articles \shmäl-'kald-, one of the CONFESSIONS OF FAITH of LUTHERANISM, written by MARTIN LUTHER in 1536. The articles were prepared as the result of a bull issued by Pope Paul III calling for a general council of the ROMAN CATHOLIC church to deal with the REFORMATION movement. John Frederick I, Lutheran elector of Saxony, wished to determine what issues could be negotiated with the Roman Catholics and what could not be compromised. He asked Luther to review earlier statements of faith by the Reformers to determine what was absolutely essential to the faith. Luther prepared the articles, and after further discussion they were sent to the elector in January 1537.

In February 1537 the PROTESTANT secular heads of state who were members of the Schmalkaldic League met with several theologians at Schmalkalden to decide how to deal with a council of the Roman Catholic church. John Frederick I presented Luther's articles to the gathering. Because of Luther's somewhat controversial doctrine of the EUCHARIST, the AUGSBURG CONFESSION and its Apology was adopted as an adequate presentation of the reformers' faith and the Schmalkaldic Articles were not officially accepted. Forty-four theologians signed them as an expression of their personal faith, however, and subsequently they were included in the BOOK OF CONCORD (1580).

The Schmalkaldic Articles are divided into three sections. The first discusses the unity of God, the TRINITY, the INCARNATION, and Christ. The second section dealt with Christ and JUSTIFICATION by faith. According to Luther, "On this article rests all that we teach and practice against the pope, the devil, and the world." This section also discusses the MASS, monastic orders, and the PAPACY. The third section dealt with such subjects as SIN, the Law, repentance, the SACRAMENTS, confession, the ministry, and a definition of the church.

SCHOLASTICISM \skə-'las-tə-'si-zəm-, philosophical systems and speculative tendencies of various medieval Christian thinkers who, working on a background of fixed religious dogma, sought to solve anew general philosophical problems—as of faith and reason, will and intellect, realism and nominalism, and the provability of the existence of God—initially under the influence of the mystical and intuitional tradition of the CHURCH FATHERS (especially AUGUSTINE) and later under that of Aristotle.

In the early Middle Ages the authority of the Church Fathers still remained important. The impact of the theologians PETER ABELARD and ANSELM OF CANTERBURY in the 11th century, however, brought logic to the forefront of scholastic philosophy and rendered reliance upon the authority of the Fathers alone inadequate.

ST. THOMAS AQUINAS, reason assumed an important role in theology, not as the antithesis of faith, but as its supplement. Thus, the scholastics made a systematic attempt to map out the field of theology as a science and in so doing developed new treatises on matters, such as the SACRAMENTS, that had previously belonged to preaching. They borrowed freely from the philosophy of Aristotle, which came to them largely via the Islamic philosophers IBN RUSHD (Averroës; 1126–98) and IBN SĪNĀ (Avicenna; 980–1037), and aimed at a synthesis of learning in which theology surmounted the hierarchy of knowledge.

The primary methods of teaching were lecture and formal debate, which consisted largely in the presentation and analysis of syllogisms. Although there was fairly general agreement as to method and aim, scholastics did not always agree among themselves on points of doctrine. Distinct schools of theology emerged, the most influential being those of the Franciscan DUNS SCOTUS, for whom a world created in God's groundless, absolute freedom could exhibit no "necessary reasons," and the Dominican St. Thomas Aquinas, for whom faith, in general, presupposed and therefore required natural reason. The Thomist position tended increasingly to prevail, and Aquinas was eventually considered the repository of sound and orthodox doctrine. His Summa Theologiae ("Summary of Theology") became the standard textbook of theology, and the era of the great commentaries on Aquinas began. One of the most famous was that of a 16th-century Dominican, Cardinal Tommaso de Vio, commonly known as Cajetan.

In the period following the REFORMATION, while PROTESTANT theologians stressed scriptural and patristic authority and despised the scholastics as logic-chopping obscurantists, Catholic theologians came to rely on the latter more and more heavily. The Metaphysical Disputations of the late-16th-century Jesuit FRANCISCO SUÁREZ, however, reveal a concern for the spirit rather than the letter of scholasticism. Rather than a commentary on Aquinas, his work is an original philosophical treatise inspired by Aquinas and others.

The first author to try to extract a philosophy (apart from theology) from Aquinas was the Dominican John of St. Thomas in the 17th century with his Cursus Philosophicus, and this example was much followed. Though subsequent philosophers and theologians saw themselves as heirs to the scholastic tradition, by the 18th and 19th centuries scholasticism had fallen out of touch with contemporary thought and science.

A Thomist revival was announced and stimulated by Pope Leo XIII's ENCYCLICAL Aeterni Patris (1879); so-called neo-scholasticism became the dominant school in the Roman Catholic universities. Subsequently, neo-scholasticism and neo-Thomism earned renewed respect on the basis of the historical scholarship of the French Christian philosopher Étienne Gilson and others, who traced the original contributions of the scholastics and their influence on subsequent philosophy.

SCHWEITZER, ALBERT \ˈshwīt-sər\ (b. Jan. 14, 1875, Kaysersberg, Upper Alsace, Ger. [now in France]—d. Sept. 4, 1965, Lambaréné, Gabon), Alsatian-German theologian, philosopher, organist, and MISSION doctor in equatorial Africa, who received the 1952 Nobel Peace Prize for his efforts on behalf of "the Brotherhood of Nations."

The son of a Lutheran pastor, Schweitzer studied philosophy and theology at Strasbourg, where he took the doctor's degree in philosophy in 1899. At the same time, he was also a lecturer in philosophy and a preacher at St. Nicholas' Church, and the following year he received a doctorate in theology. His book Von Reimarus zu Wrede (1906; The Quest of the Historical Jesus) established him as a world figure in theological studies. In this and other works he stressed the eschatological views (concerned with the consummation of history) of JESUS and ST. PAUL, asserting that their attitudes were formed by expectation of the imminent end of the world. During these years Schweitzer also became an accomplished musician, beginning his career as an organist in Strasbourg in 1893.

In 1905 Schweitzer announced his intention to become a mission doctor in order to devote himself to philanthropic work, and in 1913 he became a doctor of medicine. With his wife, Hélène Bresslau, who had trained as a nurse in order to assist him, he set out for Lambaréné in the Gabon province of French Equatorial Africa, where he built a hospital. Interned there briefly as an enemy alien (German), and later in France as a prisoner of war during World War I, he turned his attention increasingly to world problems and was moved to write his Kulturphilosophie (1923; "Philosophy of Civilization"), in which he set forth his personal philosophy of "reverence for life," an ethical principle involving all living things, which he believed essential to the survival of civilization.

Schweitzer returned to Africa in 1924. By 1963 there were 350 patients with their relatives at the hospital and 150 patients in an associated leper colony.

Schweitzer never entirely abandoned his musical or scholarly interests. He published Die Mystik des Apostels Paulus (1930; The Mysticism of Paul the Apostle), gave lectures and organ recitals throughout Europe, made recordings, edited J.S. Bach's works, and wrote a widely influential book on Bach. His address upon receiving the Nobel Peace Prize, Das Problem des Friedens in der heutigen

Welt (1954; The Problem of Peace in the World of Today), had a worldwide circulation. Despite the occasional criticisms of Schweitzer's medical practice as being autocratic and primitive, and despite the opposition sometimes raised against his theological works, his influence continues to have a strong moral appeal.

SCIENTOLOGY \,sī-ən-'tā-lə-jē\, official name Church of Scientology, religio-scientific movement developed in the United States in the 1950s by the author L. Ron Hubbard (1911–86). Its forerunner was Dianetics, a form of psychotherapy originated by Hubbard and later incorporated into Scientology. See NEW RELIGIOUS MOVEMENTS.

SCIROPHORIA \,skīr-ə-'fōr-ē-ə, -'fōr-\, also spelled Skirophoria, also called Skira, in GREEK RELIGION, annual Athenian festival held at threshing time on the 12th of Skirophorion (roughly, June/July). The priestess of ATHENA and the priests of POSEIDON and HELIOS walked from the Acropolis to a place on the road to Eleusis called Skiron. The solemnity, which was probably a companion festival to the THESMOPHORIA, may have been held in honor of the goddess Athena; more reliable traditions, however, indicate that it was in honor of DEMETER and her daughter Kore (PERSEPHONE).

SCRIPTURE, also called sacred scripture, the revered texts, or Holy Writ, of the world's religions. Scriptures comprise a large part of the literature of the world. They vary greatly in form, volume, age, and degree of sacredness; but their common attribute is that their words are regarded by the devout as sacred.

Most sacred scriptures were originally oral and were passed down through memorization from generation to generation until they were finally committed to writing. A few are still preserved orally, such as the hymns of the Native Americans. Many bear the unmistakable marks of their oral origin and can best be understood when recited aloud; in fact, it is still held by many Hindus and Buddhists that their scriptures lack, when read silently, the meaning and significance they have when recited aloud, for the human voice is believed to add to the recited texts dimensions of truth and power that cannot readily be grasped by the solitary reader.

The greater part of recorded scripture has either a narrative or an expository character. The types of sacred and semisacred texts are, in fact, many and of a great variety. Besides magical runes (ancient Germanic alphabet characters) and SPELLS, they include hymns, prayers, chants, myths, stories about gods and heroes, epics, fables, sacred laws, directions for the conduct of rituals, the original teachings of major religious figures, expositions of these teachings, moral anecdotes, dialogues of seers and sages, and philosophical discussions.

Types of sacred literature vary in authority and degree of sacredness. The centrally important and most holy of the sacred texts have in many instances been gathered into canons (standard works of the faith). These canons, after being determined either by general agreement or by official religious bodies, then become fixed—i.e., they are limited to certain works that are alone viewed as fully authoritative and beyond all further change or alteration. The works that are not admitted to the canons (those of a semisacred or semicanonical character) may still be quite valuable as supplementary texts.

A striking instance of making a distinction between canonical and semicanonical scriptures occurs in HINDUISM. The Hindu sacred literature contains ancient elements and every type of religious literature that has been listed, except historical details on the lives of the seers and sages who produced it. Its earliest portions, namely, the four ancient VEDAS (hymns) seem to have been provided by Indo-Aryan families in northwest India in the 2nd millennium BCE. These and the supplements to them composed after 1000 BCE, the BRĀHMAṆAS (commentaries and instruction in ritual), the ĀRANYAKAS (forest books of ascetics), and the UPANISHADS (philosophical treatises), are considered more sacred than any later writings. They are collectively referred to as ŚRUTI (“heard”; i.e., communicated by revelation); whereas the later writings are labeled SMṚTI (“remembered”; i.e., recollected and reinterpreted at some distance in time from the original revelations). The former are canonical and completed, not to be added to nor altered, but the latter are semicanonical and semisacred.

The most precisely fixed canons are those that have been defined by official religious bodies. The Jewish canon, known to Christians as the OLD TESTAMENT, was fixed by a synod of RABBIS held at Yavneh, Palestine, about 90 CE. The semisacred books that were excluded were labeled by Christians the APOCRYPHA (Greek: “hidden, secret, noncanonical”). ROMAN CATHOLICISM and EASTERN ORTHODOXY later included them in their canons. JESUS left nothing in writing, but he so inspired his followers that they preserved his sayings and biographical details about him in oral form until they were written down in the four Gospels. To these were added the letters of PAUL THE APOSTLE and others (many of them written before the Gospels), and the Book of REVELATION TO JOHN, the whole forming a sacred canon called the NEW TESTAMENT, which was ecclesiastically sanctioned by the end of the 4th century CE. There were also New Testament Apocrypha, but they did not achieve canonical status because of numerous spurious details.

Where no religious body has provided sanction or authorization, scriptures have had to stand on their own authority. Muslims believe that the QUR'AN does this easily. The Qur'an, their only sacred canon or standard of faith, authenticates itself, they believe, by its internal self-evidencing power, for it is composed of the very words of God communicated to MUHAMMAD and recited by him without addition or subtraction. This faith of Muslims in the Qur'an is somewhat similar to that of CHRISTIAN FUNDAMENTALISTS who believe that the BIBLE, as God's word, is verbally inspired from beginning to end.

There exists a large body of literature that possesses less of the aura of true scripture than the works just noted. They are interpretations about divine truth and divine commands, or stories that illustrate how persons, exalted or lowly, have acted (with or without awareness) in response to a divine stimulus. They are, in effect, supportive of true scripture. An outstanding instance is the TALMUD, which to many Jews has very nearly the authority of the Mosaic TORAH (the Law, or the Pentateuch). Indeed, in the postbiblical rabbinical writings it was generally considered a second Torah, complementing the Written Law of MOSES. Similarly, Christianity's major CREEDS have, at one time or another, been regarded as infallible statements, to depart from which would be HERESY. This is particularly true of the APOSTLES' CREED and the three “ecumenical creeds” of Nicaea (325), Constantinople (381), and Chalcedon (451).

SCYLLA AND CHARYBDIS \ˈsi-lə...kə-ˈrib-dis\, in Greek mythology, two immortal and irresistible monsters who beset the narrow waters traversed by the hero ODYSSEUS in his wanderings. Scylla was a supernatural creature, with 12 feet and 6 heads on long, snaky necks, each head having a triple row of sharklike teeth, while her loins were girt with the heads of baying dogs. From her lair in a cave she devoured whatever ventured within reach, including six of Odysseus' companions. She was sometimes said to have been originally human in appearance but transformed out of jealousy through the magic of CIRCE or AMPHITRITE into her fearful shape.

Charybdis, who lurked under a fig tree a bowshot away on the opposite shore, drank down and belched forth the waters three times a day. She was most likely the personification of a whirlpool. The shipwrecked Odysseus barely escaped her clutches by clinging to a tree until the improvised raft that she swallowed floated to the surface again after many hours.

SÉANCE (French: "session," or "sitting"), in OCCULTISM, meeting centered on a medium who seeks to communicate with spirits of the dead. A séance generally involves six or eight persons who normally form a circle and hold hands.

Believers assert that communication has been established when a disembodied voice is heard, a voice speaks through the medium, or a ghostly apparition appears. Sometimes music from an unknown source seems to fill the room; objects appear to move for unnatural reasons; or a hand, a limb, or an entire body may take shape from ectoplasm (a peculiar viscous substance said to issue from the medium's body). Other alleged means of communication include automatic writing, trance speaking, or a OUIJA BOARD or planchette. Whether some spiritualists actually possess the ability to communicate with spirits of the dead remains open to debate.

SEBEK \ˈse-ˌbək\, also spelled Sobek \ˈse-ˌbək\, Greek Suchos \ˈsü-ˌkōs\, in ancient EGYPTIAN RELIGION, god whose chief SANCTUARY in Fayyūm province included a sacred crocodile, Petesouchos (Hellenized form of Egyptian pa-ti-sbk, "the one Sebek has given"), in whom the god was believed to be incarnate.

Sebek may have been associated with fertility or death and burial before becoming a major deity and patron of kings in the Middle Kingdom (c. 1850–c. 1630 BCE). He was merged with RE, the sun god, to constitute a crocodile form of that God known as Sebek-Re. The worship of Sebek continued into Ptolemaic and Roman times in the Fayyūm, at Kawm Umbū (Kom Ombo) in Upper Egypt, and elsewhere. Cemeteries of mummified crocodiles have been found in the Fayyūm and at Kawm Umbū.

SECOND COMING, also called Second Advent, or Parousia, in CHRISTIANITY, the future return of JESUS CHRIST, when it is understood that he will set up his kingdom, judge his enemies, and reward the faithful. Early Christians believed the Advent to be imminent, and those who profess what is known as Adventism believe that the visible appearance of Jesus may occur at any moment. Such believers find evidence in the Gospels (Matthew 24, 25; Mark 13; Luke 21:5–26; John 14:25–29), in the REVELATION TO JOHN, and in other sources.

SECRET SOCIETIES, politically dissident messianic movements that have existed and developed separately from the established Taoist religion from the very beginning (2nd century CE). Their leaders were priest-shamans, similar to the modern fa-shih priests of folk TAOISM. Their followers were from the lower social classes, and their organization was similar to that of the syncretistic religions and of modern secret societies. Although the secret societies have had no organizational contact with the Taoist tradition for centuries, their religious beliefs, practices, and symbols contain some Taoist elements, such as initiation rites, worship of Taoist deities, mediumism, and the use of charms and AMULETS for invulnerability. These influences reached them either directly or through popular religion.

SECT SHINTŌ \ˈshēn-tō, Angl' shin-tō\, Japanese Kyōha Shintō \ˈkyō-hā-\, group of folk religious sects in Japan that were separated by a government decree in 1882 from the suprareligious national cult, State or SHRINE SHINTŌ. They were denied public support, and their denominations were called kyōkai ("church"), or kyōha ("sect"), to distinguish them from the established shrines, called JINJA, which were considered state institutions.

By 1908, 13 sects had been recognized by the government. The main groups are:

Revival Shintō: Shintō Taikyō ("Great Teaching of Shintō"); Shinrikyō ("Divine Truth Religion"); Izumo-ōyashirokyō, also called Taishakyō ("Religion of the Grand Shrine of Izumo").

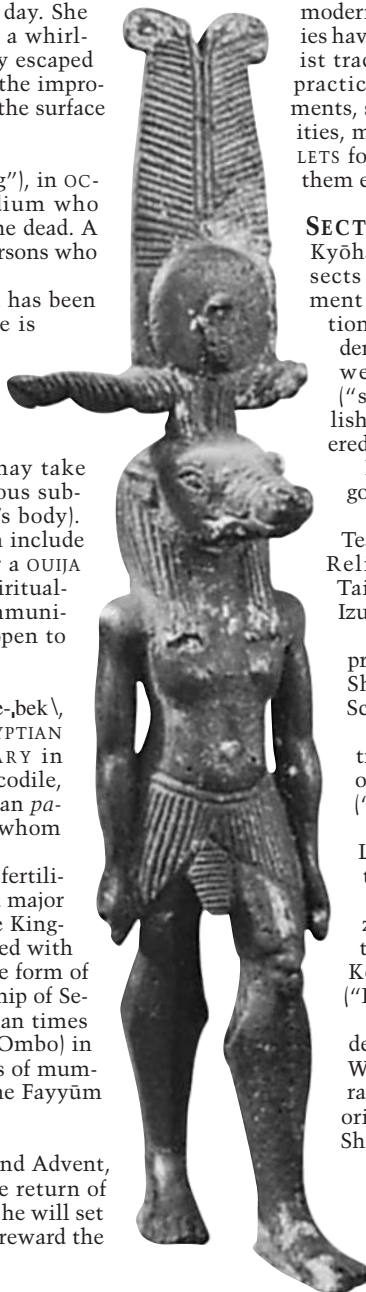

Confucian sects: Shintō Shūsei-ha ("Improving and Consolidating School of Shintō"); Shintō Taisei-ha ("Great Accomplishment School of Shintō").

Mountain-worship sects: Jikkōkyō ("Practical Conduct Religion"); Fusōkyō ("Religion of Mount Fuji"); Mitakekyō, or Ontakekyō ("Religion of Mount Ontake").

Purification sects: Shinshūkyō ("Divine Learning Religion"); Misogikyō ("Purification Religion").

Utopian or faith-healing cults: Kurozumikyō ("Religion of Kurozumi," named after its founder); Konkōkyō ("Religion of Konkō," the name of the KAMI); TENRIKYŌ ("Religion of Divine Wisdom").

The sects developed many splinter sects and devotional associations, so that by the end of World War II, when they were allowed to separate themselves, they had multiplied from the original 13 to 75. Most influential of the Sect Shintō is Tenrikyō.

SECULARISM, any movement in society directed away from otherworldliness to life on earth. In the Middle Ages there was a strong tendency for religious persons to despise human affairs and to meditate on God and the afterlife. As a reaction to this medieval tendency, secularism exhibited itself in the development of Renaissance humanism, when people began to show more interest in human cultural achievements and the possibilities of their fulfillment in this world. The movement toward secularism has often been viewed as being anti-Christian and antireligious. In the latter half of the 20th century, however, some theologians (e.g., MARTIN BUBER, DIETRICH BONHOEFFER, PAUL TILlich) began advocating a more secular Christianity. They suggested that Christianity should not be concerned only with the sacred and the otherworldly, but that people should find in the world the opportunity to promote Christian values. Secularism, in most uses of the term, has either a theological or political significance. Thus, the term has no value in an objective account of either religion or politics as cultural systems.

SEDARIM \se-dā-rēm, sə-dār-əm\, the major orders, or divisions, of the MISHNAH.

SEDER \sā-dər\ (Hebrew: "Order"), in JUDAISM, ritual meal that, on the first night of PASSOVER, celebrates the EXODUS from Egypt (for Jews living outside Israel, it is celebrated on both the first and second nights of Passover). The foundations of the Seder appear in the MISHNAH (in the tractate Pesahim), which sets out a sequence of symbolic foods and required liturgy (hence the Hebrew term seder, meaning "order") that focus upon three foods (unleavened bread [MATZAH], bitter herbs [maror], and the Passover offering) and recitation of some of the HALLEL psalms of praise. In Talmudic times this basic ceremony was embellished with a discussion of Israelite history leading up to and including the captivity in Egypt. Since then, liturgical poems and other homilies have been added. The Seder remains one of the most powerful ceremonies in contemporary Judaism, depicting the power of God's miraculous acts of redemption. In modern times the Seder's message and symbols have been used to respond to issues ranging from feminist concerns to economic and social injustice.

The traditional Seder liturgy, contained in a book called the HAGGADAH, begins with the blessing (KIDDUSH) over wine that introduces all festivals and continues with a statement associating unleavened bread with "the bread of affliction" consumed by the Israelites in Egypt. The head of the family, having usually donned a KITTEL, gives this BENE-DICTION over the wine, and traditionally leads the entire Seder ceremony. In all, four cups of wine (arba' kosot) will be poured at certain intervals. This passage continues and expresses the hope that all who participate in the Passover celebration soon will enjoy freedom in the land of Israel.

After a second cup of wine is poured comes a set of four questions, traditionally recited by the youngest child present, regarding the ways in which the nights of the Passover Seder differ from other nights: "Why does this night differ from all other nights? For on all other nights we eat either leavened or unleavened bread; why on this night only unleavened bread? On all other nights we eat all kinds of herbs; why on this night only bitter herbs? On all other nights we need not dip our herbs even once; why on this night must we dip them twice? On all other nights we eat either sitting up or reclining; why on this night do we all recline?" The answers, found in a passage that begins "We were enslaved by Pharaoh," introduce the EXODUS story, embellished by homilies focusing on the inability of the Egyptians to break the spirit of their Israelite captives, on the miracle of the 10 plagues, and on God's dividing of the Reed Sea (traditionally mislocated as the Red Sea).

Consumption of the festive Passover meal proper is introduced by explanations of the Passover sacrifice, the bitter herbs, representing the bitterness of slavery, are dipped into a mixture of crushed fruits and wine (charoset), signifying that freedom and spiritual progress are the reward of suffering and sacrifice—and the unleavened bread, symbolizing the haste with which the Israelites left Egypt. At this point the meal is eaten and is then followed, as are all meals in the home of observant Jews, by recitation of the grace after meals and, in the case of the Passover Seder, by the drinking of the third cup of wine.

The meal is followed by a medieval addition beginning, "Pour out your wrath," which is a compilation of Scriptural verses urging God to take vengeance upon nations that oppress the people of Israel and to bring ELIJAH the Prophet, the precursor of the MESSIAH. At this point a cup of wine (which is not drunk) is poured for Elijah, whose appearance at some future Seder will signify the imminent arrival of the Messiah.

SEFER HA-BAHIR \ˈse-fer-ˌhā-bā-ˈhir, ˈsā-fər-\ (Hebrew: "Book of Brightness"), largely symbolic commentary on the OLD TESTAMENT, written in a mixture of Hebrew and Aramaic, the basic motif of which is the mystical significance of the shapes and sounds of the Hebrew alphabet. The influence of the Bahir on the development of QABBALAH was profound and lasting. Whereas Qabbalists viewed the Bahir as authoritative, others rejected it as heretical.

The book seems to have first appeared in Provence, France, in the latter half of the 12th century. Qabbalists themselves attributed parts to RABBI Nehunya ben Haqana (about 1st century CE) and credited many of the book's sayings to early Jewish tannaim (1st to 3rd century; see TANNA) and amoraim (3rd to 6th century; see AMORA). It seems, however, that the author of the Bahir merely appropriated certain mystical texts and concepts that had earlier made their way to Europe from the East.

The Bahir successfully introduced into Qabbalah—and through Qabbalah, into Judaism—an extensive mystical symbolism. It contains the earliest-known explanation of the 10 "divine emanations," which are said to symbolize and explain the creation and continued existence of the universe. These 10 ma'amarot ("sayings"), divided into 3 upper and 7 lower manifestations, became widely known in Qabbalah as SEFIROT ("numbers").

The Bahir also introduced into Qabbalistic speculations the concept of the transmigration of souls (gilgul) and the notion of a cosmic, or spiritual, tree to symbolize the flow of divine creative power. In addition, evil was said to be a principle found within God himself.

SEFER HASIDIM \ˈse-fer-ˌkā-sē-ˈdēm, ˈsā-fər-, -kā-ˈsē-dəm\ (Hebrew: "Book of the Pious"), also spelled Sepher Hasidim, account of the day-to-day religious life of medieval German Jews known as Hasidim. The authentic Hasid is described in terms of ASCETICISM, humility, serenity, altruism, and strict ethical behavior. The work presents the combined teachings of the three leaders of German HASIDISM during the 12th and 13th centuries: Samuel the Hasid, Judah the Hasid of Regensburg (his son), and ELEAZAR BEN JUDAH OF WORMS.

SEFER HA-TEMUNA \ˈse-fer-ˌhā-tə-mū-ˈnā, ˈsā-fər-\ (Hebrew: "Book of the Image"), anonymous work that first appeared in Spain in the 13th century; it imbues the letters of the Hebrew alphabet with a mystical significance and claims that there are invisible parts of the TORAH. The book advances the notion of cosmic cycles (shemittot), each of which provides an interpretation of the Torah according to a corresponding divine attribute. Its primary treatment is of the first three shemittot, governed respectively by "grace," "judgment," and "mercy." Humankind, currently living under "judgment," reads the Torah as a series of prohibitions and commandments. This relativistic interpretation of the Torah strongly influenced Shabbetaianism (see SHABBETAI TZEVI) by helping to shape its theory that the Torah can be fulfilled only by its seeming annulment.

SEFER HA-ZOHAR \ˈse-fer-hā-ˈzō-här, ˈsā-fər-\ (Hebrew: "Book of Splendor"), 13th-century book, mostly in Aramaic, that is the classic text of QABBALAH. Many Qabbalists invested the Zohar with a sanctity that is normally accorded only to the TORAH and the TALMUD.

The Zohar consists of several units, the largest of which—usually called the Zohar proper—deals with the "inner" meaning of biblical texts, especially those from the Torah, the Book of Ruth, and the Song of Solomon. Lengthy homilies are mixed with short discourses and PARABLES, all centered on SIMEON BEN YOĤAI (2nd century CE) and his disciples. Though ostensibly authored by Simeon, the major portion of the Zohar should be credited to MOSES DE LEÓN (1250–1305) of Spain, though earlier mystic materials may have been used or incorporated into the present text.

Because the mystery of creation is a recurrent theme in the Zohar, there are extensive discussions of the 10 divine emanations (SEFIROT, literally "numbers") of God the Creator, which reputedly explain the creation and continued existence of the universe. Other major topics are the PROBLEM OF EVIL and the significance of prayer and good deeds.

The greatest popular influence of the Zohar did not occur until after the expulsion of the Jews from Spain in 1492, when it came to be consulted as a guide for mystical speculations about the MESSIAH and ESCHATOLOGY.

SEFER TORAH \ˈse-fer-tō-ˈrā; ˈsā-fər-ˈtō-rə, -ˈtōr-ə\ (Hebrew: "Book of the Law"), also spelled Sepher Torah, in JUDAISM, the PENTATEUCH written in Hebrew by a qualified calligrapher (SOFER) on vellum or parchment and enshrined in the Ark of the Law (aron ha-qodesh) in SYNAGOGUES. The Sefer TORAH is used for public readings during services on SABBATHS, Mondays, Thursdays, and religious festivals. The SEPHARDIM often enclose the Sefer Torah in a case of wood or metal and display it to the congregation before the reading of the Law. ASHKENAZIM generally cover it with an ornate mantle of cloth and display it to the congregation only after the daily reading has been completed.

SEFER YETZIRA \ˈse-fer-ˌyet-sē-ˈrā, ˈsā-fər-\ (Hebrew: "Book of Creation"), oldest known Hebrew text on magic and cosmology; it contends that the cosmos derived from the 22 letters of the Hebrew alphabet and from the 10 divine numbers (SEFIROT). Taken together, they were said to comprise the "32 paths of secret wisdom" by which God created the universe. The book, falsely attributed to ABRAHAM and thus sometimes called Otiyyot de Avraham Avinu ("Alphabet of Our Father Abraham"), appeared between the 3rd and 6th century CE, but interpolations were later added.

The Yetzira developed the concept of the 10 sefirot, which profoundly influenced subsequent JUDAISM. The first group of four represented universal elements (the spirit of God, air, water, and fire), whereas the last group represented the six spatial directions. The sefirot and the letters of the alphabet were likewise correlated to parts of the human body, thereby making man a microcosm of creation.

Medieval German pietistic HASIDISM associated formulas of the Yetzira with the GOLEM. Among the more important commentaries on the Yetzira were those of SA'ADIA BEN JOSEPH (882–942) and ISAAC BEN SOLOMON LURIA (1534–72).

SEFIROT \se-fē-ˈrōt\ (Hebrew: "numbers"), also spelled sephiroth, singular sefira \-ˈrā\, or sephira, in the speculations of QABBALAH, the 10 emanations, or powers, by which God the creator is manifest. The sefirot have also been called "crowns," "attributes," "principles," and "steps."

The concept first appeared in the SEFER YETZIRA ("Book of Creation"), as the 10 ideal numbers. In the development of Qabbalistic literature, the idea was expanded and elaborated to denote the 10 stages of emanation from En Sof (the Infinite, the unknowable God), by which God the Creator can be discerned; the rhythm by which one sefira unfolds to another was believed to represent the rhythm of creation. Qabbalists used them as one of their principal subjects of mystical contemplation, despite criticism that such speculations were implicitly heretical.

The sefirot are keter 'elyon ("supreme crown"), ḥalhama ("wisdom"), bina ("intelligence"), hesed ("love"), gevura ("might"), tif'eret ("beauty"), netzah ("eternity"), hod ("majesty"), yesod ("foundation"), and malkhut ("kingship").

SEKHMET \ˈsek-met\, also spelled Sakhmet \ˈsāk-, in EGYPTIAN RELIGION, goddess of war and the destroyer of the enemies of the sun god RE. Sekhmet was associated both with disease and with healing and medicine. Like other fierce goddesses in the Egyptian pantheon, she was called the "Eye of Re." Sekhmet was the companion of the god PTAH and was worshiped principally at Memphis. She was usually depicted as a lioness or as a woman with the head of a lioness, on which was placed the solar disk and the uraeus serpent. Sekhmet was sometimes identified with other Egyptian goddesses such as HATHOR, BASTET, and MUT.

SELENE \sə-ˈlē-nē\ (Greek: "Moon"), Latin Luna \ˈlū-nə\, in GREEK RELIGION and ROMAN RELIGION, personification of the moon as a goddess. She was worshiped at the new and full moons. Her parents were the TITANS Hyperion and Theia; her brother was HELIOS (sometimes called her father); her sister Eos; and her husband ZEUS. She is most connected with ENDYMION, whom she loved and whom Zeus cast into eternal sleep in a cave on Mount Latmus; there, Selene visited him and became the mother of 50 daughters. In another story she was loved by PAN. By the 5th century BCE Selene was sometimes identified with ARTEMIS, or PHOEBE, "the bright one." As Luna, she had temples at Rome on the Aventine and Palatine hills.

SELF-REALIZATION FELLOWSHIP, spiritual society founded in the United States by Paramahansa Yogananda (1893–1952), a teacher of YOGA, who was one of the first Indian spiritual teachers to reside permanently in the West. The fellowship was chartered in 1935, with headquarters in Los Angeles; there are now centers worldwide, as well as several independent groups influenced by his teachings. His Autobiography of a Yogi (1946) became highly popular and influential.

Yogananda's teaching was based on the Yoga Sūtras of PATAÑJALI (2nd century BCE). He also taught a specific method, kriyā yoga, which combines deep meditation with techniques to control the movement of "life energy" and withdraw energy and attention from "outer" to "inner" concerns. Self-Realization Fellowship centers emphasize classes in kriyā yoga and also offer Churches of All Religions, which have services that combine elements of HINDUISM and CHRISTIANITY and include meditation, lectures, and music. The Self-Realization Fellowship consists of lay members as well as those who have taken monastic vows and generally play the role of clergy.

SELKET \ˈsel-ket\, also spelled Selket, or Serqet \ˈser-ket\, in EGYPTIAN mythology, goddess of the dead. Her symbolic animal was the scorpion. She was one of the underworld deities charged with protecting the CANOPIC JAR in which the intestines of the deceased were stored after EMBALMING.

SEMELE \ˈse-mə-lē\, also called Thyone \ˈthī-ō-nē\, in GREEK mythology, daughter of CADMUS and HARMONIA and mother of DIONYSUS by ZEUS.

Semele's liaison with Zeus enraged HERA, who, disguised as an old nurse, coaxed Semele into asking Zeus to visit her in the same splendor in which he would appear before Hera. Zeus had already promised to grant Semele her every wish and thus was forced to grant a wish that would kill her: his lightning and thunder destroyed Semele. Zeus saved the unborn Dionysus from the womb. According to some versions of the story, Dionysus descended into HADES after reaching maturity and brought Semele back, and she too became an immortal or even a goddess.

SEMI-ARIANISM, 4th-century Trinitarian HERESY in CHRISTIANITY. Though it modified the extreme position of ARIANISM, it still fell short of the church's orthodox teaching that Father, Son, and HOLY SPIRIT are of the same substance.

ARIUS held that the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit were three separate essences (ousiai) or substances (hypostaseis) and that the Son and Spirit derived their divinity from the Father, were created in time, and were inferior to the Godhead. Semi-Arians, however, admitted that the Son was "like" (homoiousios) the Father but not of one substance (homoousios) with him. Both Arianism and semi-Arianism were condemned at the COUNCIL OF NICAËA (325) and the COUNCIL OF CONSTANTINOPLE (381).

SEMI-PELAGIANISM, in 17th-century theological terminology, a doctrine that flourished from about 429 to 529 in southern France. The surviving evidences of the original movement are limited, but it is clear that the fathers of semi-Pelagianism were monks who stressed the need of ascetic practices and who were respected leaders in the church. The writings of three of these monks had positive influence on the history of the movement. They were JOHN CASSIAN, who had lived in the East and who founded two monasteries in Massilia (Marseille); Vincent, a monk of the celebrated Abbey of Lérins; and Faustus, bishop of Riez, a former monk and ABBOT at Lérins, who at the request of Provence bishops wrote De gratia ("Concerning Grace"), in which semi-Pelagianism was given its final form.

Unlike the Pelagians, who denied ORIGINAL SIN and believed in perfect human FREE WILL, the semi-Pelagians believed in the universality of original SIN as a corruptive force in man. They also believed that without God's GRACE this corruptive force could not be overcome, and they therefore admitted the necessity of GRACE for Christian life and action. They also insisted on the necessity of BAPTISM, even for infants. But contrary to AUGUSTINE, they taught that the innate corruption of man was not so great that the initiative toward Christian commitment was beyond the powers of man's native will.

This commitment was called by John Cassian initium fidei ("beginning of faith") and by Faustus of Riez credulitatis affectus ("feeling of credulity"). According to this view, man by his unaided will could desire to accept the gospel of salvation, but he could not be actually converted without divine help. In later semi-Pelagianism, divine help was conceived not as an internal empowering graciously infused by God into man but as purely external preaching or the biblical communication of the Gospel, of the divine promises, and of the divine threats. The strong point for all semi-Pelagians was the justice of God: God would not be just if man were not natively empowered to make at least the first step toward salvation. If salvation depended initially and unilaterally only on God's free election of the saved, those not chosen could complain that they were doomed by the mere fact of being born.

The result of semi-Pelagianism, however, was the denial of the necessity of God's unmerited, supernatural, gracious empowering of man's will for saving action. It contradicted ST. PAUL and St. Augustine, and the latter was by papal declaration the approved Catholic doctor in the question of grace and thus beyond attack.

After Faustus' death (c. 490), semi-Pelagianism was still highly respected, but the doctrine declined in the 6th century. At the instigation of Pope Felix IV (526–530), semi-Pelagianism was condemned at the second Council of Orange (529). The condemnation was approved by Pope Boniface II, Felix's successor. From that point on, semi-Pelagianism was recognized as a HERESY in the Roman Catholic church.

SEN, KESHAB CHUNDER \ˈkə-shəb-ˈchən-der-ˈsen, -ˈchən-drə-, Chunder also spelled Chandra (b. Nov. 19, 1838, Calcutta, India—d. Jan. 8, 1884, Calcutta), Hindu philosopher and social reformer who attempted to incorporate Christian theology within the framework of Hindu thought.

Although not of the BRAHMIN caste, Sen's family was prominent in Calcutta. At age 19 he joined the Brahma Samaj (Society of BRAHMAN, also translated as Society of God), founded in 1828 by the Hindu religious and social reformer RAM MOHUN ROY. The Brahma Samaj was intended to revitalize Hindu religion through use of ancient Hindu sources and the authority of the VEDAS. Sen was convinced, however, that only Christian doctrine could bring new life to Hindu society.

Using Christian missionary methods, Sen effected social reforms in India; he organized relief campaigns for the poor, promoted literacy by founding schools for children and adults, and issued a number of inexpensive publications to bring reading matter within the reach of all. He condemned child marriage and was instrumental in having the marriage rites of his society recognized by law in 1872.

While his contemporaries DEBENDRANATH TAGORE and RAMAKRISHNA remained thoroughly Hindu in outlook, Sen was almost a complete convert to CHRISTIANITY. The deterrent was his belief that JESUS CHRIST, however admirable, was not unique. Nevertheless, he did want his people to emulate Jesus, believing that only a vital Christianity would be the salvation of a stratified and ossified Hindu society. Sen formed a new society in 1866 called the Bhāratvarṣiya Brahma Samaj ("Society of Brahman of India"). The Brahma Samaj was renamed the Ādi Samaj ("Original Society") and was quickly purged of Christian teaching.

In 1870 Sen lectured widely in England. Back in India, however, he allowed his 14-year-old daughter to marry, thus repudiating his avowed opposition to child marriage. As a result, some of his followers broke away, and he organized a new society, Naba Bidhān, or Nava Vidhāna ("New Dispensation"), and continued to preach a mixture of Hindu philosophy and Christian theology. Sen revived many ancient Vedic practices and sent out 12 disciples to preach under a flag bearing a crescent, a cross, and a trident.

SEPHARDI \sə-ˈfär-dē\ (from Hebrew: Sefarad, Spain), plural Sephardim, a Jew native to or tracing descent from the Jewish communities of medieval Spain and Portugal.

The Sephardim were expelled from the Iberian Peninsula in the last decades of the 15th century; initially they fled to North Africa and other parts of the Ottoman Empire, and many of these eventually settled in France, Holland, England, Italy, and the Balkans. Salonika (Thessaloníki) in Macedonia and Amsterdam became major sites of Sephardic settlement. The transplanted Sephardim largely retained their native Judeo-Spanish language (Ladino), literature, and customs. They became noted for their cultural and intellectual achievements within the Mediterranean and northern European Jewish communities. The Sephardim differ notably from the Ashkenazim in preserving Babylonian rather than Palestinian Jewish ritual traditions. Of the estimated 700,000 Sephardic Jews in the world today, many now reside in the state of Israel. The chief rabbinate of Israel has both a Sephardic and an ASHKENAZI chief RABBI.

The designation Sephardim frequently is taken to signify all North African Jews and others who, under the influence of the "Spanish Jews," have adopted the Sephardic rite.

SEPTUAGINT \sep-ˈtü-ə-jənt, -ˈtyü-; ˈsep-,\ earliest extant Greek translation of the OLD TESTAMENT from the original Hebrew, presumably made for the Jewish community in Egypt when Greek was the lingua franca throughout the region. The TORAH, or PENTATEUCH, was translated near the middle of the 3rd century BCE and the rest of the Old Testament was translated in the 2nd century BCE.

The name Septuagint (from Latin septuaginta, "70") was derived from later legend that there were 72 translators, 6 from each of the 12 tribes of Israel, who worked in separate cells, translating the whole, and in the end all their versions were identical. A tradition that translators were sent to Alexandria by Eleazar, the chief priest at Jerusalem, at the request of Ptolemy II Philadelphus (285–246 BCE), first appeared in the Letter of Aristeas, an unreliable source.

It was in the Septuagint text that many early Christians located the prophecies they claimed were fulfilled by JESUS CHRIST. Jews considered this a misuse of Holy SCRIPTURE and stopped using the Septuagint. Its subsequent history lies within the Christian church. It was the Septuagint, not the original Hebrew, that was the main basis for the Old Latin, Coptic, Ethiopic, Armenian, Georgian, and Slavic, and part of the Arabic translations of the Old Testament. It has never ceased to be the standard version of the Old Testament in the Greek church, and from it JEROME began his translation of the VULGATE Old Testament.

In addition to all the books of the Hebrew canon, the Septuagint under Christian auspices separated the minor prophets and some other books and added the extra books known to Protestants and Jews as apocryphal and to ROMAN CATHOLICS as deuterocanonical. The Hebrew canon has three divisions: the Torah (Law), the NEBİ'İM (Prophets), and the Ketubim (Writings). The Septuagint has four: law, history, poetry, and prophets, with the books of the APOCRYPHA inserted where appropriate. This division has continued in the Western church in most modern BIBLE translations, except that in Protestant versions the Apocrypha are either omitted or grouped separately.

SERAPH, plural seraphim, in Jewish, Christian, and Islamic literature, celestial being variously described as having two or three pairs of wings and serving as a throne guardian of God. Often called the burning ones, seraphim in the OLD TESTAMENT appear in the Temple vision of the prophet ISAIAH as six-winged creatures praising God (Isaiah 6:3). In Christian angelology the seraphim are the highest-ranking celestial beings in the hierarchy of ANGELS.

In art the four-winged cherubim are painted blue (symbolizing the sky) and the six-winged seraphim red (symbolizing fire). Compare CHERUB.

SERMON ON THE MOUNT, biblical collection of religious teachings and ethical sayings of Jesus of Nazareth, as found in Matthew, chapters 5–7. The sermon was addressed to disciples and a large crowd of listeners, and contains many of the most familiar Christian homilies and sayings, including the BEATITUDES and the LORD'S PRAYER. It is paralleled in the Sermon on the Plain (Luke 6:20–49).

SERVETUS, MICHAEL \sər-'vĕ-təs, ser-'vā-\, Spanish Miguel Servet (b. 1511?, Villanueva or Tudela, Spain—d. Oct. 27, 1553, Champel, Switz.), Spanish physician and theologian whose unorthodox teachings led to his condemnation as a heretic by both Protestants and ROMAN CATHOLICS and to his execution by Calvinists from Geneva.

In February 1530 Servetus attended the coronation of Emperor Charles V at Bologna. Distressed by papal ostentation and by the emperor's deference to the worldly pope, he met with REFORMATION leaders John Oecolampadius, MARTIN BUCER, and Kaspar Schwenckfeld. Servetus published a work on the TRINITY in De Trinitatis erroribus libri vii (1531), asserting that the Word is eternal, a mode of God's self-expression, whereas the Spirit is God's motion or power within the hearts of men. The Son is the union of the eternal Word with the man Jesus.

Servetus remained outwardly a conforming Roman Catholic while pursuing his private theological studies. He soon published at Lyon his most important work, Biblia sacra ex Santis Pagnini tra[ns]latione (1542), notable for its theory of PROPHECY.

Servetus forwarded the manuscript of an enlarged revision of his ideas, the Christianismi Restitutio, to JOHN CALVIN in 1546 and expressed a desire to meet him. After their first few letters, Calvin would have nothing more to do with him and kept the manuscript. He declared that if Servetus ever came to Geneva he would not allow him to leave alive.

A rewritten version of Servetus' manuscript was secretly printed at Vienne in 1553. In discussing the relationship between the Spirit and regeneration in that book, Servetus almost incidentally made known his discovery of the pulmonary circulation of blood. In the book, Servetus argued that both God the Father and Christ his Son had been dishonored by the Constantinian promulgation of the NICENE CREED, thus obscuring the redemptive role of Christ and bringing about the fall of the church; Servetus felt he could restore the church by separating it from the state and by using only those theological formulations that could be proved from SCRIPTURE and the pre-Constantinian fathers.

When some of Servetus' letters to Calvin fell into the hands of Guillaume de Trie, a former citizen of Lyon, he exposed Servetus to the inquisitor general at Lyon. Servetus and his printers were seized. During the trial, however, Servetus escaped, and the Roman Catholic authorities had to be content with burning him in effigy. He quixotically appeared in Geneva and was arrested and tried for HERESY.

Calvin played a prominent part in the trial and pressed for execution. Despite his intense biblicism and his wholly Christocentric view of the universe, Servetus was found guilty of heresy, mainly on his views of the Trinity and BAPTISM. He was burned alive at Champel on Oct. 27, 1553. His execution produced a Protestant controversy on imposing the death penalty for heresy, drew severe criticism upon Calvin, and influenced Laelius Socinus, a founder of modern unitarian views.

SETH \ˈseth\, also called Setekh \ˈse-,tek\, Setesh \ˈse-,tesh\, or Set \ˈset\, ancient Egyptian god, patron of the 11th nome, or province, of Upper Egypt.

The worship of Seth originally centered at Nubt (Greek Ombos), near modern Tūkh, on the western bank of the Nile River. Nubt, with its vast cemetery at nearby Naqādah, was the principal predynastic center in Upper Egypt. The town lost its preeminent position with the unification of Egypt about 3050 BCE, which was carried out under kings whose capital was ABYDOS and whose royal god was HORUS. This historical event probably gave rise to the myth concerning the struggle between Horus and Seth, who became perpetual antagonists.

Seth was represented as a composite figure with a canine body, slanting eyes, square-tipped ears, tufted (in later representations, forked) tail, and a long, curved, pointed snout; various animals have been suggested as the basis for his form. Because even the ancient Egyptians rendered his figure inconsistently, it is probably a mythical composite.

In myths, Seth was the brother of Osiris; he was depicted as bursting out of the womb of his mother, NUT, as being an unfaithful husband to his consort and sister, Nephthys, and as murdering OSIRIS, whom he tricked into entering a chest which he then closed and hurled into the sea. After Osiris' murder, Horus was conceived miraculously by ISIS, the wife and sister of Osiris. Horus struggled with Seth. This struggle forms the theme of the Ramesside text The Contending of Horus and Seth, which borders on satire, and the later, much more somber version recorded by Plutarch.

After the close of the New Kingdom, as Egypt lost its empire and later its independence, and as the cult of Osiris grew in prominence, Seth was gradually ousted from the Egyptian pantheon. In the 1st millennium BCE his name and image were effaced from many monuments. He was now identified as a god of the eastern invaders of Egypt, including the Persians. No longer able to reconcile Seth with Horus, the Egyptians equated the former with evil and the DEMON Apopis, or with the Greek TYPHON. Elaborate rituals of the repeated defeat of Seth as enemy largely replaced the earlier ritual destructions of Apopis.

SETON, SAINT ELIZABETH ANN, née Elizabeth Ann Bayley (b. Aug. 28, 1774, New York, N.Y. [U.S.]—d. Jan. 4, 1821, Emmitsburg, Md., U.S.; canonized 1975; feast day January 4), first native-born American to be canonized by the ROMAN CATHOLIC church. She was the founder of the first American religious society.

Elizabeth Bayley was the daughter of a distinguished physician. In 1797 she helped to found the first charitable institution in New York City; she was the organization's treasurer for seven years. She married William M. Seton in 1794, and in 1803 they and the eldest of their five children traveled to Italy for William's health. There her husband died, after which she returned to New York City and converted to Roman Catholicism in 1805.

In 1808 Seton opened a school for Catholic girls in Baltimore, Md. In 1809 she founded a religious community, the Sisters of St. Joseph, when she and her companions took vows before Archbishop John Carroll. Mother Seton and the Sisters then moved their home and school to Emmitsburg, Md., where they provided free education for the poor girls of the parish—an act later considered to be the beginning of Catholic parochial education in the United States. Renamed the Sisters of Charity of St. Joseph in 1812, the order opened houses in Philadelphia in 1814 and in New York City in 1817. Mother Seton remained active in the community until her death in 1821, by which time the order had 20 communities. In 1856 Seton Hall College (now University) was named for her.

SEVEN AGAINST THEBES \ˈthēbz\, in Greek mythology, seven champions who were killed fighting against Thebes after the fall of OEDIPUS, the king of that city. His twin sons Eteocles and Polyneices failed to agree on which of them was to succeed to the throne and decided to rule in alternate years. As Eteocles' turn came first, Polyneices withdrew to Argos and married Argeia, daughter of King Adrastus. When Eteocles refused to give up the throne at the end of the year, Adrastus mobilized an army, whose chieftains, according to Aeschylus, were Tydeus, Capaneus, Eteocles, Hippomedon, Parthenopaeus, Amphiarus, and Polyneices. Polyneices and Eteocles killed each other. When the sons of the dead Seven, the Epigoni, or second generation, reached adulthood, Adrastus again attacked and occupied the city after the Thebans had evacuated it.

SEVEN SAGES OF THE BAMBOO GROVE, also called Seven Worthies of the Bamboo Grove, Wade-Giles romanization Chu-lin ch'ī-hsien \ʃü-'lin-'chē-'shyen\, Pinyin Zhulin Qixian, group of Chinese scholars and poets of the mid-3rd century CE who escaped from the hypocrisy and danger of the official world to a life of drinking wine and writing verse in the country. Their retreat was typical of the Taoist-oriented ch'ing-t'an ("pure conversation") movement that advocated freedom of expression and hedonistic escape from the corruption of the Wei-dynasty (220–265/266 CE) court. The retirement of the Seven Sages served as a model for later Chinese writers living in troubled times.

Most prominent among the Seven Sages was the poet Yüan Chi (210–263 CE). Hsiang Hsiu (230?–280 CE) wrote a commentary, the Chuang-tzu chu, with KUO HSIANG, a Neo-Taoist contemporary, on the works of the early Taoist philosopher Chuang-tzu (d. c. 300 BCE). Other members of the group included the devout Taoist Shan T'ao and Wang Jung. The group's host was the writer and amateur smith Hsi K'ang (223–262 CE), whose independent thinking and scorn for court custom led to his execution by the state.

SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTIST \ad-'ven-tist, 'ad-, \, member of the largest organized modern denomination of Adventism, a millennialist Christian sect founded in the United States in the 19th century. (See also ADVENTIST.)

SHABBETAI TZEVI \ˈshā-bə-,tī-tsə-'vē\, also spelled Sabbatat Zebi, or Zevi (b. July 23, 1626, Smyrna, Ottoman Turkey [now Izmir, Turkey]—d. 1676, Ulcinj [Dulcigno] Republic of Montenegro), false MESSIAH who developed a mass following and threatened rabbinical authority.

As a young man, Shabbetai steeped himself in the QABBALAH. His periods of ECSTASY and his strong personality attracted many disciples, and at the age of 22 he proclaimed himself the Messiah. Driven from Smyrna by the rabbinate, he journeyed to Salonika (now Thessaloníki) and then to Constantinople (now Istanbul). There he encountered an esteemed Jewish preacher and Qabbalist, Abraham ha-Yakini, who possessed a document affirming that Shabbetai was the Messiah. Shabbetai then traveled to Palestine and after that to Cairo, where he won over Raphael Halebi, the wealthy and powerful treasurer of the Turkish governor.

With a retinue of believers and financial backing, Shabbetai triumphantly returned to Jerusalem. There, a 20-year-old student known as Nathan of Gaza prophesied the imminent restoration of ISRAEL and world salvation through the bloodless victory of Shabbetai. In accordance with millenarian belief, he cited 1666 as the apocalyptic year.

Threatened with EXCOMMUNICATION, Shabbetai returned to Smyrna in the autumn of 1665. His movement spread to Venice, Amsterdam, Hamburg, London, and several other European and North African cities. At the beginning of 1666, Shabbetai went to Constantinople and was imprisoned on his arrival. After a few months, he was transferred to the castle at ABYDOS, which became known to his followers as Migdal Oz, the Tower of Strength. In September, he was brought before the Sultan in Adrianople and, under threat of torture, converted to ISLAM. Most of his disciples were disillusioned by his APOSTASY, while Shabbetai eventually fell out of favor and was banished.

The movement that became known as Shabbetaianism attempted to reconcile Shabbetai's claims of spiritual authority with his subsequent seeming betrayal of the Jewish faith by interpreting his apostasy as a step toward ultimate fulfillment of his messiahship and, in some cases, by following their leader's example. They argued that such outward acts were irrelevant as long as one remains inwardly a Jew. Those who embraced the theory of "sacred sin" believed that the TORAH could be fulfilled only by amoral acts representing its seeming annulment (see SEFER HA-TEMUNA). Others felt they could remain faithful Shabbetaians without having to apostatize. The sect reached a peak in the 18th century with JACOB FRANK.

SHABISTARĪ, SA'D AL-DĪN MAḤMŪD AL- \shā-bi-'stā-rē\ (b. c. 1250, Shabistar, near Tabrīz, Iran—d. c. 1320, Tabrīz), Persian mystic whose poetic work Golshan-e rāz (The Mystic Rose Garden) became a classic of SUFISM.

Apparently al-Shabistārī spent most of his life in Tabrīz. He grew up in an age of spiritual confusion, following the Mongol invasion of Iran, the sack of Baghdad, and the final fall of the 'Abbāsid caliphate (1258) to the Mongols. Tabrīz was a capital of the new Mongol empire, and al-Shabistārī's life was clearly influenced by fierce doctrinal disputes and by a struggle between CHRISTIANITY and ISLAM for the allegiance of the Mongol rulers. In order to come to terms with the distressed status of a Muslim under heathen rule, he, like many of his contemporaries, withdrew from the outer world and sought refuge in spirituality and MYSTICISM.

Al-Shabistārī's Golshan-e rāz, written in 1311 or possibly 1317, is a poetical expression of his retreat from the temporal world. It consists of questions and answers about mystical doctrines. The work was introduced into Europe in about 1700, where it soon became popular in translation. European readers often regarded it as the major work of Sufism, and it enjoyed a vogue among Christian followers of mystical theology.

SHĀDHILĪ, AL- \āsh-'sha-thi-lē\, in full Abū al-Ḥasan 'Alī ibn 'Abd Allāh al-Shādhilī (b. 1196/97, Ghumāra, near Ceuta, Mor.—d. 1258, Humaiṭhrā), Sufi Muslim theologian who was the founder of the order of the SHĀDHILĪYA.

Al-Shādhilī was said to be a direct descendant of the Prophet MUHAMMAD and to have gone blind in his youth because of excessive study. In 1218/19 he traveled to Tunisia, where his ascetic Sufi teachings aroused the hostility of the traditional 'ULAMĀ'. Al-Shādhilī was forced to go into exile in Egypt, where he was more favorably received. He died returning from a PILGRIMAGE to the Islamic holy cities of Arabia. It was while he was in Egypt that he founded the Shā-dhilīya order, which became one of the most popular of the mystical brotherhoods of the Middle East and North Africa and from which 15 other orders derive their origin.

Although al-Shādhilī left no writings, his biography and certain sayings and some poetry have been preserved in Taj al-Dīn Aḥmad ibn 'Aṭā' Allāh al-Iskandarī's Latā'if al-mīnan (1284).

SHĀDHILĪYA \sha-thi-'lē-ə\, also spelled Shāziliya, widespread brotherhood of Sufis, founded on the teachings of Abū al-Ḥasan AL-SHĀDHILĪ (d. 1258) in Alexandria. Shādhilī teachings stress five points: fear of God, living the SUNNA (practices) of the Prophet, disdain of mankind, fatalism, and turning to God in times of happiness and distress. The order, which spread throughout North Africa and the Sudan and into Arabia, was created by disciples, as al-Shādhilī discouraged MONASTICISM and urged his followers to maintain their ordinary lives, a tradition still followed. The order has given rise to an unusually large number of suborders, notably the Jazūliya and the DARQĀWĀ in Morocco and the 'Isāwīya in Morocco, Algeria, and Tunisia. See also SUFISM.

SHADRAPA \shā-drā-pā\, ancient West Semitic deity. His name may possibly be translated as "Spirit of Healing." He was often represented as a youthful, beardless male, standing on a lion above mountains, wearing a long, trailing garment and a pointed headdress, and holding a small lion in one hand and, perhaps, a whip in the other. In representations from Palmyra, Shadrapa is shown with serpents and scorpions. Probably equated with ADONIS, Shadrapa was worshiped in North Africa as the tutelary deity of Leptis Magna and was equated there with Liber-Dionysus.

SHĀFI'Ī, ABŪ 'ABD ALLĀH (MUHAMMAD IBN IDRĪS) AL- \āsh-'sha-fi-ē\ (b. 767, Arabia—d. Jan. 20, 820, al-Fuṣṭāṭ [now Cairo], Egypt), Muslim legal scholar who played an important role in the formation of Islamic legal thought and was the founder of the Shāfi'īya school of law.

He belonged to the tribe of the QURAYSH, the tribe of the Prophet MUHAMMAD, to whom his mother was distantly related. His father died when he was very young, and he was brought up, in poor circumstances, by his mother in MECCA. He came to spend much time among the Bedouins and from them acquired a thorough familiarity with Arabic poetry. When he was about 20 he traveled to MEDINA to study with the great legal scholar MĀLIK IBN ANAS. On Mālik's death in 795, al-Shāfi'ī went to Yemen, where he became involved in seditious activities for which he was imprisoned by the CALIPH Hārūn al-Rashīd at al-Raqqa (in Syria) in 803. He was soon freed, however, and after a period of study in Baghdad with an important jurist of the Ḥanafī school, al-Shaybānī, he went to al-Fuṣṭāṭ (now Cairo), where he remained until 810. Returning to Baghdad, he settled there as a teacher for several years. He returned to Egypt in 815/816 and remained there for the rest of his life. His tomb in al-Fuṣṭāṭ has long been a place of PILGRIMAGE.

During the course of his travels, al-Shāfi'ī studied at most of the great centers of jurisprudence and acquired a comprehensive knowledge of the different schools of legal theory. His great contribution was the creation of a new synthesis of Islamic legal thought. Primarily he dealt with the question of what the sources of Islamic law were and how these sources could be applied by the law to contemporary events. His book, the Risāla, earned for him the title of "father of Muslim jurisprudence."

SHĀFI'Ī LEGAL SCHOOL \sha-fi-ē\, also called Madhhab Shāfi'ī, English Shafiites \sha-fē-'its\, in ISLAM, one of the four SUNNI schools of religious law, derived from the teachings of ABŪ 'ABD ALLĀH AL-SHĀFI'Ī (767–820). This legal school (madhhab) stabilized the bases of Islamic legal theory, admitting the validity of both divine will and human speculation. Rejecting provincial dependence on the living SUNNA (traditional community practice) as the source of precedent, the Shafiites argued for the unquestioning acceptance of HADITH as the major basis for legal and religious judgments and the use of qiyas (analogical reasoning) when no clear directives could be found in the QUR'AN or Hadith. IJMĀ' (consensus of scholars) was accepted but not stressed. The Shāfi'ī school predominates in eastern Africa, parts of Arabia, and Indonesia.

SHAHĀDA \shā-'hā-də\ (Arabic: "testimony"), Muslim profession of faith: "There is no god but God; MUHAMMAD is the prophet of God." The shahāda is the first of the FIVE PILLARS OF ISLAM (arkān al-Islam). It must be recited by every Muslim at least once in a lifetime, aloud, correctly, and purposefully, with a full understanding of its meaning and with an assent of the heart. Conversion to ISLAM involves performing this action, as does the daily call to prayer (ADHĀN), and many Sufi DHIKRS (ritual prayer or litany practiced by Sufis [see SUFISM] for the purpose of glorifying God and achieving spiritual perfection). SUNNIS have accused SHI'ITES of violating its monotheistic content because of their faith in the imams—a charge that they refute. Ideally the shahāda should be the last words uttered at the moment of death.

Shahāda also refers to the idea of martyrdom—that is, violent death while fighting "in God's path." Among the Shi'ites, HUSAYN IBN 'ALĪ (d. 680), is considered the MARTYR par excellence. See also 'ASHŪRĀ; MUSHĀHADA.

SHAIṬĀN \shā-'tān, shī-\ (Arabic), also spelled sheitan, in Islamic myth, unbelieving class of JINN ("spirits"); it is also the name of IBLIS when he is performing demonic acts.

In the system of evil jinn outlined by the Arab writer al-Jāhiz, the shaiṭāns are identified simply as unbelieving jinn. FOLKLORE, however, describes them as exceptionally ugly creatures, either male or female, capable of assuming human form—though their feet always remain hooves. They eat excrement and use disease as their weapon and exist on the borderline between light and darkness.

The exact nature of the shaiṭāns, however, is difficult to determine. Historically, among the pre-Islamic Arabs, they functioned as familiars, providing inspiration for soothsayers and poets. In the stories of SOLOMON, the shaiṭāns seem to be no more than particularly knowledgeable jinn. In the QUR'AN, however, they assume the role of the devil, an obvious borrowing from Judaic tradition. While they are not necessarily evil, they belong to the hordes commanded by Iblīs, who is also called in Arabic al-Shayṭān. He and the shaiṭāns whisper evil suggestions into people's ears but have no real power over them. It is said that they are as close to humans as their blood, but the shaiṭāns can only tempt, and their success depends on their ingenuity.

SHAKER, member of the United Society of Believers in Christ's Second Appearing, celibate millenarian sect that established communal settlements in the United States in the 18th century. Dedicated to productive labor as well as to a life of perfection, Shaker communities flourished economically and contributed a distinctive style of architecture, furniture, and handicraft to American culture before the sect's decline in the late 19th and 20th centuries.

The Shakers derived originally from a small branch of radical English Quakers (see SOCIETY OF FRIENDS) who had adopted the French Camisards' ritual practices of shaking, shouting, dancing, whirling, and singing in tongues. ANN

LEE, an illiterate textile worker of Manchester, was converted to the "Shaking Quakers" in 1758. After experiencing persecution and imprisonment for participation in noisy worship services, "Mother Ann" had a series of revelations, after which she regarded herself—and was so regarded by her followers—as the female aspect of God's dual nature and the second INCARNATION of Christ.

In 1774 Ann Lee came to America with eight disciples, having been charged by a new revelation to establish the church in the New World. Settling in 1776 at Niskeyuna (now Watervliet), N.Y., within five years the community was enlarged by several thousand converts.

After Mother Ann's death (1784), the Shaker church came under the leadership of Elder Joseph Meacham and Eldress Lucy Wright, who together worked out the communal pattern that was to be the distinctive Shaker social organization. The first Shaker community, established at New Lebanon, N.Y., in 1787, remained the head of influence as the movement spread through New England and westward into Kentucky, Ohio, and Indiana. By 1826, 18 Shaker villages had been set up in eight states.

Although often persecuted for pacifism or for bizarre beliefs falsely attributed to them, the Shakers won admiration for their model farms and orderly, prosperous communities. Their industry and ingenuity produced numerous (usually unpatented) inventions. They were the first to package and market seeds and were once the largest producers of medicinal herbs in the United States. In exchange with outsiders they were noted for their fair dealing. Shaker music and craftsmanship have had a lasting influence on American culture.

The Shaker impulse reached its height during the 1840s, when about 6,000 members were enrolled in the church, but by 1905 there were only 1,000 members, and by the late 20th century only a few remained.

SHAKTI \ʃhək-tē\; see ŚAKTI.

SHAMAN \ʃhā-mən, 'shā-, 'sha-\ (from Evenki: šamān, samān), a religious diviner or healer. In the religious systems of Uralic, Altaic, and other indigenous peoples of northern Eurasia, and in certain analogous systems of other peoples worldwide, a person believed to have the power to heal the sick and to communicate with the world beyond.

Broadly speaking, shamanism is encountered in the societies of the Arctic, the Central Asian regions, Southeast Asia, Oceania, and among many North American aboriginal groups. A distinction should be made, however, between the religions dominated by a shamanistic ideology and techniques (as is the case with Siberian and Indonesian religions) and those in which shamanism constitutes a supplementary phenomenon (e.g., African religions).

The shaman cures sicknesses, directs communal sacrifices, and escorts the souls of the dead to the other world. He is able to do all this by virtue of his techniques of ECSTASY; i.e., by his power to leave his body at will during a trance-like state.

The most important function of the shaman in all cultures is healing. Since sickness is thought of as a loss of the soul, the shaman must determine first whether the soul of the sick individual has strayed from the body or has been stolen and is imprisoned in the other world. In the former case the shaman captures the soul and reintegrates it in the body of the sick person. The latter case necessitates a descent to the netherworld, and this is a complicated and dangerous enterprise. Equally stirring is the voyage of the shaman to the other world to escort the soul of the deceased to its new abode; the shaman narrates to those present all the vicissitudes of the voyage as it goes on.

Shamanism is the mystical experience that is characteristic of indigenous religions, but the shaman is not only a mystic. He is just as much the guardian of the traditional lore of the tribe. The narrations of his adventurous descents to the netherworld and of his ascents to heaven constitute the material of popular epic poetry among many groups.

SHAMASH \ˈshā-māsh\ (Akkadian), Sumerian Utu \ˈü-tü\, in Mesopotamian religion, god of the sun. Shamash was the son of Sin (Sumerian: NANNA), the moon god.

Shamash, as the SOLAR DEITY, exercised the power of light over darkness and evil. In this capacity he became known as the god of justice and equity and was the judge of both gods and men. (According to legend, the Babylonian king Hammurabi received his code of laws from Shamash.) At night, Shamash became judge of the Underworld.

Shamash was not only the god of justice but also governor of the whole universe; in this aspect he was pictured seated on a throne, holding in his hand the symbols of justice and righteousness, a staff and a ring. Also associated with Shamash is the notched dagger. The god is often pictured with a disk that symbolized the sun.

As the god of the sun, Shamash was the heroic conqueror of night and death who swept across the heavens on horseback or, in some representations, in a boat or chariot. He bestowed light and life. The chief centers of his cult were at Larsa in Sumer and at Sippar in Akkad. Shamash's consort was Aya, who was later absorbed by ISHTAR.

SHĀMIL \ˈshā-mēl\, also spelled Shāmyl, Schāmil, or Schāmyl (b. 1797?, Gimry, Dagestan [Russia]—d. March 1871, Medina?, Arabia), leader of Muslim Dagestan and Chechen mountaineers, whose fierce resistance delayed Russia's conquest of the Caucasus for 25 years.

The son of a free landlord, Shāmil acquired prestige as a learned man and in 1830 joined the Murīdīs, a Sufi brotherhood. Under the leadership of Ghāzī Muhammad, the brotherhood had become involved in a HOLY WAR against the Russians, who had formally acquired control of Dagestan from Iran in 1813. After Ghāzī Muhammad was killed by the Russians (1832) and his successor, Gamzat Bek, was assassinated by his own followers (1834), Shāmil was elected to serve as the third IMAM of Dagestan.

Establishing an independent state in Dagestan (1834), Shāmil led raids against the Russian positions in the Caucasus region. Despite the Russians' successful penetration into Shāmil's territory and their conquests of his forts and towns, they were never able to defeat him. In 1857 the Russians determined to suppress Shāmil, sending large, well-equipped forces, their military successes resulted in the surrender of many villages and tribes to the Russians. On Aug. 25 (Sept. 6, New Style), 1859, Shāmil finally surrendered and effectively ended the resistance of the Caucasian peoples to Russian subjugation. Shāmil was taken to St. Petersburg and then was exiled to Kaluga, south of Moscow. With permission from the Russian tsar, he made a PILGRIMAGE TO MECCA in 1870.

SHANG-CH'ING TAOISM

\ 'shāŋ-'chiŋ-'daü-'i-zəm \, Pinyin Shangqing (Chinese: "Highest Purity," or "Supreme Clarity"), important early sectarian movement associated with the emergence of religious TAOISM during the southern Six Dynasties Period (3rd through 6th centuries CE). The origins of the sect go back to the revelations made to Yang Hsi in the 4th century, which were gathered together as an early corpus of SCRIPTURES (particularly important were the Huang-t'ing ching, or Scripture of the Yellow Court, and the Ta-tung ching, or Scripture of the Great Profundity), emphasizing spiritual fulfillment through the mental and physiological practices of inner visualization and ecstatic journeying. Eventually the famed scholar T'ao Hung-ching collated these scriptures and established a religious center on MAO SHAN (Shang-ch'ing is also known as Mao Shan Taoism). Stressing ecstatic experience and the arduous achievement of the HSIEN condition, or spiritual-physical "immortality," this tradition was especially influential during the T'ang dynasty but gradually was absorbed into the more liturgical Ling-pao tradition of Taoism.

SHANG-TI \ 'shāŋ-'dē \, Pinyin Shangdi, also called Ti ("Supreme Ruler," or "Lord on High"), ancient Chinese deity, the greatest ancestor and deity who controlled victory in battle, harvest, the fate of the capital, and the weather. He had no cultic following, however, and was probably considered too distant and inscrutable to be influenced by mortals. Shang-ti was considered to be the supreme deity during the Shang dynasty (18th–12th century BCE), but during the Chou dynasty (1122–256/255 BCE) he was gradually supplanted by Heaven (T'ien).

SHAN-SHU \ 'shān-'shü \, Pinyin shanshu (Chinese: "good books," or "morality books"), popular texts devoted to a moral accounting of actions leading to positive and negative merit. These works often combine traditional Confucian notions of FILIAL PIETY and reciprocity, Taoist ideas of selfless action (WU-WEI), and especially Buddhist ideas of karmic retribution. First appearing in the Sung dynasty, these were non-revealed works related to popular revealed stories called PAO-CHÜAN or "precious SCRIPTURES." They continue to be popular in Chinese communities.

SHAO YUNG \ 'shau-'yüŋ \, Pinyin Shao Yong (b. 1011, Kung-ch'eng, China—d. 1077, Honan), Chinese philosopher who greatly influenced the development of the idealist school of NEO-CONFUCIANISM.

Originally a Taoist, Shao refused all offers of government office, preferring to live in a hermitage outside Honan, where he engaged in mystical speculation. He became interested in CONFUCIANISM through his study of the I-CHING ("Classic of Changes"), through which he developed his theories that numbers are the basis of all existence. To Shao, the spirit that underlies all things could be comprehended if one understood the division of the different elements into numbers. He believed the key to the world hinged on the number four; thus the universe is divided into four sections (sun, moon, stars, and zodiac), the body into four sense organs (eye, ear, nose, and mouth), and the earth into four substances (fire, water, earth, and stone). In a similar way, all ideas have four manifestations, all actions four choices, and so forth.

The importance of this system resides in its basic theory: there is an underlying unity to existence, which can be grasped by the superior man who understands its basic principles, an idea which was the basis of the idealist school of Neo-Confucianism. Moreover, Shao brought into Confucianism the Buddhist idea that history consists of series of repeating cycles (kalpas), which Shao called yüan and reduced to a duration of 129,600 years. This theory was later accepted by all branches of Neo-Confucianism and made part of the official state ideology by the 12th-century Sung scholar CHU HSI.

SHAPASH \ 'shä-'päsh \ ("Light of the Gods"), in ancient Mesopotamian religion, sun goddess. In the cycle of myths recovered from UGARIT, Shapash helps ANATH in her retrieval of the dead BAAL and intervenes in the final conflict between Baal and MOT.

SHA'RĀNĪ, AL- \ ä'l-'sha-rä-'nē \, original name 'Abd al-Wahhāb ibn Aḥmad (b. 1492, Cairo—d. 1565, Cairo), Egyptian scholar and mystic who founded an Islamic order of SUFISM.

Al-Sha'rānī's formal education was concerned with the 'ulūm al-wahb ("gifted knowledge of the mystic"), as opposed to a traditional and rigorous study of Islamic sciences. He attempted to seek the middle ground between the rigid learning and legalism of the 'ULAMĀ (the religious authorities) and the mystics' PANTHEISM and pursuit of spirituality. He consistently ignored distinctions and niceties within the major schools of Islamic law, as well as the marked differences between the various Sufi orders. This approach antagonized the most traditionalist 'ulamā and the Sufis, and he was persecuted for his beliefs and doctrines and forced to earn his living as a weaver.

Al-Sha'rānī criticized the 'ulamā for their legal rigidity, neglect of duties, mock learning, and inability to come to terms with the social problems of Egyptian society. He believed that the distinctions between the schools of Islamic law were socially divisive and advocated instead a unified approach to the law, using the best elements of each school. He castigated many of the Sufi orders as being corrupt and believed that their practices were contrary to the SHARĪʿA—the body of Islamic legal doctrines that regulated society.

Initiated into the SHĀDHILĪYA order, Al-Shaʿrānī founded his own Sufi order known as al-Shaʿrawīya. It was housed in a well-endowed ZĀWIYA, a kind of monastery, and had attached to it a school for the training of law students; it also provided care for the needy and for travelers. Unlike most Sufi orders, it had practical aims and eschewed esoteric pursuits.

Al-Shaʿrānī was unsystematic in his thoughts. Although his MYSTICISM was not influenced by pantheism, he found it possible to defend the pantheism of the 13th-century mystic IBN AL-ʿARABĪ. The bulk of al-Shaʿrānī's writing was concerned with traditional learning. Of special interest is his ṭabaqāt, a biographical dictionary of mystics, and his autobiography, Laṭāʾif al-mīnan. Upon his death he was succeeded by his son ʿAbd al-Raḥmān as head of the order. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān was more concerned with temporal matters, however, and the order declined, though it remained popular until the 19th century.

SHARĪʿA \shā-ʿrē-ā\, fundamental religious concept of ISLAM, namely its legal and moral code, systematized during the 2nd and 3rd centuries of the Muslim era (8th–9th century CE).

The formulation of the Sharīʿa rests on four bases (uṣūl):

1. The QURʿAN.
2. The SUNNA ("the way") of the Prophet as recorded in the HADITH.
3. The IJMĀʿ, or universal agreement, which has been materially perhaps the most important factor in formulating the doctrine and practice of the Muslim community but which itself has curiously remained the least clearly formulated religious institution of Islam.

Ijmāʿ, in the premodern Islamic usage, has always had reference to the past, near or remote, and does not denote a contemporaneous agreement. In the modern Muslim usage of the term, however, ijmāʿ has come to mean a democratic institution opposed to traditional authority. Consequently, far from working as a monolithic principle of unique standardization, ijmāʿ came to operate as a principle of toleration of different traditions within Islam.

4. The fourth principle of the Sharīʿa formulation, known as qiyas, or analogical reasoning, is the genuine basis of interpretation and thought (IJTIHĀD) in Islam. It is this which makes progressive ijmāʿ possible. Its earlier form was personal thought and opinion (raʾy), which was criticized by many eminent traditional authorities as arbitrary. In Shiʿi jurisprudence this principle is known as ʿaql ("reason").

There are four sciences known as the sciences of the Sharīʿa: the prophetic Tradition (Hadith), the Qurʾanic exegesis (TAFSĪR), theology (KALĀM), and law (FIQH). The first two are the materials for theology and law. In the four schools of law, the ḤANAFĪ, the MĀLIKĪ, the SHĀFĪʿĪ, and the ḤANBALĪ, which took shape early—during the first two centuries of Islam—law and theology were a unity and were not separated, although theology at that time was merely a statement of the doctrine. As a result of increased exposure to other religious systems, a cleavage occurred between the law and the doctrine, and the former, which ideally presupposed the latter as its base, came not only to be an independent discipline but to claim for itself the title of the science of the Sharīʿa par excellence and was even identified with the Sharīʿa itself. Thus fiqh, which originally meant an understanding of the entire range of the faith, came to be applied to law alone.

Sharīʿa differs fundamentally from Western law in that it is, in theory, grounded in divine revelation. Among modern Muslim countries, Saudi Arabia and Iran retain the Sharīʿa as the law of the land, secular as well as religious, but the westernized civil codes of most other Muslim countries have departed from the precepts of Sharīʿa when this was deemed unavoidable.

SHARĪʿATI, ʿALI \shā-rē-ā-ʿtē\ (b. Mazīnān, Iran, 1933—d. June 19[?], 1977, England), Iranian intellectual and critic of the regime of the Shah (Mohammad Reza Shah Pahlavi, 1919–80), ʿAli Shariʿati developed a new perspective on the history and sociology of ISLAM and gave highly charged lectures in Tehran that laid the foundation for the Iranian revolution of 1979.

Shariʿati received early training in religion from his father before attending a teachers college. He later studied at the University of MASHHAD where he earned a degree in Arabic and French. He became active in politics while a student and was imprisoned for eight months. He received a Ph.D. in sociology from the Sorbonne in Paris, and while there he met Jean-Paul Sartre, French sociologists, and Iranian student dissidents. Profoundly influenced by his experience in Paris, Shariʿati returned to Iran and was jailed for six months in 1964. After his release, he taught at the University of Mashhad until his lectures and popularity were deemed threatening by the administration. He then went to Tehran where he helped establish the Husayniya-yi Irshad (a center for religious education) in 1969. In the following years Shariʿati wrote and lectured on the history and sociology of Islam and criticized the current regime, Marxism, Iranian intellectuals, and conservative religious leaders. His teachings brought him great popularity with the youth of Iran but also trouble from the clerics and government. He was imprisoned again in 1972 for 18 months and then placed under house arrest. He was released and left Iran for England in 1977. Shortly after he arrived Shariʿati died of an apparent heart attack but his supporters blame the SAVAK, the Iranian security service, for his death.

Shariʿati's teachings may be said to have laid the foundation for the Iranian revolution because of their great influence on the Iranian youth. His teachings attacked the tyranny of the Shah and his policy of Westernization and modernization that, Shariʿati believed, damaged Iranian religion and culture and left the people without their traditional social and religious moorings. Shariʿati called for a return to true, revolutionary Shiʿism. He believed that SHIʿITE Islam itself was a force for social justice and progress but also that it had been corrupted in Iran by its institutionalization by political leaders.

SHARĪF \shā-rēf\ (Arabic: "noble," or "illustrious"), plural ashraf \ash-rāf\, Arabic title of respect, restricted, after the advent of ISLAM, to members of MUHAMMAD'S clan of Hāshim—in particular, to descendants of his uncles al-ʿAbbās and Abū Tālib and of the latter's son ʿALĪ by Muhammad's daughter FĀTIMA. In the Hijaz (western coast of Arabia), the title of sharīf is said to have been further restricted to the descendants of HASAN, the elder son of ʿAli and Fātima. Sharīfs originally were heads of prominent families. Later they supplied the local semiautonomous rulers of MECCA and MEDINA, especially under the suzerainty of Baghdad and Cairo, while after the establishment of Ottoman rule, the Ottomans normally recognized the senior representative of the sharifs as prince of Mecca.

SHATH \ˈshath\, plural shataḥāt, in Sufi ISLAM, divinely inspired statements that Sufis utter in their mystical state of fanāʾ (“passing away of the self”). The Sufis claim that there are moments of ecstatic fervor when they are overwhelmed by the divine presence to such a degree that they lose touch with worldly realities. In such moments they utter statements that may seem incoherent or blasphemous if taken literally but are understood by fellow Sufis who have shared the same experiences. Shataḥāt, Sufis warn, must be interpreted allegorically.

Muslim legalists tended to brand as HERESY all Sufi shataḥāt that did not conform to Islamic teachings. The mystic AL-ḤALLĀJ was persecuted and finally executed for his famous cry, “I am the Truth.” Since “the Truth” is one of the names of God, legalists interpreted the utterance as a blasphemous claim to divinity. Sufi defenders of al-Ḥallāj argued that in his mystical state he found himself in union with God.

Since the state of mystical trance is normally of short duration, shataḥāt rarely exceed six or seven words. The Sufis, however, regard all their writings, and particularly their poetry, as possessing an element of shath. For this reason it also must be interpreted allegorically. Among often quoted shataḥāt are:

“For the perfect lover, prayer becomes impiety” (al-Ḥallāj, d. 922).

“Praise be to me. How great is my majesty!” (Bāyazīd al-Bestāmī, d. 874).

“I am the proof of God.” “Divine omnipotence has a secret; if it is revealed there is an end of the prophetic mission” (Ibn Sahl al-Tustarī, d. 896).

“Ritual acts are only impurities” (al-Shiblī, d. 945).

“In my robe there is only God” (Ibn Abī al-Khayr, d. 1048).

“The slave is the Lord and the Lord is the slave; how can one tell which of the two is the debtor?” (Ibn al-ʿArabi, d. 1240).

SHAṬṬĀRIYA \shā-tə-ˈrē-ə\, Sufi order deriving its name from either the 15th-century Indian mystic ʿAbd Allāh al-Shaṭṭār (d. 1485) or the Arabic word shātīr (“breaker”), referring to one who has broken with the world. It developed in northern India but spread as far as Indonesia.

Most Muslim mystics emphasize the servanthship of humans and the lordship of God, the fanāʾ (“dissolution”) of self and the baqāʾ (“subsistence”) of God. The Shaṭṭāriya, on the contrary, stress the self, personal deeds, personal attributes that make a person godlike, and personal union with God. They maintain that fanāʾ would imply two selves, one that is to be annihilated and another that is to be readied for the final stage of the vision of God; and that such duality is opposed to the tawhīd (“unity”) on which SUFISM is based. They also reject the Sufi practice of MUJĀHADA (“struggle with the carnal self”), saying that excessive focusing on the self distracts from the knowledge of God through personal experience and ultimate union.

Its most famous member was Muhammad Ghauth of Gwalior (d. 1562) who composed accounts of his spiritual journey and of Sufi beliefs and practices. The Mughal SULTAN AKBAR built a shrine for him in Gwalior.

SHAVUOT \shā-vü-ˈöt; shə-ˈvü-öt, -əs\, in full Ḥag Shavuot (“Festival of the Weeks”), Shavuot also spelled Shabuot, or

Shabouth, also called Pentecost (from Greek: pentekostē, “50th”), Jewish festival that falls 50 days—that is, a week of weeks—after the first day of PASSOVER. In the BIBLE, it is an agricultural festival called “Feast of Weeks” (EXODUS 34:22, Deuteronomy 16:10), “Feast of the Harvest” (Exodus 23:16), or “Day of First Fruits” (Numbers 28:26). The later RABBIS called it Atzeret (M. Rosh Hashanah 1:2, M. Hagigah 2:4), a term generally translated as “solemn assembly.”

In SCRIPTURE, Shavuot occasioned the bringing of first fruits to the Temple-sanctuary and a declaration of God’s role in freeing the Israelites from Egyptian bondage and giving them a land flowing with milk and honey (Deuteronomy 26:1–11). Rabbinic interpretation tightens the connection with the Exodus, viewing Shavuot specifically as the commemoration of God’s revealing of the TORAH at Sinai, which took place seven weeks after the Exodus. It thus serves in particular to celebrate the COVENANT between ISRAEL and God that the revelation at Sinai confirmed.

In the SYNAGOGUE, Shavuot is celebrated with special worship services and, in honor of God’s revelation, an all night session of Torah study (Tikkun leil Shavuot). A frequent subject of study is the Book of Ruth, appropriate because it depicts a MOABITE woman’s determination to accept the covenant and life within the Jewish people, seen as parallel to the Israelites’ own resolve to embrace the covenant. It is traditional on Shavuot to eat dairy foods.

SHAYKH \ˈshāk, ˈshīk, ˈshēk\, also spelled sheik, shaikh, or sheikh, Arabic title of respect dating from pre-Islamic antiquity. It strictly means a venerable man of more than 50 years of age. The title shaykh is especially borne by heads of religious orders, heads of colleges, chiefs of tribes, and headmen of villages and of separate quarters of towns. It is also applied to learned men, especially members of the class of ‘ulama’ (religious scholars and jurists), and has been applied to anyone who has memorized the whole QUR’AN, however young he might be.

Shaykh al-jabal (“the mountain chief”) was a popular term for the head of the Assassins and was mistranslated by the Crusaders as “the old man of the mountain.” By the 11th century the title shaykh al-islām was given to eminent ‘ulama’ and mystics and by the 15th century was open to any outstanding MUFTĪ (canonical lawyer). In the Ottoman Empire the use of this title was restricted by Süleyman I (1520–66) to the mufti of Istanbul, who, equal in rank to the grand vizier, was head of the religious institutions that controlled law, justice, religion, and education. Because of his right to issue binding fatwās (Islamic legal opinions), this official came to wield great power. In 1924, under the Turkish Republic, the institution was abolished.

SHE-CHI \ˈshə-ˈjē\, Pinyin Sheji, term referring to the ancient Chinese spirits of the soil and harvests and the rituals associated with those spirits. China’s earliest legendary emperors are said to have worshiped She (Earth), for they alone had responsibility for the entire earth and country. Later Chinese emperors worshiped the gods of the soil as a more particularized cult.

Since ordinary people had no part in this sacrifice, they gradually focused their worship on such gods as HOU-CHI to protect their land and grain. Small communities, or even single families, thus also came to have their local gods, or T’u-ti. Throughout the country small shrines or temples were constructed, each with two images. Originally meant to represent the god of soil (She) and the god of grain (Chi), these images eventually were considered man and wife.

SHEKHINAH \shə-ḵē-'nä; shə-'ḵē-nə, -'kē-\ (Hebrew: "Dwelling," or "Presence"), also spelled Shechina, or Schechina, in Jewish theology, the presence of God in the world. The designation was first used in the Aramaic form, shekinta, in the interpretive Aramaic translations of the OLD TESTAMENT known as TARGUMS, and it was frequently used in the TALMUD, MIDRASH, and other postbiblical writings. In the Targums it is used as a substitute for "God" where the ANTHROPOMORPHISM of the original Hebrew seemed likely to detract from the transcendence of God. In many passages Shekhinah is a reverential substitute for the divine name.

It is said that the Shekhinah descended on the TABERNACLE and on Solomon's Temple, though it is also said that it was one of the five things lacking in the Second Temple. The Shekhinah is sometimes conceived as a bright radiance. There is an affinity between the Shekhinah and the Christian conception of the Holy Spirit; both signify some forms of divine immanence, both are associated with PROPHECY, both may be lost because of SIN, and both are connected with the study of the TORAH. Certain medieval theologians viewed the Shekhinah as a created entity distinct from God (the divine "light," or "glory").

SHEMA \shə-'mä\ (Hebrew: "Hear"), in JUDAISM, a CONFESION OF FAITH made up of three scriptural texts—from Deuteronomy and Numbers—which, together with appropriate prayers, forms an integral part of the evening and morning services. The name derives from the initial word of the scriptural verse "Hear, O Israel: The Lord our God, the Lord is one" (Deuteronomy 6:4). The time for recital was determined by the first two texts: "when thou liest down, and when thou risest up." The Shema texts are also chanted at other times during the Jewish liturgy. The biblical verses inculcate the duty of total devotion to the study of the TORAH. Since, however, meditation on the Torah "night and day" was a practical impossibility, the Shema became a substitute for Torah study or, more exactly, the minimum requirement for observing the precept.

Following the example of the scholar-martyr RABBI AKIBA BEN JOSEPH (2nd century CE), the Shema has been uttered by Jewish martyrs throughout the ages as their final profession of faith. Pious Jews hope to die with the words of the Shema on their lips.

The text of the Shema follows:

◆ Hear, O Israel: The Lord our God, the Lord is One. And thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might. And these words, which I command thee this day, shall be upon thy heart; and thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thy house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up. And thou shalt bind them for a sign upon thy hand, and they shall be for frontlets between thine eyes. And thou shalt write them upon the door-posts of thy house, and upon thy gates. (Deuteronomy 6:4–9)

And it shall come to pass, if ye shall hearken diligently unto My commandments which I command you this day, to love the Lord your God, and to serve Him with all your heart and with all your soul, that I will give the rain of your land in its season, the former rain and the latter rain, that thou mayest gather in thy corn, and thy wine, and thine oil. And I will give grass in thy fields for thy cattle, and thou shalt eat and be satisfied. Take heed to yourselves, lest your heart be deceived, and ye turn aside, and serve other gods, and worship them; and the anger of the Lord be kindled against you, and He shut up the heaven, so that there shall be no rain, and the ground shall not yield her fruit; and ye perish quickly from off the good land which the Lord giveth you. Therefore shall ye lay up these My words in your heart and in your soul; and ye shall bind them for a sign upon your hand, and they shall be for frontlets between your eyes. And ye shall teach them your children, talking of them, when thou sittest in thy house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up. And thou shalt write them upon the door-posts of thy house, and upon thy gates; that your days may be multiplied, and the days of your children, upon the land which the Lord swore unto your fathers to give them, as the days of the heavens above the earth. (Deuteronomy 11:13–21)

And the Lord spoke unto Moses, saying: "Speak unto the children of Israel, and bid them that they make them throughout their generations fringes in the corners of their garments, and that they put with the fringe of each corner a thread of blue. And it shall be unto you for a fringe, that ye may look upon it, and remember all the commandments of the Lord, and do them; and that ye go not about after your own heart and your own eyes, after which ye use to go astray; that ye may remember and do all My commandments, and be holy unto your God. I am the Lord your God, who brought you out of the land of Egypt, to be your God: I am the Lord your God." (Numbers 15:37–41) ◆

SHEMINI ATZERET \shə-'mē-nē-ät-'ser-et\ (Hebrew: "Eighth Day of the Solemn Assembly"), Jewish religious festival on the eighth day of SUKKOT (Feast of Booths). In ancient times 70 sacrifices were offered on the first seven days of Sukkot to signify the "70 nations" constituting all humanity, while a single ram and bullock were sacrificed on the eighth day to symbolize Israel's special relationship to God. In Israel, SIMHATH TORAH is also celebrated on the eighth day of Sukkot, although in other countries it is celebrated on the ninth day.

SHEN \ʃhən\, Pinyin shen, in popular Chinese religion, benevolent spirit of the dead; the term is also applied to deified mortals and gods. Shen are associated with the yang (bright, active) aspect of the cosmos and with the spiritual component of the human soul. After a person's death, the soul becomes either of two spirits: the shen, which ascends to the spirit world, or the KUEI, a dark, passive yin spirit, which remains within the grave. The successful ascent of the shen depends on adequate ritual offerings from the family, without which it seeks revenge on the human world in the form of the malevolent kuei, or ghost.

SHENG \ʃhəŋ\ ("sage," or "saint"), in Chinese belief, mortal who attains extraordinary powers by self-cultivation and serves as a model for others.

SHEN NUNG \ʃhən-'nūŋ\, Pinyin Shen Nong (Chinese: "Divine Husbandman"), formally Yen-ti, second of China's mythical emperors, said to have been born in the 28th century BCE with the head of a bull and the body of a man. He was said to have invented the cart and plow, domesticated horses and oxen, and the clearing of land with fire, thereby establishing agriculture. His catalog of 365 medicinal plants became the basis of later herbological studies.

Shen Nung, engraving from San-ts'ai t'u-hui (1607–09)

SHEWBREAD \ˈshō-ˌbred\, also spelled showbread, also called bread of the Presence, any of the 12 loaves of bread that stood for the 12 tribes of Israel, presented and shown in the TEMPLE OF JERUSALEM in the Presence of God. The arrangement of the bread on a table in two rows of six (Leviticus 24) was an important aspect of the presentation because some verses in the BIBLE literally speak of “the bread of the arrangement” (1 Chronicles 9:32, 23:29; NEHEMIAH 10:33). The bread was changed every SABBATH, and the priests ate that which had been displayed. Many aspects of the Christian EUCHARIST show that it was influenced by Israel’s shewbread.

SHI‘ITE \ˈshē-ˌit\, the smaller of the two major branches of ISLAM, the other being the majority SUNNIS. Over the centuries the Shi‘ite movement has deeply influenced all Sunni Islam. Shi‘ism (Arabic: Shi‘a, or Shi‘ī Islam) is the majority religion in Iran, Iraq, and perhaps Yemen and has followers in Syria, Lebanon, East Africa, India, and Pakistan (see ITHNĀ ‘ASHARĪYA). In the early 21st century its adherents numbered more than 200 million, or one-tenth of all Islam.

In early Islamic history, the Shi‘ites were a political faction (shī‘at ‘Alī, “party of ‘Alī”) that supported the power of ‘Alī, a son-in-law of MUHAMMAD and the fourth CALIPH (temporal and spiritual ruler) of the Muslim community. ‘Alī was killed while trying to maintain his authority as caliph, and the Shi‘ites gradually developed a religious movement that asserted the legitimate authority of ‘Alī’s lineal descendants, the ‘Alids. This stand contrasted with that of the more pragmatic Sunni majority of Muslims, who were generally willing to accept the leadership of any caliph whose rule afforded the proper exercise of religion and the maintenance of order in the Muslim world.

In 656 ‘Alī had been raised to the caliphate with the support, among many others, of the murderers of the third caliph, UTHMĀN. ‘Alī never received the full allegiance of all Muslims, however, and thus he had to wage increasingly unsuccessful wars to maintain himself in power. He was murdered in 661, and Mu‘āwiya, his chief opponent, became caliph. ‘Alī’s son, ḤUSAYN, later refused to recognize Mu‘āwiya’s son and successor, Yāzid, as caliph. The Muslims of the Shi‘ite-dominated town of Kūfa in Iraq, ‘Alī’s former capital, invited Ḥusayn to become caliph. The Muslims in Iraq generally failed to support Ḥusayn, however, and he and his small band of followers were cut down (680) near Kūfa at the Battle of KARBALĀ’, which is now a PILGRIMAGE spot for Shi‘ites.

Swearing vengeance against the triumphant Umayyad government, the Kūfans soon gained support from other groups that opposed the status quo. These groups included aristocratic Muslim families of MEDINA, Muslims protesting a too worldly interpretation of Islam, and non-Arab Muslims (mawālī), who were denied equality by the ruling Arabs. Over time the Shi‘ites became a distinct collection of sects who were alike in their recognition of ‘Alī and his descendants as the legitimate leaders of the Muslim community. Although the Shi‘ites’ conviction that the ‘Alids should be the leaders of the Islamic world was never fulfilled, ‘Alī himself was rehabilitated as a major hero of Sunni Islam, and his descendants by FĀTIMA, Muhammad’s daughter, received the courtesy titles of “sayyids” and “sharīfs.”

The largest Shi‘ite subdivision is that of the ITHNĀ ‘ASHARĪYA, or Twelvers, who recognize the legitimacy of a succession of twelve ‘Alid claimants (beginning with ‘Alī himself) known as IMAMS. Other, smaller Shi‘ite sects include the Ismā‘īliya and ZAYDĪYA.

Although there were occasional Shi‘ite rulers, the Shi‘ites remained almost everywhere an Islamic minority until the start of the 16th century, when the Iranian Ṣafavid dynasty made Shi‘ism the sole legal faith of their empire, which then embraced the Persians of Iran, the Turks of Azerbaijan, and many of the Arabs of Iraq proper. These peoples have since been overwhelmingly Ithnā ‘Asharīya and have given that branch of Shi‘ism a vigorous life. In the late 20th century, Shi‘ite religious leadership became a major political force in Iran, where it toppled the secularist monarchy of the Shah in 1978–79, and in Lebanon, where it led resistance to Israeli occupation in the south during the 1980s and ‘90s.

SHIKOKU \shē-ˈkō-kū\, island, smallest of the four main islands of Japan. It is separated from Honshu by the Inland Sea and from Kyushu by the Bungo Strait. The city of Takamatsu is the base for PILGRIMAGES to the Kotohira Shrine, 19 miles southwest, while Tokushima is famous for the annual Japanese festival with the folk dance of awa odori and puppet shows.

SHILOH \ˈshī-lō\, Canaanite town that became the central SANCTUARY site of the Israelite confederacy during the period of the judges (12th–11th century BCE). After the Israelite conquest of CANAAN, the TABERNACLE and the ARK OF THE COVENANT were installed in Shiloh until the ARK was captured by the Philistines (c. 1050 BCE), and Shiloh was soon thereafter destroyed.

SHINBUTSU SHŪGŌ \ʼshēn-,büt-sū-ʼshū-,gō\, in Japan, amalgamation of BUDDHISM with the indigenous religion SHINTŌ. Even today Japanese frequently retain in their homes both Shintō god shelves (KAMIDANA) and Buddhist altars (butsudan) and observe Shintō rites for marriage and Buddhist rites for funerals.

Before construction of the Daibutsu ("Great Buddha") at Nara in 741 CE, the proposal to build the statue was first reported to AMATERASU Ōmikami, the Shintō sun goddess, at the Ise Shrine, the chief shrine of Japan. Aid was also requested of the KAMI (god) HACHIMAN, and a branch of the (Shintō) Usa Hachiman Shrine on the island of Kyushu was built in the compound of the (Buddhist) TŌDAI TEMPLE to protect it. From that time a practice developed of building Shintō shrines in Buddhist temple compounds and temples or PAGODAS near Shintō shrines, and also of reciting Buddhist SCRIPTURES at Shintō shrines.

In the Heian period (9th–12th century), Shintō kami came to be identified as incarnations of the Buddha, and for a time Shintō priests were dominated by Buddhist ecclesiastics. During the Kamakura period (1192–1333 CE), however, Shintō attempted to emancipate itself from Buddhist domination, and the ISE SHINTŌ movement claimed that Shintō divinities were not incarnations of the Buddha but that buddhas and BODHISATTVAS were rather manifestations of Shintō kami. In 1868 the Meiji regime issued an edict ordering Buddhist priests connected with Shintō shrines either to be reordained as Shintō priests or to return to lay life. Buddhist temple lands were confiscated and Buddhist ceremonies abolished in the imperial household. Shintō was proclaimed as the national religion; later it was reinterpreted as a national cult (see STATE SHINTŌ).

SHINGON \ʼshēn-,gōŋ, Angl ʼshīŋ-,gān\ (Japanese: "True Word"), Chinese Chen-yen \ʼzhən-ʼyan, -ʼyen\, Esoteric Buddhist sect that has maintained a considerable following in Japan since its introduction from China in the 9th century. Shingon may be considered an attempt to reach the eternal wisdom of the BUDDHA GOTAMA that was not expressed in words and, thus, is not contained in his public teaching. The sect believes that this wisdom may be developed and realized through special ritual means employing body, speech, and mind, such as the use of symbolic gestures (mudrās), mystical syllables (dhāraṇī), and mental concentration (YOGA).

The principal SCRIPTURE of the Shingon school is the MAHĀVIROCANA SŪTRA, in which the universe is conceived to be the body of the Buddha Mahāvairocana (the "Great Illuminator"). He has two aspects, each of which has its characteristic depiction in the MANDALA, the ritual diagram often painted on the Shingon altar. Entry into the mandala is called kanjō (Sanskrit: abhīṣekha), an initiation ceremony involving sprinkling with water.

Shingon esotericism is a part of Esoteric, or Tantric, BUDDHISM, which spread in the 8th century from India to Tibet and Java, as well as to China and from there to Japan. In Japan, however, the doctrine was much modified and systematized by the great religious leader KŪKAI.

Kūkai studied the doctrine in China under a Tantric master and returned to found the Kongōbu Temple monastic center at MOUNT KOYA in 819; he later established the Tō Temple in Kyōto as the sect's headquarters.

SHINRAN \ʼshēn-,rān\, original name Matsuwaka-Maru, also called Han'en, Shakkū, Zenshin, or Gutoku Shinran, posthumous name Kenshin Daishi (b. 1173, near Kyōto—d. Jan. 9, 1263, Kyōto), Buddhist philosopher and religious reformer whose concern for the salvation of the masses led him to establish the Jōdo Shinshū (True PURE LAND sect), the largest school of BUDDHISM in modern Japan.

Shinran entered the PRIESTHOOD when he was nine, and for 20 years he studied Buddhism on MOUNT HIEI, where an eminent monk, SAICHŌ, had established the center of the Tendai (T'ĪEN-T'AI) school. A long spiritual struggle in quest of salvation occupied Shinran's early years as a monk of the Tendai school, but despite the most rigorous ASCETICISM, his quest proved fruitless. During this time, at the beginning of the Kamakura period (1192–1333), the decline of the aristocratic class and its fierce struggles with the military class for political supremacy brought so much confusion and distress that the people began to accept a pessimistic view of history (known as MAPPŌ).

Shinran then came down from Mt. Hiei to continue his quest for salvation. It was at this time that he met the Buddhist saint HŌNEN, founder of the Jōdo (Pure Land) sect, who had been teaching to the masses the practice known as nembutsu—i.e., calling upon the name of the Amida Buddha (or AMITĀBHA) for salvation. Shinran abandoned ascetic practices and took refuge in this practice, also known as the Original Vow. He was allowed to copy Hōnen's main work, the Senchaku hongan nembutsu-shū ("Collection on the Choice of the Nembutsu of the Original Vow"). This was a great source of inspiration to Shinran, for copies of the document were entrusted to only a few close disciples.

In 1207 the government issued an edict against Hōnen's nembutsu movement. Hōnen was exiled to Tosa Province and Shinran to Echigo Province, and two other nembutsu teachers were beheaded. Soon after his arrival in Echigo, Shinran married Eshinni, in violation of the traditional Buddhist precept of CELIBACY for the priesthood.

Shinran moved to the Kantō region in east central Japan, where, between 1212 and 1235 or 1236, he lived an academic and missionary life. During this period he compiled the six volumes of the Kyōgyōshinshō (1224; "Teaching-Action-Faith-Attainment"). His ministry had great success. In 1256, however, after returning to Kyōto, Shinran had to disown Zenran, his oldest son, who tried to control the community with an alternative interpretation of the faith. It was, perhaps, the most tragic experience in Shinran's long life. Despite spiritual depressions and economic difficulties, he was able to compile a number of derivative works designed to make his teachings accessible to the masses. Works that are regarded as important include three volumes of Buddhist poems and hymns (wasan) that were later compiled by the patriarch RENNYO in the Sanjō wasan; Jinen hōni shō ("Treatise on the Ultimate Truth of Things"); and Yuishinshō mon'i ("Notes on 'The Essentials of Faith Alone'").

SHINTAI \ʼshēn-,tī\ (Japanese: "god-body"), in SHINTŌ, manifestation of the deity (KAMI), its symbol, or an object of worship in which it resides; also referred to as mitama-shiro ("the material object in which the divine soul resides"). The shintai may be a natural object in which the divinity's presence was discovered, such as a stone, mountain, or well, or an object made for him, such as a sword, comb, or mirror. The shintai is usually enclosed in cloth or in a box and kept in the main SANCTUARY of the shrine within a small room or cupboard whose doors are seldom opened.

SHINTŌ

The

indigenous RELIGIOUS BELIEFS and practices of Japan are termed Shintō. The word Shintō literally means “the way of KAMI” (the “mystical,” “superior,” or “divine,” generally sacred or divine power, specifically the various gods or deities). It came into use in order to distinguish indigenous Japanese beliefs from BUDDHISM, which had been introduced into Japan in the 6th century CE. Shintō has no founder, no official sacred SCRIPTURES in the strict sense (although the NIHON SHOKI and KOJIKI are often used as authoritative collections of mythology), and no fixed dogmas, but it has preserved its guiding beliefs throughout the ages.

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

Little is known about the religious practices that gave expression to Shintō's immanent, monistic world view during the period before the introduction of Sino-Korean culture and the establishment of a unified nation-state (4th–7th century). Presumably, agricultural rites were celebrated seasonally, and most communal religious functions centered around objects or places considered to be especially steeped in kami-nature. Gradually the kami of some of these places were associated with local ruling clans (uji) and acquired the name ujigami. The leaders of one clan in the YAMATO region (near the present city of Nara) came to be regarded as descendants of the sun goddess AMATERASU Ōmikami. By virtue of this distinction the family was recognized as the Japanese imperial household and became the cornerstone of Japanese nationhood.

With the emergence of the unified nation-state, centered in Yamato, Shintō festivals and ceremonies (MATSURI) became inseparable from the ordinary affairs of government. These activities were called matsuri-goto (literally, “affairs of religious festivals”), and the term has retained its meaning of “government” in the modern Japanese language.

This ancient union was revived and reemphasized after the Meiji Restoration of 1868, when the shrines of Shintō were magnified into the primary agencies for dramatizing, celebrating, and supporting the major interests of the national life. At the end of World War II, the ideology of this so-called State Shintō (Kokka Shintō) was discredited and the religion was officially banned, but it was reorganized without its political associations as SHRINE SHINTŌ (JINJA Shintō), which remained closely associated with the imperial family.

Throughout its history, Shintō, as a foundation of belief and practice, has been subject to a variety of external influences. The successive inroads made by CONFUCIANISM, TAOISM, and Buddhism into Japan left distinctive marks on the indigenous religion. Despite the revived orthodoxy of State Shintō, the tendency toward assimilation and hybridization reached a peak during the Meiji period (1868–1912), when some 13 new movements, known collectively with other such movements as Sect Shintō (Kyōha Shintō), arose around various points of emphasis from ASCETICISM to FAITH HEALING to Confucian ethics. Sect Shintō underwent further fragmentation after World War II.

While especially the sectarian groups, but also State and later Shrine Shintō, took on aspects of imported religions and philosophies, the beliefs and practices of the rural population remained remarkably true to the ancient tradition. Folk Shintō (Minzoku Shintō), as it is called, has no formal organizational structure or doctrinal formulation but is centered in the veneration of small roadside images and in the agricultural rites of rural families.

Although distinctive in flavor, the three types of Shintō are integrally related: Folk Shintō exists as the substructure of Shintō faith, and a SECT SHINTŌ follower is usually a parishioner (ujiko) of a certain Shrine Shintō shrine at the same time.

MYTHOLOGY

Though Shintō has no official scripture, the Kojiki ("Records of Ancient Matters") and the Nihon-gi, or Nihon shoki ("Chronicles of Japan"), are regarded in a sense as sacred books of Shintō. They were written in 712 and 720 CE, respectively, and are compilations of the ORAL TRADITIONS of ancient Shintō. But they are also books about the history, topography, and literature of ancient Japan. It is possible to construct Shintō doctrines from them by interpreting the myths and religious practices they describe.

The core of the mythology consists of tales about Amaterasu, and tales of how her direct descendants unified the Japanese people under their authority. In the beginning, according to Japanese mythology, a certain number of kami simply emerged, and a pair of kami, IZANAGI AND IZANAMI, gave birth to the Japanese islands, as well as to the kami who became ancestors of the various clans. Amaterasu, the ruler of Takama no Hara; the moon god Tsukiyomi no Mikoto; and SUSANOO (Susanowo) no Mikoto, the ruler of the nether regions, were the most important among them. A descendant of Amaterasu, JIMMU, is said to have become the first emperor of Japan. Japanese mythology says that the Three Sacred Treasures (the mirror, the sword, and the jewels), which are still the most revered symbols of the imperial household, were first given by Amaterasu to her grandson. The Inner Shrine (Naikū) of the Ise-jingū is dedicated to this ancestral goddess and is the most venerated shrine in Shintō.

The Japanese classics also contain myths and legends concerning the so-called 800 myriads of kami (yao-yorozu no kami; literally, yao equals 800 and yorozu 10,000). Some of them are the tutelary deities of clans and later became the tutelary kami of their respective local communities. Many others are not enshrined in sanctuaries and have no direct connections with the actual Shintō faith.

CONCEPT OF THE SACRED

At the core of Shintō are beliefs in the mysterious creating and harmonizing power (musubi) of kami and in the truthful way or will (makoto) of kami. The nature of kami cannot be fully explained in words, because kami transcends the cognitive faculty of man. Devoted followers, however, are able to understand kami through faith and usually recognize various kami in polytheistic form.

Parishioners of a shrine believe in their tutelary kami as the source of human life and existence. Each kami has a divine personality and responds to truthful prayers. The kami also reveals makoto to people and guides them to live in accordance with it. In traditional Japanese thought, truth manifests itself in empirical existence and undergoes transformation in infinite varieties in time and space. Makoto is not an abstract ideology. It can be recognized every moment in every individual thing in the encounter between man and kami.

In Shintō all the deities are said to cooperate with one another, and life lived in accordance with a kami's will is believed to produce a mystical power that gains the protection, cooperation, and approval of all the particular kami.

MORAL PRECEPTS

As the basic attitude toward life, Shintō emphasizes makoto no kokoro ("heart of truth"), or magokoro ("true heart"), which is usually translated as "sincerity, pure heart, uprightness." This attitude follows from the revelation of the truthfulness of kami in man. It is, generally, the sincere attitude of a person in doing his best in the work he has chosen or in his relationship with others, and the ultimate source of such a life-attitude lies in man's awareness of the divine.

Although Shintō ethics do not ignore individual moral virtues such as loyalty, FILIAL PIETY, love, faithfulness, and so forth, it is generally considered more important to seek magokoro, which constitutes the dynamic life-attitude that brings forth these virtues. In ancient scriptures magokoro was interpreted as "bright and pure mind" or "bright, pure, upright, and sincere mind." Purification, both physical and spiritual, is stressed even in contemporary Shintō to produce such a state of mind. The achievement of this state of mind is necessary in order to make communion between kami and man possible and to enable individuals to accept the blessings of kami.

RITUAL PRACTICES AND INSTITUTIONS

Shintō does not have a weekly religious service. Instead, people visit shrines at their own convenience. There are some who may go to the shrines on the 1st and 15th of each month and on the occasions of rites or festivals (matsuri), which take place several times a year. Devotees, however, may pay respect to the shrine every morning.

Rites of passage. Various Shintō RITES OF PASSAGE are observed in Japan. The purpose of the first visit of a newborn baby to the tutelary kami, which takes place between 30 and 100 days after birth, is to initiate the baby as a new adherent. The Shichi-go-san (Seven-Five-Three) festival on November 15 is the occasion for boys of five years and girls of three and seven years of age to visit the shrine to give thanks for kami's protection and to pray for their healthy growth. January 15 is Adults' Day. Youth in the village used to join the local young men's association on this day. At present it is the commemoration day for those Japanese who have attained their 20th year. The Japanese usually have their wedding ceremonies in Shintō style and pronounce their wedding vows to kami. Shintō funeral ceremonies, however, are not popular. The majority of the Japanese are Buddhist and Shintōist at the same time and have their funerals in Buddhist style. A traditional Japanese house has two family altars: one, Shintō, for their tutelary kami and the goddess Amaterasu Ōmikami, and another, Buddhist, for the family ancestors. Pure Shintō families, however, will have all ceremonies and services in Shintō style. There are other Shintō matsuri concerning occupations or daily life, as, for example, a ceremony of purifying a building site or for setting up the framework for a new building, a firing or purifying ceremony for the boilers in a new factory, a completion ceremony for a construction work, or a launching ceremony for a new ship.

Festivals and worship. Each Shintō shrine has several major festivals each year, including the Spring Festival (Haru Matsuri, or Toshigoi-no-Matsuri; Prayer for Good Harvest Festival), Autumn Festival (Aki Matsuri, or Niiname-sai; Harvest Festival), an Annual Festival (Rei-sai), and the Divine procession (Shinkō-sai). The Divine Procession usually takes place on the day of the Annual Festival, and miniature shrines (mikoshi) carried on the shoulders are transported through the parish.

The rituals at a grand festival will usually include purification rites, adoration at the altar, opening and closing of the door of the inner SANCTUARY, prayer, sacred music and dance, feasting, and the offering of food and little branches of the ever-green sacred tree to which strips of white paper are tied. Since World War II it has become popular to have a brief sermon or speech before the feast.

SHIRDI SAI BABA \shir-'dē-'säⁿ-ē-'bā-bā, 'shir-dē-\, or Sai Baba of Shirdi (b. 1836—d. 1918), spiritual leader dear to Hindu and Muslim devotees throughout India and in diaspora communities as far flung as the United States and the Caribbean. The name Sai Baba comes from sai, a Persian word used by Muslims to denote a holy person, and baba, Hindi for father. Though it is generally agreed that Sai Baba was born in 1836, his early years are a mystery. Most accounts mention his birth as a Hindu Brahmin and his subsequent adoption by a Sufi FAKIR, or MENDICANT. Later in life he claimed to have had a Hindu GURU. Sai Baba arrived in Shirdi, in the western Indian state of Maharashtra, about 1858 and remained there until his death in 1918.

At first denounced by the villagers of Shirdi as a madman, by the turn of the century Sai Baba had a considerable following of Hindus and Muslims, attracted by his compelling teachings and his performance of miracles, which often involved the granting of wishes and the healing of the sick. He wore a Muslim cap and for the better part of his life lived in an abandoned mosque in Shirdi, where he daily kept a fire burning, a practice reminiscent of some Sufi orders. Yet he named this mosque Dvarakamai, a decidedly Hindu name, and is said to have had substantial knowledge of the PURĀNAS, the BHAGAVAD GĪTĀ, and various branches of Hindu philosophy. Sai Baba's teachings often took the form of paradoxical PARABLES and displayed both his disdain for the rigid formalism that HINDUISM and ISLAM could fall prey to and his empathy for the poor and diseased. Shirdi is a major PILGRIMAGE site, and other spiritual figures like Upasani Baba and MEHER BABA credit the teachings of Sai Baba, while SATHYA SAI BABA (b. 1926) claims to be his incarnation.

SHIRK \ʃhirk\ (Arabic: “making a partner [of God]”), in ISLAM, IDOLATRY, POLYTHEISM, and the association of God with other deities.

The QUR'AN stresses in many verses that God does not share his powers with any partner (sharik). It warns those who believe their idols will intercede for them that they and the idols will become fuel for hell-fire on the Day of Judgment (21:98). Most mushrikūn (polytheists) in the Prophet's time were not Muslims; thus the words of the Qur'an were addressed not only to Muslims to keep them firm in their faith, but also to polytheistic Arabs.

Different grades of shirk have been distinguished in Islamic law. There is shirk al-'āda (“shirk of custom”), which includes all superstitions, such as the belief in OMENS. Shirk al-'ibāda (“shirk of worship”) is the belief in the powers of created things—e.g., revering saints, kissing holy stones, and praying at the grave of a holy man. There is shirk al-'ilm (“shirk of knowledge”)—e.g., to credit anyone, such as astrologers, with knowledge of the future. All these are shirk ṣaġhīr (“minor shirk”) compared with polytheism.

SHIROMANĪ GURDWARĀ PRABANDHAK COMMITTEE (SGPC) \ʃhir-ō-mə-nē-'gūr-dwā-rā-prā-'ban-dək\ (Punjabi: Shiromani Gurdwara Prabandhak Kameti, “Principal Committee of Gurdwara Management”), leading Sikh institution of the 20th century; it emerged as a part of the Singh Sabhā's efforts to adjust core Sikh institutions in response to changed conditions created by British rule in the Punjab. In 1920 a meeting of the sarbat khālsā (Punjabi: literally, “total Sikh community,” but in reality a representative gathering of the community) at the GOLDEN TEMPLE, Amritsar, resolved to create the SGPC to manage the historical GURDWARĀS—those associated with the 10 GURŪS—and the large land grants attached to them by Maharaja Ranjit Singh (1780–1839). In 1925 the British government legalized the SGPC with 175 members to be elected every five years by Sikh voters in the Punjab and assigned it statutory powers under the Gurdwara Reform Act.

Since its inception, the central office of the SGPC has been situated in the Golden Temple precincts, from where it has overseen the day-to-day functioning of a large number of historical gurdwārās in the Punjab. The SGPC has also produced the standard text of the ĀDI GRANTH, the primary Sikh scripture; codified Sikh religious and ritual conduct, the authoritative edition of which was first published as Sikh Rahit Maryādā in 1950; published scholarly works on Sikh history and religion; and run several Sikh educational institutions, including an engineering and a medical college. Often called the Sikh Parliament, the SGPC has also played an extremely important role in Sikh politics by serving as the power base of the AKĀLĪ DAL party.

SHIVA \ʃhi-və\, also spelled Śiva (Sanskrit: “Auspicious One”), one of the main deities of HINDUISM, worshiped as the paramount lord by the Śaiva (see ŚAIVISM) sects of India and the Hindu diaspora. Shiva is both the destroyer and the restorer, the great ascetic and the symbol of sensuality, the benevolent herdsman of souls and the wrathful avenger.

Shiva's female consort is known under various manifestations as Umā, SATĪ, PĀRVATĪ, DURGĀ, KĀLĪ, and sometimes ŚAKTI. The divine couple, together with their sons—SKANDA and GAṆEŚA—dwell on Mount Kailāsa in the HIMALAYAS. Shiva's mount and animal image is the bull NANDĪ; in temples and in private shrines Shiva is worshiped in the form of the LINGA, his aniconic emblem that has close historical and mythic associations with the phallus but is not so perceived by many devotees.

Shiva is usually depicted with a blue neck (from holding in his throat the poison thrown up at the CHURNING OF THE MILK-OCEAN, which threatened to destroy humankind), his hair arranged in a coil of matted locks (jaṭā-makuṭa) and adorned with the crescent moon and the GAṄGĀ RIVER (he brought the Gaṅgā to Earth by allowing her to trickle through his hair, thus breaking her fall). He has three eyes, the third eye bestowing inward vision but capable of burning destruction when focused outward. He wears a garland of skulls and a serpent around his neck and carries in his two (sometimes four) hands a deerskin, a trident, a small hand drum, or a club with a skull at the end.

Shiva is variously represented as the cosmic dancer (NĀTARĀJA), a naked ascetic, a MENDICANT beggar, a yogi, and the androgynous union of Shiva and his consort in one body (ARDHANĀRĪŚVARA). Among his epithets are Śambhu ("Benignant"), Śamkara ("Beneficent"), Paśupati ("Lord of Beasts"), Maheśa ("Great Lord"), and Mahādeva ("Great God").

SHOFAR \shō-'fār, 'shō-fər\, in ancient JUDAISM, musical instrument (perhaps made out of, or in the shape of, a "ram's horn," thus the name "shofar") used on important sacred occasions. In JOSHUA 6:4–20 and Judges 3:27, 6:34 the shofar is sounded in battle. Other texts recount the use of the shofar as a signaling device (1 Samuel 13:3; ISAIAH 18:3, 27:13, 58:1; JEREMIAH 51:27), as communication by watchmen (Jeremiah 6:1; EZEKIEL 33:3–6), and as a call to repent (AMOS 2:2, 3:6; HOSEA 5:8, 8:1). As an instrument of worship, the shofar signaled the Day of Atonement (Leviticus 25:9) and the coronations of kings (1 Kings 1:34–41; 2 Kings 9:13)—which custom is preserved in modern Israel at the swearing in of the president of the state. The most important modern use of the shofar in religious ceremonies takes place on ROSH HASHANAH; it is also sounded on YOM KIPPUR.

SHOGHI EFFENDI RABBĀNĪ \shaū-ē-e-'fen-dē-rāb-'bā-nē\ (b. March 1, 1897, Acre, Palestine [now 'Akko, Israel]—d. Nov. 4, 1957, London, Eng.), leader of the international BAHĀ'Ī FAITH, who held the title of Guardian of the Cause of God from 1921 until his death.

Shoghi Effendi grew up in Acre. In 1918 he earned a B.A. from the American University in Beirut, Lebanon. His education was directed to serving as secretary and translator to his grandfather, Abd al-Bahā', then leader of the Bahā'ī faith and son of the faith's founder, BAHĀ' ULLĀH.

After further education at Balliol College, Oxford, he returned to Haifa (1921) to assume the office of the Guardian at the death of his grandfather, who had designated him as successor. His next year was spent in maintaining the organization and unifying its followers.

Within the context of his office as Guardian, Shoghi Effendi wrote extensively as chief interpreter of the Bahā'ī teachings from his home and headquarters of the religion in Haifa, Israel. His writings are collected in The World Order of Bahā' Ullāh and other volumes published between 1930 and 1958. Additionally, as a result of his travels in Africa, the membership in the Bahā'ī faith increased considerably on that continent.

Although the office of Guardian had been envisioned as hereditary, it terminated with his death. The assistants appointed by Shoghi Effendi, known as the Hands of the Cause of God, currently serve under the Universal House of Justice, which is the supreme administrative body that assumed world leadership of the religion in 1963.

SHOU-HSING \shō-'shīŋ\, Pinyin Shouxing, in Chinese mythology, one of three stellar gods known collectively as Fu-Shou-Lu. He was also called Nan-chi lao-jen ("Old Man of the South Pole"). Greatly revered as the god of longevity (shou), Shou-hsing has no temples, but at birthday parties for older people his statue is draped in silk robes.

SHRINE SHINTŌ \shēn-'tō, Angl 'shin-tō\, Japanese Jinja Shintō \jēn-jā-\, form of SHINTŌ that focuses on worship in public shrines, in contrast to folk and sectarian practices (see Kyōha Shintō). It succeeded STATE SHINTŌ when the latter was disbanded. More than 80,000 shrines, nearly all of those formerly administered by the government, have formed themselves into an Association of Shintō Shrines (Jinja Honchō). They depend on private contributions for their maintenance and for the support of their priests.

SHU \shū\, in EGYPTIAN RELIGION, god of the air and supporter of the sky, created by ATUM. Shu and his sister and companion, Tefnut (goddess of moisture), were the first couple of the group of nine gods called the Ennead of HELIOPOLIS. Of their union were born GEB, the earth god, and NUT, the goddess of the sky. Shu was portrayed in human form with the hieroglyph of his name, an ostrich feather, on his head. He was often represented separating Geb and Nut, supporting with uplifted arms the body of Nut arched above him. In some Middle Kingdom texts Shu was given the status of a primeval creator god. Later he was frequently termed the "Son of Re" (the sun god), and he was also identified with Onuris, a warrior god, thus acquiring martial associations.

SHU-CHING \shū-'jīŋ\ (Chinese: "Classic of History"), Pinyin Shujing, also called Shang-shu \shāŋ-'shū\ ("Official History"), compilation of documentary records of events in China's ancient history, one of the FIVE CLASSICS (Wu-ching) of Chinese antiquity. Though certain chapters are forgeries, the authentic parts constitute the oldest Chinese writing of its kind.

The SHU-CHING consists of 58 chapters. Of these, 33 are considered to be authentic works of the 4th century BCE or earlier. The first five chapters relate the sayings and deeds of the emperors who reigned during China's legendary golden age. The next four are devoted to the Hsia dynasty (c. 2205–c. 1766 BCE), the historicity of which has not been definitively established. The next 17 deal with the Shang dynasty and its collapse in 1122 BCE. The final 32 chapters cover the Hsi- (Western) Chou dynasty that ruled China until 771 BCE.

SHUGEN-DŌ \shū-'gen-'dō\, Japanese religious tradition combining folk beliefs with SHINTŌ, BUDDHISM, and elements of religious TAOISM. The Shugen-dō practitioner, the yamabushi (literally, "one who bows down in the mountains"), engages in spiritual and physical disciplines in order to attain power against evil spirits.

Shugen-dō (meaning "way of mastering power") flourished during the Heian period (794–1185 CE) and allied itself with the esoteric schools of Buddhism, Tendai (see T'ĪEN-T'AI), and SHINGON. As a "mountain religion," Shugen-dō emphasized PILGRIMAGES and retreats to sacred mountains. The yamabushi served as guides for pilgrims visiting Yoshino and Kumano, sacred mountains inhabited by Shintō KAMI. The yamabushi helped the spread of Buddhism through northern Japan.

Many Buddhist priests belonging to esoteric traditions regularly developed their yamabushi techniques, and Shugen-dō practitioners often served as priests of Shintō shrines. This latter practice was discontinued by the Meiji government, which abolished the Shugen-dō in 1872. Three of the religious movements recognized by the Meiji regime under Sect Shintō—the Jikko-kyō, the Fusō-kyō, and the Ontake-kyō—are mountain cults, featuring practices similar to those of Shugen-dō.

SHULḤAN 'ARUKH

After 1945, with the disbandment of STATE SHINTŌ, some Shugen-dō groups that had survived within Buddhism once more attempted to establish Shugen-dō organizations. However, the membership and influence of Shugen-dō groups are now greatly diminished. See also ASCETICISM.

SHULḤAN 'ARUKH \shül-'kän-ä-'ruk\ (Hebrew: "Prepared Table"), 16th-century codification of Jewish religious law and practice that is still the standard reference work for Orthodox observance. The ShulḤan 'arukh, compiled and published by JOSEPH BEN EPHRAIM KARO (1488–1575) as a compendium of his larger work Bet Yosef ("House of Joseph"), contains opinions of various other codifiers before his time as well as Karo's personal decisions on disputed points.

The ShulḤan 'arukh is in four parts: observance of the SABBATH, festivals and the daily commandments are covered in Oraḥ Ḥayyim; guidelines for mourning, usury, and purity (see TOHORAH) are discussed in Yoreh De'ah; marriage and divorce are handled in Even ha-Ezer; and both criminal and civil legal issues are addressed in Hoshen Mishpat.

The ShulḤan 'arukh was criticized by ASHKENAZI RABBIS for its overemphasis on Sephardic customs. Accordingly, Moses Isserles (c. 1525–72) wrote a commentary (called Mappa, "Tablecloth") on the ShulḤan 'arukh that was subsequently printed with Karo's work so that both rites were represented. Thereafter, the ShulḤan 'arukh became a universally accepted guide for Orthodox observance.

SHUN \ʃhùn\, Pinyin Shun, in Chinese mythology, one of three legendary emperors, along with YAO and Yu, of the golden age of antiquity (c. 23rd century BCE), singled out by CONFUCIUS as a model of integrity and resplendent virtue.

Though Shun's father repeatedly tried to murder him, the boy's FILIAL PIETY never faltered. Because of his virtue, birds helped him weed his paddies and animals pulled his plow. The emperor Yao bypassed his own son to choose Shun as most worthy to rule and gave him his daughters, O Huang and Nü Ying (also known as Hsiang Chün and Fu-jen), in marriage. Shun offered sacrifice to the Six Honored Ones (whose identity is uncertain) and to the spirits of earth.

SHŪRĀ \ʃhūr-ə\ (Arabic: "consultation"), in early Islamic history, board of electors that was constituted by the second CALIPH (head of the Muslim community), 'Umar I (634–644), to elect his successor. Thereafter, in Muslim states, shūrā variously designated a council of state, or advisers to the sovereign, a parliament (in modern times), and a court of law with jurisdiction over claims made by citizens and public officials against the government. The word shūrā provides the title of the 42nd chapter of the QUR'AN, in which believers are exhorted to conduct their affairs "by mutual consultation." Conservative Muslim ideologues in the 20th century understand shūrā to be an expression of divine unity (tawḥīd) rather than purely human agency.

SHUSHIGAKU \ʃshü-shē-,gä-kü\ (Japanese: "Chu Hsi school"), most influential of the schools of NEO-CONFUCIANISM that developed in Japan during the Tokugawa period (1603–1867).

SHWE DAGON \ʃshwä-,dä-gün\, PAGODA in Yangôn (Rangoon), the capital of Myanmar (Burma). A great Buddhist temple complex about one mile north of the Cantonment (the city's center), the pagoda is a solid brick STUPA completely covered with gold. It rises 326 feet on a hill 168 feet above the city.

SIBYL \ʃi-bəl\, also called Sibylla \si-'bi-lə\, prophetess in Greek legend and literature. She was always a figure of the mythical past, and her prophecies, in Greek hexameters, were handed down in writing. In the 5th and early 4th centuries BCE, she was always referred to in the singular. From the late 4th century the number of sibyls was multiplied; they were localized traditionally at all the famous oracle centers, particularly in association with APOLLO, and "sibyl" was treated as a title.

A famous collection of sibylline prophecies, the Sibylline Books, was traditionally offered for sale to Tarquinius Superbus, the last of the seven KINGS OF ROME, by the Cumaean sibyl. He refused to pay her price, so the sibyl burned six of the books before finally selling him the remaining three at the price she had originally asked for all nine. The books were thereafter kept in the temple of JUPITER on the Capitoline Hill, to be consulted only in emergencies.

SIBYLLINE ORACLES \ˈsi-bə-,līn-,lən\ collection of oracular prophecies in which Jewish or Christian doctrines were allegedly confirmed by a SIBYL (legendary Greek prophetess); the prophecies were actually the work of certain Jewish and Christian writers from about 150 BCE to about 180 CE and are not to be confused with the much earlier collection known as the Sibylline Books.

In the Oracles the sibyl proved her reliability by first “predicting” events that had actually recently occurred; she then predicted future events and set forth doctrines peculiar to Hellenistic JUDAISM or CHRISTIANITY. Modern scholars have dated the various Oracles by comparing actual historical events with what was predicted in the Oracles. At the point where errors begin, the oracle-writer was predicting the future, and it is possible to assign a date from the last correct prediction.

In the Byzantine period 12 of the compositions were collected in a single manuscript containing 14 books (of which numbers 9 and 10 are lost). An incomplete text of this collection was first published in 1545.

SIDDHA \ˈsid-də\, in JAINISM, one who has achieved perfection. By right faith, right knowledge, and right conduct a Siddha has freed himself from the cycle of rebirths and resides in a state of perpetual bliss in the siddha-śīlā, at the top of the universe. The Siddha and the other ascetics constitute the pañca-paramēṣṭhin, the five chief divinities of the Jains. Their figures are represented on a silver or brass tray called a siddha-cakra (saint-wheel), to which great sanctity and power are attributed. In the twice-yearly ceremony known as oḷī, the images are washed and anointed, and offerings of rice, sweetmeats, and fruit are made.

In BUDDHISM under the Pāla kings of India (8th–12th century CE) Tantric Buddhism (i.e., VAJRAYĀNA) became the dominant sect. Adepts of this sect were called Siddhas, and they identified NIRVANA with the passions, maintaining that one could “touch the deathless element with his body.” See also MAHĀSIDDHA.

SIDDUR \sē-ˈdūr, ˈsi-dər\ (Hebrew: “order”), plural siddurim \,sē-dür-rēm\, or siddurs, Jewish prayer book that contains the entire liturgy used on the ordinary SABBATH and on weekdays for domestic as well as SYNAGOGUE ritual. It is distinguished from the MAHZOR, which is the prayer book used for the High Holidays. Because tradition long allowed the addition of new prayers and hymns (piyyutim) to voice contemporary needs and aspirations, the siddurim reflect Jewish religious history expressed in liturgy and prayers. Variations persist, but the basic elements are unchanging.

SIEGFRIED \ˈsig-,frēd, ˈsēg-, German ˈzēk-,frēt\, Old Norse Sigurd \ˈsi-gürd, -görd\, figure from the heroic literature of the ancient Germanic people. He appears in both German and Old Norse literature, although the versions of his stories do not always agree. He plays a part in the story of Brunhild, in which he meets his death, but in other stories he is the leading character and triumphs. A feature common to all versions is his outstanding strength and courage. It is still disputed whether the figure of Siegfried is of mythical or historical (Merovingian) origin.

Siegfried was a boy of noble lineage who grew up without parental care. One story tells of Siegfried’s fight with a dragon, and another of how he acquired a treasure from two brothers who quarreled over their inheritance. These two stories are combined into one in the Norse Poetic EDDA. Siegfried plays a major part in the Nibelungenlied, where this old material is used but is much overlaid with more recent additions. Das Lied vom hürnen Seyfrid, not attested before about 1500, also retains the old material in identifiable form, although the poem’s central theme is the release of a maiden from a dragon; and an Edda poem tells how Sigurd awakened a VALKYRIE maiden from a charmed sleep. There is doubt about the antiquity of both poems.

SIFRA \si-ˈfrä\, compilation of midrashic exegeses on the book of Leviticus produced by Jewish sages in the 2nd and 3rd centuries and closed at c. 300 CE. Sifra contends that the law of the MISHNAH is not the product of logic—but that it is, and can only be, the product of EXEGESIS of SCRIPTURE. The Mishnah is subordinated to Scripture and validated only through Scripture. The framers of the Mishnah effect their taxonomy through the traits of things. The authorship of Sifra insists that the only true source of classification is Scripture. In the Mishnah one seeks connection between fact and fact, sentence and sentence, by comparing and contrasting two things that are both like and not alike. But, Sifra insists, only Scripture reliably defines the governing classifications by which facts are formed into intelligible patterns.

SIFRÉ TO DEUTERONOMY \si-ˈfrä . . . ,dü-tə-ˈrä-nə-mē, -dyü-\, systematic, verse by verse commentary to the book of Deuteronomy by the sages of RABBINIC JUDAISM. Since the MISHNAH (c. 200 CE) and the TOSEFTA (c. 250 CE) are cited verbatim, a probable date for the work is c. 300 CE. Out of cases and examples, the sages sought generalizations and governing principles. The document’s compilers took the details of cases and carefully reframed them into rules that then pertained to all cases. These rules show what details restrict the prevailing law to the conditions of the case, and what details exemplify the encompassing traits of the overall law. Four principal topics comprise the document’s propositions—the first three yield systematic statements that concern the relationships between ISRAEL (the Jewish people) and God, with special reference to the COVENANT, the TORAH, and the land, Israel and the nations, with interest in Israel’s history, past, present, and future, and how that cyclic time is to be recognized; and Israel on its own terms, focusing upon Israel’s distinctive leadership. The fourth rubric examines prevailing modes of thought that demonstrate the inner structure of intellect—whether that be the intellect underlying sifré itself, the cases of SCRIPTURE, or the encompassing rules.

SIFRÉ TO NUMBERS \si-ˈfrä\, commentary to the book of Numbers that dates to c. 300 CE and that provides a miscellaneous reading of most of that book. All authorities quoted in it enjoy the status of MISHNAH sages, called tanna'im (those who repeat ORAL TRADITIONS), and so the EXEGESIS is called “tannaic.” The document cites as complete, extraneous compositions passages of the Mishnah and the TOSEFTA, c. 200 and 250 CE, respectively; thus the indicated date, which is at the very end of the period of the TANNA, is probable.

The word sifré corresponds to the Hebrew sefarim, meaning books. The document as a whole through its fixed and recurrent literary structures makes two complementary points: (1) reason unaided by SCRIPTURE produces uncertain propositions, and (2) reason operating within the limits of Scripture produces truth. These two principles are never articulated but are left implicit in the systematic reading of most of the book of Numbers, verse by verse.

SIKHISM

ounded in the late 15th century CE by GURŪ NĀNAK, Sikhism is the youngest of the world's monotheistic religious traditions. The word Sikh is derived from the Pāli sikkha or Sanskrit śiṣya, meaning "follower." Sikhs are a community of almost 25,000,000 people. Although Sikhism is historically associated with the Punjab, a region that connects southern Asia with the Middle East, millions of Sikhs have left the Punjab and now live and work in North America, western Europe, and many former British colonies.

HISTORY

Nānak (1469–1539) was a Hindu by birth. While in his late twenties, he is said to have had a divine revelation that resulted in his leaving the routine domestic life behind and embarking on extensive travel. After about twenty years, he ceased traveling, acquired farmland in the lush plains of the central Punjab, and founded a town named Kartārpur (City of God). At Kartārpur, Nānak became Gurū Nānak (Nānak, the preceptor), and the daily routine of the lives of his Sikhs—followers—was constructed around his spiritual ideals.

Gurū Nānak provided the early Sikh community at Kartārpur with an institutional structure. He composed hymns of great beauty and had them recorded in a distinct script called Gurmukhī. These hymns formed the core of the Sikh sacred text, the ĀDI GRANTH ("original book"). He also created the practice of three daily prayers and established the institution of community kitchen (langar), where (contrary to Hindu custom) all Sikhs were to eat together as a sign of their belief in human equality. At the time of his death in 1539, Gurū Nānak appointed one of his followers, AṄGAD, to be his successor; by doing so he institutionalized the office of Gurū, which continued until the death of Gurū GOBIND SINGH, the tenth Sikh Gurū (1675–1708).

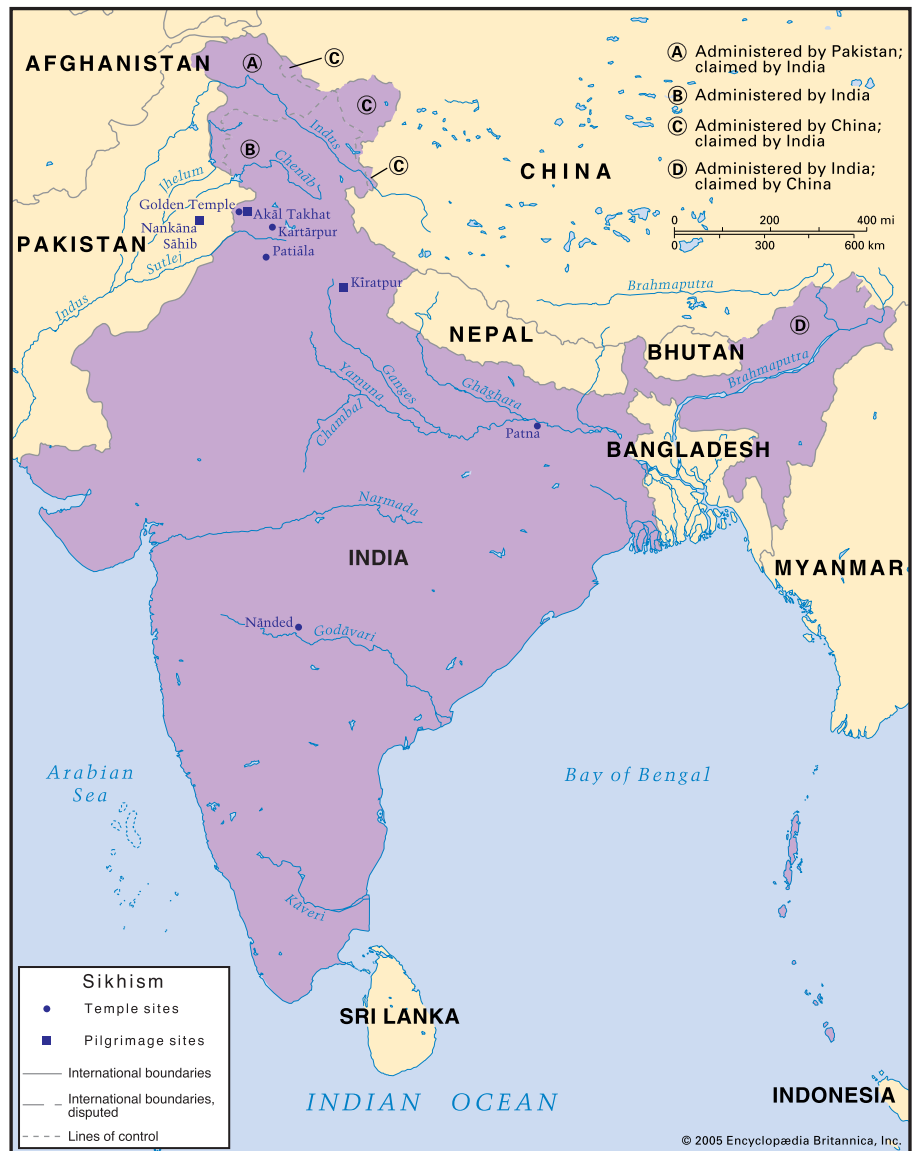

By the end of the 16th century the Sikhs had become powerful enough to be seen as a threat by the Mughal (Muslim) administration in both Lahore (the provincial headquarters) and Delhi. A period of tension culminated in the execution of Gurū ARJAN, the fifth Sikh Gurū (1581–1606). The Sikh community, under the leadership of his successor, Gurū HARGOBIND (1606–44), responded by formally rejecting Mughal authority and declaring the Gurū to be both temporal (mīr) and spiritual (pīr) head. Sikhs were forced to leave the Punjab plains and move to the Himalayan foothills, where they remained throughout the 17th century. An attempt to revive the community in the plains during the leadership of Gurū TEGH BAHĀDUR, the ninth Sikh Gurū (1664–75), ended with his execution in Delhi.

Given this hostile political climate, the Sikh belief in God’s justice took the form of Gurū Gobind Singh’s declaration of the Sikh community as the KHĀLSĀ (“pure”). In the process, he gave the community a new understanding of its special relationship to God on the one hand, and its mission to participate in establishment of the khālsā rāj (kingdom of God) on the other. Gurū Gobind Singh introduced a ceremony of initiation in which fresh water was transformed into nectar by reciting on it the compositions of the Gurūs, the divine word as revealed to the Sikhs, while stirring it with a double-edged sword (khandā) symbolizing God’s power and justice. Having taken the nectar, a Sikh became a Singh ("lion") and followed an expanded version of the existing code of conduct (rahit). The new code involved the carrying of five Ks: kes (uncut hair), kañghā (a comb), kirpān (a sword), karhā (a steel bracelet), and kachhā (long shorts), as well as abstinence from tobacco.

Gurū Gobind Singh thus gave the community both a strengthened identity and a political vision. On this basis Sikhs developed a powerful myth that the land of the Punjab belongs to them, the special gift of the tenth Gurū. They waged relentless military campaigns, and finally, under the leadership of Ranjīt Singh (1780–1839) created a powerful kingdom in the region. The community's understanding of itself as the Khālsā, the special ones, did not permit any concerted effort among Sikhs to convert others to their faith, and even at the peak of their political power they remained a small minority in the Punjab. Despite their minority status, they were able to hold on to the Punjab by determination and military skill.

The death of Ranjīt Singh in 1839 ushered in a period of instability, and the Punjab was ultimately annexed by the British in 1849. After a time of painful introspection and reflection on the fall of the khālsā rāj, the Sikhs began to work closely with their conquerors. The British declared the Sikhs to be a martial race and recruited them into the imperial army and the police, creating opportunities for worldwide travel.

Late in the 19th century the SINGH SABHA ("Society of Singhs") emerged. The leaders of this movement undertook to make the Sikhs aware of what they saw as correct Sikh doctrines and practices, using the newly arrived print medium to propagate Sikh history and literature. They worked closely with the British administration, convincing them of the importance of treating the Sikhs as a distinct political community.

The idea of an independent Sikh state figured prominently in the protracted negotiations that preceded the partition of the Punjab in 1947, but the small numbers of Sikhs in relation to other residents made this an unviable proposition. In independent India, the Akālī Dal—the Sikh political party whose programs and criteria for membership have a distinctly religious character—has historically found itself in conflict with the central government of India in New Delhi. In 1966 its efforts led to the founding of the present-day state of Punjab, in which Sikhs are a majority and Punjābī is the official language. In the 1980s a movement led by Sant Jarnail Singh Bhindrānwale (1947–84) to create an independent Khālistān ("Land of the Khālsā") paralyzed the Punjab.

Although an overwhelming majority of the Sikhs still live in the Punjab, approximately 10 percent of them have settled in other parts of the world. This development has created a new situation in which issues of religious authority, sacred language, Sikh relationship with the land of the Punjab, and social practice are receiving new scrutiny in the diaspora community. The positions taken on these issues will have a lasting impact on the future shape of Sikhism, not only in the diaspora community but also, because of the sharing of Sikh leadership internationally, in the Punjab itself.

DOCTRINE

Gurū Nānak's theology is built on the foundational concept of the unity of God, the creator lord (kartār/pātishāh/sāhib) who governs the universe with his command (hukam) centered on twin principles of justice (niān) and grace (nadar). As the creator, God is the sole legitimate object of human worship.

The universe came into being as part of the divine decision. Being the creation of God, the world and all the human beings in it are assigned a high degree of sanctity, with the humans positioned at the top of the hierarchy. Human beings, irrespective of their social and gender distinctions, have the unique opportunity to achieve liberation (mukatī), which is release from the cycle of birth and death and becoming one with God.

The pursuit of liberation, however, is obstructed by a core human flaw: self-centeredness (haumai). This can be brought under control by developing a relationship with God based on love (bhau) and fear (bhai) and by cultivation of a constant remembrance (nām simran) of his power. Gurū Nānak traced the movement toward liberation in five distinct realms. The first three mark the preparation: the recognition that the universe runs according to a divine plan and God alone judges man's activity (dharam); the realization of the vastness and complexity of the divine creation (giān); and the humility arising from an understanding of the humble nature of human existence in this God-created universe (saram). These complete the preparation for the believer to receive the divine grace (karam), which then leads to the ineffable realm of truth (sach).

Commitment to hard work (kirat), sharing the fruits of one's labor (vand ke chhako), and service to humanity (sevā) are the other enduring assets in pursuit of liberation. The family and community are not simply a passive backdrop for the individual's search for liberation; they are very much a part of that agenda. Gurū Nānak believed in the individual's obligation to work toward collective liberation. A successful individual is one who attains liberation for himself or herself but who in addition assists in the liberation of all others. It is not a matter of choice but a moral imperative.

The social and ethical dimensions of early Sikh doctrine evolved into a belief in the indivisibility of the spiritual and temporal. The characteristic Sikh thinking on this issue is manifest in the proximity in AMRITSAR of the GOLDEN TEMPLE (Darbār Sāhib), the most sacred religious site of the Sikhs, and the AKĀL TAKHAT, the highest temporal seat of Sikh authority. This belief paved the way for the Khālsā's declared mission of bringing divine victory on earth. The Khālsā saw itself as the army of God (Akāl Purukh kī fauj) in the firm belief that if peaceful means fail to bring justice, it is legitimate to wage war.

At the time of his death, Gurū Gobind Singh declared that henceforth the Ādi Granth would be the Gurū, elevating its position to that of Gurū Granth Sāhib (honorable Gurū in book form). The office of the personal Gurū was thus effectively replaced with the divine word as enshrined in the Ādi Granth. The text functions as the central authority in the presence of which the community (Gurū-Panth) gathers and attempts to reach a consensus (gurmata) that is considered mandatory for all Sikhs, whether present or not.

SACRED LITERATURE

The Ādi Granth is the canonical SCRIPTURE of the Sikhs. It includes the hymns of the six Sikh Gurūs, of bards associated with the Sikh court, and of fifteen non-Sikh saint-poets known in the Sikh tradition as bhagats ("devotees"). The text plays the central role in the Sikh devotional and ceremonial life.

The DASAM GRANTH ("the book of the tenth Gurū") comes second in the hierarchy. The orthodox Sikh view attributes its entire corpus to Gurū Gobind Singh, but many scholars argue that a large part of the text was produced by others associated with his court during the closing decades of the 17th century.

The Janam Sākhīs ("Life Stories"), a hagiographic genre, celebrate the life and works of Gurū Nānak. The earliest written versions of these stories can be traced to the mid-17th century. Gurū Nānak is presented as the greatest teacher and spiritual master of the age. At the beginning of the 18th century an offshoot of this genre surfaced in the form of the Gurbilās literature, which celebrates the heroic accomplishments of Gurū Hargobind and Gurū Gobind Singh. To these the rahit nāmā ("manual of conduct") literature may be added. This literature was codified into the authoritative text entitled Sikh Rahit Maryādā ("the Sikh code of conduct") in the mid-20th century by the SHIROMANĪ GURDWĀRĀ PRABANDHAK COMMITTEE, the most important Sikh governing body.

DEVOTIONAL AND CEREMONIAL LIFE

Each day most Sikhs recite three prayers: the Japjī ("meditation") and a set of other hymns in the morning, the Rahirās ("supplication") in the evening, and the Sohilā ("praise"), a thanksgiving prayer, just before going to sleep. On the first day of each month of the lunar calendar a special prayer called the Barānmāh ("twelve months") is recited.

Almost all Sikh families possess anthologies of sacred hymns (gatkās), which are used for recitation over and above the daily prayers. Families who can do so usually keep the Ādi Granth in their house. This requires some space, since the text is normally kept in a separate room, to be opened (prakāsh) in the morning and put to rest (sukhāsan) after sunset. The women in the family assume this responsibility. Family members often undertake the complete reading of the Ādi Granth over a period lasting from six months to one year. A reading of the text over a week and an unbroken reading taking 48 hours mark special occasions.

Soon after the birth of a child, the family visits the gurdwāra, offers supplication for his or her happy and healthy life, and takes "the command" (hukam) from the Ādi Granth (the text is opened at random and the hymn that appears on the left-hand top corner is considered to be the divine reply to the supplication). The opening letter of the hymn is used as the first in the name of the child.

Sikh marriage ceremonies are preceded by an unbroken reading of the Ādi Granth. The bride and groom circumambulate the Ādi Granth four times while a specific hymn of four stanzas is recited from its text. The ceremony concludes with a supplication seeking the divine blessings for the new couple.

At the time of death the body is cremated, and the remains are taken to Kīratpur, the town where Gurū Hargobind died, and dispersed in the river Sutlej. A reading of the Ādi Granth is completed on the tenth day after death, and relatives and friends offer supplication seeking the peace of the departed soul.

Other Sikh celebrations include: the birth anniversaries of Gurū Nānak and Gurū Gobind Singh; the martyrdom of Gurū Arjan and Gurū Tegh Bahādur; and the Vaisākhī, the day of the inauguration of the Khālsā by Gurū Gobind Singh.

SĪLA \ˈsē-lə\ (Pāli), Sanskrit śīla \ˈshē-lə\, in BUDDHISM, morality, or right conduct. Sīla comprises three stages along the EIGHTFOLD PATH—right speech, right action, and right livelihood. Evil actions are considered to be the product of defiling passions, but their causes are rooted out only by the exercise of wisdom (prajna).

Buddhist morality is codified in the form of 10 precepts (dasa-sīla), which require abstention from (1) taking life, (2) taking what is not given, (3) committing sexual misconduct (nonchastity for the monk and sexual conduct contrary to proper social norms, such as adultery, for the layman), (4) engaging in false speech, (5) using intoxicants, (6) eating after midday, (7) participating in worldly amusements, (8) adorning the body with ornaments and using perfume, (9) sleeping on high and luxurious beds, and (10) accepting gold and silver.

Laymen are to observe the first five precepts (pañca-sīla) at all times. Occasionally, such as during a fast day, they may observe eight precepts (aṣṭā-sīla; the first nine, with the seventh and eighth combined as one). Normally the full 10 vows are observed only by monks or nuns, who also follow the detailed monastic rules (see PRĀTIMOKṢA) that are a further elaboration of the precepts.

SILHAK: see PRACTICAL LEARNING SCHOOL.

SILVANUS \sil-ˈvā-nəs\, in ROMAN RELIGION, god of the countryside, similar in character to FAUNUS, the god of animals, with whom he is often identified. Initially the spirit of the unreclaimed woodland fringing the settlement, he developed into a god of woodland pastures, of boundaries, and of villas, parks, and gardens. He never enjoyed a state cult or temple, but the simple ritual of his private worship at a sacred grove or tree had wide appeal. In Latin literature his character tended to merge with that of the Greek gods Silenus or PAN, and to be assimilated into the Greco-Roman mythological tradition.

SIMEON \ˈsi-mē-ən\, one of the 12 tribes that in biblical times comprised the people of Israel. The tribe was named after the second son born to JACOB and his first wife, LEAH (GENESIS 29:33).

Following the EXODUS out of Egypt, the tribe of Simeon seems to have settled in the south of Palestine beyond the powerful tribe of JUDAH (Joshua 19:1–8). In time, part of the tribe of Simeon was apparently absorbed by Judah (Joshua 19:9), while other members possibly relocated in the north. If the tribe of Simeon is counted among the tribes that later formed the northern Kingdom of Israel, then it too was assimilated by other peoples after Israel was conquered by the Assyrians in 721 BCE (2 Kings 18:9–12). One way or another, the tribe of Simeon disappeared from history and is thus numbered among the TEN LOST TRIBES OF ISRAEL.

SIMEON BEN YOḤAI \ˈsi-mē-ən-ben-yō-ˈkī\, also known as bar Yohai, important rabbinic authority of the mid-2nd century CE, one of the five students of AKIBA BEN JOSEPH who, ordained by Judah ben Bava (or Baba), revived rabbinic learning after the failed BAR KOKHBA revolt (Talmud BAVLI Yebamot 62b). In the MISHNAH he is always referred to simply as Simeon. Later tradition assigns to him authorship of all anonymous statements in Sifre (Talmud BAVLI Sanhedrin 86a). He also was claimed to be the author of the SEFER HAZOHAR; his name became central in Jewish mystical lore.

During the Hadrianic persecutions that followed the Bar Kokhba revolt, Simeon is said to have fiercely opposed Roman culture and rule. Talmud BAVLI Shabbat 33b reports that, because of his derogatory statements against the Roman people, he was sentenced to death and forced to flee with his son to a cave, in which they hid for 13 years. Simeon is known for his homiletical remarks, as well as many legal dicta. He stated that the MESSIAH will come after all Jews correctly observe two SABBATHS (Talmud BAVLI Shabbat 118b), and he emphasized the importance of rabbinic learning by asserting that a person who breaks off from study to contemplate a tree or other natural phenomenon deserves death (Mishnah Abot 3:7).

SIMHATH TORAH \sēm-ˈkāt-tō-ˈrā, ˈsim-kəs-ˈtōr-ə\, Simhath also spelled Simhat, Simchas, Simchath, or Simchat, Hebrew Simḥat Torah (“Rejoicing of the Torah”), in JUDAISM, religious observance held on the last day of SUKKOT (Festival of Booths), when the yearly cycle of TORAH reading is completed and the next cycle is begun. Torah scrolls are removed from the ARK and carried through the SYNAGOGUE seven times, sometimes followed by children waving flags. The rejoicing characteristic of Simhath Torah is meant to express the joy that Jews feel in their possession and observance of the words of the Torah.

SIMON MAGUS \ˈsi-mən-ˈmā-gəs\ (Latin), English Simon the Magician, or the Sorcerer (fl. 1st century CE), magician who, according to the NEW TESTAMENT account (Acts 8:9–24), offered to purchase from the Apostles PETER and JOHN the power of transmitting the HOLY SPIRIT, thus giving rise to the term SIMONY as the buying or selling of sacred things or ecclesiastical office. Later references in early Christian writings identify him as the founder of post-Christian GNOSTICISM and as the archetypal heretic of the Christian church.

The 2nd-century theologian JUSTIN MARTYR relates that Simon visited Rome at the time of the emperor Claudius (41–54) and was there deified by followers who were fascinated with his miracle working; no archaeological verification of this claim has been found. According to legend, Simon fell to his death from the Roman Forum in an attempt to demonstrate his ability to fly. Other sources portray him as the individual responsible for the eclectic fusion of stoicism and gnosticism, known as “The Great Pronouncement.”

Simon’s quasi-Trinitarian teaching is contained in the early Christian writings known as the Clementine literature. In the 2nd century a Simonian sect arose that viewed Simon Magus as the first God, or Father, and he was sometimes worshiped as the incarnation of the Greek god ZEUS. His consort Helen was regarded by his followers as the earthly manifestation of ATHENA.

SIMONY \ˈsi-mə-nē-, ˈsī-\, buying or selling of something spiritual or closely connected with the spiritual. The name is taken from SIMON MAGUS (Acts 8:18), who sought to buy the power of conferring the gifts of the HOLY SPIRIT.

Simony, in the form of buying church offices, became familiar when the Christian church gained positions of wealth and influence to bestow. The first legislation on the point was the second canon of the COUNCIL OF CHALCEDON (451). From that time prohibitions and penalties were reiterated against buying or selling promotions to the episcopate, priesthood, and diaconate. Later, the offense of simony was extended to include all traffic in benefices and all pecuniary transactions on masses (apart from the authorized offering), blessed oils, and other consecrated objects.

From an occasional scandal, simony became widespread in Europe in the 9th and 10th centuries, after which Pope

GREGORY VII (1073–85) rigorously attacked the problem. It recurred in the 15th century, but after the 16th century, it gradually disappeared in its most flagrant forms with the disendowment and secularization of church property.

SIN \ˈsɛn\ (Akkadian), Sumerian Nanna \ˈnän-nä\, in MESOPOTAMIAN RELIGION, god of the moon. Sin was the father of the sun god, SHAMASH, and, in some myths, of ISHTAR, who was seen as the planet VENUS.

NANNA, the Sumerian name for the moon god, may originally have referred only to the full moon, whereas Su-en, later contracted to Sin, designated the crescent moon. At any rate, Nanna was intimately connected with the cattle herds that were the livelihood of the people in the marshes of the lower Euphrates River, where the cult developed. (The city of Ur, of the same region, was the chief center of the worship of Nanna.) The crescent, which later was definitely Nanna's emblem, was sometimes represented by the horns of a great bull. Nanna bestowed fertility and prosperity on the cowherds, governing the rise of the waters, the growth of reeds, the increase of the herd, and therefore the quantity of dairy products produced. His consort, Ningal, was a reed goddess. Each spring, Nanna's worshipers reenacted his mythological visit to his father, ENLIL, at Nippur with a ritual journey, carrying with them the first dairy products of the year. Gradually Nanna became more human: from being depicted as a bull or boat, because of his crescent emblem, he came to be represented as a cowherd or boatman.

Sin was represented as an old man with a flowing beard—a wise god—wearing a headdress of four horns surmounted by a crescent moon. The last king of Babylon, Nabonidus (reigned c. 556–539 BCE), attempted to elevate Sin to a supreme position within the Babylonian pantheon.

SIN, moral evil as considered from a religious standpoint. SIN is regarded in JUDAISM, CHRISTIANITY, and ISLAM as the deliberate and purposeful violation of the will of God.

Concepts similar to sin have been present in many cultures throughout history, where they were usually equated with an individual's failure to live up to external standards of conduct or with his or her violation of prohibitions, laws, or moral codes. In the OLD TESTAMENT, sin is viewed as a defiance of God's commandments or hatred of God. The NEW TESTAMENT added the doctrine that humanity's state of collective and individual sinfulness is a condition that JESUS came into the world to heal. Redemption through Christ could enable humans to overcome sin and thus to become whole. Both Christianity and Judaism see sin as being attributable to human pride, self-centeredness, and disobedience.

Theologians have divided sin into "actual" and "original." Actual sin consists of evil acts, whether of thought, word, or deed. ORIGINAL SIN is the morally vitiated condition in which one finds oneself at birth as a member of a sinful race. In GENESIS 3, this is depicted as a consequence of the first human sin, i.e., that of ADAM AND EVE; this doctrine arises from human beings having come into the world not as isolated individuals but as members of a corporate race inheriting both GOOD AND EVIL features from its past history.

Actual sin is in turn subdivided, on the basis of its gravity, into mortal and venial. A mortal sin is a deliberate turning away from God; it is a sin in a grave matter that is committed in full knowledge and with the full consent of the sinner's will, and until it is repented it cuts the sinner off from God's sanctifying GRACE. A venial sin usually involves a less important matter and is committed with less awareness of wrongdoing. While a venial sin weakens the sinner's union with God, it is not a deliberate turning from him and so does not impede all God's sanctifying grace.

Actual sin is also subdivided again into material and formal. Formal sin is both wrong in itself and known by the sinner to be wrong; it therefore involves the sinner with personal guilt. Material sin, however, consists of an act that is wrong in itself (because it is contrary to God's law and human moral nature) but which the sinner does not know to be wrong and for which he or she is therefore not personally culpable.

SINAI, MOUNT \ˈsɪ-nī, -nē-ī\, also called Mountain of Moses, or Mount Hareh, Hebrew Har Sinai, Arabic Jabal

The summit of Mount Sinai

W.P. Jacob, Greenwich, Conn.

Mūsā, granitic peak of the south-central Sinai Peninsula, Janūb Sīnā' (South Sinai) muḥāfazāh (governorate), Egypt. Mount Sinai is renowned as the principal site of divine revelation in Jewish history, where God is purported to have appeared to MOSES and given him the TEN COMMANDMENTS (Exodus 20; Deuteronomy 5). According to Jewish tradition, the entire corpus of biblical text and interpretation was revealed to Moses on Sinai. The mountain is also sacred in both the Christian and Islamic traditions. A positive identification of the biblical Mount Sinai cannot be made, but Mount Sinai itself has long been accepted as the site in the traditions of JUDAISM, CHRISTIANITY, and ISLAM.

In the early Christian era the area was frequented by HERMITS, and in 530 CE the monastery of St. Catherine was built at the northern foot of the mountain. Still inhabited by a few monks of the autonomous ORTHODOX CHURCH of Mount Sinai, it is probably the world's oldest continuously inhabited Christian monastery.

SINGH SABHĀ \ˈsɪŋ-ɡə-ˈsə-bā, ˈsɪŋ-ˌ\ (Punjabi: "Society of the Singhs," i.e., Sikhs who have undergone khande kī pahul), 19th-century movement within SIKHISM which began as a defense against the proselytizing activities of Christians and Hindus. Its chief aims were the revival of the teachings of the Sikh GURŪS, the production of religious literature in Punjabi, and a campaign against illiteracy.

After the annexation of the KHĀLSĀ Rāj by the British in 1849, Christian missionaries increased activities in central Punjab. In 1853, Dalīp Singh, the last Sikh ruler, decided to join the Christian fold, and Harnam Singh, a Sikh aristocrat from Kapurthala, followed soon thereafter. Christian missionary activity was thus quickly perceived as a threat to local religious traditions, but it did not stand alone. The lower rung of the British administration in the Punjab was comprised of English-speaking Bengalis, who were largely BRAHMO SAMAJIS (members of a Hindu reform movement). They actively established their branches in several Punjab cities in the 1860s. Punjabi Muslims concerned with saving their heritage formed the first Anjuman-i-Islamia (an association created to improve religious, educational, and social conditions in the Muslim community) in Lahore in 1869.

In response to these developments, Sikhs initiated the Singh Sabhā movement, forming the first unit in AMRITSAR in 1873. This was followed by a branch in Lahore, and by the end of the 19th century the number of Singh Sabhās exceeded 100. The movement sought to revive Sikh doctrine in its pristine purity. Building on the early 18th-century understanding of Singh identity as the accepted Sikh ideal, Singh Sabhā leaders undertook a major effort to make Sikhs aware of what they saw as correct doctrines and practices, using the newly arrived print culture to propagate Sikh history and literature. These leaders emphasized the religious significance of learning Punjābī written in the Gurmukhī script (a script developed by the Sikhs in India for their sacred literature), while simultaneously stressing the importance of Western education. They worked closely with the British administration, convincing them of the importance of treating the Sikhs as a distinct political community. Modern scholars have stressed the broad effects of the Singh Sabhā movement in establishing clear boundaries between Sikhs and other Punjabis, creating the sort of exclusively defined community behaviors and beliefs easily recognized as "religion" by Westerners and Western-educated Indians.

SIREN \ˈsɪ-rən\, in Greek mythology, creature half-bird and half-woman who lured sailors to destruction by the sweetness of her song. According to Homer there were two Sirens on an island in the western sea between Aea and the rocks of Scylla. Later the number was usually increased to three. They were variously said to be the daughters of the sea god Phorcys or of the river god Achelous.

ODYSSEUS, advised by CIRCE, escaped their lure by stopping the ears of his crew with wax; he had himself tied to the mast so that he could not steer the ship out of course. Another story relates that when the ARGONAUTS sailed that way, ORPHEUS sang so divinely that none of them listened to the Sirens. In later legend, after one or other of these failures the Sirens committed suicide.

The Sirens may originally have developed from an imported Near Eastern image of a bird-woman. Anthropologists explain the Near Eastern image as a soul-bird—i.e., a winged ghost that stole the living to share its fate. In that respect the Sirens had affinities with the Harpies.

SIRHINDĪ, SHAYKH AHMAD \sir-ˈhin-dē\ (b. 1564?, Sirhind, Patiala, India—d. 1624, Sirhind), Indian mystic and theologian who was largely responsible for the reassertion and revival in India of scripturalist Sunni ISLAM as a reaction against the inclusivist religious tendencies prevalent during the reign of the Mughal emperor AKBAR.

SHAYKH AHMAD, who through his paternal line traced his descent from the CALIPH ʿUmar I (the second caliph of Islam), received a traditional Islamic education at home and later at Siālkot (now in Pakistan). He reached maturity when Akbar, the renowned Mughal emperor, attempted to unify his empire by forming a new syncretistic faith (Dīn-e-Ilāhī), which sought to combine the various mystical forms of belief and religious practices of the many communities making up his empire.

Shaykh AHMAD joined the mystical order NAQSHBANDĪYA, the most important of the Indian Sufi orders (see SUFISM), in 1593–94. He spent his life preaching against the inclination of Akbar and his successor, Jahāngīr (1605–27), toward PAN-THEISM and SHĪʿITE Islam. Of his several written works, the most famous is Maktūbāt, a compilation of his letters written in Persian to his friends in India and the region north of the Oxus River. In refuting the extreme monistic position of waḥdat al-wujūd (the concept of divine existential unity of God and the world, and hence humans), he advanced the notion of waḥdat ash-shuhūd (the concept of unity of vision). According to this doctrine, there exists only a subjective experience of unity, which occurs only in the mind of the believer; it has no objective counterpart in the real world. The former position, he felt, led to pantheism, which was contrary to SUNNI tenets.

His posthumous title Mujaddid-e Alf-e Sānī ("Renovator of the Second Millennium") was a reference to the fact that he lived at the beginning of the second millennium of the Muslim calendar. His teachings were not always popular in official circles. In 1619, by the orders of the emperor Jahāngīr who was offended by his aggressive opposition to Shīʿite views, Shaykh AHMAD was temporarily imprisoned in the fortress at Gwalior. His burial place at Sirhind is still a site of PILGRIMAGE.

SISYPHUS \ˈsɪ-sə-fəs\, in Greek mythology, cunning king of Corinth who was punished in HADES by having repeatedly to roll a huge stone up a hill only to have it roll down again as soon as he had brought it to the summit. This fate is related in the Odyssey. In the Iliad Sisyphus, living at Ephyre (later Corinth), was the son of AEOLUS and the father of GLAUCUS. In post-Homeric times he was called the father of ODYSSEUS. Sisyphus was the reputed founder of the ISTHMIAN GAMES. Later legend related that when Death came to fetch him, Sisyphus chained him up so that no one died until ARES came to aid Death, and Sisyphus had to submit. In the meantime, Sisyphus had told his wife, Merope, not to perform the usual sacrifices and to leave his body unburied. Thus, when he reached the Underworld he was permitted to return to punish her for the omission. Once back at home, he continued to live to a ripe old age before dying a second time.

SĪTĀ \sē-ī-tā\, also called Jānakī (Sanskrit: “Furrow”), in Hindu mythology, the consort of RĀMA and the embodiment of wifely devotion and self-surrender, yet also, on occasion, of defiance. Her abduction by the DEMON king RĀVAṆA and subsequent rescue are the central incidents in the great Hindu epic, the RĀMĀYAṆA.

Sītā sprang from a furrow when King Janaka was plowing his field. Rāma won her as his bride by bending Shiva’s bow, and she accompanied Rāma when he went into exile. When carried away to Laṅkā by Rāvaṇa, she kept herself chaste throughout her long imprisonment. On her return she asserted her purity and proved it by voluntarily undergoing an ordeal by fire. Rāma, however, banished her to the forest in deference to public opinion. There she gave birth to their two children, Kuśa and Lava. After they reached maturity and were acknowledged by Rāma to be his sons, she called upon her mother, Earth, to swallow her up.

Sītā is worshiped as the incarnation of LAKṢMĪ, the consort of VISHNU. Surveys have shown her to be the single most highly revered figure in the Hindu pantheon. Symbol of the sufferings and strengths of women, she is often regarded as exemplifying even higher standards of DHARMA (duty) and BHAKTI (love) than her celebrated husband. So central is her story to the Rāmāyaṇa that in many performances and retellings, especially those of women, that epic could more fittingly be described as a Sītāyaṇa.

ŚIVĀJĪ \shi-‘vā-jē\, also spelled Shivājī (b. Feb. 19, 1630, or April 1627, Shivner, Pune, India—d. April 3, 1680, Rājgarh), Indian king (reigned 1674–80), founder of the Marāthā kingdom of India. This kingdom’s security was based on religious toleration and on the functional integration of the BRAHMINS, Marāthās, and Prabhus.

Śivājī was descended from a line of prominent nobles. India at that time was under Muslim rule: the Mughals in the north and the Muslim SULTANS of Bijāpur and Golkundā in the south. Śivājī found the Muslim oppression and religious persecution of the Hindus so intolerable that, by the time he was 16, he had already convinced himself that he was the divinely appointed instrument of the cause of Hindu freedom—a conviction that was to sustain him throughout his life.

Collecting a band of followers, he began in about 1655 to seize territory from the Muslims. His depredations grew increasingly audacious, and a series of expeditions sent to chastise him proved ineffective. Ultimately faced with an army said to number 100,000 men, Śivājī was compelled to sue for peace; he and his son were placed under house arrest, where they lived under the threat of execution. They were, however, able to escape on Aug. 17, 1666, hiding in enormous baskets of sweets that Śivājī had delivered to the poor. His followers welcomed him back as their leader, and within two years he had expanded his domain. He collected tribute from Mughal districts and plundered their rich mart; he reorganized the army and instituted reforms for the welfare of his subjects; and he began the building of a naval force for trade and defense.

In the summer of 1674 Śivājī had himself enthroned with great fanfare as an independent sovereign. The Hindu majority rallied to him as their leader. He ruled his domain for six years, through a cabinet of eight ministers. A devout Hindu who prided himself on being a protector of his religion, he also respected the beliefs and protected the places of worship of both Christians and Muslims. Many Muslims were in his service.

Śivājī’s last years were shadowed by the defection of his elder son, Śambājī, to the Mughals. Śambājī was reconciled to his father only with the utmost difficulty. The strain of guarding his kingdom from its enemies in the face of bitter domestic strife and discord among his ministers hastened Śivājī’s end. He died after an illness in April 1680, in the mountain stronghold of Rājgarh, which he had made his capital.

SIYYUM \sē-‘yūm, ‘sē-ūm\ (Hebrew: “termination”), in JUDAISM, celebration, either when a study group completes a tractate of the TALMUD or when the writing of a TORAH scroll is completed.

The study of the Talmud is frequently arranged so that a tractate can be finished on the eve of PASSOVER (Pesah). Because a special meal (se’uddat mitzva) follows a study of the final passage, the firstborn is exempt from his usual fast on that day. When a Torah scroll is near completion, males are generally allowed the privilege of writing one of the final letters on the sacred manuscript. This event is followed by a celebration.

SKADI \‘skä-thē\, Old Norse Skaoi, in Norse mythology (see GERMANIC RELIGION), giantess wife of the sea god Njörd. In order to avenge the death of her father, the giant Thiazi, Skadi attacked the rival tribe of the gods (the AESIR) in ASGARD, home of the gods. The Aesir, wanting to appease her anger, offered her the choice of one of their number for a husband, with the stipulation that she choose a god by his knees (or feet) alone. She chose Njörd, thinking that he was Balder; their marriage failed because Njörd preferred to live by the sea, and Skadi was happier in her father’s home in the mountains (Thrymheim). In some sources, Skadi was known as the goddess of snowshoes. Another tradition relates that Skadi bore sons to the god ODIN.

SKANDA \‘skən-də\, also called Kārttikeya, Kumāra, or Subrahmanya, Hindu god of war and the first-born son of SHIVA. The gods wished for Skanda to be born in order to destroy the DEMON Tāraka, who had been granted a boon that he could only be killed by a son of Shiva. Shiva, however, was lost in meditation and was not attracted to PĀRVATĪ until struck by an arrow from the bow of KĀMA, the god of love. After the many years of abstinence Shiva's seed was so strong that the gods feared the result, and some accounts say it was deposited into the fire (from which comes the name Skanda, in Sanskrit: "Spurt of Semen").

One tradition has it that Skanda was reared by, or was even the son of, the Kṛttikās, six wives of ṛṣis who as stars make up the Pleiades, hence the name Kārttikeya ("Son of Kṛttikās"). He developed his six faces to drink the milk of his six nurses. He is also often depicted as a six-headed child held by his mother Pārvatī and accompanied by his brother GAṆEŚA. He is called Kumāra (Sanskrit: "Youth," "Boy") because he never married and in YOGA represents the power of chastity. He has enormous strength and is sometimes shown leading the army of the gods.

In South India, where the god originated as Murukaṅ before merging with the North Indian Skanda, he has a large following under the name Subrahmaṇya ("Dear to the Brāhmaṇas"), and he is also important among Hindus residing in Southeast Asia.

SKANDHA \ˈskən-də\ (Sanskrit: "aggregates"), Pāli khandha \ˈkən-də\, according to Buddhist thought, the five elements that constitute an individual's mental and physical existence. The self cannot be identified with any one of the parts, nor is it the total of the parts. They are: (1) matter (rūpa), the manifest form of the four elements—earth, air, fire, and water; (2) sensations (vedanā); (3) perceptions of sense objects (Sanskrit: saṃjñā; Pāli: saññā); (4) mental formations (SANSKĀRAS, or sankhāras); and (5) consciousness (viññāna, or viññāna). All individuals are subject to constant change, as the elements of consciousness are never the same. The individual may be compared to a river, which retains an identity though the drops of water that make it up are different from one moment to the next.

SKULL CULT, veneration of human skulls, usually those of ancestors, by various prehistoric and some modern peoples. Begun as early as the Early Paleolithic Period, the practice of preserving and honoring the skull apart from the rest of the skeleton continued in different forms throughout prehistoric times. Most authorities agree that the skulls were cleaned and set up for worship after death. Prehistoric peoples also paid special attention to animal skulls. This practice is believed to have been a type of hunting magic, whereas the human skulls were honored with the reverence accorded to heroic ancestors.

SLAVIC RELIGION, beliefs and practices of the ancient Slavic peoples of eastern Europe. Slavs are usually subdivided into East Slavs (Russians, Ukrainians, and Belarusians), West Slavs (Poles, Czechs, Slovaks, and Lusatians [Sorbs]), and South Slavs (Serbs, Croats, Slovenes, Macedonians, and Bulgars).

Cosmogony. A myth known to all Slavs tells how God ordered a handful of sand to be brought up from the bottom of the sea and created the land from it. Usually it is the Devil who brings up the sand, in Slovenia it is God himself. The 12th-century German missionary Helmold of Bosau recorded his surprise in encountering among the Slavs on the Baltic a belief in a single heavenly God, who ignored the affairs of this world, having delegated the governance of it to certain spirits begotten by him (see DEUS OTIOSUS).

This is the only instance in which the sources allude to a hierarchy of divinities.

Divine beings. The 12th- to 13th-century Kiev Chronicle (Povest vremennykh let) enumerates seven Russian pre-Christian divinities: PERUN, Volos, Khors, DAZHBOG, STRIBOG, Simargla, and Mokosh. An earlier Russian text mentions SVAROG, apparently the son of Dazhbog. Of all these figures only two, Perun and Svarog, are at all likely to have been common to all the Slavs.

Common to Slavic Eurasia is a divinity called Zcerneboch (or Chernobog), the Black God, and Tiarnoglofi, the Black Head (Mind or Brain). The Black God survives in numerous Slavic curses, and the aid of the White God is sought to obtain protection or mercy in Bulgaria, Serbia, and Pomerania. This religious DUALISM of white and black gods is common to practically all the peoples of Eurasia.

In Estonia the prophet ELIJAH is considered to be the successor to UKKO, the ancient spirit of lightning. Similarly, the prophet Elijah replaces Elwa in Georgia and Zeus in Greece. It is therefore probable that, among the Slavs also, Elijah is to be considered a successor of Perun. According to a popular Serbian tradition, God gave the lightning to Elijah when he decided to retire from governing the world. The Serbian story agrees with Helmold's description of the distribution of offices by an inactive God. Elijah is a severe and peevish saint. It is rare that his feast day passes without some ill fortune. Fires—even spontaneous combustion—are blamed on him.

A similar complex may be seen if the Slavic Perun is equated with Perkunas, the lightning deity of the Lithuanians. In Latvia, creatures with black fur or plumage were sacrificed to Perkons, as they were to the fire god Agni in ancient India. Such deities are therefore generic deities of fire, not specifically celestial and even less to be regarded as supreme. Scholarly efforts to place Perun at the center of Slavic religion and to create around him a pantheon of dei-ties of the Greco-Roman type cannot yield appreciable results. Russian sources treat Svarog, present as Zuarasici among the Liutici of Rethra (an ancient locality in eastern Germany), as a god of the drying-house fire. But the Belarussians of Chernigov, when lighting the drying-house fire, invoke Perun and not Svarog, as if Svarog (apparently from svar, "litigation" or "dispute," perhaps referring to the friction between the pieces of wood used to produce ignition) were an appellation of Perun.

Places of worship. Though the idols of which the Russian chronicles speak appear to have been erected outdoors, the German chronicles provide detailed descriptions of enclosed sacred places and temples among the Baltic Slavs. Such enclosures were walled and were usually of triangular shape at the confluence of two rivers, fortified with earthwork and palisades. Religious buildings contained wooden structures including a cell for the statue of a god, also made of wood and sometimes covered in metal. These representations, all anthropomorphic, very often had supernumerary body parts—e.g., seven arms or three or five heads (Triglavus, Suantevitus, and Porenutius, respectively). The temples were in the custody of priests, who enjoyed prestige and authority even in the eyes of the chiefs and received tribute and shares of military booty. HUMAN SACRIFICES, including eviscerations, decapitations, and TREPANNING (drilling of a hole into the human skull), had a propitiatory role in securing abundance and victory. One enclosure might contain up to four temples; those at Szczecin (Stettin), in northwestern Poland, were erected in close proximity to each other. They were visited annually by the whole population of the surrounding district, who brought oxen and sheep to be butchered. The boiled meat was distributed to all the participants without regard to sex or age. Dances and plays, sometimes humorous, enlivened the festival.

Communal banquets and related practices. The custom of communal banquets has been preserved into modern times in Russia in the bratchina (from brat, "brother"), in the mol'ba ("entreaty" or "supplication"), and in the kanun (a short religious service); in the Serbian slava ("glorification"); and in the sobor ("assembly") and kurban ("victim" or "prey") of Bulgaria. In Russia the feasts are dedicated to the memory of a deceased person or to the patron saint of the village and in Serbia to the protecting saint from whom the rod or pleme ("clan") took its name. In the Serbian seoska slava, or "slava of the village," the whole community participates and consumes in common the flesh of the victims prepared in the open air. In Russia sometimes the animals (or their flesh) are first brought into the church and perfumed with incense. The social unit sought to secure for itself the favor of a powerful figure of the past, or even of more than one, representing them in several forms on the same pillar or giving to their statues supernumerary body parts that would express their superhuman powers. A hollow bronze idol, probably ancient Russian, was found at Ryazan, Russia. The idol has four faces with a fifth face on its breast. The eastern Finns and the Ugrians venerated their dead in the same way, representing them as polycephalic (multiple-headed), and also held communal banquets in their honor.

Until the 19th century there survived here and there throughout the Danubian-Balkan region the custom of reopening graves three, five, or seven years after interment, taking out the bones of the corpses, washing them, wrapping them in new linen, and reintering them. In protohistoric times the tumuli (BURIAL MOUNDS) of the mortuaries of the Krivichi (a populous tribe of the East Slavs of the northwest)—the so-called long kurgans—contained cinerary urns buried in the TUMULUS together and all at one time. Such a practice could occur only as the consequence of collective and simultaneous CREMATION. There must, therefore, have existed a periodic cremation season or date, in preparation for which the corpses were temporarily exhumed.

SLEIPNIR \ˈslāp-nir\, in Norse mythology, the god Odin's magical horse. The offspring of LOKI, disguised as a mare, and SVADILFARI, the stallion of a giant, Sleipnir had eight legs and could ride in the air.

SMĀRTA SECT \ˈsmār-tə\, orthodox Hindu sect composed primarily of BRAHMINS characterized by their allegiance to all the gods of the Hindu pantheon and by their adherence to rules of ritual and of conduct laid down in the ancient SŪTRA texts.

The sūtras followed by the Smārta sect form part of the SMRTI, a class of sacred texts that are considered to be of human authorship. Their greatest teacher and, according to some, the founder of the sect was the 8th-century philosopher ŚANKARA. The monastery he founded at Sringeri, in Karnataka (formerly Mysore state), continues to be the center of the sect, and the head of the monastery, the jagadguru ("teacher of the world"), is the spiritual authority of the Smārtas in south India and Gujarāt and one of the chief religious personages in India.

The Smārtas pay allegiance in their worship to the five gods they regard as primary—SHIVA, VISHNU, ŚAKTI, SŪRYA, and GAṆEŚA—in the pañcāyatana pūjā ("five-shrines worship"), though Shiva is particularly favored among them today. They are active in all branches of learning and have earned the honorary title of śāstrī (Sanskrit: "men of learning"), or, in Tamil, ayyar, which often follows their names.

SMITH, JOSEPH \ˈsmith\ (b. Dec. 23, 1805, Sharon, Vt., U.S.—d. June 27, 1844, Carthage, Ill.), American prophet whose writings, along with the BIBLE, provide the theological foundation of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints and other MORMON denominations.

Smith grew up in western New York at a time of intense religious REVIVALISM. He was a literate but unschooled child, remembered by his neighbors as a diviner who dug for buried treasure. One day in the woods, at the age of 14, Joseph Smith experienced an intense spiritual revelation of God and JESUS CHRIST. In 1827 he claimed that an ANGEL had directed him to buried golden plates whose engraved surfaces contained a history of the American Indians describing them as descendants of the lost tribes of Hebrews who centuries earlier had sailed to North America by way of the Pacific. This BOOK OF MORMON he translated from "reformed Egyptian" with the aid of special stones. Published in 1830, the book was offered as scientific evidence of his divine calling. Most non-Mormon scholars, however, regard the book as a collection of local legends of Indian origin, fragments of autobiography, and current religious and political controversies (especially that connected with the Anti-Masonic movement).

Smith claimed that the church that he organized on April 6, 1830, at Fayette, N.Y., restored the ancient, primitive Christian religion. The converts whom it attracted followed him from New York to Ohio, Missouri, and Illinois, as their neighbors were suspicious of the Mormons' unorthodox cooperative society ruled by an ecclesiastical oligarchy. Non-Mormons were also hostile toward the sect's practice of polygamy. Although Smith's revelation on this subject was not made public until 1852, and it is not supported in the Book of Mormon, there is evidence that he may have married as many as 50 wives. Publicly, however, he acknowledged only his first, Emma Hale Smith, who bore him nine children.

Smith governed by announcing periodic revelations on widely divergent matters. He combined elements of Jewish and Christian MYSTICISM with the goal of perpetual prosperity and sought to establish Mormonism as a complete way of life.

In 1839 Smith led his followers to Commerce, Ill., which he renamed Nauvoo. The Mormon population soon reached 20,000, making it the largest city in Illinois. Smith served as the city's mayor and commanded a part of the state militia, gaining a reputation as one of the West's most illustrious citizens.

In February 1844, when he announced his candidacy for the U.S. presidency, Mormon dissenters attacked him in their opposition newspaper on grounds of polygamy and political ambition. Smith ordered their press destroyed, and threats of mob violence followed. After Smith called out the Nauvoo militia to protect the town, he was charged with treason and imprisoned, along with his brother Hyrum. A mob of armed men with blackened faces stormed the jail on June 27 and murdered them both.

In addition to the Book of Mormon, the Latter-day Saints also use as scriptural sources Smith's Doctrine and Covenants (1835) and The Pearl of Great Price (1842).

SMITH, WILLIAM ROBERTSON (b. Nov. 8, 1846, Keig, Aberdeenshire, Scot.—d. March 31, 1894, Cambridge, Cambridgeshire, Eng.), encyclopedist, and scholar of Semitic languages, COMPARATIVE RELIGION, and social anthropology.

Smith was ordained a minister in 1870 on his appointment as professor of Oriental languages and Old Testament Exegesis at the Free Church College of Aberdeen. The authorities of the Free Church took strong exception to his early publications on biblical subjects; in 1877 they suspended him from his teaching duties. He was formally tried, and in 1880 the assembly dropped the indictment against him. After a second attack on his opinions, he was again suspended; in 1881 he was removed from his chair.

Appointed later that year as joint editor of Encyclopædia Britannica, he wrote The Old Testament in the Jewish Church (1881) and The Prophets of Israel (1882) and took academic positions at the University of Cambridge in 1883. His article "Sacrifice" (1886), his book Kinship and Marriage in Early Arabia (1885), and his most original work, Lectures on the Religion of the Semites (1889), are important landmarks in the study of comparative religion. works had a significant influence on such scholars as ÉMILE DURKHEIM and SIGMUND FREUD.

SMOHALLA \smə-'ha-lə\, also called Smowhola, Smoholler, Smokeholer, Smuxale, Snohallow, and Somahallie (b. c. 1815/20, Upper Columbia River, Oregon Country [U.S.]—d. 1895), North American Indian prophet, preacher, and teacher, one of a series of such leaders who arose in response to the encroachment of white settlers. He founded the Dreamers, a religious movement that emphasized traditional Indian values (see also NATIVE AMERICAN RELIGIONS).

Smohalla belonged to the Wanapum, a small Sahaptian-speaking tribe in what is now eastern Washington state. He grew up to become a celebrated MEDICINE MAN and warrior. After a fight with a rival, he left his home to travel and was away for several years. When he returned, he announced that he had died and been resurrected by God. He began to preach and by 1872 had a large following.

Smohalla taught that the Indians alone were real people, the first created, and that whites, blacks, and Chinese had been created later by God to punish the Indians for leaving their ancient ways. They must live as their fathers had done and, above all, not plow land or sign papers for land, which was against nature.

If they lived as their fathers had and followed the ritual of his Dreamer cult, they would be aided by the forces of nature, as well as by hordes of Indian dead who would be resurrected. God would drive away the non-Indians. The Dreamers got their name from the emphasis Smohalla placed on dreams sent to himself and his priests by God to direct them in the right ways. The ritual emphasized drumming, ringing of bells, and ecstatic dancing, all of which combined to bring on visions and exaltation.

Smohalla's influence spread among the Plateau Indians, Chief Joseph and the Nez Percé being among his most devoted followers. For a generation the cult was the greatest barrier to the U.S. government's efforts to settle the Indians of the region and to convert them to European ways, and it persisted for several years after Smohalla's death.

SMṚTI \ˈsmri-tē, ˈsmər-\ (Sanskrit: "recollection"), class of Hindu sacred literature in Sanskrit that is based on human memory, as distinct from Vedic literature, which is considered to be ŚRUTI, or revealed. Formally speaking, smṛti is said to elaborate, interpret, and codify authoritative Vedic thought, but in practice Hindus usually have a greater familiarity with smṛti SCRIPTURES than with Vedic śruti. Smṛti texts include the KALPA SŪTRAS (important religious manuals); the PURĀNAS (compilations of ancient myth, legends, and history); the BHAGAVAD GĪTĀ, and very importantly the RĀMĀYAṆA and MAHĀBHĀRATA epics. The term smṛti has come to refer particularly to texts relating to law and social conduct, such as the MANU-SMṚTI ("Tradition of Manu"). Vernacular texts, which surely constitute the great bulk of "scripture" held dear by Hindus, largely escape the śruti/smṛti distinction, although some (especially Tamil hymns) have been claimed as "vernacular Veda" and others have been identified as smṛti by the Sanskrit-knowing elite on grounds that only Sanskrit is the "language of the gods." Many dispute this point of view.

SMYTH, JOHN \ˈsmɪθ, ˈsmɪθ\, Smyth also spelled Smith (d. August 1612, Amsterdam), English religious libertarian and NONCONFORMIST minister, called "the Se-baptist" (self-baptizer), who is generally considered the founder of the organized BAPTISTS of England. He also influenced the Pilgrim Fathers who immigrated to North America in search of religious toleration in 1620.

Smyth studied at Christ's College, Cambridge, where he was a fellow during 1594–98. He was a city preacher in Lincoln from 1600 to 1602, but he renounced Anglicanism in 1606 and became minister at Gainsborough, Lincolnshire, to a group of Separatists. With John Robinson, the minister to the Pilgrims in England and later in Holland, Smyth helped organize Separatists in Nottinghamshire. In 1608 both Smyth and Robinson went with their followers to Amsterdam. Adopting Baptist principles there, Smyth baptized first himself and then others, including THOMAS HELWYS, later an influential London Baptist.

He frequently revised his convictions according to conscience, a characteristic that naturally caused divisions among his congregation. When excommunicated by that congregation, he sought in vain for a favorable reception from Dutch MENNONITES. He eventually rejected the doctrine of ORIGINAL SIN and asserted the right of every Christian to hold his own religious views. Among Smyth's works is The Differences of the Churches of the Separation (probably 1608 or 1609).

SNORRA EDDA \ˈsnōr-rə-ˈe-də\, or Younger Edda, or Prose Edda, work by Snorri Sturluson. See EDDA.

SOCIAL GOSPEL, American religious social-reform movement that was prominent from about 1870 to 1920, especially among liberal Protestant groups dedicated to the betterment of industrialized society. Especially important were the works of Charles Monroe Sheldon (e.g., In His Steps; "What Would Jesus Do?"; 1897) and WALTER RAUSCHENBUSCH (e.g., Christianity and the Social Crisis; 1907). Labor reforms—abolition of child labor, a shorter workweek, a living wage, and factory regulation—constituted the Social Gospel's most prominent concerns. During the 1930s many of these ideals were realized through the rise of organized labor and the legislation of the New Deal.

SOCIETY AND RELIGION, relation between cultural elements termed "religious" and the wider social context. It has often been stated, ever since the work of ÉMILE DURKHEIM, that religion is preeminently social. This means two things: that religion is not simply reducible to individual, subjective experiences, and that religion is not simply a representation, in symbolic form, of a particular social system. As the CASTE system illustrates, religion and society are inextricably intertwined. Accordingly, such an experience as a religious conversion must first of all be understood as a social fact, before the experience, causes, or transformations that take place in the event can be discussed. It is best, therefore, to think of religion and society in the same way we think of society and language: just as the notion of a "private language" is a contradiction in terms, there can be no such phenomenon as a "private religion." That is, we are born into performing a religion just as we are born into speaking or performing a language. Society and religion are thus two elements whose relations and structures constitute human life; it is the relations between the two elements that describe what we mean by community. SOCINUS, FAUSTUS \ˈfau-s-təs-sō-ˈsī-nəs, ˈfō-\, Italian Fausto (Paolo) Socini, Sozini, or Sozzini (b. Dec. 5, 1539, Siena [Italy]—d. March 3, 1604, Luśawice, Pol.), Italian-born lay theologian whose anti-Trinitarian teachings led to the founding of the Socinian sect and were later influential in the development of the theology of UNITARIANISM.

Socinus had no systematic education but early began to reject orthodox ROMAN CATHOLIC religious doctrines. He was denounced by the INQUISITION in 1559 and sought refuge until 1562 in Zürich. His first published work was an interpretation of the prologue of the Gospel According to John, in which he wrote of Christ as divine by office rather than by nature. After fifteen years in Florence and Basel living in outward conformity to the Roman Catholic church, he wrote De Jesu Christo servatore (completed 1578, published 1594), his most important work.

Central to Socinus' teaching was the attainment of eternal life through the study of divinely revealed SCRIPTURE. He saw Christ as a real man, though without SIN, who by his suffering taught men how to bear their own sufferings. In his view, faith is more than the belief that the teaching of Christ is true; faith also results in repentance for sins and in an obedience that leads to eternal life.

From 1587 to 1598 Socinus lived in Kraków, but in the latter year an enraged mob tried to take his life, and he took refuge at the neighboring village of Luśawice, where he spent his final years. His incomplete work, Christianae religionis institutio, is possibly the basis for the Racovian CATECHISM (1605), which is a thorough exposition of Socinian thought.

Unitarian theology, particularly the doctrines of the person and work of Christ, was greatly influenced by the introduction of Socinian writings to England in the 17th century.

SODOM AND GOMORRAH \ˈsā-dəm . . . gə-ˈmôr-ə\, notoriously sinful cities in the biblical Book of GENESIS; sexual acts attributed to the Sodomites gave the city's name to the modern term sodomy. Sodom and Gomorrah constituted, along with the cities of Admah, Zeboim, and Zoar (Bela), the five biblical "cities of the plain." Destroyed by "brimstone and fire" because of their wickedness (Genesis 19:24), Sodom and Gomorrah presumably were devastated by an earthquake about 1900 BCE. The cities are now possibly covered by the shallow waters south of Al-Lisān, a peninsula near the southern end of the Dead Sea in Israel.

Archaeological evidence indicates that the area was once fertile in the Middle Bronze Age (c. 2000–1500 BCE), with sufficient fresh water to sustain agriculture. Because of the fertile land, the biblical Lot, the nephew of the Hebrew patriarch ABRAHAM, selected the area of the cities of the Valley of Siddim (the Salt Sea, or the Dead Sea) to graze his flocks.

SOFER \sō-ˈfer, ˈsō-fər\ (Hebrew: "scribe"), also spelled sopher, plural soferim, or sopherim \sō-fe-ˈrēm\, any of a group of Jewish scholars who interpreted and taught biblical law and ethics from about the 5th century BCE to about 200 BCE, the first of the soferim was the biblical prophet EZRA. Previously the word had designated an important administrator connected with the Temple but without religious status. Ezra and his disciples initiated a tradition of rabbinic scholarship that remains to this day a fundamental feature of JUDAISM. Historically, the soferim are credited with initiating rabbinic studies, fixing the canon of OLD TESTAMENT scriptures, and, as copyists and editors, working to safeguard the purity of the original text.

Under foreign rule, the Jews enjoyed cultural autonomy and were allowed to govern themselves under the constitution of the Law of MOSES. The soferim became experts in the Law, applying the idealistic aspirations of the TORAH and ORAL TRADITION to the exigencies of daily life. With the decline of the soferim, their tradition of biblical scholarship was largely taken over by the PHARISEES and, in later generations, by the tannaim, amoraim, and geonim (see TANNA, AMORA, and GAON). The soferim disappeared about the 2nd century BCE; the “scribes” of the NEW TESTAMENT (often referred to in connection with the Pharisees) were doctors of the law, or jurists (usually called hakhamim), who gave advice to judges entrusted with legal administration.

Over time, sofer came to mean one who taught the BIBLE to children; it could also signify a copyist, notary, or calligrapher qualified to write Torah scrolls or other religious documents. The Talmud BAVLI (c. 500 CE) has a soferim tractate that stipulates how such work is to be performed. Modern Hebrew translates sofer as a “man of letters.”

SŌKA-GAKKAI \ˈsō-kä-ˈgäk-,kī\ (Japanese: “Value-Creation Society”), lay religious group associated with the Japanese Buddhist sect Nichiren-shō-shū (see NICHIREN). Sōka-gakkai is the most successful of the new religious movements of the 20th century in Japan; but insofar as it draws upon the teachings of the Buddhist saint Nichiren, it belongs to a tradition dating from the 13th century.

The Sōka-gakkai follows an intensive policy of conversion (shakubuku, literally, “break and subdue”). Membership increased within a seven-year period (1951–57) from 3,000 to 765,000 families; in the early 21st century the group claimed a membership of more than 12,000,000. In 1964 Sōka-gakkai established its own political party, Kōmeitō (Clean Government Party), which by the 1980s had become the third largest political party in Japan. In the late 1990s Kōmeitō was renamed the New Komeito party.

The association was founded in 1930 by Makiguchi Tsunesaburō under the name Sōka-kyōiku-gakkai (“Value-Creation Educational Society”). The society suffered from the government’s repressive policies during World War II and for a time was disbanded. Makiguchi died in detention during this period. His chief disciple, Toda Jōsei, revived the organization in 1946, renaming it Sōka-gakkai.

In common with other Nichiren movements, Sōka-gakkai places great emphasis on the LOTUS SUTRA.

SŌKKURAM \ˈsōk-ˈkür-ˈäm\, Buddhist artificial-cave temple on the crest of Mount T’oham, near the Pulguk Temple, Kyōngju, South Korea. Built in the 8th century, Sōkkuram is a domed circular structure of granite blocks. A square anteroom houses eight guardian figures in relief. On an elevated lotus pedestal a large statue of the BUDDHA GOTAMA (or AMITĀBHA, according to some) seated, about 11.5 feet high, carved out of a single block of granite, occupies the center of the main chamber. On the surrounding walls are 15 slabs in relief depicting BODHISATTVAS and 10 disciples in attendance. The sculpture of this cave temple is one of the finest achievements of Buddhist art in the East.

SOL \ˈsäl\, in ROMAN RELIGION, name of two distinct sun gods at Rome. The original Sol, or Sol Indiges, had a shrine on the Quirinal, an annual sacrifice on August 9, and another shrine, together with Luna, in the Circus Maximus.

After the importation of various sun cults from Syria, the Roman emperor Elagabalus (reigned 218–222 CE) built a temple to Sol Invictus on the Palatine and attempted to make his worship the principal religion at Rome. The emperor Aurelian (reigned 270–275) later reestablished the worship and erected a magnificent temple to Sol in the Campus Agrippae. The worship of Sol as special protector of the emperors and of the empire remained the chief imperial cult until the rise of CHRISTIANITY.

SOLAR DEITY, divinity conceived of as sovereign, all-seeing and usually active in terrestrial life, often identified with the supreme deity of a culture or with the ruler.

SOLOMON \ˈsä-lə-mən\, Hebrew Shlomo (fl. mid-10th century BCE), son and successor of DAVID and traditionally regarded as the greatest king of ISRAEL. He maintained his dominions with military strength and established Israelite colonies outside his kingdom’s borders. The crowning achievement of his vast building program was the famous temple at his capital, Jerusalem (see TEMPLE OF JERUSALEM).

Nearly all that is factually known of Solomon comes from the BIBLE (especially 1 Kings 1–11 and 2 Chronicles 1–9). His father, David, was a self-made king, who founded the Judaeen dynasty and carved out an empire from the border of Egypt to the Euphrates River. In addition, he made common cause with King Hiram of Tyre, forming a land and sea alliance that endured into Solomon’s reign. Solomon’s mother was BATHSHEBA, formerly the wife of David’s Hittite general, Uriah. It was only through her efforts, in concert with the prophet Nathan, that Solomon, who was younger than several of his brothers, was anointed king while David was still alive.

Empire builder. As soon as he acceded to the throne, Solomon consolidated his position by liquidating his opponents ruthlessly, one by one. Once rid of his foes, he established his friends in the key posts of the military, governmental, and religious institutions. Solomon also strengthened his position through marital alliances. Although the astonishing harem of Solomon—700 wives and 300 concubines—recorded in 1 Kings is no doubt an exaggeration of popular tradition, the figures do indicate his position as a grand monarch. Such a ménage brought prestige as well as pleasure; in addition, the marriages were a form of diplomacy.

The passage in 2 Chronicles 8 recounts Solomon’s successful military operations in Syria, where his targets included Tadmor-Palmyra, a caravan oasis city in the desert, midway between Syria and Mesopotamia. His aim was the control of a great overland trading route. To consolidate his interests in the province, he planted Israelite colonies to look after military, administrative, and commercial matters. This network of Solomon’s far-flung trading posts would eventually form the nucleus of the first great JEWISH DIASPORA.

Palestine was strategically located for trade by land and sea. By land, it connects Asia and Africa, with ports on the Atlantic-Mediterranean and Red Sea–Indian Ocean waters. The nature of Solomon’s empire was predominantly commercial, and so it served him and friendly rulers to increase trade by land and sea. A celebrated episode in the reign of Solomon is the visit of the Queen of Sheba. Her southern Arabian kingdom lay along the Red Sea route into the Indian Ocean, and her terrain was rich in gold, frankincense, and myrrh. Solomon needed her products and her trade routes for maintaining his commercial network; she needed Solomon's cooperation for marketing her goods in the Mediterranean via his Palestinian ports.

Solomon's Temple. The demand for fortresses and garrison cities throughout his homeland and empire made it necessary for Solomon to embark on a vast building program; the prosperity of the nation made such a program possible. He was especially lavish with his capital, Jerusalem, where he erected a city wall, a construction called the Millo, the royal palace, and the famous Temple. Around Jerusalem, he built facilities, including shrines, for the main groups of foreigners on trading missions in Israel. Later generations, in less secure and less prosperous times, destroyed those shrines in a parochial spirit that could not accommodate itself to Solomon's ecumenical outlook.

The vigor of Solomon's building program made it oppressive. Men had to put in one month out of every three in forced labor. In theory, such labor was to be performed by the Canaanites—not by the noble Hebrew tribesmen, who were supposed to be the administrators, priests, and fighters. But Solomon's demands were such that there were not enough Canaanites to go around, so that Israelites were forced to do menial labor for the crown.

Solomon was a vigorous administrator, and he reorganized the old division of the nation into 12 tribes into 12 administrative districts, deviating, for the most part, from the tribal boundaries. The figure of 12 was retained because each district was to "support the palace" (i.e., shoulder federal obligations) for one of the 12 months in the year. Each district had its royally appointed governor, and a chief ruled over the 12 governors. Another important but unpopular appointee of the king was the chief of taxation; taxes were exacted most commonly in the form of forced labor and in kind (taxes paid in a commodity, such as grain).

His legendary wisdom. Solomon also became famous as a sage. The biblical Book of Proverbs contains collections of aphorisms and other wise teachings attributed to him. He was also famed as a poet who composed 1,005 songs, and the biblical Song of Solomon is (spuriously) attributed to him in the opening verse. Post-biblical tradition attributed later works to him: the apocryphal Wisdom of Solomon and the Odes of Solomon and Psalms of Solomon are tributes to him as sage and poet, respectively.

Decline of the kingdom. During Solomon's reign, it is suspected that the increase in Israel's wealth was matched by an increase in extravagance and that the wealth was not diffused to the people. It is also considered possible that Solomon's treatment of the northern tribes showed favoritism to his own tribe of JUDAH. When his son Rehoboam succeeded him, the northern tribes wanted to know his policy concerning the burdens borne by the people. Rehoboam ill-advisedly announced a harsher course, whereupon the northern tribes seceded and formed their own Kingdom of Israel, leaving the descendants of Solomon with the southern Kingdom of Judah. Thus Solomon's empire was lost beyond recall, and even the homeland was split into two, often hostile, kingdoms.

SOLOVYOV, VLADIMIR SERGEYEVICH \sə-lə-'vyóv\, also spelled Soloviev [b. Jan. 16 [Jan. 28, New Style], 1853, Moscow, Russia—d. July 31 [Aug. 13], 1900, Uzkoye, near Moscow], Russian philosopher and mystic who, reacting to European rationalist thought, attempted a synthesis of religious philosophy, science, and ethics in the context of a universal CHRISTIANITY uniting the EASTERN ORTHODOX and ROMAN CATHOLIC churches under papal leadership.

He was the son of the historian Sergey M. Solovyov. After a basic education in languages, history, and philosophy at his Orthodox home, he took his doctorate at Moscow University in 1874 with the dissertation "The Crisis of Western Philosophy: Against the Positivists." After travels in the West, he wrote a second thesis, a critique of abstract principles, and accepted a teaching post at the University of St. Petersburg, where he delivered his celebrated lectures on "Godmanhood" (1880). This appointment was later rescinded because of Solovyov's clemency appeal for the March 1881 assassins of Tsar Alexander II. He also encountered official opposition to his writings and to his activity in promoting the union of Eastern Orthodoxy with the Roman Catholic church.

Solovyov criticized Western empiricist and idealist philosophy for attributing absolute significance to partial insights and abstract principles. Drawing on the writings of Benedict de Spinoza and G.W.F. Hegel, he regarded life as a dialectical process, involving the interaction of knowledge and reality through conflicting tensions. Assuming the ultimate unity of Absolute Being, termed God in the Judeo-Christian tradition, Solovyov proposed that the world's multiplicity, which had originated in a single creative source, was undergoing a process of reintegration with that source. Solovyov asserted, by his concept of Godmanhood, that the unique intermediary between the world and God could only be man, who alone is the vital part of nature capable of knowing and expressing the divine idea of "absolute unitotality" in the chaotic multiplicity of real experience. Consequently, the perfect revelation of God is Christ's INCARNATION in human nature.

For Solovyov, ethics became a dialectical problem of basing the morality of human acts and decisions on the extent of their contribution to the world's integration with ultimate divine unity, a theory expressed in his The Meaning of Love (1894).

SOMA \sō-mə\, in ancient Indian cult worship, unidentified plant, the juice of which was a fundamental offering of the Vedic sacrifices. The stalks of the plant were pressed between stones, and the juice was filtered through sheep's wool and then mixed with water and milk. After first being offered as a LIBATION to the gods, the remainder of the soma was consumed by the priests and the sacrificer. It was highly valued for its exhilarating, probably hallucinogenic, effect. The personified deity Soma was the "master of plants," the healer of disease, and the bestower of riches.

The soma plant grows in the mountains, but its true origin is believed to be heaven, whence it was brought to earth by an eagle, and the pressing of soma was associated with the fertilizing rain. In the post-Vedic classical period, soma is identified with the moon, which wanes when soma is drunk by the gods but which is periodically reborn.

SOMNĀTH \sōm-'nät\, also called Pātan-Somnāth, or Somnāth-Patān, ancient ruined city, southwestern Gujarāt state, west-central India. It is the site of the temple of Śiva as Somanātha (which means "lord of the SOMA" and, by extension, "lord of the moon"). The temple was sacked by the Turkic Muslim invader Maḥmud of Ghazna in 1024–25 CE.

Reconstructed in 1169, it was destroyed again in the final Muslim invasions of the late 13th century. Subsequently rebuilt and destroyed on several occasions, it was reconstructed again beginning in 1951. According to an ancient tradition in the MAHĀBHĀRATA, Somnāth was the scene of the internecine massacre of the Yādava clan and of the subsequent death of KRISHNA. Recent excavations there have revealed a settlement dating from about 1500 BCE.

SORANUS \sō-'rā-nəs\, in ROMAN RELIGION, Underworld deity worshiped on Mount Soracte in southern Etruria. As priests, the hirpi Sorani celebrated a rite in which they marched barefoot over burning coals. Soranus was identified with Dis, the Roman god of the underworld, and he also had a female partner, Feronia, a goddess of uncertain attributes.

SORCERY, use of power gained from the assistance or control of spirits. Sorcery is distinguished by some writers from WITCHCRAFT in that it may be practiced by anyone with the appropriate knowledge, using charms, SPELLS, potions, and the like; whereas witchcraft is considered to result from an inherent mystical power, often inherited, and to be practiced by invisible means. During the witch-hunts of the 16th and 17th centuries, courts frequently regarded witches and sorcerers alike as candidates for burning.

SOTERIA \sō-te-'rē-ə\ (from Greek: "Deliverance"), in HELLENISTIC RELIGIONS, any sacrifice or series of sacrifices performed either in commemoration of or in expectation of deliverance from a crisis; also used for a large-scale commemorative festival held at planned intervals. Sixteen Soteria festivals are known; the most famous was that at DELPHI celebrating the defeat of the Celts in 279–278 BCE.

SŌTŌ \sō-tō\, Chinese Ts'ao-tung \t'saü-'dün\, largest of the ZEN Buddhist sects in Japan. It follows the method of quiet and meditation (zazen) as a means of obtaining Enlightenment. The sect was founded in China in the 9th century by Liang-chieh and Pen-chi. It was transmitted to Japan in the 13th century by DŌGEN and further popularized in the 13th–14th century by Keizan.

The headquarters of the sect are the Eihei Temple (founded in 1244 in what is now Fukui prefecture) and the Sōji Temple (founded in 1321 in what is now Ishikawa prefecture and moved in 1911 to Yokohama). Compare RINZAI.

SOUL, immaterial aspect or essence of a human being, conjoined with the body and separable at death.

Many cultures have recognized some incorporeal principle of human life or existence corresponding to the soul, and many have attributed souls to all living things. There is evidence even among prehistoric peoples of a belief in an aspect distinct from the body and residing in it. Different religions and philosophers have developed a variety of theories as to its nature, its relationship to the body, and its origin and mortality.

Both the Egyptians and the ancient Chinese conceived of a dual soul. The Egyptian KA (breath) survived death but remained near the body, while the spiritual BA proceeded to the region of the dead. The Chinese distinguished between a lower, sensitive soul, which disappears with death, and a rational principle, the hun, which is the object of ANCESTOR WORSHIP. The early Hebrews apparently had a concept of the soul, related to the concept of breath, but established no distinction between the ethereal soul and the corporeal body; later Jewish writers would develop the idea of the soul further.

Ancient Greek concepts of the soul varied considerably according to the particular era and philosophical school. The Epicureans considered the soul to be made up of atoms like the rest of the body. For the Platonists, the soul was an immaterial and incorporeal substance, akin to the gods yet part of the world of change and becoming. Christian concepts of a body-soul dichotomy originated with the ancient Greeks and were introduced into Christian theology at an early date by GREGORY OF NYSSA and by AUGUSTINE. Augustine spoke of the soul as a "rider" on the body, with the soul representing the "true" person. However, although body and soul were separate, yet still, it was not possible to conceive of a soul without its body.

Just as there have been different concepts of the relation of the soul to the body, there have been numerous ideas about when the soul comes into existence and when and if it dies. Pythagoras held that the soul was of divine origin and existed before and after death. Plato and Socrates also accepted the immortality of the soul, while Aristotle considered only part of the soul, the noûs, or intellect, to have that quality. Epicurus believed that both body and soul ended at death. The early Christian philosophers adopted the Greek concept of the soul's immortality and thought of the soul as being created by God and infused into the body at conception.

In HINDUISM, each ĀTMAN ("breath," or "soul") is considered to have been created at the beginning of time and imprisoned in an earthly body at birth. At the death of the body, the atman passes into a new body, its position in the Chain of Being determined by KARMA, or the cumulative consequences of actions. The cycle of death and rebirth (SAMSĀRA) is eternal according to some Hindus but others say it persists only until the soul has attained karmic perfection, thus merging with the Absolute. BUDDHISM negates the concept of ātman, asserting that any sense of the individual soul or self is illusory.

SOUL LOSS, departure of the soul from the body and its failure to return, which in many cultures, especially those in Siberia, Mesoamerica, and the northwestern coast of North America, is believed to be the cause of illness. Though the soul may wander inadvertently when its owner's guard is relaxed—e.g., in sleep or when sneezing or yawning—the most common cause of soul loss is its enticement and capture by an adversary through WITCHCRAFT.

When the owner is conscious of the danger, the soul may be prevented from wandering by ritual measures. In the case of witchcraft, the retrieval of the soul from an enemy's power requires complex techniques and the services of a religious specialist.

SPELL, words uttered in a set formula with magical intent. The correct recitation, often with accompanying gestures, is considered to unleash supernatural power. Some societies believe that incorrect recitation can not only nullify the magic but cause the death of the practitioner.

The language of spells is sometimes archaic and is not always understood by the reciter. In some cases meaningless but familiar terms are believed to be efficacious because of their traditional value. Much magical language, however, is clearly and directly correlated with the aim of the recital. Through analogy it represents and foreshadows the technical achievement, and metaphor and simile are freely used. An example is a Maori spell giving speed and grace to a canoe, which speaks of the swiftness of a bird on the wing and the lightness of a seagull and which uses such onomatopoeic effects as speed noises or the wailing of the sea.

In blessings and curses, which are similar types of verbal expressions, the efficacy of the recitation is also believed to be connected to the magical power of the words themselves or to the sacred power of a supernatural being. Certain gestures as well as words may be bound up with the act of blessing, as in putting one's hands on the head of the person being blessed. The curse, a wish to cause harm or misfortune, is usually directed against others, although an important form of curse, associated with oaths, contracts, and treaties, is conditionally directed against oneself, should one fail to keep one's word or tell the truth.

SPENER, PHILIPP JAKOB \ʃpā-nər\ (b. Jan. 23, 1635, Rappoltsweiler, Upper Alsace [now Ribeauvillé, Fr.]—d. Feb. 5, 1705, Berlin, Prussia [Germany]), theologian, author, and a leading figure in German PIETISM, a movement among 17th- and 18th-century Lutherans that stressed personal improvement and upright conduct.

During his studies at Strassburg (1651–59) Spener developed an interest in reforming Lutheran orthodox theology and practice, objecting to the rigidity of ecclesiastical structures and the lack of moral discipline among the clergy. In 1666, Spener became president of the Lutheran Church at Frankfurt am Main, where he began his collegia pietatis ("schools of piety"), devotional gatherings intended to encourage personal spiritual growth, prayer, and BIBLE study. His correspondence with the German clergy contributed to the growth of Pietism, as did his major work, Pia Desideria (1675; Pious Desires), which outlined Pietism's basic program and earned Spener a reputation as the movement's spokesman. In 1686 he was made first court CHAPLAIN at Dresden, then the most valued position in the German Lutheran Church, but his views soon aroused opposition. Attacks upon Pietism came from the orthodox Lutherans at the University of Leipzig and from the Saxon court, whose elector, John George III, had been rebuked by Spener for drunkenness.

Spener moved to Berlin in 1691 to become provost of St. Nicholas' Church. There he gained from the Brandenburg-Prussian court the support that enabled him to carry out numerous reforms. Spener obtained positions for his disciples at the University of Halle, founded on a Pietist basis in 1694. By the time of Spener's death, Pietism was well established in Germany, and its influence reached to England and eventually to the British colonies in America.

SPENTA MAINYU \span-'tä-mīn-'yü\, in ZOROASTRIANISM, HOLY SPIRIT, created by AHURA MAZDĀ to oppose the Destructive Spirit, Angra Mainyu. Spenta Mainyu is an aspect of Ahura Mazdā himself. According to Zoroastrian belief, Spenta Mainyu protects and maintains the sky, water, earth, plants, and children yet to be born.

SPHAGIA \ʃfā-jē-ə, 'sfa-gē-ə\, in ancient GREEK RELIGION, term for the propitiatory sacrifice made to the CHTHONIC (Underworld) deities and forces (including the winds and the spirits of the dead). The sphagia was not eaten by the worshippers, as in the cults of the Olympian gods; instead the victim was cut to pieces and burned, buried, or cast into a river.

SPHINX, mythological creature with a lion's body and human head, an important image in Egyptian and Greek art and legend. It was once thought that the word sphinx was derived by Greek grammarians from the verb sphingein ("to bind," or "to squeeze"). Such an origin is unlikely, however, and leaves unexplained the early variants Sphix and Phix, the latter of which is the oldest known form, found in Hesiod's Theogony. Herodotus, who visited Egypt in the 5th century BCE, applied the word androsphinx, "male-headed sphinx," to statues he saw at Sais in the Nile Delta. It has been hypothesized that the Greek application of sphinx to lion-bodied Egyptian figures—and perhaps even the form of the Greek word—was influenced by an Egyptian epithet that may be phoneticized as shep-ankh, "living image," applied to representations of gods, or of pharaohs viewed as "living images" of gods such as Re.

In myth the winged sphinx of Boeotian Thebes was said to have terrorized the people by demanding the answer to a riddle taught her by the Muses—what is it that has one voice and yet becomes four-footed and two-footed and three-footed?—and devouring a man each time the riddle was answered incorrectly. Eventually OEDIPUS gave the proper answer: man, who crawls on all fours in infancy, walks on two feet when grown, and leans on a staff in old age; the sphinx thereupon killed herself. From this tale ap-and the wings developed a beautiful curving form unknown in Asia. Sphinxes decorated vases, ivories, and metal works and in the late Archaic period occurred as ornaments on temples; their appearance on temples suggests a protective function. By the 5th century clear illustrations of the encounter between Oedipus and the sphinx appeared on vase paintings, usually with the sphinx perched on a column. Other monuments of classical age showed Oedipus in armed combat with the sphinx and suggested an earlier stage of the legend in which the contest was physical instead of mental.

parently grew the legend that the sphinx was omniscient, and even today the wisdom of the sphinx is proverbial.

The earliest and most famous example in art is the colossal recumbent Sphinx at Giza, Egypt, dating from the reign of King Khafre (4th king of 4th dynasty, c. 2575–c. 2465 BCE). This is known to be a portrait statue of the king, and the sphinx continued as a royal portrait type through most of Egyptian history. (Arabs, however, know the Sphinx of Giza by the name of Abū al-Hawl, or “Father of Terror.”) The sphinx did not occur in Mesopotamia until about 1500 BCE, when it was clearly imported from the Levant. In appearance the Asian sphinx differed from its Egyptian model most noticeably in the addition of wings to the leonine body, a feature that continued through its subsequent history in Asia and the Greek world. Another innovation was the female sphinx, which first began to appear in the 15th century BCE. On seals, ivories, and metalwork they were portrayed sitting on their haunches, often with one paw raised, and were frequently paired with a lion, a GRIFFIN (part eagle and part lion), or another sphinx.

About 1600 BCE the sphinx first appeared in the Greek world. Objects from Crete at the end of the middle Minoan period and from the shaft graves at Mycenae throughout the late Helladic age showed the sphinx characteristically winged. Although derived from the Asian sphinx, the Greek examples customarily wore a flat cap with a flame-like projection on top.

After 1200 BCE the depiction of sphinxes disappeared from Greek art for about 400 years, though they continued in Asia in forms and poses similar to those of the Bronze Age. By the end of the 8th century, the sphinx reappeared in Greek art and was common down to the end of the 6th century. The later Greek sphinx was almost always female and usually wore a long-tiered wig; the body became graceful, SPIRITUAL, in North American white and black folk music, an English-language folk HYMN.

White spirituals include both revival and camp-meeting songs and a smaller number of other hymns. They derived variously, notably from the “lining out” of psalms, dating from at least the mid-17th century. Where congregations could not read, a leader intoned (lined out) the psalm text, one line at a time, alternating with the congregation’s singing of each just-given line to a familiar melody. The tune, sung slowly, was ornamented with passing notes, turns, and other graces, each singer producing his own improvised embellishment at the pitch level he found comfortable.

A second source was the singing of hymns (as opposed to psalms only), reintroduced by such 18th-century religious dissenters as John and CHARLES WESLEY, the founders of METHODISM. Hymn verses were composed and set to borrowed melodies, often secular folk tunes. Many of these evangelical hymns passed into ORAL TRADITION.

In the late 18th century and up to the mid-19th, there were several waves of religious REVIVALISM. The resulting camp meetings and revivals were marked by spontaneous mass singing. It is not completely known how the camp-meeting songs and revival spirituals were sung; but it is thought that they were sung unharmonized, the tune typically begun by the high male voices, the women and basses joining in an octave (or other comfortable interval) above or below. A call-and-response pattern (as in lining out) may have at times been used.

The texts had verses and refrains that wandered from song to song; these and a common stock of folk-melody fragments allowed new songs to be improvised upon inspiration. The songs were passed on orally, though many were eventually written down in folk hymnbooks using special shape-note notation.

A 19th-century offshoot of the spiritual was the gospel song. Influenced by “correct” European music, it had composed melodies and texts, was sung with instrumental accompaniment, and (unlike the folk hymns) was written to be harmonized.

The black spirituals developed mostly from white rural folk hymnody. The borrowing of melodies with pentatonic (five-note) and major scales is especially prominent. In voice quality, vocal effects, and type of rhythmic accompaniment, black spirituals differ markedly from white ones. Black spirituals were sung not only in worship but also as work songs; the text imagery often reflects concrete tasks.

Musically, it is believed that a complex intermingling of African and white folk-music elements occurred and that complementary traits of African music and white American folksong reinforced each other. For example, the call-and-response pattern occurs in both, as do certain scales and the variable intonation of certain notes. Most authorities see clear African influence in vocal style and in the complex polyrhythmic clapped accompaniments. African tradition also included polyphonic and choral singing. The ring shout (a religious dance usually accompanied by the singing of spirituals and clapped rhythms) is also of African ancestry.

After the Civil War the black spirituals were “discovered” by Northerners and either developed toward harmonized versions, often sung by trained choirs, or, conversely, preserved in the older traditional style, especially in rural areas and certain sects.

Like the white gospel song, the modern black gospel song is a descendant of the spiritual and is instrumentally accompanied. Black GOSPEL MUSIC is closely related to secular black music (as is the spiritual to the work song and blues) and often includes jazz rhythms and instruments alongside traditional clapped accompaniment and often dance. Though gospel songs are usually composed, the melodies are taken for improvisational bases in church services, as popular tunes are improvised upon in jazz.

SPIRITUAL ASSEMBLY, in the BAHĀ'Ī FAITH, any of numerous administrative units that conduct an extensive work of missions, publication, education, and general philanthropy. Spiritual assemblies consist of nine members elected or designated annually on the local, national, and world levels during the holy days (April 21, April 29, May 2) commemorating the declaration of the founder's mission. Since they are said to be invested with their authority by God himself, the members of the spiritual assemblies have absolute jurisdiction over their electorates and are not answerable to them for their decisions and actions. Financial support comes from voluntary contributions from the community.

A local spiritual assembly exists in any community of nine or more Bahā'īs. In the mid-1980s there were some 33,000 local assemblies. National spiritual assemblies—numbering 148 by the mid-1980s—appear when there are enough local assemblies in a country to elect a 19-member convention, which in turn will elect the nine members of the national group from among all Bahā'īs in the country. World leadership of the faith was held by SHOĠHI EFFENDI RABBĀNĪ as Guardian of the Cause of God until his death in 1957; since 1963, this leadership has been assumed by the highest order of spiritual assembly, the Universal House of Justice, a body elected by the national spiritual assemblies and possessing the sole right to institute new laws or abrogate the old laws laid down in Bahā'ī sacred SCRIPTURES.

SPIRITUALISM, belief, or practices based upon the belief, that departed souls hold intercourse with mortals, usually through a medium by means of physical phenomena or during abnormal mental states, such as trances.

Within the terms of spiritualism, “spirit” is the essential part of the human. After the death of the body the spirit lives on. The “spirit world” is the world of disembodied spirits, while a “medium” is a person on earth who is sensitive to vibrations from the spirit world and is able to convey messages from that world and to produce other spiritualist phenomena. A “control” is a disembodied spirit who gives messages to a medium who in turn gives them to men and women on Earth.

The attempt to communicate with discarnate spirits seems to be one of the forms that religion may take in human societies and to be widely distributed in space and time. Practices very like those of a modern spiritualistic seance have been reported in various parts of the world, as, for example, Haiti and among Native North Americans, and there is no reason for supposing that these are of recent origin. The record of an ancient materialization seance is preserved in the OLD TESTAMENT account of Saul's visit to the witch of Endor, in the course of which a materialization appeared that was regarded by the king as the prophet Samuel (1 Samuel 28:7–19).

ŚRĀDDHA \ˈshrā-də, ˈsrā-, \, in HINDUISM, ceremony performed in honor of a dead ancestor. The rite is both a social and a religious responsibility enjoined on all male Hindus (with the exception of some SANNYĀSĪS, or ascetics).

The rite is performed for the deceased father, grandfather, and great-grandfather and also for the mother, grandmother, and great-grandmother. It is intended to nourish, protect, and support the spirits of the dead in their pilgrimage from the lower to higher realms, preceding their REINCAR-NATION and reappearance on Earth. The rites are performed between the 11th and 31st days after death, depending on CASTE traditions, and at regular intervals thereafter. During a śrāddha ceremony, rice balls (piṇḍas) are offered to the deceased, which constitute a “body” for the dead person in the preta (or ghostly) world. The first annual death anniversary is observed by a śrāddha ceremony that enables the deceased (preta) to be admitted into the assembly of forefathers (PITR).

SRAOSHA \sraü-ˈshä, -ˈsha \, in ZOROASTRIANISM, divine being who is the messenger of AHURA MAZDĀ, the embodiment of the divine word, and the mediator between human and divine. His name, related to the Avestan word for “hearing,” signifies man's obedient hearkening to Ahura Mazdā's word and also signifies Ahura Mazdā's omnipresent listening. Zoroastrians believe that no ritual is valid without his presence, and he is very prominent in their liturgy. He has, in addition, a protective role. Three times each night Ahura Mazdā sends Sraosha to combat the DEMONS that harass men. His strongest weapon is prayer. In the end of time, he will be the agent of the final extermination of evil. Sraosha also leads the righteous soul through the ordeal of judgment three days after its body's death.

ŚRAUTA SŪTRA \ˈshraü-tə-ˈsü-trə \, any of a number of Hindu ritual manuals used by priests engaged in the performance of the Vedic sacrifices requiring three fires and the services of many specialized priests. The manuals are called śrauta (from Sanskrit ŚRUTI, “revelation”) because they are based on the Vedic literature considered to be śruti, or revealed. The Śrauta SŪTRAS, together with the Gṛhya Sūtras (dealing with domestic ceremonies) and the DHARMA SUTRAS (dealing with rules of conduct), make up the KALPA SŪTRAS. Each Śrauta Sūtra guides the priests of its own Vedic school in the performance of specialized functions.

SRAVANA BELGOLA \ˈshrə-və-nə-,be-lə-ˈgō-lə\, Indian town, 56 miles from Mysore, which contains examples of architecture from the Mauryan Empire. The town has a giant stone figure, believed to be 1,000 years old, of Bāhubali (Gommatesvara), the Jain saint.

SRI PADA \ˈshrē-ˈpā-də, ˌsrē-\, also called Adam's Peak, mountain in southwestern Sri Lanka, 7,360 feet high and 11 miles northeast of Ratnapura. Its conical summit terminates in an oblong platform about 74 by 24 feet, on which there is a large hollow resembling the print of a human foot, 5 feet 4 inches by 2 feet 6 inches. The depression is venerated alike by Buddhists, Muslims, and Hindus, who regard it as the footprint of the BUDDHA, ADAM, and SHIVA, respectively. Many pilgrims visit the peak every year.

SRIĀNGAM \ˌsrē-ˈrəŋ-gəm\, city, east-central Tamil Nādu state, southeastern India. Sriāngam is one of the most frequently visited PILGRIMAGE centers in southern India. Its main Raṅganātha temple, primarily Vaiṣṇavite, is also holy to Śaivites (see VAIṢṆAVISM and ŚAIVISM).

The temple is composed of seven rectangular enclosures, one within the other, the outermost having a perimeter more than 2 miles in length. A remarkable feature of the temple is the Hall of a Thousand Pillars, with its colonnade of rearing horses. The temple and its hall were constructed in the Vijayanagar period (1336–1565) on the site of an older temple.

ŚRĪ VAIṢṆAVA \ˌshrē-ˈvīsh-nə-və\, member of a sect of Vaiṣṇavite Hindus, most numerous in South India, who follow the teachings of the philosopher RĀMĀNUJA. "Śrī" refers to Vishnu's consort, also called LAKṢMĪ, to whom VISHNU first taught the doctrine.

In the late 10th or 11th century the devotional hymns of the ĀLVĀRS were introduced into the sect's temple service by Nāthamuni. He is called the first ācārya ("teacher") of the sect and founded a Sanskrit-Tamil school at Sriāngam (Tamil Nadu state), which continues to be a great Vaiṣṇava center. Rāmānuja (11th/12th century) gave the sect a philosophical doctrine to fit its views. In the late 14th century, the sect split into its present two subsets, the Vaṭakalai (or school of northern learning), which relied more on the Sanskrit SCRIPTURES, and the Teṅkalai (or school of southern learning), which stressed the Tamil hymns of the Ālvārs.

The Śrī Vaiṣṇavas worship Vishnu and his consorts and attendants and do not acknowledge Krishna's mistress RĀDHĀ. Brahmin members observe CASTE regulations in diet and interdining and are given to scholarly pursuits.

ŚRUTI \ˈshrū-tē\ (Sanskrit: "learning by hearing"), the most revered body of sacred literature in HINDUISM, all of it existing in Sanskrit (or Vedic, its archaic form). Śruti works are considered divine revelation, heard and transmitted by earthly sages, in contrast to SMṚTI, or that which is remembered. Although śruti is held to be the more authoritative, in practice the smṛti texts have been more influential in ancient and modern Hinduism. Śruti texts encompass the four VEDAS, the BRĀHMAṆAS (ritual treatises), the *Āraṇyaka*s ("Books of the Forest"), and the UPANISHADS.

SSU-MA CH'ENG-CHEN \ˈsə-ˈmā-ˈchəŋ-ˈjən\, Pinyin Sima Chengzhen (b. 647—d. 735), sixth patriarch of the Shang-ch'ing school of TAOISM, who was associated with the poets Li Po and Wang Wei. Called to court during the reign of Emperor Jui-tsung (reigned 710–712), Ssu-ma recommended a government that followed the principles of WU-WEI, or "non-action." He advised Emperor Hsüan-tsung (reigned 712–756) and was an accomplished calligrapher. He is known for blending Taoist, Confucian, and Buddhist methods of mental cultivation. He recommended religious methods that emphasized "inner alchemy" over the external practices and drugs of "outer alchemy."

STATE SHINTŌ \ˈshēn-tō, ˌʌŋl ˈshin-tō\, Japanese Kokka Shintō \ˈkōk-kā-\, nationalistic official religion of Japan from the Meiji Restoration in 1868 through World War II. It focused on ceremonies of the imperial household and public SHINTŌ shrines.

State Shintō was founded on the idea of saisei itchi, the unity of religion and government. National prosperity was believed to be assured by harmony between human politics and the will of the gods. But Shintō came to be dominated by BUDDHISM and NEO-CONFUCIANISM, and the emperor was overshadowed by military rulers. Efforts to restore Shintō and the emperor came to naught in the medieval period.

During the Meiji period (1868–1912) the government attempted to institutionalize Shintō. It assumed control of the Shintō shrines, established a Department of Shintō (later the Shintō Ministry), and adopted policies against other religions. Although the 1889 constitution included a nominal guarantee of religious freedom, obeisance at Shintō shrines was considered the patriotic duty of all Japanese. The country's more than 100,000 Shintō shrines were administered by the government, Shintō moral teaching (shūshin) was made compulsory in the schools, and the divine status of the emperor was fostered by the political authorities.

State Shintō was abolished in 1945 by a decree of the Allied occupation forces. The ban was continued in the post-war constitution. The shrines previously administered by the government were reorganized as SHRINE SHINTŌ.

STEIN, EDITH, original name of Saint Teresa Benedicta of the Cross, Latin, Sancta Teresia Benedicta a Cruce (b. Oct. 12, 1891, Breslau, Ger. [now Wrocław, Pol.] —d. Aug. 9/10, 1942, Auschwitz, Pol.) Roman Catholic convert from JUDAISM, Carmelite nun, philosopher, and spiritual writer who was executed by the Nazis because of her Jewish ancestry and who is regarded as a modern martyr.

Born into an Orthodox Jewish family, Stein became an atheist. At the University of Göttingen, she grew interested in philosophy and came into contact with ROMAN CATHOLICISM. She received her doctorate in philosophy (1916) from the University of Freiburg and became one of the university's leading philosophers. Attracted to Roman Catholicism, Stein read the autobiography of the mystic ST. TERESA OF ÁVILA and converted. She was baptized on Jan. 1, 1922, and began teaching at a Dominican girls' school in Speyer. In 1934 she entered the Carmelite convent at Cologne, taking the name Teresa Benedicta of the Cross. In 1938, with the Nazi threat growing, she was transferred to a convent in The Netherlands. The condemnation of Nazi anti-Semitism by the bishops of occupied Holland (July 26, 1942) provoked Adolf Hitler to order the arrest of all non-Aryan Roman Catholics. She was seized by the Gestapo, shipped to Auschwitz, and died in the gas chamber. She was canonized on Oct. 11, 1998.

STEINER, RUDOLF \ˈstī-nər, Angl ˈsti-\ (b. Feb. 27, 1861, Kraljević, Austria—d. March 30, 1925, Dornach, Switz.), Austrian-born scientist, editor, and founder of ANTHROPOSOLOGY, a movement based on the notion that there is a spiritual world comprehensible to pure thought but accessible only to the highest faculties of mental knowledge.

Attracted in his youth to the works of Goethe, Steiner edited that poet's scientific works and from 1889 to 1896 worked on the standard edition of his complete works at Weimar. Coming gradually to believe in spiritual perception independent of the senses, he called the result of his research "anthroposophy," relating it to "knowledge produced by the higher self in man." In 1912 he founded the Anthroposophical Society.

Steiner believed that humans once participated more fully in spiritual processes of the world through a dreamlike consciousness but had since become restricted by their attachment to material things. The renewed perception of spiritual things required training the human consciousness to rise above attention to matter. The ability to achieve this goal by an exercise of the intellect is theoretically innate in everyone.

In 1913 at Dornach, near Basel, Switz., Steiner built his first Goetheanum, which he characterized as a "school of spiritual science." The Waldorf School movement, derived from his experiments with the Goetheanum, by 1969 was responsible for some 80 schools attended by more than 25,000 children in Europe and the United States. Other projects that have grown out of Steiner's work include schools for disabled children; a therapeutic clinical center at Arlesheim, Switz.; scientific and mathematical research centers; and schools of drama, speech, painting, and sculpture.

STIGMATA, singular stigma, in Christian MYSTICISM, bodily marks, scars, or pains corresponding to those of the crucified JESUS CHRIST—that is, on the hands or feet, near the heart, and sometimes on the head (from the crown of thorns) or shoulders and back (from carrying the Cross and scourging). They are often presumed to accompany religious ECSTASY.

While in his cell on Mount Alverno in 1224, pondering on the sufferings of Christ, ST. FRANCIS OF ASSISI was purportedly visited by a SERAPH who produced upon his body the five wounds of Christ. Pope Alexander IV and others attested that they had seen these marks both before and after Francis' death. In the next century the same alleged wonder occurred to the DOMINICAN sister, ST. CATHERINE OF SIENA, who received her first stigma at the age of 23. From the 14th to the 20th century, more than 330 persons were identified as having been stigmatized; 60 were declared saints or the blessed in the ROMAN CATHOLIC church.

STONEHENGE \ˈstōn-henj, ˌstōn-ˈhenj\, circular setting of large standing stones surrounded by a circular earthwork, built in prehistoric times beginning about 3100 BCE and located about eight miles north of Salisbury, Wiltshire, Eng.

The monument consists of a number of structural elements, mostly circular in plan. On the outside is a circular ditch, with a bank immediately within it, all interrupted by an entrance gap on the northeast, leading to the Avenue. At the center of the circle is a stone setting consisting of a horseshoe of tall uprights of sarsen (Tertiary sandstone) encircled by a ring of tall sarsen uprights, all originally capped by horizontal sarsen lintels. Within the sarsen stone circle were also configurations of smaller and lighter bluestones (igneous rock of diabase, rhyolite, and volcanic ash), but most of these bluestones have disappeared. Additional stones include the so-called Altar Stone, the Slaughter Stone, two Station stones, and the Heel Stone, the last standing on the Avenue outside the entrance. Small circular ditches enclose two flat areas on the inner edge of the bank, known as the North and South Barrows, with empty stone holes at their centers.

Archaeological excavations since 1950 suggest three main periods of building. In Stonehenge I, about 3100 BCE, the native Neolithic people, using deer antlers for picks, excavated a roughly circular ditch about 320 feet in diameter; the ditch was about 20 feet wide and 4.5 to 7 feet deep, and the excavated chalky rubble was used to build the high bank within the circular ditch. They also erected two parallel entry stones on the northeast of the circle (one of which, the Slaughter Stone, still survives). Just inside the circular bank they dug—and seemingly almost immediately refilled—a circle of 56 shallow holes, named the Aubrey Holes (after their discoverer, the 17th-century antiquarian John Aubrey). The Station stones also probably belong to this period, but the evidence is inconclusive. Stonehenge I was used for about 500 years and then reverted to scrubland.

During Stonehenge II, about 2100 BCE, the complex was radically remodeled. About 80 bluestone pillars, imported 240 miles from the Preseli Mountains in southwestern Wales and weighing up to 4 tons each, were erected in the center of the site to form what was to be two concentric circles, though the circles were never completed. The entranceway of this earliest setting of bluestones was aligned approximately with the sunrise at the summer solstice, the alignment being continued by a newly built and widened approach, called the Avenue, together with a pair of Heel stones. The double circle of bluestones was dismantled in the following period.

The initial phase of Stonehenge III, starting about 2000 BCE, saw the erection of the linteled circle and horseshoe of large sarsen stones whose remains can still be seen today. The sarsen stones were transported from the Marlborough Downs 20 miles north and were erected in a circle of 30 uprights capped by a continuous ring of stone lintels. Within this ring was erected a horseshoe formation of five trilithons (three stones, two of them upright and the third forming a lintel), each of which consisted of a pair of large stone uprights supporting a stone lintel. The sarsen stones are of exceptional size, up to 30 feet long and 50 tons in weight. Their visible surfaces were laboriously dressed smooth by pounding with stone hammers; the same technique was used to form the mortise-and-tenon joints by which the lintels are held on their uprights, and it was used to form the tongue-and-groove joints by which the lintels of the circle fit together. The lintels are not rectangular; they were curved to produce all together a circle. The pillars are tapered upward.

In the second phase of Stonehenge III, which probably followed within a century, about 20 bluestones from Stonehenge II were dressed and erected in an approximate oval setting within the sarsen horseshoe. Sometime later, about 1550 BCE, two concentric rings of holes (the Y and Z Holes, today not visible) were dug outside the sarsen circle. The holes in both circles were left open to silt up over the succeeding centuries. The oval setting in the center was also removed.

The final phase of building in Stonehenge III probably followed almost immediately. Within the sarsen horseshoe the builders set a horseshoe of dressed bluestones set close together, alternately a pillar followed by an obelisk followed by a pillar and so on. The remaining unshaped 60-odd bluestones were set as a circle of pillars within the sarsen circle (but outside the sarsen horseshoe). The largest bluestone of all, traditionally misnamed the Altar Stone, probably stood as a tall pillar on the axial line.

About 1100 BCE the Avenue was extended from Stonehenge eastward and then southeastward to the River Avon, a distance of about 9,120 feet. This suggests that Stonehenge was still in use at the time.

Why Stonehenge was built is unknown, though it probably was constructed as a place of worship of some kind. Speculations that the builders were DRUIDS or sun worshippers, or that Stonehenge was a complicated computer for predicting eclipses, have been severely criticized.

STRANG, JAMES JESSE ˈstrɑŋ^ˌ, also called Jesse James Strang (b. March 21, 1813, Scipio, N.Y., U.S.—d. July 9, 1856, Voree, Wis.), American churchman, dissident of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (MORMONS), whose futile attempt to succeed JOSEPH SMITH as its leader led him to found the Strangite sect.

Admitted to the bar in 1836 after teaching for a brief period, Strang also served as postmaster for five years at Ellington, N.Y., and owned and edited a weekly paper. In 1843 he followed his wife's family to Burlington, Wis. He met Joseph Smith the next year in Nauvoo, Ill., where the Mormons had established a large settlement. Despite an earlier philosophical skepticism, Strang became a Mormon convert and was ordained an elder by Smith. After Smith's assassination in June 1844, Strang exhibited a letter, purportedly written by Smith, that named Strang his successor. He also claimed to have had a vision appointing him “seer, revelator, and prophet” of the Mormon Church. However, the Twelve Apostles denounced Strang as an impostor and forger and expelled him from the church. Strang and a group of his own followers then organized a new sect in Voree, Wis. There in 1845 he allegedly translated (with the aid of magic spectacles given him by an ANGEL) The Book of the Law of the Lord from golden plates from the ARK OF THE COVENANT. Strang then established a secret society that swore allegiance to him and operated under puritanical rules.

Dissension prompted Strang to relocate the colony in 1847 to Beaver Island, in northern Lake Michigan. In 1850 Strang received another revelation in the “plates of Laban.” It sanctioned polygyny, and he was married to four wives at one time. He also claimed that it sanctioned his coronation, and in July he became King James I. The Strangites endured considerable persecution, but Strang was able to preserve the sect and to gain acquittal in the several lawsuits brought against him.

Twice elected to the legislature in Michigan (1852, 1854), Strang had more than 5,000 followers when he was shot on June 16, 1856, by two former Strangites. More than 2,000 Strangites were driven from their homes and the sect was all but extinguished.

STRAUSS, DAVID FRIEDRICH \ˈshtraüs\ (b. Jan. 27, 1808, Ludwigsburg, Württemberg [Germany]—d. Feb. 8, 1874, Ludwigsburg), controversial German-Protestant philosopher, theologian, and biographer whose use of dialectical philosophy, emphasizing social evolution through the inner struggle of opposing forces, broke new ground in biblical interpretation by explaining the NEW TESTAMENT accounts of Christ mythologically.

Influenced during his studies at the universities of Tübingen and Berlin (1825–31) by the doctrine of G.W.F. Hegel, Strauss proposed a developmental theory of formative CHRISTIANITY in which the interaction of inherent, conflicting forces and interpretations led to a higher religious synthesis. Such an analysis inspired his first major work, Das Leben Jesu kritisch bearbeitet, 2 vol. (1835–36; The Life of Jesus Critically Examined), which was translated into English by the British Victorian novelist George Eliot. In it Strauss denied the historical value of the Gospels and rejected their supernatural claims, describing them as “historical myth,” or the unintentionally created, legendary embodiment by 2nd-century writers of the primitive Christian community’s popular hopes.

The ensuing furor among German Protestants prompted Strauss to mitigate his attack by commenting that such criticism did not essentially destroy Christianity, because all religions were based on ideas, not facts. This apology, however, did not avert his exclusion from further university teaching at Tübingen or at the University of Zürich, where previously he had been offered a professorship.

In retirement from academic theological circles for more than 20 years, he resided in Ludwigsburg and Darmstadt, where he produced several biographies of political and intellectual figures and held political office as provincial legislator. His religious odyssey closed with the publication of Der alte und der neue Glaube (1872; The Old Faith and the New), in which he ventured to replace Christianity with scientific materialism, a personalized form of Darwinism. Criticized for an inadequate understanding of the biblical and theological texts he criticized, Strauss nevertheless not only influenced 20th-century liberal and eschatological schools of biblical thought but also challenged subsequent scholars with the search for the “historical Jesus.”

STRIBOG \strē-ˈbōg\, one of seven Russian pre-Christian deities, the others being PERUN, Volos, Khors, DAZHBOG, Simargla, and Mokosh. The deities are mentioned in the Kiev Chronicle (Povest vremennykh let)—a 12th- to 13th-century account of events and life in the Kievan state.

STRUCTURALISM, theory and critical method applied in such disciplines as anthropology, sociology, linguistics, and literary studies. Modern versions of structuralism in the cultural sciences trace their origin to the linguistic work of Ferdinand de Saussure (1857–1913) and the theories of the anthropologist Claude Lévi-Strauss (b. 1908).

The first principle of structuralism is that the true object of study is not immediately given. Thus, appeal to sensations, experience, or intuitive insights is of no use in the discovery of the object of study since such things are always external to the structure or system. As Lévi-Strauss once said, sensations, emotions, and intuitions cannot be the foundation of an explanation but rather are that which must be explained. Accordingly, structuralism rejects such notions as the sui generis nature of religion, or the converse idea, that religion is the mere satisfaction of bodily needs.

The second principle asserts that understanding cultural phenomena requires a kind of analysis, revealing the relations which constitute a particular system, whether ritual, myth, or RELIGIOUS BELIEF. This principle rejects the contention that the significance of a myth or ritual or religious symbol is to be found in an analysis of the elements of the myth or ritual. A symbol or an element in a myth—a goddess for example—has significance only in the relations that constitute this element in the system. Elements, symbols, and signs in themselves are held to be meaningless and arbitrary.

A third principle states that system and practice must be distinguished. Saussure made this distinction in linguistics when he separated language from speech, asserting that the proper object of linguistics is language. Speech is the practice, the actual speech acts of a language, which exists as an abstraction. A similar distinction may be made between religion as a system or structure and the practice or performance of religion or religious acts. From a structuralist point of view one cannot arrive at language, or the meaning of religion, by an examination of speech or religious acts.

Lévi-Strauss insisted upon the importance of these principles for the establishment of a new anthropology and the study of myth, KINSHIP, and TOTEMISM. He was fully aware of the Saussurian axiom that knowledge of the history of a symbol would not yield its structure, syntax, or semantics. Lévi-Strauss held, for example, that totemism, which was once viewed as the ORIGIN OF RELIGION, never in fact existed as an institution but can be understood as an element in a wider system of classifications.

Work done in religion from a structuralist perspective includes the work of Louis Dumont who has shown that the notion of CASTE may be explained as a relation between the contraries pure–impure, which are ritual categories. Stanley Tambiah has demonstrated that the rituals of THERAVĀDA BUDDHISM are more adequately explained as elements within a larger system constituted by the set of relations that might be indicated as householder/renouncer. Jean-Pierre Vernant has used structuralist principles for explicating the myths of classical Greece.

STUDY OF RELIGION

The study of religion is an attempt to understand the nature and various aspects of religion through the use of established intellectual disciplines. Broadly speaking, it comprehends two aspects: gathering information and systematically interpreting it.

The first aspect involves the psychological and historical study of religious life, whereas the second involves the attempt to understand the structure, nature, and dynamics of RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE.

An acceptable DEFINITION OF RELIGION is difficult to attain. Attempts have been made to find an essential ingredient in all religions (e.g., the numinous, or spiritual, experience; the contrast between the sacred and the profane; belief in gods or in God) so that an “essence” of religion might be described. But it has become evident that, because of the rich variety of religions, it is always possible to find counterexamples—an element suggested as essential is found in some religions to be peripheral. A more promising method might be to list elements that are typical of religions, though they may not be universal.

The fact that the possibility of finding an essence of religion is disputed means that there is likewise a problem in speaking too generally of the study of religion or of religions themselves. In practice, a religion is a particular system or set of systems in which doctrines, myths, rituals, sentiments, institutions, and other similar elements are interconnected. In order to understand a given belief as it occurs in such a system, it is necessary to look at its particular context—that is, at the other beliefs held in the system, at rituals, and at the other elements. Every religion has its unique properties, and attempts to make comparisons between religions may obscure these unique aspects. Most students of religion agree, however, that valid comparisons are possible, though they are difficult to make. Indeed, since comparison also includes contrast, one may be able to illuminate the very uniqueness of a religion through such comparison.

In modern times there is an emphasis on neutral description—i.e., description of RELIGIOUS BELIEFS and practices that does not reflect any judgment of whether they are valuable or harmful, true or false. To some extent this emphasis arises as a reaction against committed accounts of religion, which were long the norm and still exist. Conflict sometimes arises because the committed point of view is likely to begin with a conservative stance—e.g., to accept at face value a scriptural account of events—whereas the secular historian may be more skeptical, especially of records of miraculous events.

There are, however, questions about how possible or even desirable the qualities of neutrality and objectivity are in the study of religion. It may be asked, for example, whether we can understand a faith without holding it. One of the challenges to the student of religion is the problem of evoking its inner, individual side, which is not observable in any straightforward way.

The scholar is concerned also with communal responses. The adherent of a faith is no doubt authoritative as to his own experience, but he is not necessarily so in regard to the communal significance of the rites and institutions in which he participates. Thus, the effort to understand the inner side of a religion involves a dialectic between observation of and dialogical (interpersonal) relationship with the adherents of the faith. Consequently, the study of religion has strong similarities to, and indeed overlaps with, anthropology.

The study of religion can be broadly divided between descriptive and historical inquiries and normative inquiries. The latter primarily concern the truth of religious claims, the acceptability of religious values, and other such aspects; the former are primarily concerned with its history, structure, and similar observable elements. The distinction is not an absolute one, for descriptions of religion may sometimes be shaped by theories that imply something about the truth or other normative aspects of some or all religions. Conversely, theological claims may imply something about the history of a religion.

The study of religion may thus be characterized as being concerned with human religious behavior in relation to its object (the transcendent God or gods or whatever is regarded as sacred or holy) and as a study that attempts to be faithful to both the outer and inner facts. Its present-day concern is predominantly descriptive and explanatory and hence embraces such disciplines as history, sociology, anthropology, psychology, and archaeology.

HISTORY OF THE STUDY OF RELIGION

Some qualities that characterize the modern study of religion have their roots in classical Greek thought. The rise of speculative philosophy in ancient Greece led to a critical and somewhat rationalistic treatment of religion and the gods. The 4th-century-BCE philosopher Plato was strongly critical of the older poets' (e.g., Homer's) accounts of the gods and substituted a form of belief in a single creator, the DEMIURGE, or supreme craftsman. This line of thought was developed by Aristotle in his conception of a supreme intelligence that is the unmoved mover.

Criticism of the ancient tradition was reinforced by the reports of travelers who carried Greek culture into other cultures. The historian Herodotus (5th century BCE) attempted to solve the problem of the plurality of cults by identifying foreign deities with Greek deities (e.g., the Egyptian AMON with ZEUS). Among the later Greek thinkers, EUHEMERUS (c. 330–c. 260 BCE) gave his name to the doctrine called EUHEMERISM, which held that the gods are divinized men.

In the early Roman Empire, Euhemerism became fashionable among the Christian CHURCH FATHERS as an account of paganism. Christianity's own contribution to theories of the genesis of POLYTHEISM was through the doctrine of the fall of man, by which the truth of MONOTHEISM was believed to have become overlaid by demonic cults of false gods. In this view there is the germ of an evolutionary account of religion.

During the Middle Ages, ISLAMIC theology had an impact on Western CHRISTIANITY through the promotion of the values of reason and revelation. The reports of European travelers brought Westerners some knowledge of Asian religions, which opened the way toward a more informed consideration of other religions. With the Renaissance and the Protestant REFORMATION there arose a new respect for the Greek and Roman classics, which lessened the force of antipagan Christian polemics. A new tendency developed among some PROTESTANT authors to compare the Roman church to pre-Christian Rome, which brought the idea of a comparative study of religion into focus; meanwhile the popularity of compilations of mythological and other material gave Europe a vivid sense of the richness and variety of human customs and histories.

Attempts at a developmental account of religion were undertaken in the late 17th and 18th centuries. The Italian philosopher Giambattista Vico (1668–1774) suggested that GREEK RELIGION passed through various stages: the divinization of nature, then of those powers that man had come at least partly to control (such as fire and crops), then of institutions (such as marriage); the final step was the process of humanizing the gods, as in the works of Homer. For English philosopher David Hume (1711–76), original polytheism was the result of a naive ANTHROPOMORPHISM (conceiving the divine in human form) in the assignment of causes to natural events. The intensification of propitiatory and other forms of worship, he believed, led ultimately to the exaltation of one infinite divine Being (see also RELIGION, PHILOSOPHY OF).

In the meantime, the beginning of Oriental studies, ethnology, and anthropology were making available more data about religion. The French scholar Charles de Brosses (1709–77) attempted to explain Greek polytheism partly through the fetishism (belief in the magical powers of certain objects) found in West Africa. This foreshadowed later endeavors in the comparative study of religion. The French abbé Bergier (1718–90) explained early religions by means of a belief in spirits arising from a variety of psychological causes, which thus was a precursor of ANIMISM (a belief in souls in persons or certain natural objects).

The French social philosopher Auguste Comte (1798–1857), from a positivistic and materialistic point of view, devised an evolutionary scheme in which there are three stages of human history: the theological, in which the supernatural is important; the metaphysical, in which the explanatory concepts become more abstract; and the positivistic—i.e., the empirical. A rather different positivism was expressed by the English philosopher Herbert Spencer (1820–1903), in which religion has a place beside science in attempting to refer to the unknown and unknowable Absolute. Attempts to produce evolutionary accounts of religion were much encouraged in the latter part of the 19th century by the success of the new theory of biological evolution, and they left a marked effect on the history of both religion and anthropology. These movements were supplemented by the progress of scientific history, archaeology, anthropology, and other sciences, which increased comparative knowledge of civilizations and cultures.

STUPA

STUPA \ˈstü-pə\, Buddhist commemorative monument usually housing sacred relics associated with the Buddha, a royal personage, or a saint; it is an architectural symbol of the Buddha's parinirvāṇa, or final death and release from the cycle of death and rebirth. The hemispherical form of the stupa appears to have derived from pre-Buddhist BURIAL MOUNDS in India. The classic form is most characteristically seen in the series of stupas at SĀNCHI, India, especially in the Great Stupa (3rd–1st centuries BCE). The monument, which is believed to contain a relic of the BUDDHA GOTAMA, consists of a circular base supporting a massive solid dome (the aṇḍa, “egg,” or garbha, “womb”) at the summit of which projects an umbrella (chatra). The whole of the Great Stupa is encircled by a railing and four gateways, which are richly decorated with relief sculpture depicting JĀTAKAS (stories of events in the Buddha's previous lives), events in the Buddha's “historical” life, and popular mythological figures.

Stupa III and its single gateway, one of several stupas at Sanchi, Madhya Pradesh state, India

In South and Southeast Asia later reliquary stupas display many variations. For example, bell-shaped stupas are common in Sri Lanka, pyramidal and conical designs are prominent in mainland Southeast Asia, and a great terraced stupa was built at BOROBUDUR in Java, Indonesia. However, most of the South and Southeast Asian edifices of this type retain the basic form of the Great Stupa.

In other parts of the Buddhist world—particularly in China, Korea, and Japan—the change in form has been more dramatic. In these areas—where the term PAGODA usually replaces the term stupa—the edifice has become a tall tower consisting of the repetition of a basic story unit ascending in regularly diminishing proportions.

Whatever the form of the stupa or pagoda, the basic symbolic identification between the central object enclosed in the edifice (usually a relic but sometimes a bit of sacred text), the person or teaching being honored, and the building itself is retained. Worship consists in walking around the monument in the direction taken by the path of the Sun (pradakṣiṇā). Miniature stupas and pagodas are used by Buddhists throughout Asia as votive offerings. Stupas were also built by Jains to commemorate their saints.

STYLITE \ˈstī-līt\, Christian ascetic who lived standing on top of a column (Greek: stylos) or pillar. The first to do this was St. Simeon Stylites (the Elder), who took up residence atop a column in Syria in 423 CE.

The stylite was permanently exposed to the elements, though he might have a little roof above his head. He stood night and day in his restricted area, usually with a rail around him, and was dependent for his sustenance on what his disciples brought him by ladder. He spent most of his time in prayer but also did pastoral work among those who gathered around his column. A stylite might continue this practice briefly or for a long period.

STYX \ˈstiks\, in Greek mythology, one of the rivers of the Underworld. The word is a derivative of a Greek verb and noun base styg- that denotes both abhorrence and repulsion (hence stygēin, “to regard with loathing”) and extreme cold (Styx was the name of an icy spring in Arcadia). In the epics of Homer, the gods swore by the water of the Styx as their most binding oath; if a god perjured himself, he was rendered insensible for a year and then banished from the divine society for nine years. Hesiod personified Styx as the daughter of OCEANUS and the mother of Emulation, Victory, Power, and Might. The ancients believed that its water was poisonous and would dissolve any vessel containing it except one made of the hoof of a horse or an ass. There is a legend that Alexander the Great was poisoned by Styx water.

SUÁREZ, FRANCISCO \ˈswä-res, -reth, Angl -rez\, byname Doctor Eximius (b. Jan. 5, 1548, Granada, Spain—d. Sept. 25, 1617, Lisbon), Spanish theologian and philosopher, a founder of international law, often considered the most prominent Scholastic philosopher (see SCHOLASTICISM) after THOMAS AQUINAS, and the major theologian of the ROMAN CATHOLIC order the Society of Jesus (JESUITS).

Suárez began the study of law in Salamanca in 1561 but left to join the Jesuits in 1564. From 1571 he taught philosophy, in 1580 becoming a theology instructor at the Jesuit college in Rome and later at Alcalá. In 1593 King Philip II of Spain appointed him to teach, and he eventually served as a professor at Coimbra (1597–1616), after obtaining his doctorate from Évora (1597).

His principal study in philosophy is the Disputationes Metaphysicae (1597), which was used for more than a century as a textbook at most European universities, Catholic and Protestant alike. In this work, which treats especially the problems of human will and the concept of general versus particular phenomena, Suárez drew upon Aristotle and Aquinas, although he took into consideration the criticisms of other Scholastic philosophers such as Duns Scotus.

Suárez also wrote apologetic works on the nature of the Christian state. Among them were De Virtute et Statu Religionis (1608–09) and Defensio Fidei Catholicae (1613), opposing Anglican theologians who defended the divine right of kings. At the time this theory was being advanced in England by James I, who subsequently burned Suárez' Defensio on the steps of St. Paul's Cathedral in London.

Suárez expounded his political theory and philosophy of law in De Legibus (1612; “On Laws”) as well as in the Defensio. Having refuted the divine-right theory of kingly rule, he declared that the people themselves are the original holders of political authority; the state is the result of a social contract to which the people consent. Arguing for the natural rights of the human individual to life, liberty, and property, he rejected the Aristotelian notion of slavery as the natural condition of certain men. He criticized most of the practices of Spanish colonization in the Indies in his De Bello et de Indis ("On War and the Indies"). The islands of the Indies he viewed as sovereign states legally equal to Spain as members of a worldwide community of nations.

SUBĤA \ˈsüb-hə\, string of Muslim PRAYER BEADS whose units (100, 25, or 33) represent the names of God. As the beads (made of wood, bone, or precious stones) are touched one by one, Muslims may recite any of numerous formulas, the most common being "Glory to ALLĀH." But because prayer may also be recited in the secret of one's heart, a person can multiply his praises of God by merely moving the beads through his fingers. Sufi orders make use of the subĥa in reciting their litanies.

SUBUD \ˈsü-büd\, religious movement based on spontaneous and ecstatic exercises, founded by an Indonesian, Muhammad Subuh, called Bapak. A student of SUFISM as a youth, Bapak had a powerful mystical experience in 1925, and in 1933 he claimed that the mission to found the Subud movement had been revealed to him. The movement was restricted to Indonesia until the 1950s, when it spread to Europe and America.

The central feature of Subud is the latihan, its only group spiritual activity, which is usually held for an hour twice a week. During the latihan, undergone by men and women in separate rooms, members allow the power of God to express itself through unrestrained spontaneous activity. The latihan includes unprogrammed singing, dancing, shouting, and laughter. Subud has little doctrinal teaching, except for the belief in divine power and higher centers of consciousness implied by the latihan.

SUCCUBUS \ˈsə-kyə-bəs\, female form of an INCUBUS.

SUCELLUS \sü-ˈke-ləs\, powerful and widely worshiped Celtic god; his iconographic symbols were usually his mallet and LIBATION saucer. His Irish equivalent seems to have been the DAGDA. Sucellus was possibly one of the Gaulish gods who were equated by Julius Caesar with the Roman god DIS PATER, from whom all the Gauls believed themselves to be descended.

ŚŪDRA \ˈsü-drə, ˈshü-\, fourth and lowest of the traditional VARNAS, or social classes, of Hindu India, traditionally artisans and laborers. The term does not appear in the earliest Vedic literature. In its first application it probably included all conquered peoples of the Indus civilization as they were assimilated as menials to the tripartite society of the BRAHMINS (priests and teachers), KṢĀTRIYAS (nobles and warriors), and VAIŚYAS (merchants). Śūdras are not permitted to perform the UPANAYANA initiatory rite, which introduces members of the three upper classes to the study of the VEDAS and gives them their status as DVĪJA ("twice-born").

The Śūdra varṇa includes a wide spectrum of endogamous status groups with dominant, landowning groups at one end of the scale and near-untouchables at the other. These variations derive from the belief that certain behavior patterns and occupations are polluting, a concept that gave rise to a distinction between "clean" and "unclean"

Śūdra groups. Many CASTES claiming Kṣatriya and Vaiśya status gradually emerged from the Śūdra class.

SUFISM \ˈsü-fi-zəm\, mystic Islamic belief and practice that seeks to find divine love and knowledge through direct personal experience of God. Sufism consists of a variety of mystical paths that are designed to ascertain divine and human nature and to facilitate the experience of divine love and wisdom in the world.

The Arabic term ṣūfī ("mystic") derives from ṣuf, "wool," probably in reference to the woolen garments worn by early Islamic ascetics. Sufism as an organized movement arose, in part, as a reaction against the worldliness of the early Umayyad period (661–750 CE). Yearning for a personal union with God, the mystics found the externalities of the law, divorced from a personal theology, very unsatisfactory and increasingly asserted a way (ṭarīqa, "path") and a goal (ḥaqīqa, "reality") alternative to those of the SHARĪʿA, or traditional law. Sufism similarly opposed its intuitionism (maʿrifa, "interior knowledge") to the rational deductions of formal theology (ʿilm al-kalām).

The mainstream of the Sufis strove to remain within the bounds of the belief and practice of the majority and declared that the observance of the Sharīʿa was indispensable; indeed, from the early period they had attempted to develop a scheme of partly antithetical and partly complementary categories (e.g., annihilation and restoration; intoxication and sobriety) to achieve a synthesis of the external and the internal. But the opposition of these two aspects continued to be emphasized. During the late 12th and early 13th centuries, under the influence of speculative MYSTICISM, IBN AL-ʿARABĪ produced a system that created a complete chasm between the law and Sufism. In societies, such as Islamic India, that had a strong pre-Islamic heritage of mysticism, this chasm became much wider. Sufism developed into DERVISH orders, which emphasized emotionalism and hypnotic and ecstatic states and which remained influential until very recent times.

The flowering of Sufi literature, especially mystical love poetry, represents a golden age among the Arabic, Persian, Turkish, and Urdu languages. And it was largely through the efforts of Sufi missionaries that ISLAM was extended into India, Central Asia, Turkey, and sub-Saharan Africa. Numerous Sufi orders and suborders exist, each characterized by variations in certain basic practices. A primary spiritual technique of Sufism is DHĪKR, the recitation of the name of God or of certain Qurʾanic phrases. Through discipline and the gift of grace, the "wayfarer" seeks to loosen the bonds of his lower self until they are severed altogether, enabling the soul to experience the true reality (ḤAQĪQA) toward which it naturally aspires.

SUHRAWARDĪ, AL- \əl-süh-rā-wär-ˈdē\, in full Shihāb al-Dīn Yahyā ibn Ḥabash ibn Amīrak al-Suhrawardī (b. c. 1155, Suhraward, near Zanjān, Iran—d. 1191, Ḥalab, Syria), theologian and philosopher who was a leading figure of the illuminationist school of Islamic philosophy, which attempted to create a synthesis between philosophy and MYSTICISM.

After studying at Iṣfahān, a leading center of Islamic scholarship, al-Suhrawardī traveled through Iran, Anatolia, and Syria. Influenced by mystical teachings, he spent much time in meditation and retreat. His teachings, particularly the pantheistic overtones of his mystical doctrines, aroused the opposition of established 'ULAMĀ', who had him put to death. The appellation al-Maqtūl ("the Killed") meant that he was not to be considered a shahīd ("martyr").

The more than 50 separate works that were attributed to al-Suhrawardī fall into two categories: doctrinal and philosophical accounts containing commentaries on the works of Aristotle and Plato, as well as his own contribution to the illuminationist school; and shorter treatises, generally written in Persian and of an esoteric nature, meant to illustrate the paths and journeys of a mystic before he could achieve ma'rifa (esoteric knowledge).

In his best-known work, Ḥikmat al-ishrāq ("The Wisdom of Illumination"), he said that essences are creations of the intellect, having no objective reality or existence. Concentrating on the concepts of being and non-being, he held that existence is a single continuum that culminates in a pure light that he called God. Other stages of being along this continuum are a mixture of light and dark.

Al-Suhrawardī also founded a mystical order known as the Ishrāqīya. The Nūrbakhshīya order of dervishes (itinerant holy men) also traces its origins to him.

SUHWARWĀDIYA \sūh-rā-wār-'dē-ə\, Sufi Muslim order noted for the severity of its spiritual discipline, founded in Baghdad by Abū Najīb al-Suhrawardī and developed by his nephew 'Umar al-Suhrawardī. The order's ritual prayers (DHIKR) are based upon thousands of repetitions of seven names of God, identified with seven "subtle spirits" (laṭā'if sab'a) which in turn correspond to seven lights.

The main order became concentrated in Afghanistan and the Indian subcontinent, while other branches moved westward. The Khalwatīya, also strictly disciplined, was founded in Iran by 'Umar al-Khalwatī, then spread into Turkey and Egypt in many branches. The Ṣafawīya, organized by ṢAFĪ AL-DĪN, at Ardabil, Iran, gave rise to the Iranian Ṣafavid dynasty (1502–1736) and several Turkish branches active against the Ottomans early in the 16th century. The Algerian Raḥmānīya grew out of the Khalwatīya in the second half of the 18th century.

SUKHĀVATĪ VYŪHA SŪTRAS \sū-'kāvə-tē-'vyū-hə-'sū-trəz\, MAHĀYĀNA Buddhist texts that describe Sukhāvātī (Sanskrit: "Pure Land"), the Western Paradise of the Buddha AMITĀBHA. According to followers of the PURE LAND sects, rebirth in Sukhāvātī is ensured by invoking the name of Amitābha, particularly at the moment of death. Sukhāvātī is expressively described in the sūtras as being a joyous and beautiful world where Amitābha sits on a lotus in the midst of a terraced pond, attended by the BODHISATTVAS AVALOKITEŚVARA and Mahāsthāmaprāpta. The newly dead enter into lotus buds, which unfold when the occupants have become entirely purified. They remain in this land until their final enlightenment.

SUKKOT \sū-'kōt, 'sū-kəs\ (Hebrew: "huts," or "booths"), also spelled Sukkoth, also called Feast of Tabernacles, or Feast of Booths, singular Sukka \sū-'kā, 'sū-kə\, in JUDAISM, a festival that begins on the 15th day of Tishri (in September or October), five days after YOM KIPPUR. It is one of the three PILGRIM FESTIVALS of the OLD TESTAMENT.

The BIBLE refers to ḥag ha-asif ("Feast of the Ingathering," EXODUS 23:16) at the harvest's end, and to ḥag ha-sukkot ("Feast of Booths," Leviticus 23:34), recalling the days when the Israelites lived in huts (sukkot) during their years of wandering after the Exodus from Egypt. The festival is characterized by the building of huts made of branches and by the gathering of four species of plants, with prayers of thanksgiving for the fruitfulness of the land. A sevenfold circuit of the SYNAGOGUE is made with the four plants on the seventh day of the festival, called by the special name Hoshana Rabba ("Great Hosanna").

SULTAN \səl-tən, sül-'tän\, Arabic sultān, originally, according to the QUR'AN, moral or spiritual authority; the term later came to denote political or governmental power and from the 11th century was used as a title by Muslim sovereigns. Maḥmūd of Ghazna (reigned 998–1030 CE) was the first Muslim ruler to be called sultan by his contemporaries, and under the Seljuqs of Anatolia and Iran it became a regular title. Thereafter it was frequently conferred on sovereigns by the CALIPH and came to be used throughout the Islamic world.

SUN DANCE, most spectacular and important religious ceremony of the Plains Indians of 19th-century North America, ordinarily held by each tribe once a year in early summer in order to give thanks to the creator and ask for the rejuvenation of the cosmos (see NATIVE AMERICAN RELIGIONS).

The ceremony was most highly developed among the Arapaho, Cheyenne, and Oglala Sioux (and may have originated with these tribes). By the end of the 19th century, it had spread with local variations to include most of the tribes from the Plains Ojibwa in Saskatchewan south to the Kiowa in Texas. The development of total tribal participation, widespread cooperative effort, direction by tribal and religious leaders, and elaboration beyond the immediate Sun Dance indicate the meaning of this ceremony in terms of tribal aspirations (secular and religious) and in the reinforcement of social control.

In the most elaborate versions a great camp circle was formed, preliminary instruction was given to the pledger and his associates, necessary supplies were gathered, and a dance lodge was erected with a central pole to symbolize the sun; usually parts of sacred animals such as the eagle and buffalo were placed on the pole. Preliminary dances and the erection of an altar were followed by the Sun Dance itself. This continued intermittently for several days and nights; during this time those dancers who were fulfilling a vow or seeking power neither ate nor drank. Among some tribes self-torture and mutilation ended the rite.

In an effort to curb such practices, the United States government outlawed the Sun Dance in 1904. Among a number of tribes benign forms of the ceremony continued, usually as part of Fourth of July celebrations. There were a few tribes, however, that attempted to revive the Sun Dance in its original form and meaning.

SUNDAY, in CHRISTIANITY, the Lord's Day, the weekly memorial of JESUS CHRIST'S RESURRECTION. The practice of Christians gathering for worship on Sunday dates to apostolic times. It replaced Saturday, observed as SABBATH by Jews, and became the Christian "Sabbath." Before the end of the 1st century CE, the author of Revelation gave the first day its name of the "Lord's Day" (Revelation 1:10). ST. JUSTIN MARTYR (c. 100–c. 165) described the style of worship on this day: The Gospel or the OLD TESTAMENT was read, the presiding minister preached a sermon, and the group prayed together and celebrated the Lord's Supper.

The emperor Constantine (d. 337) introduced the first civil legislation concerning Sunday in 321, when he decreed that all work should cease on Sunday, except that farmers could work if necessary. This law, aimed at providing time for worship, was followed later and in subsequent centuries by further restrictions on Sunday activities.

SUNNA \ˈsū-nə, ˈsə-, also spelled sunnah (Arabic: "prescribed way," or "habitual practice"), in ISLAM, body of traditional social and legal custom and practice. In pre-Islamic Arabia, sunna referred to ancestral, normative practices of the tribe or community. The early Muslims did not immediately concur on what constituted their sunna. Some looked to the people of MEDINA, others followed the behavior of the Companions of MUHAMMAD, whereas the provincial legal schools attempted to equate sunna with an ideal system—based partly on what was traditional and partly on precedents that they themselves had developed. These varying sources, which created differing community practices, were finally reconciled late in the 8th century by the legal scholar AL-SHĀFIʿĪ (767–820), who accorded the sunna of the Prophet Muhammad, as preserved in eyewitness records of his words, actions, and approbations, and known as the HADITH, normative and legal status second only to that of the QURʿAN.

The authoritativeness of the sunna was further strengthened when Muslim scholars, in response to the wholesale fabrication of hadiths by supporters of various doctrinal, legal, and political positions, developed ʿilm al-ḥadīth, the science of attesting the authenticity of individual traditions. The sunna was then used in TAFSĪR, Qurʿanic EXEGESIS, to supplement the meaning of the text, and in FIQH, Islamic jurisprudence, as the basis of legal decisions not discussed in the Qurʿan.

SUNNI \ˈsūn-nē, ˈsū-nē\, the larger of the two major branches of ISLAM, the other being the minority SHĪʿITES. Sunni Muslims regard their branch as representing mainstream and traditional Islam. Sunnis constitute the majority of Muslims in all nations except Iran, Iraq, Bahrain, and perhaps Yemen. In the early 21st century there were more than 1,000,000,000 Sunnis worldwide.

Sunnis recognize the first four CALIPHS as the rightful successors of MUHAMMAD, whereas the Shiʿites believe that Muslim leadership properly belonged only to Muhammad's son-in-law, ʿALĪ, and his descendants. In contrast to the Shiʿites, the Sunnis have long conceived of the theocratic state built by Muhammad as an earthly, temporal dominion and have thus regarded the leadership of Islam as being determined not by divine order or inspiration but by the prevailing political realities of the Muslim world. This stance led historically to Sunni acceptance of the leadership of the foremost families of Mecca; they likewise have accepted unexceptional and even foreign caliphs, so long as their rule allowed for the proper exercise of religion and the maintenance of order. The Sunnis accordingly held that the caliph must be a member of Muhammad's tribe, the QURAYSH, but they devised a theory of election that was flexible enough to permit giving allegiance to the caliph no matter what his origins may be. The distinctions between the Sunnis and other Islamic groups regarding the proper basis of spiritual and political authority remained firm even after the end of the caliphate itself in the 13th century.

Sunni orthodoxy is marked by an emphasis on the views and customs of the majority of the community. The institution of consensus evolved by the Sunnis allowed them to incorporate various customs and usages that arose through ordinary historical development but that nevertheless had no roots in the QURʿAN.

SUN WORSHIP, veneration of the sun or a representation of the sun as a deity.

Elaborate sun worship is relatively rare. Though almost every culture uses solar motifs, only a relatively few cultures (Egyptian, Indo-European, and Pre-Columbian) developed solar religions. Most of these groups had in common a strong ideology of SACRED KINGSHIP with a well-developed urban civilization; important exceptions to the urban setting for solar worship include the various Plains Indian communities of North America. In all of them, a prominent image is the sun as the ruler of both the upper and the lower worlds that he majestically visits on his daily round.

In ancient Egypt the sun god RE was the dominant figure among the high gods and retained this position from early in that civilization's history. When the pharaoh Ikhnaton reformed EGYPTIAN RELIGION, he took up the cult of the ancient deity Re-Horakhte under the name of ATON, an older designation of the sun's disk. Under Akhenaton, the sun's qualities as creator and nourisher of the Earth and its inhabitants are glorified.

The sun god occupied a central position in both Sumerian and Akkadian religion, and was one of the most popular deities among the Indo-European peoples as a symbol of divine power to them. The Indo-European character of sun worship is seen in the conception of the SOLAR DEITY, drawn in his carriage, common to many Indo-European peoples, and recurring in Indo-Iranian, Greco-Roman, and Scandinavian mythology.

SUPERNATURALISM

During the later periods of Roman history, sun worship gained in importance and ultimately led to what has been called a “solar MONOTHEISM.” Nearly all the gods of the period were possessed of solar qualities, and both JESUS CHRIST and MITHRA acquired the traits of solar deities; the date of December 25 as CHRISTMAS once belonged to the feast of SOL Invictus (Unconquered Sun).

An impressive example of the solar cult is the SUN DANCE of the Plains Indians of North America which is still carried out in several communities. In the Pre-Columbian civilizations of Mexico and Peru, sun worship was a prominent feature. In Aztec religion extensive HUMAN SACRIFICE was demanded by the sun gods Toniaturh and HUITZILOPOCHTLI. In both Mexican and Peruvian ancient religion, the Sun occupied an important place in myth and ritual. The ruler in Peru was an incarnation of the sun god, INTI. In Japan the sun goddess, AMATERASU, who played an important role in ancient mythology and was considered to be the supreme ruler of the world, was the tutelary deity of the imperial clan, and to this day the sun symbol represents the Japanese state.

SUPERNATURALISM, term opposite in meaning to “naturalism” or “nature.” See also OCCULTISM.

SUPERSTITION, term used to imply that religion or certain religions are irrational. It is a pejorative which usually implies an evolution of rationality from the “primitive” to a “civilized,” or “modern” mode of thought. Thus, religion, when viewed as superstition, is viewed as a less rational stage of human cognitive development.

SUPPLICATIO \sü-plē-‘kä-tē-ō\, in ROMAN RELIGION, rite or series of rites celebrated either as a thanksgiving to the gods for a great victory or as an act of humility after a national calamity. During those times the public was given general access to some or all of the gods; the statues or sacred emblems of the gods often were placed on platforms or couches. Originally a supplicatio lasted from one to five days, but in later times it was extended to 10, 20, or even 50 days. On one occasion an expiatory supplicatio was celebrated in association with a LECTISTERNIUM, in which images of pairs of gods were exhibited on couches before tables spread with food, but the supplicatio was originally a Roman custom and not, as with the lectisternium, imported from Greece.

SŪRA \‘sü-rä\ (Arabic), also spelled surah, chapter in the QUR’AN. Each of the 114 sūras, which vary in length from several pages to several words, encompasses one or more revelations received by MUHAMMAD from ALLĀH (God). In the traditional Muslim classification, the word Madaniya (“of Medina”) or Makkiyah (“of Mecca”) appears at the beginning of each sūra, indicating to some Muslim scholars that the sūra was revealed to Muhammad in the period of his life when he was preaching in one or the other of these cities. In some cases an intermixture of verses is similarly designated; modern critical scholarship, however, does not accept the validity of these divisions. Except for the first sūra, the FĀTIHA (Arabic: “the opening”), the sūras are mostly arranged in descending order of length and are numbered serially. They are further identified by a name, usually derived from an unusual image appearing in the text but not necessarily indicative of the general content (for example: Cow, Spider, Blood Clot). About one-fourth of the sūras are also preceded by the fawātih; these are detached letters, the function and meaning of which have not yet been satisfactorily determined.

Every sūra but the ninth opens with the basmala formula (“in the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful”) and is followed by numbered verses (āyas) written in prose, much of which is of a highly intense quality and is often rhymed. All the sūras—except the fātiha, which is a short devotional prayer, and the last two sūras—are in the form of an address from God, either speaking himself in the first person or speaking through the imperative form qūl, “say!,” and ordering that the words that follow be proclaimed. The subject matter of the revelations is varied, ranging from stories of previous prophets (ABRAHAM, MOSES, JESUS) to ESCHATOLOGY. The general tone is deeply moralistic and theocentric, reverberating with a demand for obedience to a transcendent but compassionate God.

In pious circles the Qur’an is often divided into 30 equal sections known as juz’ (Persian and Urdu sipāra, or pāra). These break up the sūras arbitrarily, without regard to content, into 30 parts in order to facilitate the systematic reading of the entire Qur’an in 30 days, or one lunar month.

SŪRDĀS \sür-‘dās\ (fl. 16th century, probably in Braj, India; traditionally b. 1483—d. 1563), North Indian devotional poet known for lyrics addressed especially to KRISHNA that are usually considered to be the finest expressions of Brajbhasa, one of Hindi's two principal literary dialects. Owing to a biographical tradition preserved in the VALLABHA SAMPRADĀYA, Sūrdās (or Sūr, for short) is usually regarded as having taken his inspiration from the teachings of Vallabha, whom he is supposed to have met in 1510. Sūr is said to have become foremost among the poets the Sampradāya designates as its AṢṬACHĀP ("eight seals"), following the convention that each poet affixes his oral signature (chāp, or "seal") at the conclusion of each composition. Yet a number of factors render this connection historically doubtful: the awkward logic of the story of the meeting of the poet and philosopher, and the absence from early Sūrdās poems of any mention of Vallabha and of any clear debt to major themes in his theology. More likely, Sūrdās was an independent poet, as is suggested by his continuing appeal to members of all sectarian communities and well beyond. He probably became blind in the course of later life (the Vallabhite story makes him blind from birth), and to this day blind singers in North India refer to themselves as Sūrdās.

Poems attributed to Sūrdās have been composed and collected gradually, swelling a corpus of about 400 poems that must have been in circulation in the 16th century to editions of some 5,000 in the 20th century. A 19th-century manuscript boasts twice that number. The size of this cumulative tradition, in which later poets evidently composed in Sūr's name, justifies a title that had already been assigned to the corpus by 1640: Sūrsāgar ("Sūr's Ocean"). The Sūrsāgar's modern reputation focuses on descriptions of Krishna as a lovable child, usually drawn from the perspective of one of the cowherding women (gopīs) of Braj. In its 16th-century form, however, the Sūrsāgar gravitates much more to descriptions of Krishna and RĀDHĀ as beautiful, youthful lovers; the pining (viraha) of Rādhā and the gopīs for Krishna when he is absent—and sometimes vice versa; and a set of poems in which the gopīs lambast Krishna's messenger Ūdho (Sanskrit: Uddhava) for trying to satisfy them with his spiritual presence once he has finally left their midst. They will have nothing less than the real, physical thing. In addition, poems of Sūr's own personal BHAKTI are prominent, whether as celebration or longing, and episodes from the RĀMĀYAṆA and MAHĀBHĀRATA also appear.

SURPLICE, white outer vestment worn by clergymen, ACOLYTES, choristers, or other participants in ROMAN CATHOLIC and in ANGLICAN, LUTHERAN, and other Protestant religious services. It is a loose garment, usually with full sleeves.

SŪRYA \ˈsūr-yə\, in HINDUISM, the sun and the sun god. Although in the Vedic period several other deities also possessed solar characteristics, most of these were merged into a single god in later Hinduism. Sūrya was once ranked along with VISHNU, SHIVA, ŚAKTI, and GAṆEŚA, and many temples dedicated to him are found throughout India. These five deities are worshiped by a very important group of BRAHMINS, the Smārtas, and Sūrya is worshiped as the supreme deity by only a small following, the Saura sect, though he is invoked by most Hindus, and the Gāyatrī-mantra, uttered daily at dawn by orthodox Hindus, is addressed to the sun.

Sūrya is the mythological father of MANU (progenitor of the human race), YAMA (lord of death), the Aśvins (twin physicians to the gods), Karna (a great warrior of the MAHĀBHĀRATA), and Sugrīva (king of monkeys). The PURĀNAS record that the weapons of the gods were forged from pieces trimmed from Sūrya, whose full emanation was too bright to bear. His wife Uṣas—in some accounts, his mother or mistress—is the personification of dawn.

SUSANOO \sü,-sä-nō-'ō\, in full Susanoo no Mikoto, also spelled Susanowo (Japanese: "Impetuous Male"), in Japanese mythology, the storm god, younger brother of the sun goddess AMATERASU. He was born as his father Izanagi washed his nose.

Susanoo, driven out of heaven because of his outrageous behavior, descended into the land of Izumo in western Japan and killed an eight-headed dragon that had been terrorizing the countryside. From the dragon's tail he recovered the marvelous sword Kusanagi that he presented to his sister and that later came to form part of the Imperial Treasures of Japan. Susanoo married the girl he had rescued from the dragon; the most famous of their offspring was ŌKUNINUSHI, the "Master of the Great Land" (Izumo).

SUSO, HEINRICH \ˈsü-sō\, also spelled Seuse, also called Henry Suso, original name Heinrich von Berg (b. March 21, 1295?, probably Constance, Swabia—d. Jan. 25, 1366, Ulm), one of the chief German mystics and leaders of the Friends of God (Gottesfreunde), a circle of devout ascetic Rhinelanders who opposed contemporary evils and aimed for a close association with God.

Of noble birth, Suso joined the DOMINICAN order in Constance. Between c. 1322 and c. 1325 he was in Cologne for theological studies under MEISTER ECKHART, considered to be one of the greatest German speculative mystics. Suso returned c. 1326 to teach at Constance, where he wrote his first work, Little Book of Truth, in defense of Eckhart, who had been tried for his controversial works (1327). Suso's Little Book of Eternal Wisdom (c. 1328) is considered his masterpiece; for a period of one hundred years it was the most popular religious treatise. Although containing mystical topics and theological reflections, Eternal Wisdom is a practical work written in simple language.

In 1327/30 Suso was removed from his professorship for his teachings and for his defense of Eckhart, who was condemned by the pope in 1329. He became a preacher in Switzerland and the upper Rhine. After serving as prior of the Friends of God in Constance (1343–44), he was exiled to Diessenhofen, Switz., by the German king Louis IV the Bavarian. He was beatified by Pope Gregory XVI in 1831, and his traditional feast day is March 15.

SŪTRA \ˈsü-trə\ (Sanskrit: “thread”), Pāli sutta, in HINDUISM, a brief, aphoristic composition; in BUDDHISM, a more extended exposition, the basic form of the SCRIPTURES of both the THERAVĀDA and MAHĀYĀNA traditions. The early Indian philosophers did not work with written texts and later often disdained the use of them; thus, there was a need for very brief explanatory works that could be committed to memory. The earliest sūtras were expositions of ritual procedures, but their use spread. The sūtras of the Sanskrit grammarian Pāṇini (5th–6th century BCE) became in many respects a model for later compositions. Nearly all the Indian philosophical systems had their own sūtras, most of which were preserved in writing in the early centuries CE.

In the Buddhist sūtras a particular point of doctrine is propounded and deliberated. The most important collection of the Theravāda sūtras is to be found in the SUTTA PĪṬAKA section of the Pāli canon, which contains the discourses attributed to the BUDDHA GOTAMA. In Mahāyāna Buddhism sūtras are applied to expository texts.

SUTTA PĪṬAKA \ˈsüt-tə-ˈpi-tə-kə\ (Pāli: “Basket of Discourse”), Sanskrit Sūtra Pīṭaka, extensive collection of texts that contain—usually in a sermonic or poetic mode—the basic teachings of the THERAVĀDA school of BUDDHISM. For the most part the contents of the Sutta Pīṭaka are attributed to the Gotama Buddha himself. In the few instances where this is not the case they are attributed to his closest disciples and most accomplished early followers.

The schools whose works were written in Sanskrit divided this body of literature into four collections, called Āgamas. Roughly comparable collections, called Nikāyas, comprise the Pāli Sutta Pīṭaka of the Theravāda school, but with a fifth group, the Khuddaka Nikāya, added. The four Nikāyas that correlate with the four Āgamas are:

1. Dīgha Nikāya (“Long Collection”; Sanskrit Dīrghāgama), which includes basic teachings, legends, and moral rules. The first sutta, the Brahmajāla (“Divine Net”) Sutta, deals with fundamental Buddhist doctrines and with rival philosophies and reveals much about everyday life and religious practices of the period. The famous Mahāparinibbāna Sutta (“Discourse on the Great Final Extinction”—i.e., the Buddha’s release from the round of rebirths), one of the oldest texts in the canon, narrates the activities and teachings of the Buddha’s last year and describes his death and the events that followed immediately thereafter.

2. Majjhima Nikāya (“Medium [Length] Collection”; Sanskrit Madhyamāgama), covers nearly all aspects of Buddhism. Included are texts dealing with monastic life, the excesses of ASCETICISM, the evils of caste, Buddha’s debates with the Jains, and meditation, together with basic doctrinal and ethical teachings and many legends and stories.

3. Samyutta Nikāya (“Cluster Collection”; Sanskrit Samyuktāgama), suttas arranged more or less by subject matter into clusters. The best known sutta is the Dhammacakkapavattana-sutta (“Discourse on the Turning of the Wheel of the Law”), which contains the Buddha’s first sermon.

4. Aṅguttara Nikāya (“Item-more Collection”; Sanskrit Ekottarikāgama), a numerical arrangement, for mnemonic purposes, of 9,557 terse suttas. The first nipāta (“group”) in the collection contains suttas dealing with single things, such as the mind or the Buddha; the suttas in the second nipāta speak of pairs (two kinds of SIN); in the third there are triplets (three praiseworthy acts); and so on up to 11.

The Khuddaka Nikāya—to which there is no Sanskrit parallel that is considered to be an Āgama—includes 15 suttas. Among these are a number of famous and probably quite early suttas, such as the DHAMMAPADA and the Sutta-nipāta.

SUZUKI DAISETSU TEITARŌ \sü-ˈzū-kē-ˈdī-,set-sü-ˈtā-tā-rō\ (b. Oct. 28, 1870, Kanazawa, Japan—d. July 12, 1966, Kamakura), Japanese Buddhist scholar and thinker who was the chief interpreter of the ZEN school of BUDDHISM to the West during the first half of the 20th century.

Suzuki studied at the University of Tokyo. He became a disciple of Sōen, a noted Zen master of the day, and believed that under Sōen’s guidance he had attained the experience of SATORI (sudden enlightenment), which remained of fundamental importance throughout his life. During 1897–1909 Suzuki lived in the United States and collaborated with Paul Carus as a magazine editor. He attracted interest with his translation The Discourse on the Awakening of Faith in the Mahayana (1900) and the publication of Outline of Mahayana Buddhism (1907). He spent the last half of his life teaching, writing, and lecturing in Japan, the United States, and other countries.

SVADILFARI \ˈsvä-ˈthil-fär-ē\, in Norse mythology, horse belonging to a giant who offered to build a great wall around ASGARD (the kingdom of the gods) to keep invaders away. The gods stipulated that, if the builder completed the wall in one winter’s time, his reward would be the goddess FREYJA and possession of the sun and the moon. Svadilfari gave his owner such assistance that the wall was almost completed a few days before the end of winter. The gods, however, were able to cheat the giant with the aid of LOKI, who changed himself into a mare and attracted Svadilfari away from his work. From their union Loki bore Odin’s magical horse, SLEIPNIR.

SVANTOVIT \ˈsvän-tō-ˈvêt\, or Svantevit, Slavic war god. His citadel-temple at ARKONA was destroyed in the 12th century by invading Christian Danes.

SVAROG \ˈsvä-ˈrōg\, also called Zuarasici, Slavic deity, divine smith and instigator of monogamous marriage. The root svar means “quarrel” or “dispute.” Svarog was considered the father of DAZHBOG.

SVAROZHICH \ˈsvä-ˈrō-zhēch\, also spelled Svarozic, Svaroshigh, or Svaroziczu, in SLAVIC RELIGION, god of the sun, of fire, and of the hearth. He was worshiped in a temple at Radegast (now in eastern Germany). In myth he may have been the son of SVAROG and the brother of DAZHBOG, or he may have been identical to the latter.

ŚVETĀMBARA \ˈswä-ˈtām-bə-rə, shwä-\ (Sanskrit: “White-robed,” or “White-clad”), one of two principal sects of JAINISM, concentrated chiefly in Gujarāt and western Rājasthān states but found throughout northern and central India. The monks and nuns of the Śvetāmbara sect wear simple white garments, in contrast to the practice of the DIGAMBARA sect, which does not admit women into the ascetic order and whose monks are always nude.

Though the date of the schism is given by the Śvetāmbara sect as 83 CE, the earliest image of a TĪRTHĀNKARA (Jain savior) wearing a lower garment has been ascribed to the late 5th or 6th century.

SWĀMĪNĀRĀYAṆ \ˈswā-mē-nā-ˈrā-yən\, also spelled Swāmīnārāyaṇa, Hindu reform sect with a large popular following in Gujarāt state. The sect was founded in Ahmedabad about 1804 by Swāmī Nārāyaṇa, who emphasized the observance of traditional Hindu law, particularly in matters of CASTE, diet, and ritual. The sect worships KRISHNA and also the five major gods of orthodox HINDUISM, and it employs the VALLABHA MANTRA.

SWASTIKA, equilateral cross with arms bent at right angles, all in the same rotary direction, usually clockwise. The swastika is a symbol widely distributed throughout the ancient and modern world. The word is derived from Sanskrit svastika, “symbol promoting good fortune” (ultimately from the noun svasti, “well-being”). It was a favorite symbol on ancient Mesopotamian coinage. In Scandinavia the left-hand swastika was the sign for Thor’s hammer. The swastika also appeared in early Christian and Byzantine art, and it occurred in South and Central America (among the MAYA) and in North America (principally among the Navajo).

In India the swastika continues to be the most widely used auspicious symbol of Hindus, Jains, and Buddhists. Among the Jains it is the emblem of their seventh TIRTHANKARA (saint). Both Hindus and Jains use the swastika to mark the opening pages of their account books, thresholds, doors, and offerings. The right-hand swastika, which moves in a clockwise direction, is considered a solar symbol and imitates in the rotation of its arms the course taken daily by the Sun. The left-hand swastika (more correctly called the sauvastika), more often stands for night, the goddess KĀLĪ, and magical practices.

In the Buddhist tradition the swastika symbolizes the feet, or the footprints, of the Buddha. It is often placed at the beginning and end of inscriptions, and modern Tibetan Buddhists use it as a clothing decoration.

In Nazi Germany the swastika (German: Hakenkreuz) became the national symbol. In 1910 the poet and nationalist Guido von List had suggested the swastika as a symbol for all anti-Semitic organizations; and when the National Socialist Party was formed in 1919–20, it adopted it. This use of the swastika ended in World War II with the German surrender in May 1945, though the swastika is still favored by neo-Nazi groups.

SWEDENBORG, EMANUEL \ˈswē-dən-ˌbörg\, original name Emanuel Swedberg, or Svedberg (b. Jan. 29, 1688, Stockholm, Swed.—d. March 29, 1772, London, Eng.), Swedish scientist, Christian mystic, philosopher, and theologian who wrote voluminously on his interpretation of the SCRIPTURES as the immediate word of God. Soon after his death, followers created Swedenborgian societies dedicated to the study of his thought. These societies formed the nucleus of the Church of the New Jerusalem, or NEW CHURCH, also called the Swedenborgians.

Swedenborg’s father was a prominent member of the Swedish clergy. After graduating from the University of Uppsala in 1709, Swedenborg began to publish that country’s first scientific journal, Daedalus Hyperboreus, in 1715. After several years of anatomical research he underwent a painful religious crisis, from which there survives his Journal of Dreams (1743–44). On April 7, 1744, he had his first vision of Christ, which gave him a temporary rest from the temptations of his own pride and the evil spirits he believed to be around him. A definite call to abandon worldly learning occurred in April 1745, Swedenborg told his friends in his later years. The call apparently came in the form of a waking vision of the Lord. Swedenborg left his remaining works in the natural sciences unfinished.

For the remainder of his long career, Swedenborg interpreted the BIBLE and related what he had seen and heard in the world of spirits and ANGELS. From 1749 to 1771 he wrote some 30 volumes, the major part anonymously. Among these were Arcana Coelestia, 8 vol. (1749–56; Heavenly Arcana) and Apocalypsis Explicata, 4 vol. (1785–89; Apocalypse Explained), which contain his commentaries on the internal spiritual meaning of GENESIS and EXODUS and on the Book of Revelation, respectively. De Coelo et ejus Mirabilibus et de Inferno (1758; On Heaven and Its Wonders and on Hell) is perhaps his best-known theological work. He gave a summary of his theological thinking in his last work, the Vera Christiana Religio (1771; True Christian Religion).

Swedenborg maintained that the infinite, indivisible power and life within all creation is God. The Father, the Son, and the HOLY SPIRIT represent a TRINITY of essential qualities in God; love, wisdom, and activity. This divine trinity is reproduced in human beings in the form of the trinity of soul, body, and mind. Swedenborg asserted that all created things are forms and effects of specific aspects of that love and wisdom and thus “correspond,” on the material plane, to spiritual realities. This true order of creation, however, has been disturbed by human beings’ diversion of their love from God to their own egos, thus bringing evil into the world.

In order to redeem and save humankind, the divine being of God had to come into the world in the form of a human being—i.e., JESUS CHRIST. During the course of his life on earth, Jesus resisted every possible temptation and lived to their divine fullness the truths of the Word of God; in so doing he laid aside all the human qualities he had received from MARY, and his nature was revealed as the divine embodiment of the divine soul. Redemption, for Swedenborg, consisted in humankind being recreated in God’s image through the vehicle of Christ’s glorification.

Upon his death Swedenborg was buried in the Swedish Church in London. At the request of the Swedish government, his body was removed to Uppsala Cathedral in 1908. The first Swedenborgian societies appeared in the 1780s, and the first independent congregation, the origin of the various Church of the New Jerusalem organizations, was founded in London by the end of that decade. Swedenborg’s influence was by no means restricted to his immediate disciples. His visions and religious ideas inspired writers such as August Strindberg, Ralph Waldo Emerson, and W.B. Yeats. His theological writings have been translated into many languages.

SYMBOLISM AND ICONOGRAPHY

forms and gestures, often complex, have long been used to convey religious concepts and in the visual, auditory, and kinetic representation of religious ideas and events. The importance of symbolical expression and of the pictorial presentation of religious facts and ideas has been confirmed, and the understanding of them widened and deepened, by the comparative study of the religions of the world. Systems of symbols and pictures that are constituted in a certain ordered and determined relationship to the form, content, and intention of presentation are believed to be among the most important means of knowing and expressing religious facts. The symbolic aspect of religion has been considered by some scholars of psychology and mythology to be the main characteristic of religious expression.

Nevertheless, there is little agreement among scholars as to how symbols should be interpreted. Some scholars have approached symbolism as if it were a code: match a given symbol with a given meaning, and the interpretation of all the world's symbols inexorably develops. However, as Sigmund Freud pointed out in The Interpretation of Dreams (1899), symbols are so deeply involved in the particular aspects of a given situation—language, cultural context, even individual experience and psychology—that any universalist approach is likely to miss the mark. STRUCTURALISM, meanwhile, insists that symbols acquire meaning only through the relations they bear to other symbols within the same cultural and linguistic context. Thus they cannot be interpreted except as a member of that set of symbols. Some scholars have asserted, on the same grounds, that symbols cannot be interpreted at all, or that they are not useful in the STUDY OF RELIGION.

THE NATURE OF RELIGIOUS SYMBOLS AND SYMBOLIZATION

The word symbol comes from the Greek symbolon, which means contract, token, insignia, and a means of identification. Parties to a contract, allies, guests, and hosts could identify each other with the help of the parts of the symbolon. In its original meaning the symbol represented and communicated a coherent greater whole by means of a part. The part, as a sort of certificate, guaranteed the presence of the whole and, as a concise meaningful formula, indicated the larger context. The idea of a symbol is based, therefore, on the principle of complementation. The symbolic object, picture, sign, word, or gesture requires the association of certain conscious ideas in order to fully express what is meant by it. To this extent it has both an esoteric and an exoteric, or a veiling and a revealing, function. The discovery of its meaning would thus presuppose a certain amount of active cooperation. As a rule, it is based on the convention of a group that agrees upon its meaning.

Concepts of symbolization. In examining the historical development and present use of the concepts of symbolization, a variety of categories and relationships must necessarily be differentiated. Religious symbols are used to convey concepts concerned with the relationship between humans and “the sacred” and also their social and material world. Other nonreligious types of symbols have been important in the modern world, especially those dealing with our relationship to and conceptualization of the material world. This type of secularized symbol functions in a manner similar to that of the religious symbol by associating a particular meaning with a particular sign. The rationalization of symbols and symbolical complexes as well as the rationalization of myth have been in evidence at least since the Renaissance.

The concept of the religious symbol embraces an abundantly wide variety of types and meanings. ALLEGORY, personifications, figures, analogies, metaphors, PARABLES, pictures (or, more exactly, pictorial representations of ideas), signs, emblems as individually conceived, artificial symbols with an added verbal meaning, and attributes as a mark used to distinguish certain persons all are formal, historical, literary, and artificial categories of the symbolical. The symbol (religious and other) is intended primarily for the circle of the initiated and involves the acknowledgment of the experience that it expresses. The meaning of the symbol is not, however, kept hidden; to some extent, the symbol even has a revelatory character (i.e., it goes beyond the obvious meaning for those who contemplate its depths). It indicates the need for communication and yet conceals the details and innermost aspects of its contents.

Varieties and meanings associated with the term symbol. Different forms and levels of the experience of and relationship to reality (both sacred and profane) are linked with the concepts of symbol, sign, and picture. The function of the symbol is to represent a reality or a truth and to reveal them either instantaneously or gradually. The relationship of the symbol to a reality is conceived of as somewhat direct and intimate and also as somewhat indirect and distant. The symbol is sometimes identified with the reality that it represents and sometimes regarded as a pure transparency of it. As a "sign" or "picture" the representation of the experience of and relationship to reality has either a denotative or a truly representative meaning. For instance, the doctrines of the nature of the presence of JESUS CHRIST in the sacrament of the EUCHARIST in the teachings of EASTERN ORTHODOXY, ROMAN CATHOLICISM, and the leaders of the Protestant REFORMATION demonstrate the various and extensive levels of symbolical understandings. These levels range all the way from the concept of physical identity in the TRANSUBSTANTIATION theory of Roman Catholicism (in which the substance of breadness and wine-ness is believed to be changed into the body and blood of Christ, though the apparent properties of the elements remain the same) through Luther's Real Presence theory (in which Christ is viewed as present, though the question of how is not answered because the question of why he is present is considered more important), and Huldrych Zwingli's sign (symbolic or memorial) theory, to the concept of mere allusion. The concept of the symbol permits all these interpretations.

Furthermore, a symbol in its intermediary function has aspects of epistemology (theory of knowing) and ontology (theory of being). As a means of knowledge, it operates in a characteristically dialectical process of veiling and revealing truths. It fulfills an interpretative function in the process of effectively apprehending and comprehending RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE. In doing so, the word, or symbol—with its meaning, contextual use, relationship to other types of religious expression, and interpretative connection with the various forms of sign, picture, gesture, and sound—plays an important part in the process of symbolical perception and reflection. Although the symbol is an abbreviation, as a means of communication it brings about—through its connection with the object of religion—not only an interpretative knowledge of the world and a conferral or comparison of meaning to life but also a means of access to the sacred reality. It may even promise a fusion, or union of some sort, with the divine.

The symbolic process. To trace the origin, development, and differentiation of a symbol is a complicated process. Almost every symbol and picture in religion is at first either directly or indirectly connected with the sense impressions and objects of the environment. Many are derived from the objects of nature, and others are artificially constructed in a process of intuitive perception, emotional experience, or rational reflection. In most cases, the constructions are again related to objects in the world of sense perception. A tendency toward simplification, abbreviation into signs, and abstraction from sense objects is quite evident, as well as a tendency to concentrate several processes into a single symbol. On the other hand, there is a tendency to accumulate, combine, multiply, and differentiate symbolical statements for the same thought or circumstance. Here, the same idea may be symbolically expressed in various manners; e.g., by means of representing persons, objects, animals, and signs, all side by side.

The foundations of the symbolization process lie in the areas of the conscious and the unconscious, of experience and thought, and of sense perception, intuition, and imagination. From these arises the structure of religious symbolism. Sensation and physiological and psychological processes participate in the formation of the symbol structure. Extraordinary experiences and conditions, visions, ECSTASY, and states of delirium must also be taken into consideration. The symbol itself, however, is intended as an objective concentration of experiences of the transcendent world and not as a subjective construction of a personally creative process. The process of rational conceptualization and structuralization also plays a part in the origin and development of many symbols. There is a correlation between sense perception, imagination, and the work of the intellect.

ICONS AND SYSTEMS OF ICONOGRAPHY

Throughout the history of their development, religious ICONOGRAPHY and symbolism have been closely interrelated. Many religious symbols can be understood as conceptual abbreviations, simplifications, abstractions, and stylizations of pictures or of pictorial impressions of the world of sense objects that are manifested in iconographic representations. In conceiving, describing, and communicating the experience of reality, the realistic picture and the nonrepresentational sign both have as their primary function the expression of this experience in religious terms. These pictures may also include other types of symbolic representation, such as words, tones, gestures, rituals, and architecture (see SACRED ARCHITECTURE).

Icons may portray the ritual means of attaining salvation or explain moral relationships and duties. They may borrow from myths and other religious narrative material to depict the historical past and the present, as well as the future and the afterlife. Or they may represent religious doctrine and the theological treatment of dogmatic themes, as well as other RELIGIOUS BELIEFS, religious experiences, and conceptions of a more individualistic nature.

Painted or sculptured tableaux of historical or mythical events originally belonged in a ritual setting.

These tableaux also may occasionally be found on the interiors and sometimes the exteriors of houses and on cemetery monuments. They are made for the purpose of serving private devotion and a personal confession of faith. In the form of a framed picture, Oriental roll picture, print, or book illustration, such an iconographic tableau contains religious information, and it thereby serves both to mediate and to stimulate contemplation and devotion.

It is generally the case that the religions of JUDAISM, ISLAM, and ancient SHINTŌ have rejected any representation of the divine (see ANICONISM).

SYMEON THE NEW THEOLOGIAN, SAINT \ˈsi-mē-ən\, also spelled Simeon (b. c. 949, Paphlagonia, in Asia Minor—d. March 12, 1022, Chrysopolis, near Constantinople [now Istanbul, Turkey]), Byzantine monk and mystic, called the New Theologian to mark his difference from two key figures in Greek Christian esteem both surnamed “the Theologian,” ST. JOHN THE EVANGELIST and the 4th-century theologian ST. GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS. Through his spiritual experiences and writings Symeon prepared the way for the MYSTICISM of HESYCHASM, a 14th-century Eastern movement in CONTEMPLATIVE prayer. (See also GREGORY PALAMAS.)

Symeon’s writings consist mainly of catecheses (Greek: “doctrinal and moral instructions”); sermons preached to his monks at St. Mamas, a series of short rules, capita (Latin: “chapters”); and the Hymns of the Divine Loves, describing his spiritual experiences. Symeon’s mystical theology is a distinct phase of an evolutionary process in Greek spirituality that began in the late 2nd century. Its central theme is the conviction that, by applying the classical methods of mental prayer, one experiences a contemplative “vision of light,” a symbolic term denoting the intuitional illumination that the mystic realizes in his encounter with the Divine Unknown. Symeon emphasized that such experience is attainable by all who earnestly immerse themselves in the life of prayer and is essential to interpreting sacred SCRIPTURES.

SYNAGOGUE, in JUDAISM, community house of worship that serves as a place not only for liturgical services but also for assembly and study. Its traditional functions are reflected in three Hebrew synonyms for synagogue: bet ha-tefilla (“house of prayer”), bet ha-kneset (“house of assembly”), and bet ha-midrash (“house of study”). The Greek word synagōgē, literally, “bringing together, assembly” (hence English synagogue), was first regularly applied to a house of worship by Jewish writers (and in the NEW TESTAMENT) in the 1st century CE. The Medieval Latin word schola, in the sense “assemblage, corporate body,” was used to refer to the synagogue and is most likely continued in the Yiddish word shul—a merger of a corresponding Judeo-Romance word with the Middle High German word schuole (“school”). In modern times, the word “temple” is common among some Reform and Conservative congregations.

The oldest dated evidence of a synagogue is from the 3rd century BCE, but synagogues doubtless have an older history. Some scholars feel that the destruction of Solomon’s Temple in 586 BCE gave rise to synagogues after private homes were temporarily used for public worship and religious instructions.

Other scholars trace the origin of synagogues to the Jewish custom of having representatives of communities outside Jerusalem pray together during the two-week period when priestly representatives of their community attended ritual sacrifices in the TEMPLE OF JERUSALEM.

Whatever their origin, synagogues flourished side by side with the ancient Temple cult and existed long before Jewish sacrifice and the established PRIESTHOOD were terminated with the destruction and plundering of the Second Temple by Titus in 70 CE. Thereafter, synagogues took on an even greater importance as the unchallenged focal point of Jewish religious life.

Literature of the 1st century refers to numerous synagogues not only in Palestine but also in Rome, Greece, Egypt, Babylonia, and Asia Minor. By the middle of that century, all sizable Jewish communities had a synagogue where regular morning, afternoon, and evening services were held, with special liturgies on the SABBATH and on religious festivals.

Modern synagogues carry on the same basic functions associated with ancient synagogues but have added social, recreational, and philanthropic programs as the times demand. They are essentially democratic institutions established by a community of Jews who seek God through prayer and sacred studies. Since the liturgy has no sacrifice, no priesthood is required for public worship. Because each synagogue is autonomous, its erection, its maintenance, and its RABBI and officials reflect the desires of the local community.

A typical synagogue contains an ARK (where the scrolls of the Law are kept), an “eternal light” burning before the Ark, two candelabra, pews, and a raised platform (bimah), from which scriptural passages are read and from which, often, services are conducted. The segregation of men and women, still observed in Orthodox synagogues, has been abandoned by Reform and Conservative congregations. A RITUAL BATH (mikveh) is sometimes located on the premises.

SYNCRETISM, RELIGIOUS \ˈsɪŋ-krə-ti-zəm\, fusion of diverse RELIGIOUS BELIEFS and practices. Instances of religious syncretism—as, for example, GNOSTICISM, which is a religious dualistic system that incorporated elements from the Oriental MYSTERY RELIGIONS, JUDAISM, CHRISTIANITY, and Greek religious philosophical concepts—were particularly prevalent during the Hellenistic period (c. 300 BCE–c. 300 CE). The fusion of cultures that was effected by the conquest of Alexander the Great (4th century BCE), his successors, and the Roman Empire tended to bring together a variety of religious and philosophical views that resulted in a strong tendency toward religious syncretism. Orthodox Christianity, although influenced by other religions, generally looked negatively upon these syncretistic movements.

Syncretistic movements in the Orient, such as MANICHAEISM (a dualistic religion founded by the 3rd-century-CE Iranian prophet MANI, who combined elements of Christianity, Zoroastrianism, and BUDDHISM) and SIKHISM (a religion founded by the 15th–16th-century Indian reformer GURŪ NĀNAK, who combined elements of ISLAM and HINDUISM), also met with resistance from the prevailing religions of their respective areas.

SYNOD (from Greek synodos, “assembly”), in the Christian church, a local or provincial assembly of bishops and other church officials meeting to resolve questions of discipline or administration.

The earliest synods can be traced to meetings held by bishops from various regions in the middle of the 2nd century. A synod of bishops from the worldwide ROMAN CATHOLIC church meets in Rome at regular but infrequent intervals for the purpose of discussing matters of vital church interest, in an advisory capacity to the pope. In some Protestant churches, the term synod has come to signify an organizational unit.

The actions taken by individual synods sometimes have had lasting significance. In the SYNOD OF DORT (1618–19), the Dutch REFORMED CHURCH dealt with ARMINIANISM and sponsored reforms aimed at personal religious renewal.

SYNOPTIC GOSPELS \si-'nāp-tik\, the Gospels of Matthew, Mark, and Luke in the NEW TESTAMENT. They have been called the Synoptic Gospels since the 1780s because, as distinguished from the Gospel of John, they are so similar in structure, content, and wording that they can easily be set side by side to provide a synoptic (presenting the same or common view) comparison of their content. The striking similarities between the first three Gospels prompt questions regarding the actual literary relationship that exists between them. This question, called the Synoptic problem, has been elaborately studied in modern times.

TABARĪ, AL- \ät-ˈtä-bə-,rē\, in full Abū Jaʿfar Muhammad ibn Jarīr al-Ṭabarī (b. 839, Āmol, Ṭabaristān [Iran]—d. 923, Baghdad, Iraq), Muslim scholar, author of enormous compendiums of early Islamic history and Qurʾanic EXEGESIS, who made a distinct contribution to the consolidation of SUNNI thought during the 9th century. His major works were the Qurʾan Commentary and the History of Prophets and Kings.

Life. The young al-Ṭabarī demonstrated a precocious intellect and journeyed from his native town to study in the major centers of learning in Iraq, Syria, and Egypt. Over the course of many years he collected oral and written material from numerous scholars and libraries for his later work. Al-Ṭabarī enjoyed sufficient financial independence to enable him to devote the latter part of his life to teaching and writing in Baghdad, the capital of the ʿAbbāsīd caliphate, where he died in 923. The times in which he lived were marked by political disorder, social crisis, and philosophical-theological controversy. Discontent, of diverse cause and circumstance, brought open rebellion to the very heart of the caliph’s empire, and, like all movements of socioeconomic origin in medieval ISLAM, sought legitimacy in religious expression directed against official Sunni orthodoxy.

Likewise retreating from the ultraorthodox Sunni faction, al-Ṭabarī established his own school of jurisprudence, which did not long survive his own death. He nevertheless made a distinct contribution to the consolidation of Sunni thought during the 9th century through his reorganization of material for historical and Qurʾanic studies, condensing the vast wealth of exegetical and historical erudition of the preceding generations of Muslim scholars (many of whose works are not extant in their original form).

Major works. His labor began with the Qurʾan Commentary, in which his method was to follow the QURʾAN text word by word, juxtaposing all of the juridical, lexicographical, and historical explanations transmitted in reports from the Prophet MUHAMMAD, his companions, and their followers. To each report (HADITH) was affixed a chain of “transmitters” (ISNĀD) purporting to go back to the original informant. Divergent reports were seldom reconciled, the scholar’s only critical tool being his judgment as to the soundness of the isnād and not of the content of the Hadith. Thus plurality of interpretation was admitted on principle. This was followed by the History of Prophets and Kings, which began with the Creation, followed by accounts regarding the patriarchs, prophets, and rulers of antiquity. The history of the Sāsānian kings came next. For the period of the Prophet’s life, al-Ṭabarī drew upon the extensive research of 8th-century Medinan scholars whose perspective of Muslim history evolved as a theocentric (god-centered) universal history of PROPHECY culminating in the career of Muhammad.

The sources for al-Ṭabarī’s History, covering the years from the Prophet’s death to the fall of the Umayyad dynasty (661–750), were short monographs, each treating a major event or the circumstances attending the death of an important person. Al-Ṭabarī supplemented this material with historical reports embodied in works on genealogy, poetry, and tribal affairs. Further details of the early ʿAbbāsīd period were available to him in a few histories of the CALIPHS that unfortunately have come down only in the fragments preserved by al-Ṭabarī. From the beginning of the Muslim era (dated from 622, the date of the HIJRA—the Prophet Muhammad’s migration from MECCA to MEDINA), the History is arranged as a set of annals according to the years after the Hijra, terminating in the year 915. It grew so popular that the Sāmānid prince Manšūr ibn Nūh had it translated into Persian (c. 963).

Views of history. Al-Ṭabarī saw no relevance in searching for the nature and causes of events, for any ultimate explanation lay beyond history itself and was known to God alone. Prophetic tradition, like the Qurʾan, provided positive commands and injunctions from God. History pointed to the consequences of heeding or ignoring him. For al-Ṭabarī, therefore, history was the divine will teaching by example. See also TAFSĪR.

TABERNACLE, Hebrew Mishkan (“Dwelling”), in Jewish history, portable SANCTUARY constructed by MOSES as a place of worship for the Hebrew tribes during the period of wandering that preceded their arrival in the Promised Land. The Tabernacle no longer served a purpose after the erection of Solomon’s TEMPLE IN JERUSALEM in 950 BCE.

The entire Tabernacle complex consisted of a large court surrounding a comparatively small building that was the Tabernacle proper. The court, enclosed by linen hangings, had the shape of two adjacent squares. In the eastern square stood the altar of sacrifice for burnt offerings; nearby stood a basin holding water used by the priests for ritual ABLUTIONS. The western square was occupied by the ARK of the Law, situated in the inner sanctuary of the Tabernacle.

The Tabernacle was constructed of tapestry curtains decorated with cherubim. The interior was divided into two rooms. The outer room, or “holy place,” contained the table on which the bread of the Presence (SHEWBREAD) was placed, the altar of incense, and the seven-branched candelabrum (MENORAH). The inner room, or HOLY OF HOLIES, was thought to be the actual dwelling place of the God of Israel, who sat invisibly enthroned above a solid slab of gold that rested on the ARK OF THE COVENANT and had a CHERUB at each end. This Ark was a gold-covered wooden box containing the tablets of the TEN COMMANDMENTS.

TABOO, Tongan tabu, Maori tapu, prohibition of an action or the use of an object based on ritualistic distinctions as being either sacred and consecrated or dangerous, unclean, and accursed. The term is of Polynesian origin and was first noted by Captain James Cook during his visit to Tonga in 1771; he introduced the term into the English language. Taboos were most highly developed in the Polynesian societ-

TAFSĪR \táf-'sēr\ (Arabic: “explanation”), science of explanation of the QUR’AN or of Qur’anic commentary. So long as MUHAMMAD was alive, no other authority for interpretations of the Qur’anic revelations was recognized by Muslims. Upon his death, however, commentaries were needed because the text, when it achieved written form, lacked historical sequence in the arrangement of materials, suffered from ambiguity of both text and meaning, showed a variety of differing readings, was recorded in a defective script, and even contained apparent contradictions. Many Muslims in the early period sought to explain the Qur’an on the basis of pure personal speculation, known as tafsīr bi’l-ra’y, and such interpretation, though generally disapproved, has persisted down ies of the South Pacific, but such ritual prohibitions have been present in virtually all cultures.

Taboos could include prohibitions on certain activities, dietary restrictions, prohibitions on talking to or touching certain people, prohibitions on walking or traveling in certain areas, and various taboos that function during important life events such as birth, marriage, and death. The two primary classes of taboos are those in which notions of sacredness or holiness are apparent and those in which notions of uncleanness are the motivating factor.

Generally, the prohibition that is inherent in a taboo includes the idea that a breach or defiance of the taboo will automatically be followed by some kind of trouble to the offender, such as lack of success in hunting or fishing, sickness, or the death of a relative. A person meets with an accident or has no success in a given pursuit, and, in seeking a reason for this turn of events, he or others infer that he has in some manner committed a breach of taboo.

Taboos as manifested in various cultures have stimulated an extensive scholarly literature that seeks to compare, analyze, and explain them. The most important researchers or theorists on the topic have included WILLIAM ROBERTSON SMITH, Wilhelm Wundt, and SIGMUND FREUD in his book Totem and Taboo (1913). Freud provided one of the most persuasive and ingenious explanations for the apparently irrational nature of taboos, positing that they were generated by ambivalent social attitudes and in effect represent forbidden actions for which there nevertheless exists a strong unconscious inclination. Freud directly applied this viewpoint to the most widespread of all taboos, the incest taboo, which prohibits sexual relations between close blood relatives. There is no generally accepted explanation of taboos, but there is broad agreement that the taboos current in any society tend to relate to objects and actions that are significant to the social order and that belong to the general system of social control.

to the present time. Others explained or embellished Qur’anic passages using stories drawn from Christian—and especially from Jewish—sources (Isrā’īliyāt). To counter the arbitrariness of such interpretation, in the fourth Islamic century (10th century CE) there emerged the religious science called ‘ilm al-tafsīr, a systematic EXEGESIS of the Qur’anic text, which proceeds verse by verse, and sometimes word by word. Over time this science developed several methods and forms of its own.

The Hungarian scholar Ignáz Goldziher traced the development of tafsīr through several stages. In the first, or primitive, stage, Muslims were concerned principally to establish the proper text of the Qur’an. The second stage, known as traditional tafsīr, featured explanations of Qur’anic passages based upon explanations attributed either to the Prophet himself or to his Companions. It relied, therefore, upon HADITH. As Muslims sought to establish their identity as a religious community and to define their doctrinal stance, there arose a dogmatic type of tafsīr. The Qur’an was interpreted by various sectarian groups to establish their own peculiar doctrinal positions; notable among them were the MU’TAZILA, so-called rationalists, who insisted that interpretation (ta’wīl) of the Qur’an must conform with reason. SUFIS and SHĪ’ITES with esoteric inclinations also practiced ta’wīl, departing sharply from a purely external analysis. A British scholar, John Wansbrough, classified tafsīr literature according to its form and function. He distinguished five types, which he held to have appeared in roughly chronological order: attempts to supply a narrative context for passages, efforts to explain the implications for conduct of various passages, concern with details of the text, concern with matters of rhetoric, and allegorical interpretation.

The monumental commentary compiled by the historian AL-ṬABARĪ (839–923) assembled all the traditional scholarship that had been produced until his time. It remains the most basic of all tafsirs. Subsequent commentaries of note include those by al-Zamakhsharī (1075–1143), AL-RĀZĪ (1149–1209), al-Bayḏawī (d. 1280), and al-Suyūṭī (1445–1505). Commentaries continue to be compiled at the present time; Muslim modernists, for example, have used them as a vehicle for their reformist ideas. See also EXEGESIS; SCRIPTURE.

TAGORE, DEBENDRANATH \ˈtā-gōr, Angl tə-ˈgōr\, Debendranath also spelled Devendranath, Bengali Debendranāth Thākūr \də-ˈben-drə-nāt-ˈtā-kūr\ (b. May 15, 1817, Calcutta, India—d. Jan. 19, 1905, Calcutta), Hindu philosopher and religious reformer, active in the BRAHMO SAMAJ.

Born into a wealthy landowning family, Tagore was educated in Sanskrit, Persian, English, and Western philosophy. He became a close friend of his fellow reformer KESHAB CHUNDER SEN. Tagore spoke out vehemently against SATĪ, a practice that was especially prevalent in Bengal. Together, Tagore and Sen attempted to raise the Indian literacy rate and to bring education within the reach of all. While Sen drifted toward CHRISTIANITY, Tagore remained a more conservative Hindu. This philosophical break between the two men eventually resulted in a SCHISM within the Brahma Samaj in 1866.

Tagore, in his zeal to erase Hindu IDOLATRY as well as divisive and undemocratic practices, finally rejected the whole of the VEDAS, claiming that no set of writings could furnish complete and satisfying guidelines to human activity. Failing to find a middle path between radical RATIONALISM and fanatical BRAHMIN conservatism, Tagore retired from public life, although he continued to instruct a small band of followers. In 1863 he founded Śāntiniketan (“Abode of Peace”), a retreat in rural Bengal later made famous by his son RABINDRANATH TAGORE, whose educational center there became an international university. Until his death Tagore bore the title Maharishi (“Great Sage”).

One of Tagore’s books was translated into English, Vedāntic Doctrines Vindicated (1845). His Brahmo-Dharma (1854; “The Religion of God”), a commentary in Bengali on the Sanskrit SCRIPTURES, is considered to be a masterpiece.

TAGORE, RABINDRANATH, Bengali Rabīndranāth Thākūr \rə-ˈbēn-drə-nāt-ˈtā-kūr\ (b. May 7, 1861, Calcutta, India—d. Aug. 7, 1941, Calcutta), Bengali poet, short-story writer, song composer, playwright, essayist, and painter who was awarded the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1913. Tagore introduced new prose and verse forms and the use of colloquial language into Bengali literature, thereby freeing it from traditional models based on classical Sanskrit. He was highly influential in introducing Indian culture to the West and vice versa and is generally regarded as the outstanding creative artist of modern India.

The son of the religious reformer DEBENDRANATH TAGORE, he early began to write verses and studied for a time in England. Returning to India, he published several books of poetry in the 1880s and completed Mānasī (1890), a collection that contains some of his best-known poems, including many in verse forms new to Bengali, as well as some social and political satire that was critical of his fellow Bengalis.

In 1891 Tagore went to East Bengal (now in Bangladesh) to manage his family’s estates at Shilaidah and Shazadpur for 10 years. His sympathy for the poverty and backwardness of the village folk there became the keynote of much of his later writing. During these years he published several poetry collections, notably Sonār Tarī (1894; The Golden Boat), and plays, notably Chitrāṅgadā (1892; Chitra). His more than 2,000 songs remain extremely popular among all classes of Bengali society.

In 1901 Tagore founded an experimental school in rural West Bengal at Śāntiniketan (“Abode of Peace”), where he sought to blend the best in the Indian and Western traditions. He settled there permanently; the school became Viśva-Bhārati University in 1921. His later poetry was introduced to the West in Gitanjali, Song Offerings (1912), containing Tagore’s English prose translations of religious poems from several of his Bengali verse collections. Hailed by W.B. Yeats and André Gide, it won him the Nobel Prize in 1913. He was awarded knighthood in 1915, but he repudiated it in 1919 as a protest against the AMRITSAR Massacre.

Tagore’s novels include Gora (1910) and Ghare-Baire (1916; The Home and the World). In the late 1920s Tagore took up painting and produced works that won him a place among India’s foremost contemporary artists.

ṬAHĀRA \tā-ˈhār-ə\ (Arabic: “purity”), system of ritual purity in ISLAM. This system is based on two premises: the first is that humans lapse from a state appropriate to ritual activity as a result of certain bodily acts, such as defecation, sexual intercourse, or MENSTRUATION. Second, there are certain substances, such as pork or blood, that are either unclean by nature or have the effect of defiling a space, person, or object, rendering it unfit for ritual use. In both cases, the unfitness of the thing or person can be remedied by the ritual application of water or of a simulacrum (sand, clean rock, etc.).

All things and places are presumed to be ritually acceptable or neutral unless Scripture—either QUR’AN or HADITH—indicates otherwise. Items that are always defiling are called najas and include swine, blood, dog saliva, and wine. All najas should be avoided when possible, and if clothing or dishes come in contact with these items they should be washed with water until there is no smell, sight, or other evidence of the proscribed item. Pork or carrion should never be eaten and neither should carrion eaters such as vultures or dogs; products such as feces or hides from these animals should also be avoided.

There are two ritually disabling states into which humans fall—affected (muḥḏath) and precluded (junub). Acts that are “affects” are called ḥadath, and these include defecation, urination, breaking wind, touching a person of the opposite sex (with desire, for most schools of Islamic jurisprudence), or touching one’s own genitals. For most jurists, unconsciousness or sleeping in a prone position make it probable that one has at least broken wind and so is affected. Likewise, violent laughter, coughing, or anger, according to many jurists, ought to occasion ritual purification, if they do not actually require it. Until the affected person undoes this state, he or she cannot perform ritual worship (ṢALĀT), circumambulate the KA’BA, or handle the Qur’an.

The ritual purification for being affected is called ABLUTION (wuḏū’). It consists of (1) intending to perform the wu- ḍū), (2) washing the hands three times, (3) rinsing out the mouth and snuffing water into the nostrils three times, and (4) washing the face from the hairline to the neck, the chin, and the openings of the nostrils. (5) The beard (if there is one) is then combed with wet fingers, and (6) the hands are washed up to the wrists three times. (7) The head—from the forehead to the nape of the neck, including the ears—is then rubbed with both hands, and (8) the feet, particularly the tops and including the ankles, are rubbed. Finally, (9) the Muslim says, “I bear witness that there is no God but God, the unique, who has no partner. I bear witness that MUHAMMAD is his servant and his Messenger.”

The other state of impurity, which is sometimes called the major impurity, is referred to in ritual texts as preclusion (janābah). It arises from sexual intercourse, seminal emission, menstruation, and childbirth. A person in a state of preclusion is ritually disabled like the affected person, but in addition he or she may not recite the Qurʾan, perform ritual recollections (DHIKR) of God, or fast for RAMADĀN. This disability is reversed by—according to most schools—adding the pouring of water over the entire body to the rituals of ablution. This LUSTRATION (ghusl) is the reason why bathhouses are found throughout Islamdom, since every act of sexual intercourse, every menstruation, and every childbirth requires lustration before the Muslim can resume his or her ritual life. Only women are ritually disabled in this major way by acts they cannot control, and only women cannot immediately lustrate themselves into a state of ritual capability.

Unlike in many other ritual communities, however, in SUNNI law a ritually disabled person does not, by touch, conversation, or other contact, have the power to disable another person ritually. Shiʿism differs from Sunni law precisely on this issue of the contamination through ritually disabled persons and impure substances. For Imami SHIʿITES, women who are menstruating can render a man in need of ablution by contact with her. Indeed, according to some legists, the very sweat of a menstruating woman, passing through her clothing, can ritually disable a man. Also, prayer in an area contaminated by an impure substance or person is invalid. In addition, Christians, Jews, and other non-Muslims have been seen in much of Shiʿite legal theory as ritually contaminating. According to some, food cooked by non-Muslims cannot be eaten, water being drunk by non-Muslims and the cup that contains it are ritually impure, and (as one of the distinctive features of Shiʿite law) Christians and Jews cannot be acceptable butchers, as they may be for Sunnis.

The penalties for transgressions of the rules of purity are generally mild. Muslims who have intercourse when the woman is menstruating must make a small donation to charity. Impure foods eaten inadvertently require no penance. Prayer or other rituals deliberately offered in a state of ritual impurity are simply invalid, causing one to suffer the double fault of disobeying God and failing validly to perform one's ritual obligations.

One of the most striking features of the Islamic legal (FIQH) literature on purity (as on most things) is the nearly complete absence of any justification for ritual rules. Why God ordained washing in a certain way as a precondition of prayer or excluded menstruating women from ritual was not explained by the legists. The arbitrariness of these rules—from a human point of view—was recognized in legal and theological discourse. The Sufi tradition, by contrast, did not shy from venturing such explanations, and works like Abū Ṭālib al-Makkī's Qut al-qulub and AL-GHA-

ZĀLĪ's Iḥyāʾ ʿulūm al-dīn are filled with explanations of the reasons or symbolism behind the rituals of purity. In SUFISM, they were particularly prone to see in the rituals of ablution and lustration figures of moral or spiritual purity. The cleansing of the body and the cleansing of the heart were conflated by Sufi legists, so that these rituals took on a deeper significance and acquired many layers of meaning.

In modern times the justification of ritual as obedience has seemed embarrassing to apologists, and from the 19th century both liberals and Islamists have labored to find the real point of these rituals. Most have assimilated ritual purity to “cleanliness” or “hygiene” and have seen in the rules for ablution a wise anticipation by God and his Prophet of the insights of modern scientists such as Louis Pasteur and Joseph Lister.

TA-HSÜEH \ˈdä-ˈshwe\, Pinyin Daxue (Chinese: “Great Learning”), text generally attributed to CONFUCIUS and TSENG-TZU. For centuries the text existed only as a chapter of the LI-CHI (“Collection of Rituals”). When CHU HSI, a 12th-century philosopher, published it separately as one of the “FOUR BOOKS” (Ssu-shu), it gained lasting renown.

Ta-hsüeh states that world peace is impossible unless a ruler first regulates his own country. But no ruler can do this without first setting his own household in order, which in turn is impossible before he has oriented his personal life by rectifying his heart and acquiring sincerity. These virtues are the natural consequence of expanded wisdom that results from investigating all things. It thus views good government and world peace as inseparably bound up with a ruler's personal virtue.

In his preface, Chu Hsi explained that the treatise is a means to personal development. Each individual, he says, must cultivate benevolence (JEN), righteousness (i), propriety (LI), and wisdom (chih), but virtue will not be acquired in equal measure by all. T'ien (Heaven), therefore, will see to it that the most virtuous man will rule.

ṬAḤṬĀWĪ, RIFĀʿA RĀFIʿ AL- \ˈtäk-ˈtä-wē\ (b. 1801, Ṭaḥṭā, Egypt—d. 1873, Egypt), teacher and scholar who was one of the first Egyptians to grapple with the question of adjusting to the West and to provide answers to this question in Islamic terms.

In 1826 al-Ṭaḥṭāwī went to Paris as a religious teacher to a group of Egyptian students there. After five years he returned to Egypt, and in 1836 he became head of the new School of Languages in Cairo. In 1841 he was placed in charge of a translation bureau, which dealt with books on history, geography, and military science. Under the Khedive ʿAbbās I, who ascended the throne in 1848, Western influences were suspect, and al-Ṭaḥṭāwī was sent to Khartoum, where he taught school. On the succession of Saʿīd (1854), al-Ṭaḥṭāwī returned to Cairo, where he continued his own scholarly work.

Al-Ṭaḥṭāwī saw the social order as being established by God and the ruler as God's representative. He believed that the only limitations on the ruler's authority were the dictates of his own conscience. Although the people had no rights, the ruler should rule with justice and should strive to foster their material well-being. The people in turn should conscientiously fulfill their duties as citizens, and the state should educate them to that end. Al-Ṭaḥṭāwī's modernism lay in his conception of the material progress that could be possible within the framework of a harmoniously functioning government and society, achieved with the aid of Western technology.

TAHUANTINSUYU \tä-,wän-tēn-'sü-yü\, also spelled Tawantinsuyu (Quechua: "Realm of the Four Parts"), territories spread over parts of Ecuador, Peru, Bolivia, Chile, and Argentina that, by the 1500s, were all part of a single Inca state. See also PRE-COLUMBIAN MESO-AMERICAN RELIGIONS.

T'AI, MOUNT \t'ä-\, Chinese (Wade-Giles) T'ai Shan \t'ä-'shän\, also called Yu-huang Shan \yüē-'hwäŋ-\, (Pinyin) Tai Shan, or Yuhuang Shan, principal peak of the T'ai Shan (mountain range); it lies to the north of the city of T'ai-an in Shantung Province, China. Since Ch'in times (221–206 BCE) it has also been known as Tung-yüeh (Eastern Peak), one of the five holy peaks of China, and has usually ranked as the first among them. Its name was changed from Mount T'ai to Mount Yu-huang by the Chinese Communists.

Historically an object of continuous veneration in the cult of the official state religion, Mount T'ai was also the site of the most awesome of all the state rituals of the traditional Chinese empire, the sacrifices called Feng and Shan, which symbolized the absolute establishment of a dynasty's fortunes. They were carried out at rare intervals—by the Former Han dynasty (206 BCE–8 CE) in 110, 106, 102, and 98 BCE; by the Later Han dynasty (23–220 CE) in 56 CE; and by emperors of the T'ang dynasty (618–907) in 666 and again in 725. These sacrifices announced to heaven and earth alike the accomplishment of dynastic success. Mount T'ai was also a deity in its own right, to which prayers were offered in spring for a good harvest and in autumn to give thanks for a completed harvest. Because Mount T'ai was the chief regional deity of eastern China, prayers were also offered to it in case of floods or earthquakes.

The mountain also became associated with a wide range of beliefs connected with TAOISM. It was considered the center of the Yang principle, the source of life, and from the Later Han period onward it was believed that the spirit of Mount T'ai commanded the fates of all humans and that after death their souls returned to Mount T'ai for judgment. In Ming times (1368–1644) the center of the popular cult was transferred from the god to his daughter, T'ai Shan Niang-niang (The Lady of Mount T'ai)—also called Pi-hsia Yüan-chün (The Goddess of the Variegated Clouds)—whose cult began to grow from about 1000 and who became a northern Taoist equivalent to the Buddhist KUAN-YIN (Goddess of Mercy), whose cult was powerful in central and southern China.

The slopes of Mount T'ai have remained covered with temples and shrines dedicated to the complex pantheon of minor deities with whom it is associated. In former times vast numbers of pilgrims visited it annually, and a great festival was held in the third month of the Chinese year.

T'AI-CHI \t'ä-'jē\, Pinyin Taiji (Chinese: "Great Ultimate"), in Chinese philosophy, the eternal source and cause of all reality. The concept is first mentioned in the I-CHING, where T'ai-chi is the source and union of the two primary aspects of the cosmos, yang (active) and yin (passive). The Neo-Confucian philosophers of the Sung dynasty (960–1279 CE) associated T'ai-chi with LI ("principle"), the supreme rational principle of the universe. Li engenders ch'i ("vital matter"), which is transformed through the yang and yin modes of development into the Five Elements (wood, earth, fire, metal, and water), which form the basic constituents of the physical universe.

T'AI-CHI CH'UAN \t'ä-'jē-'chwän\, Pinyin Taijichuan (Chinese: from T'ai-chi, "Great Ultimate" plus ch'uan, "fist," "boxing"), ancient and distinctive Chinese form of exercise or attack and defense. As exercise, T'ai-chi ch'uan is designed to provide relaxation in the process of body-conditioning exercise and is drawn from the principles of T'ai-chi, notably including the harmonizing of the yin and yang. It employs flowing, rhythmic, deliberate movements, with carefully prescribed stances and positions. As a mode of attack and defense, T'ai-chi ch'uan resembles kung fu and is properly considered a martial art. It may be used with or without weapons.

Freehand exercise to promote health was practiced in China as early as the 3rd century, and, by the 5th century, monks at the Buddhist monastery of Shao-lin were performing exercises emulating the five creatures: bear, bird, deer, monkey, and tiger. The snake was added later, and, by the early Ming dynasty (1368), the yin and yang principles had been added to harmonize the whole.

There have been many schools of T'ai-chi ch'uan, and two, the Wu and the Yang, survive. Depending on school and master, the number of prescribed exercise forms varies from 24 to 108 or more. The forms all start from one of three stances, weight forward, weight on rear foot, and horse riding, or oblique.

T'AIGO WANGSA \ta-'gō-'wäŋ-sä\ (b. 1301, Korea—d. 1382, Korea), Buddhist monk, founder of the T'aigo sect of Korean BUDDHISM. T'aigo entered into Buddhism at the age of 13 and at 25 passed the national Buddhist service examination. He built a temple north of Seoul in the mountain T'aigoam (whence his name was derived). In 1346 he went to China and received further training under the guidance of Shih-wu, the 18th patriarch in the Lin-chi branch of the Ch'an (ZEN) sect in China. In an attempt to reform Korean Buddhism, T'aigo adopted the Regulations of the Ch'an Sect and in 1356 he established a new Buddhist administration office called Wonyung-bu. Though he became head of the office, his reform did not take, and the T'aigo sect remained relatively small.

T'AI HSÜ \t'ä-'shüē\, Pinyin Taixu, original name (Wade-Giles romanization) Lü P'ei-Lin (b. Jan. 8, 1890, Haining, Chekiang province, China—d. March 17, 1947, Shanghai), Chinese Buddhist monk and philosopher.

T'ai Hsü received his early training in BUDDHISM in the T'ien-tung Monastery near Ningpo. In 1912 he helped organize the Association for the Advancement of Buddhism with headquarters in Nanking. During 1918 he made an extended tour of Formosa (later Taiwan) and Japan, and in 1921 he began the publication of the influential journal Hai-ch'ao-yin ("The Voice of the Sea Tide"). T'ai Hsü was heavily influenced by Sun Yat-sen and by the revolution of 1911. He sought to reform the education of monks and promoted social welfare activities. In his attempts to form national and international Buddhist organizations he traveled to Japan again in 1925, to Europe and the United States in 1928–29, and to South and Southeast Asia in 1939 and 1941. T'ai Hsü attempted to harmonize Buddhism with modern scientific and philosophical thought. He also tried to synthesize the teachings of the rival schools of HUA-YEN and T'YEN-T'AI to bring them into harmony with Wei-shih (Ideation Only) philosophy.

TÁIN BÓ CÚAILGNE \tän'-'bō-'kü-əl'-'nə, -'kü-'l'ē\ (Irish Gaelic), English The Cattle Raid of Cooley, old Irish epic-like tale, the longest of the ULSTER CYCLE of hero tales dealing with the conflict between Ulster and Connaught over possession of the brown bull of Cooley. It was composed in the 7th and 8th centuries, probably by an author who was acquainted with epics such as the Latin Aeneid. It is partially preserved in The Book of the Dun Cow (c. 1100) and is also found in The Book of Leinster (c. 1160) and The Yellow Book of Lecan (late 14th century).

MEDB (Maeve), the warrior-queen of Connaught, disputes with her husband, Ailill, over their respective wealth. Because possession of the white-horned bull guarantees Ailill's superiority, Medb resolves to secure the even more famous brown bull of Cooley from the Ulstermen. Although Medb is warned by a prophetess of impending doom, the Connaught army proceeds to Ulster. The Ulster warriors are temporarily disabled by a curse, but CÚ CHULAINN, the youthful Ulster champion, is exempt from the curse and singlehandedly holds off the Connaughtmen. The climax of the fighting is a three-day combat between Cú Chulainn and FER DÍAD, his friend and foster brother, who has been bribed to fight him by Medb. Cú Chulainn is victorious, and, nearly dead from wounds and exhaustion, he is joined by the Ulster army, which routs the enemy. The brown bull, however, has been captured by Connaught and defeats Ailill's white-horned bull, after which peace is made.

TAIPING REBELLION \tā-'piŋ\, Pinyin Taiping (1850–64), radical political and religious upheaval in China. It ravaged 17 provinces, took some 20 million lives, and irrevocably altered the Ch'ing (Qing) dynasty (1644–1911/12).

The rebellion began under the leadership of Hung Hsiuch'üan (1814–64). Influenced by Christian teachings, Hung had a series of visions and believed himself to be the son of God, the younger brother of JESUS CHRIST, sent to reform China. A friend of Hung, Feng Yün-shan, utilized Hung's ideas to organize a new religious group, the God Worshipers' Society (Pai Shang-ti hui), among the peasants of Kwangsi. In 1847 Hung joined Feng and the God Worshipers, and three years later he led them in rebellion. On Jan. 1, 1851, he proclaimed his new dynasty, the T'ai-p'ing t'ien-kuo (Heavenly Kingdom of Great Peace), and assumed the title of T'ien-wang, or Heavenly King.

Their slogan—to share property in common—attracted many famine-stricken peasants, workers, and miners, as did their propaganda against the foreign Manchu rulers of China. Their ranks swelled to more than 1,000,000 soldiers, organized into separate men's and women's divisions. Sweeping north through the Yangtze River Valley, they reached Nanking. After capturing the city on March 10, 1853, they renamed it T'ien-ching (Heavenly Capital) and dispatched a northern expedition to capture the Manchu capital at Beijing. This failed, but another expedition into the Upper Yangtze Valley scored many victories.

Meanwhile, the Taiping ministers and generals began a prolonged struggle for power among themselves, in which thousands were killed and the rebel forces divided. In 1860 an attempt by the Taipings to regain their strength by taking Shanghai was stopped by a Western-trained army commanded by the American Frederick Townsend Ward and later by the British officer "Chinese" Gordon. The gentry, who usually rallied to support rebellion, had been alienated by the radical anti-Confucianism of the Taipings and organized against them. Nanking fell in July 1864, and Hung committed suicide. Sporadic Taiping resistance continued until 1868. After the capture of Nanking, almost 100,000 of the Taiping followers preferred death to capture.

Taiping CHRISTIANITY emphasized a wrathful God who demanded worship and obedience. Prostitution, foot binding, slavery, opium smoking, adultery, gambling, and the use of tobacco and wine were prohibited. The Chinese language was simplified, and equality between men and women was decreed. All property was to be held in common, and equal distribution of land was planned. Some Western-educated Taiping leaders proposed the development of industry and the building of a Taiping democracy. The Ch'ing dynasty was so weakened by the rebellion that it was never able to reestablish effective control of the country.

TAJONG-GYO \tā-'jōŋ-'gyō\, also called Tan'Gun \tān-'gün\, or Tangun Cult, Korean millenarian movement that was formulated by Na Chul in the late 19th century. It worships the Lord, the Light, or the Progenitor of the Heaven. The triune deity consists of Great Wisdom, Power, and Virtue, which are parallel to the mind, body, and breath of humanity. The union and harmony of the heavenly trinity with the trinity of humanity, adherents believe, will renew humanity and reform society. The trichotomy of man, his universe, and its pursuit of ultimate harmony in terms of YIN-YANG theory was derived from NEO-CONFUCIANISM.

TAJWĪD \tāj-'wēd\, in ISLAM, sophisticated and artistic form of the recitation of the Qur'an. See QURRĀ'.

TALBIYA \tāl-'bē-ə\, in ISLAM, the pronouncement labbayka allāhumma labbayka ("at your service, O Lord, at your service"), recited during the HAJJ and 'UMRA when pilgrims perform the tawāf—i.e., the walk around the sacred shrine of the KA'BA in MECCA. The question whether the talbiya is obligatory or commendable has been much discussed, but no consensus has emerged. All Islamic branches and legal schools use the talbiya during PILGRIMAGES and on other religious occasions. Several longer versions of talbiya have been attributed to prominent Muslims, particularly to MUHAMMAD and the Companions, and some have been attributed to pious figures such as ADAM and NOAH.

TALIBAN, political and religious faction and militia that came to power in Afghanistan in the mid-1990s. Following the Soviet Union's 1989 withdrawal from Afghanistan, the Taliban (Persian: "Students")—whose name refers to the Islamic religious students who formed the group's main recruits—arose as a popular reaction to the chaos that gripped the country. In 1994–95, under the leadership of Mullah Mohammad Omar, the Taliban extended its control in Afghanistan from a single city to more than half the country, and in 1996 it captured Kabul and instituted a strict Islamic government. By 1999, the Taliban controlled most of Afghanistan, though most countries refused to recognize the regime because of its harsh social policies—including the almost complete removal of women from public life, the systematic destruction of non-Islamic artistic relics, and the implementation of severe criminal punishments—and its role as a haven for Islamic extremists. Among these extremists was Osama bin Laden, the expatriate Saudi Arabian leader of Al-Qaeda, a network of Islamic militants that had engaged in numerous acts of terrorism. The Taliban's refusal to extradite bin Laden to the U.S. following the September 11 attacks in 2001 prompted the U.S. to attack Taliban and Al-Qaeda forces in Afghanistan, driving the former from power and sending the leaders of both groups into hiding.

TALLIT \tā-'lēt, 'tā-lis\, prayer shawl worn by male Jews during the daily morning service (shaharit) and by the leader of the service during the afternoon service (minḥa). On YOM KIPPUR, males wear it for all five services and on TISHA BE-AV only during the afternoon service.

The rectangular wool or silk shawl has black or blue stripes with fringes (tzitzit) affixed to the corners as prescribed (Numbers 15:38): two fringes in front, two behind. An embroidered collar is added, inscribed with the blessing to be recited when the tallit is put on. Pious Jews are buried in a tallit after one of the fringes has been removed.

TALMUD \täl-'müd; 'täl-,müd, 'tal-mäd\ (Hebrew: "Study," or "Learning"), sustained, systematic amplification and analysis of passages of the MISHNAH and other collections of Jewish oral law, including the TOSEFTA. Two Talmuds exist, produced in two locations by two different groups of scholars: the Palestinian Talmud (YERUSHALMI), c. 400 CE, and the Babylonian Talmud (BAVLI), c. 600 CE. The former treats the first four divisions of the Mishnah; the latter, the second through the fifth; each is independent of the other, the two meeting only at parts of the Mishnah and sharing, further, some sayings attributed to authorities after the Mishnah, although reading these sayings in different ways.

In form the two Talmuds are identical. Both consist of commentaries to some of the same passages of the Mishnah. Both are laid out in the same way, that is, as ad hoc analyses of phrases (or even whole paragraphs) of the Mishnah. The two Talmuds defined Mishnahic commentary in a distinctive way, through their active program of supplying not merely information but guidance on the meaning of the Mishnah. That program was fully realized, however, only in the second of the Talmuds, the Bavli.

The two are further comparable in that they organize their materials in the same way and take up much the same topical agenda, agreeing in particular to treat the matters of everyday practice, as distinct from theory. The two Talmuds also share certain definitive traits. One of these is the harmonization of one Mishnah rule or principle with another. Further, both propose to uncover the scriptural foundation of these rules. Both Talmuds, therefore, undertake the sustained demonstration of the theology of the TORAH: its perfection, on the one side, its unity (oral and written), on the other.

Both Talmuds' framers deal with Mishnah tractates of their own choosing, and neither group provides a Talmud to the entirety of the Mishnah. What the Mishnah therefore contributed to the Talmuds was not received in a spirit of humble acceptance by the sages who produced the two Talmuds. Important choices were made about what to treat and what to ignore. This discrete reading of sentences or, at most, paragraphs, avoiding all larger generalizations except for those transcending the specific lines of tractates facilitated the revision of the whole into a quite different pattern—thus, the Talmud represents a representation of the Torah, and one of considerable originality indeed.

The writers of the Mishnah created a coherent document, with a topical program formed in accord with the logical order dictated by the characteristics of a given topic, and with a set of highly distinctive formal traits as well. But these are obscured when the document is taken apart into bits and pieces and reconstituted. The re-defi-inition of the Torah accomplished by the Talmuds therefore represented a vast revision of the initial writing down of the oral component of the Torah—a point at which the HERMENEUTICS shaded over into a profoundly theological activity.

For the Mishnah as read by the Talmuds is a composite of discrete and essentially autonomous rules. In the process, the most striking formal traits of the Mishnah are obliterated. More importantly, the Mishnah as a whole and complete statement of a single viewpoint no longer exists. Its propositions are reduced to details. What is offered instead is a statement that, on occasion, recasts details in generalizations encompassing a wide variety of other details across the gaps between one tractate and another. This immensely creative and imaginative approach to the Mishnah vastly expands the range of discourse. At the same time, however, it denies to the Mishnah both its own mode of speech and its distinctive and coherent message. So the two Talmuds formulate their own hermeneutics, to convey their theological system: (1) defining the Torah and (2) demonstrating its perfection and comprehensive character: unity, harmony, lineal origin from Sinai.

TALMUD TORAH \täl-'müd-tō-'rä; 'täl-,müd-'tō-rə, 'tal-mäd-, 'tör-ə\ (Hebrew: "Study of the Torah"), in JUDAISM, religious study of the TORAH in quest of the God who makes himself known in that work. TALMUD Torah focuses upon learning God's message for today through inquiry into the books of the HEBREW SCRIPTURES of ancient Israel (the OLD TESTAMENT of CHRISTIANITY) or those that record the originally oral Torah of Sinai, the MISHNAH, MIDRASH compilations, and Talmuds. More broadly, Talmud Torah may refer to any act of learning under rabbinic auspices, the teaching of Torah being regarded as a sacred action. The term applies also to educational institutions of Judaism, particularly schools for children, so that one may say, "I go to the Talmud Torah to study Torah."

In Judaism, Talmud Torah not only enlightens but also empowers. It stands for more than acquiring information; it represents an encounter, through study of the Torah, with God, whose meeting with humanity is recorded therein. Talmud Torah outweighs all of the other religious obligations of Judaism put together—hence, Mishnah-tractate Peah 1:1: “These are things, the benefits of which a person enjoys in this world, while the principal remains for him in the world-to-come: (1) deeds done in honor of father and mother, (2) performance of righteous deeds, and (3) doing acts that bring about peace between one person and another. But (4) study of Torah is equal to all of them put together.”

TAM, JACOB BEN MEIR \ˈtä˞, Angl ˈtam \ (b. 1100, Ramerupt, France—d. June 9, 1171, Troyes), outstanding Talmudic authority of his time and one of the most eminent of the French tosafists (commentators on the Talmud; see TOSAFOT).

Tam, a grandson of RASHI, was attacked by a band of crusaders in 1147, who wounded his head five times as revenge for the five wounds that the Jews allegedly inflicted on Christ. Saved by a passing knight, he fled to neighboring Troyes. There he became a leading participant in the rabbinical synods that about 1160 began to develop rules to govern the relations between Christians and Jews. The key ordinances of Rabbe-nu (“Our Teacher”) Tam provided that (1) disputes between Jews were to be resolved by the Jewish authorities; (2) the law of Rabbe-nu Gershom (c. 960—c. 1028/40) abrogating polygamy was essentially reinforced; and (3) no Jew could lightly challenge the legality of a Jewish deed of divorce.

Tam’s major legal work is Sefer ha-yashar (“Book of the Righteous”). It contains explanations of 30 tractates of the TALMUD, as well as RESPONSA.

TAMA \ˈtä-,mä\, formally mitama \ˈmē-tä-mä\, in Japanese religions, a soul or semidivine spirit. Several mitama are recognized; among them are the ara-mitama (with the power of ruling), the kushi-mitama (with the power of transforming), the nigi-mitama (with the power of unifying, or harmonizing), and the saki-mitama (with the power of blessing). Some SHINTŌ shrines pay homage to a particular mitama of a deity or KAMI.

TAMMUZ \ˈtä-,müz\, Akkadian Dumuzi \ˈdü-mü-zē\, in MESOPOTAMIAN RELIGION, god of fertility embodying the powers for new life in nature in the spring. The name Tammuz seems to have been derived from the Akkadian form Tamuzi, based on early Sumerian Damu-zid, The Flawless Young. The later standard Sumerian form, Dumu-zid, in turn became Dumuzi in Akkadian. The earliest known mention of Tammuz is in texts dating to the early part of the Early Dynastic III period (c. 2600–c. 2334 BCE), but his cult probably was much older. Although the cult is attested for most of the major cities of Sumer in the 3rd and 2nd millennia BCE, it centered in the cities around the central grasslands area, for example, at Bad-tibira (modern Madinah) where Tammuz was the city god.

As shown by his most common epithet Sipad (Shepherd), Tammuz was essentially a pastoral deity. His father Enki is rarely mentioned, and his mother, the goddess Duttur, was a personification of the ewe. His own name, Dumu-zid, and two variant designations for him, Ama-ga (Mother Milk) and U-lu-lu (Multiplier of Pasture), suggest that he actually was the power for everything that a shepherd might wish for: grass to come up in the desert, healthy lambs to be born, and milk to be plentiful in the mother animals.

When the cult of Tammuz spread to Assyria in the 2nd and 1st millennia BCE, the character of the god seems to have changed from that of a pastoral to that of an agricultural deity. The texts suggest that, in Assyria (and later among the Sabaeans of Haran), Tammuz was viewed as the power in the grain, dying when the grain was milled.

The cult of Tammuz centered around two yearly festivals, one celebrating his marriage to the goddess INANNA, the other lamenting his death at the hands of DEMONS from the netherworld. During the 3rd dynasty of Ur (c. 2112–c. 2004 BCE) in the city of UMMA (modern Tell Jokha), the marriage of the god was dramatically celebrated in February–March, Umma’s Month of the Festival of Tammuz. During the Isin–Larsa period (c. 2004–c. 1792 BCE), the texts relate that in the marriage rite the king actually took on the identity of the god and thus, by consummating the marriage with a priestess incarnating the goddess, fertilized all of nature for the year.

The celebrations in March–April that marked the death of the god also seem to have been dramatically performed. Many of the lamentations for the occasion have as a setting a procession out into the desert to the fold of the slain god. In Assyria, however, in the 7th century BCE, the ritual took place in June–July. In the major cities of the realm, a couch was set up for the god upon which he lay in state. His body appears to have been symbolized by an assemblage of vegetable matter, honey, and a variety of other foods.

Among the texts dealing with the god is “Dumuzi’s Dream,” a myth telling how Tammuz had a dream presaging his death and how the dream came true in spite of all his efforts to escape. A closely similar tale forms the second half of the Sumerian myth “The Descent of Inanna,” in which Inanna (Akkadian ISHTAR) sends Tammuz as her substitute to the netherworld. His sister, Geshtinanna, eventually finds him, and the myth ends with Inanna decreeing that Tammuz and his sister may alternate in the netherworld, each spending half of the year among the living.

Eventually a variety of originally independent gods seem to have become identified with Tammuz. Tammuz of the cattle herders, whose main distinction from Tammuz the Shepherd was that his mother was the goddess NINSUN, Lady Wild Cow, and that he himself was imagined as a cattle herder, may have been an original aspect of the god. The agricultural form of Tammuz in the north, where he was identified with the grain, may also have been an originally independent development of the god from his role as the power in the vegetation of spring. A clear fusion, though very early, was the merger of Tammuz in Uruk with Amaushumgalana, the One Great Source of the Date Clusters, i.e., the power of fertility in the date palm. A later important fusion was the merger of Tammuz and DAMU, a fertility god who probably represented the power in the sap to rise in trees and plants in spring.

TAMMUZ, FAST OF \tā-'müz, 'tä-'müz\, minor Jewish observance (on Tammuz 17) that inaugurates THREE WEEKS of mourning that culminate in the 24-hour fast of TISHA BE-AV, probably originally adapted from foreign rites. The fast is commonly associated with the various misfortunes of the Jewish people at the hands of the Babylonians and Romans, such as the conquest of Jerusalem by Babylon in 586 BCE and the capture of Jerusalem by the Romans in 70 CE.

TAMOANCHÁN \tä-mō-än-'chän\, in Aztec mythology, the verdant paradise of the west, birthplace of XOCHIQUETZAL, the goddess of beauty. See PRE-COLUMBIAN MESO-AMERICAN RELIGIONS.

TANGUN \tän-'gün\, mythological first king of the Koreans, the grandson of Hwanin, the creator, and the son of Hwanung, who fathered his child by breathing on a woman. Tangun reportedly became king in 2333 BCE.

According to one account, Hwanung left heaven to rule earth from atop Mt. T'aebaek (Daebaik). When a bear and a tiger asked to become human beings, he ordered them into a cave for 100 days where they were to eat only mugwort and garlic and to avoid the sunlight. The tiger grew impatient and left the cave, but the bear remained and after three weeks was transformed into a beautiful woman; she became the mother of Tangun.

BUDDHISM and TAOISM clothed themselves with a Korean mantle by crediting Tangun with starting a national religion of Heavenly Teaching and with originating the Korean maxim Hongik-ingan ("Love humanity"). An altar on Kanghwa Island, which is said to have been built by Tangun himself, is periodically refurbished. Tangun's birthday ("Opening of Heaven Day") on the 3rd day of the 10th month is a holiday for schoolchildren.

TANIT \tä-nit\, also spelled Tinith, Tinnit, or Tint, chief goddess of Carthage, equivalent of ASTARTE. Although she seems to have had some connection with the heavens, she was also a MOTHER GODDESS, and fertility symbols often accompany representations of her. She was probably the consort of BAAL Hammon (or AMON), the chief god of Carthage, and was often given the attribute "face of Baal." Although Tanit did not appear at Carthage before the 5th century BCE, she soon eclipsed the more established cult of Baal Hammon and, in the Carthaginian area at least, was frequently listed before him on the monuments. In the worship of Tanit and Baal Hammon, children, probably firstborn, were sacrificed. Ample evidence of the practice has been found west of Carthage in the precinct of Tanit, where a tofet (a SANCTUARY for HUMAN SACRIFICE) was discovered. Tanit was also worshiped on Malta and Sardinia and in Spain.

TANNA \tä-'nä, 'tä-nä\, plural tannaim \tä-nä-'ēm\ (Aramaic: "teacher"), memorizer of ORAL TRADITION, generally in the 1st and 2nd centuries CE, ordinarily in the land of Israel; the oral traditions memorized and handed on by tanna authorities were held to originate in the revelation by God to MOSES of the TORAH at MOUNT SINAI and handed on in a chain of tradition from then to their inclusion in the law codes, the MISHNAH (c. 200 CE) and the TOSEFTA (c. 300 CE). Tannaite sayings also reached formulation in a fixed-word composition called a BARAITA (plural Baraitot), which are marked tny—meaning external to the Mishnah—a process that continued into the 5th century CE and yields sayings in both the Talmud YERUSHALMI and the Talmud BAVLI.

The tannaim were succeeded by other scholars, called amoraim ("interpreters," or "reciters"). The amoraim, located in both Palestine and Babylonia, commented on teachings of the Mishnah and the Tosefta and also wrote extensive analysis of the law, their work all together being called "Gemara" or simply "TALMUD." The tannaim opinions occur in the Mishnah, Tosefta, and Baraita corpus, the amoraim in the Gemara—i.e., the commentary on that corpus. The differentiation is by groupings in temporal relationship, 1st and 2nd centuries as against 3rd and 4th centuries. The Yerushalmi and Bavli Talmuds, based on the differences in the dates of their compilation, have the same Mishnaic content but significantly different GEMARA. See also AMORA.

TANTALUS \tan-tə-ləs\, in Greek mythology, son of ZEUS or Tmolus (a ruler of Lydia) and PLUTO (daughter of CRONUS and RHEA) and the father of NIOBE and PELOPS. He was the king of Sipylus in Lydia (or of Phrygia) and was the intimate friend of the gods, to whose table he was admitted. In punishment for a crime (various ancient sources identified the crime as (1) abuse of divine favor by revealing to humans divine secrets he had learned in heaven, (2) the theft of nectar and ambrosia, food of the gods, which he turned over to humans, or (3) the murder of his son Pelops, whom he cooked and served to the gods in order to test their powers of observation) Tantalus was condemned to stand up to his neck in water, which flowed away from him when he tried to drink it; over his head hung fruits that the wind wafted away whenever he tried to grasp them. The modern term "tantalizing" derives from this myth.

TANTRA \tän-trə\ (Sanskrit: "loom"), any of numerous texts dealing with the esoteric practices of some Indian sects. In the orthodox classification of Hindu religious literature tantras are, theoretically, considered to treat of theology, YOGA, construction of temples and images, and religious practices; in reality, they tend to deal with such aspects of popular HINDUISM as SPELLS, rituals, and symbols. They are distinguished along Hindu sectarian lines between the Śaiva Āgamas, the Vaiṣṇava Samhitās, and the Śākta tantras.

Lists of the Śākta tantras differ considerably from one another but suggest that the earliest manuscripts date from about the 7th century. They emphasize the goddess ŚAKTI as the female personification of the creative power or energy of the god. This view taken to its extreme holds that SHI-

VA without his Śakti is like a corpse. The tantras also stress the efficacy of YANTRAS, MANDALAS, and MANTRAS. Among the major Śākta tantras (see ŚAKTISM) are the Kulārṇava, which treats of "left-hand" practices, such as ritual copulation; the Kulacūḍāmaṇi, which discusses ritual; and the Śaradātīlaka, which deals almost exclusively with magic.

The Buddhist tantras are traced to the 7th century or earlier, the Guhyasamāja being one of the first and most important. They were accepted and utilized by Esoteric Buddhists associated with the Indian-Tibetan VAJRAYĀNA tradition, the Chen-yen tradition in China, and the SHINGON tradition in Japan. The Buddhist tantras include some very sophisticated texts that combine profound philosophical orientations, rich symbolic content, and guidance for complex rituals, including "left hand" rituals. Some of these rituals were designed to facilitate rapid progress toward the highest religious goals, including the attainment of buddhahood itself. Many other rituals prescribed within the very large corpus of Buddhist tantras were designed to generate sacred power for quite mundane purposes.

Jain tantras were also produced. However, Tantric elements did not become as important in JAINISM as they did in Hinduism and BUDDHISM.

TANTRIC HINDUISM \ˈtən-trɪk, ˈtæn-\, system of esoteric practices used for both the attainment of spiritual experiences and the fulfillment of worldly desires. TANTRA designates a particular group of post-Vedic Sanskrit treatises, heterogeneous in content, that deals with worship of gods and goddesses, rites and rituals, magic, and secret practices aiming at the purification of the body and the control of physiological and psychological processes by which the body and the mind may be made perfect media for the realization of the highest truth. Tantrism also plays a significant part in BUDDHISM (see VAJRAYĀNA) and, to a limited degree, in JAINISM. It is practiced in India, Nepal, and Bhutan and especially among Tibetan Buddhists.

Tantric HINDUISM is mostly concerned with practical methods and lays little stress on religious theories, which it accepts from the main philosophical schools of Hinduism. Theologically it holds that the nondual Supreme Reality has two aspects, SHIVA (male) and ŚAKTI (female), the one representing pure consciousness and transcendent passivity, the other representing mental activity. The human body is a microcosm of the universe. The spinal cord represents MOUNT MERU; and the three main nerve connections (iḍā, piṅgalā, and suṣumṇā) running along the left, the right, and the middle of the spine represent the three sacred rivers GAṄGĀ (Ganges), JAMUNĀ, and SARASVATĪ; the breathing process represents the course of time. Śakti, also called KUNDALINĪ, lying coiled and dormant in serpent form in the lowest psychic center, or CHAKRA ("wheel"), of the body, has to be awakened and made to move upward through the five (in some systems, six) higher chakras along the spinal cord, so as to be united with Shiva at the sahasrāra padma chakra, the "thousand-petaled lotus" at the top of the head. This union brings about the transcendently blissful realization of supreme nonduality.

Tantrics sometimes use, as a yogic practice, disciplined forms of sexual intercourse aimed at channeling the semen of the male adept along the path of ascending bodily chakras until he senses that his ordinary mental processes have been suspended and that he and his partner are recapitulating the primordial union of Shiva and PĀRVATĪ. Tantric texts disagree as to whether physical ejaculation aids this process or should be restrained.

T'AN-YAO \ˈtän-ˈyäu\ (fl. 450 CE), monk and head of the Buddhist church in China. He instituted the earliest five temples at the YÜN-KANG CAVES.

TAO \ˈdäu\, Pinyin dao (Chinese: "road," or "way"), in Chinese philosophy, fundamental concept signifying "the correct way," or "heaven's way." In the Confucian tradition, tao signifies a morally correct path of human conduct and is thus limited to behavior. In TAOISM (the name of which derives from tao), the concept takes on a metaphysical sense transcending the human realm. The TAO-TE CHING opens with these words: "The tao that can be spoken about is not the Absolute Tao." The Absolute Tao thus defies verbal definition, but language can make suggestions that may lead to an intuitive or mystical understanding of this fundamental reality.

One aspect of the tao, however, can be perceived, namely, the visible process of nature by which all things change. From an observation of the visible manifestation of the Absolute Tao, it is possible to intuit the existence of an ultimate substratum that is the source of all things. Awareness of this process then leads toward an understanding of the Absolute Tao.

TAO-AN \ˈdäu-ˈän\, Pinyin Dao'an (b. 312—d. 385), pioneer Chinese Buddhist monk who facilitated the assimilation of BUDDHISM in China through his work in translating Buddhist SCRIPTURES into Chinese. Tao-an's work influenced Kumarājīva, the greatest translator of the Buddhist scriptures. In addition to his translations and commentaries on the scriptures, he is also known for developing a disciplinary code for Chinese monastic communities.

TAO-CH'Ō \ˈdäu-ˈchwò\, Pinyin Daochuo (562–645), Chinese Buddhist monk and advocate of the PURE LAND doctrine. His predecessor T'an-luan had preached that invocation of the name AMITĀBHA would allow even evil persons to gain access to the Western Paradise; Tao-ch'ō argued that in this degenerate age people must take the "easy path" to salvation of complete trust in Amitābha, for they no longer possessed the capacity to follow the more difficult path of the saints.

T'AO HUNG-CHING \ˈtau-ˈhŭŋ-ˈjɪŋ\, Pinyin Tao Hongjing (b. 451, Mo-ling, China—d. 536, Hua-yang), Chinese poet, calligrapher, physician, naturalist, and the most eminent Taoist of his time.

A precocious child, T'ao was tutor to the imperial court while still a youth. In 492 he retired to MAO SHAN, a chain of hills southeast of Nanking, where he established a mountain retreat and devoted himself to the study of Shang-ch'ing TAOISM. T'ao was adviser and friend to the emperor Wu-ti, and his retreat survived the proscription of all other Taoist sects in 504.

His major work was the editing and annotation of the religious writings of Yang Hsi, Hsü Mi, and Hsü Hui, composed at Mao Shan in the 4th century. T'ao produced two compendiums of the literature, the Chen-kao ("Declarations of the Perfected") and the Teng-chen yin-chüeh ("Secret Instructions for Ascent to Perfection"). In the course of his research into proper eating and living practices, he produced the T'u ching yen-i pen-ts'ao, one of the major pharmacological works of China. T'ao also effected a working synthesis of the private and individual practices of the Mao Shan literature with the 4th-century public rites of the LING-PAO liturgies.

TAOISM

A n indigenous religio-philosophical tradition that has shaped Chinese life for more than 2,000 years, Taoism includes the ideas and attitudes peculiar to the Lao-tzu (or TAO-TE CHING; “Classic of the Way of Power”), the CHUANG-TZU, the LIEH-TZU, the Huai-nan Tzu, and related writings; the Taoist religion and the collected writings known as the Tao Tsang, which is concerned with the ritual meditational practices of the TAO; and those who identify themselves as Taoists.

Taoist thought permeates Chinese culture, while in Chinese religion the Taoist tradition—often serving as a link between the Confucian tradition and folk tradition—has generally been more popular and spontaneous than the official (Confucian) state cult and less diffuse and shapeless than folk religion. Taoist philosophy and religion have also found their way into all Asian cultures influenced by China, especially those of Vietnam, Japan, and Korea. In recent decades an acculturated Western-style Taoism has started to emerge in North America and Europe.

Both Western Sinologists and Chinese scholars themselves have distinguished—since Han times (206 BCE–220 CE)—between a Taoist philosophy of the great mystics and their commentators (Tao-chia) and a later Taoist religion (Tao-chiao). This theory, no longer considered valid, was based on the view that the “ancient Taoism” of the mystics antedated the “later Neo-Taoist superstitions” that were misinterpretations of the mystics’ metaphorical images. The mystics, however, should be viewed against the background of the religious practices existing in their own times. Their ecstasies, for example, were closely related to the trances and spirit journeys of the early magicians and SHAMANS. Not only are the authors of the Tao-te ching, the Chuang-tzu (book of “Master Chuang”), and the Lieh-tzu (book of “Master Lieh”) not the actual and central founders of an earlier “pure” Taoism later degraded into superstitious practices, but they can even be considered somewhat on the margin of older Taoist traditions. Therefore, because there has been a nearly continuous mutual influence between Taoists of different social classes—philosophers, ascetics, alchemists, and the priests of popular cults—the distinction between philosophical and religious Taoism in this article is made simply for the sake of descriptive convenience.

There is also a tendency among scholars today to draw a less rigid line between what is called Taoist and what is called Confucian. The two traditions share many of the same ideas about man, society, the ruler, heaven, and the universe—ideas that were not created by either school but that stem from a tradition prior to either CONFUCIUS or LAO-TZU. In the case of BUDDHISM, meanwhile, competition with Taoism for influence among the people resulted in mutual borrowings, numerous superficial similarities, and essentially Chinese developments inside Buddhism, such as the Ch'an (Japanese: ZEN) sect. In folk religion, since Sung times (960–1279), Taoist and Buddhist elements have coexisted without clear distinctions in the minds of the worshipers.

GENERAL CHARACTERISTICS

The great sages and their associated texts. Behind all forms of Taoism stands the figure of Lao-tzu, traditionally regarded as the author of the classic text known as the Lao-tzu, or the Tao-te ching. Modern scholars, however, regard the Tao-te ching as a compilation that reached its final form only about three centuries later, in the 3rd century BCE. The work was meant as a handbook for the ruler. He should be a sage whose actions pass so unnoticed that his very existence remains unknown. The sacred aura surrounding kingship was rationalized and expressed as “inaction” or “nonintrusive action” (WU-WEI), demanding of the sovereign no more than right cosmological orientation at the center of an obedient universe. Survivals of archaic notions concerning the compelling effect of renunciation—which the Confucians sanctified as ritual “deference” (jang)—are echoed in the recommendation to “hold to the role of the female,” with an eye to the ultimate mastery that comes of passivity.

It is more particularly in the function attributed to the Tao, or Way, that this little tract stands apart. The term Tao was employed by all schools of thought. The universe has its Tao; there is a Tao of the sovereign, his royal mode of being; while the Tao of man comprises continuity through procreation. Each of the schools, too, had its own Tao, its way or doctrine. But in the Tao-te ching the ultimate unity of the universal Tao itself is being proposed as a social ideal. It is this idealistic peculiarity that seems to justify later historians and bibliographers in their assignment of the term Taoist to the Tao-te ching and its successors.

Knowledge of the sage Chuang-tzu is even more scanty than that of Lao-tzu, but the Chuang-tzu is valuable as a monument of Chinese literature and because it contains considerable documentary material describing numerous speculative trends and spiritual practices of the Warring States period (475–221 BCE). Whereas the Tao-te ching is addressed to the sage-king, the Chuang-tzu is the earliest surviving Chinese text to present a philosophy for private life, a wisdom for the individual. Its PARABLES demonstrate the relativity of all values and the sliding scales of size, utility, beauty, and perfection. Life and death are equated, and the dying are seen to welcome their approaching transformation as a fusion with the Tao. Its concluding chapter is a systematic account of the preeminent thinkers of the time, and the note of mock despair on which it closes typifies the Chuang-tzu's position regarding the more formal, strait-laced ideologies that it parodies.

Among the strange figures that people the pages of Chuang-tzu are a very special class of spiritualized beings who dine on air, are immune to the effects of the elements, and possess the power of flight. Their effortless existence is the ultimate in autonomy, the natural spontaneity that Chuang-tzu ceaselessly applauds. These striking portraits may have been intended to be allegorical, but whatever their original meaning, these Immortals (HSIEN), as they came to be called, were construed as practical objectives by later generations. By a variety of practices, men attempted to attain their qualities in their own persons, and in time Chuang-tzu's unfettered paragons of liberty were to see themselves classified according to kind and degree in a hierarchy of the heavenly hosts.

Basic concepts of philosophical Taoism. Certain concepts of ancient agrarian religion have dominated Chinese thought without interruption from before the formation of the philosophic schools until the first radical break with tradition and the overthrow of dynastic rule at the beginning of the 20th century, and they are thus not specifically Taoist. The most important of these concepts are the solidarity of nature and man (that is, the interaction between the universe and human society); the cyclical character of time and the universal rhythm and the law of return; and the worship of ancestors, the cult of heaven, and the divine nature of the sovereign.

What Lao-tzu calls the “permanent Tao” in reality is nameless. The act of bestowing a name (ming) in ancient Chinese thought implied an evaluation assigning an object its place in a hierarchical universe. The Tao is outside these categories: “It is something formlessly fashioned, that existed before Heaven and Earth.” Tao is the “imperceptible, indiscernible,” about which nothing can be predicated but that latently contains the forms, entities, and forces of all particular phenomena. Not-Being (wu) and Tao are not identical; wu and Being (yu) are two aspects of the permanent Tao. Nor does wu mean Nothingness but rather the absence of perceptible qualities; in Lao-tzu’s view it is superior to Being. It is the Void, or chaos (that is, empty incipience), that harbors in itself all potentialities and without which even Being lacks its efficacy.

him without obstacle. An essential characteristic that governs the Tao is spontaneity (TZU-JAN), the unconditioned. The Tao, in turn, governs the universe. This is the way of the saint who does not intervene but possesses the total power of spontaneous realization that is at work in the universe.

The conception of the universe common to all Chinese philosophy can be called magical or even alchemical. The universe is viewed as a hierarchically organized mechanism in which every part reproduces the whole. Man is a microcosm (small universe) corresponding rigorously to this macrocosm (large universe); his body reproduces the plan of the cosmos. Between man and universe there exists a system of correspondences and participations. The five organs of the body and its orifices and the dispositions, features, and passions of man correspond to the five directions, the five holy mountains, the sections of the sky, the seasons, and the elements (WU-HSING), which in China are not material but more like five fundamental phases of any process in space-time. Whoever understands man thus understands the structure of the universe.

One concept of the natural order is the law of the Tao. The law of the Tao refers to the continuous reversion of everything to its starting point. Anything that develops extreme qualities will invariably revert to the opposite qualities. All being issues from the Tao and ineluctably returns to it; undifferentiated unity becomes multiplicity in the movement of the Tao. Life and death are contained in this eternal transformation from Not-Being into Being and back to Not-Being, but the underlying primordial unity is never lost.

For society, any reform means a type of return to the ideals established in the remote past; civilization is considered a degradation of the natural order, and the ideal is the return to an original purity. For the individual, wisdom is the state of conforming to the rhythm of the universe. The Taoist mystic creates a void inside himself that permits him to return to nature's origin.

Another Taoist belief concerning the universe is that all parts of the universe are attuned in a rhythmic pulsation. Nothing is static; all beings are subjected to periodical mutations and transformations that represent the Chinese view of creation. Instead of being opposed to a static ideal, change itself is systematized and made intelligible, as in the theory of the five phases (wu-hsing) and in the 64 hexagrams of the I-CHING, which are basic recurrent constellations in the general flux. An unchanging unity (the permanent Tao) was seen as underlying the kaleidoscopic plurality.

The imperceptible Tao shapes the universe continuously out of primordial chaos (HUN-TUN); the perpetual transformation of the universe by the alternations of yin and yang, or complementary energies (seen as night and day or as winter and summer), is nothing but the external aspect of the same Tao.

Concepts of man and society. The power acquired by the Taoist is TE, the efficacy of the Tao in the realm of Being, which is translated as "virtue." The virtue of Taoism is a latent power that never lays claim to its achievements; it is the "mysterious power" (hsüan-te) of Tao present in the heart of the sage—"the man of superior virtue never acts (wu-wei), and yet there is nothing he leaves undone."

Wu-wei is not an ideal of absolute inaction nor a mere "not-overdoing." It is an action so well in accordance with things that its author leaves no trace of himself in his work. There is no true achievement without wu-wei because every deliberate intervention in the natural course of things will sooner or later turn into the opposite of what was intended and will result in failure.

Any willful human intervention is believed to be able to ruin the harmony of the natural transformation process. The spontaneous rhythm of the primitive agrarian community and its unself-conscious symbiosis with nature's cycles is thus the Taoist ideal of society. Chuang-tzu liked to oppose the heaven-made and the man-made—that is, nature and society. He wanted man to renounce all artificial “cunning contrivances” that facilitate his work but lead to “cunning hearts” and agitated souls in which the Tao will not dwell.

Characteristic of Chuang-tzu are his ideas of knowledge and language developed under the stimulus of his friend and opponent, the philosopher Hui Shih. Because, in the Taoist view, all beings and everything are fundamentally one, opposing opinions can arise only when people lose sight of the Whole and regard their partial truths as absolute. Thus, Chuang-tzu's holy man fully recognizes the relativity of notions like GOOD AND EVIL and true and false. He is neutral and open to the extent that he offers no active resistance to any would-be opponent, whether it be a person or an idea. The mystic does not speak because declaring unity, by creating the duality of the speaker and the affirmation, destroys it.

Mystic realization also does away with the distinction between the self and the world. This idea also governs Chuang-tzu's attitude toward death. Life and death are but one of the pairs of cyclical phases, such as day and night or summer and winter. Death is natural, and men ought neither to fear nor to desire it. Chuang-tzu's attitude thus is one of serene acceptance.

The Confucian saint (SHENG) is viewed as a ruler of antiquity or a great sage who taught men how to return to the rites of antiquity. The Taoist sainthood, however, is internal (nei-sheng), although it can become manifest in an external royalty (wai-wang) that brings the world back to the Way by means of quietism: variously called “nonintervention” (wu-wei), “inner cultivation” (nei-yeh), or “art of the heart and mind” (hsin-shu).

Whereas worldly ambitions, riches, and (especially) discursive knowledge scatter the person and drain his energies, the saint “embraces Unity” or “holds fast to the One” (pao-i); that is, he aspires to union with the Tao in a primordial undivided state underlying consciousness. “Embracing Unity” also means that he maintains the balance of yin and yang within himself and the union of his spiritual (hun) and vegetative (p'o) souls, the dispersion of which spells death; Taoists usually believed there were three hun and seven p'o. The spiritual soul tends to wander (in dreams), and any passion or desire can result in loss of soul. To retain and harmonize one's soul is important for physical life as well as for the unification of the whole human entity. Cleansed of every distraction, the saint creates inside himself a void that in reality is plenitude. Empty of all impurity, he is full of the original energy (yüan-ch'i), which is the principle of life that in the ordinary person decays from the moment of birth on.

Because vital energy and spirituality are not clearly distinguished, old age in itself becomes a proof of sainthood. The aged Taoist sage became a saint because he had been able to cultivate himself throughout a long existence; his longevity in itself was the proof of his saintliness and union with the Tao. Externally he had a healthy, flourishing appearance and inside he contained an ever-flowing source of energy that manifested itself in radiance and in a powerful, beneficial influence on his surroundings, which is the charismatic efficacy (te) of the Tao.

Physical immortality was a Taoist goal probably long before and alongside the unfolding of Taoist MYSTICISM. The adept of immortality had a choice among many methods that were all intended to restore the pure energies possessed at birth by every infant. Through these methods, the adept became an immortal (hsien) who lived 1,000 years in this world if he so chose and, once satiated with life, transformed his body into pure yang energy and ascended to heaven.

Mythology. Much ancient Chinese mythology has been preserved by the Taoists, who drew on it naturally to illustrate their views. A chaos (hun-tun) myth is recorded as a metaphor for the undifferentiated primal unity; the mythical emperors (HUANG-TI and others) are extolled for wise Taoist rule or blamed for introducing harmful civilization. Dreams of mythical paradises and journeys on clouds and flying dragons are metaphors for the wanderings of the soul, the attainment of the Tao, and the identity of dream and reality.

Taoists have transformed and adapted some ancient myths to their beliefs. Thus, the Queen Mother of the West (HSI-WANG-MU), who was a mountain spirit, pestilence goddess, and tigress, became under Taoism a high deity.

Early eclectic contributions. Yin and yang, which literally mean the “dark side” and “sunny side” of a hill, are primary concepts of Taoism. Yin and yang are two complementary, interdependent principles or phases alternating in space and time; they are emblems evoking the harmonious interplay of all pairs of opposites in the universe.

First conceived by musicians, astronomers, or diviners and then propagated by a school that came to be named after them, yin and yang became the common stock of all Chinese philosophy. The Taoist treatise HUI-NAN-TZU (book of “Master Huai-nan”) describes how the one “Primordial Breath” (yüan-ch’i) split into the light ethereal yang breath, which formed heaven, and the heavier, cruder yin breath, which formed earth. The diversifications and interactions of yin and yang produced the Ten Thousand Beings.

Yin and yang are often referred to as two “breaths” (ch’i). Ch’i means air, breath, or vapor—originally the vapor arising from cooking cereals. It also came to mean a cosmic energy. The Primordial Breath is a name of the chaos (state of Unity) in which the original life force is not yet diversified into the phases that the concepts yin and yang describe.

Every person has a portion of this primordial life force allotted to him at birth, and his task is not to dissipate it through the activity of the senses but to strengthen, control, and increase it in order to live out a full span of life.

Another important set of notions associated with the same school of YIN-YANG are the “five agents,” or “phases” (wu-hsing), or “powers” (wu-te): water, fire, wood, metal, and earth. They are also “breaths” (i.e., active energies), the idea of which enabled the philosophers to construct a coherent system of correspondences and participations linking all phenomena of the macrocosm to those of the microcosm. Associated with spatial directions, seasons of the year, colors, musical notes, animals, and other aspects of nature, they also correspond, in the human body, to the five inner organs. The Taoist techniques of longevity are grounded in these correspondences. The idea behind such techniques was that of nourishing the inner organs with the essences corresponding to their respective phases and during the season dominated by the latter.

HISTORY

Taoism in the Ch’in and Han periods (221 BCE–220 CE). Esoteric traditions of eastern China. The textual remains of Taoism during the Warring States period were all presumably produced in connection with official patronage; similarly, developments in Taoist thought and practice during the early Imperial age principally have to be studied from the vantage point of the court. At the Imperial court, representatives of different local traditions met as competitors for official favor, and the court consequently served as the principal meeting place for the exchange of ideas. The historians who recorded the progress of these various intellectual and religious currents were themselves court officials and often were active participants in the movements they describe. The emperors, anxious to consolidate and expand their power, were a natural focus for wonder-workers and specialists in esoteric arts (known as the fang-shih).

A series of such wonder-workers from the eastern seaboard visited the courts of the Ch’in and early Han. They told of islands in the ocean, peopled by immortal beings—which the Chuang-tzu had described—and so convincing were their accounts that sizable expeditions were fitted out and sent in search of them. The easterners brought the cults of their own region to the capital, recommending and supervising the worship of astral divinities who would assure the emperor’s health and longevity. One of their number, LI SHAO-CHÜN, bestowed on the Han emperor Wu-ti counsels that are a résumé of the spiritual preoccupations of the time. The emperor was to perform sacrifices to the furnace (tsao), which would enable him to summon spiritual beings. They in turn would permit him to change cinnabar powder (mercuric sulfide) into gold, from which vessels were to be made, out of which he would eat and drink. This would increase his span of life and permit him to behold the immortals (hsien) who dwell on the Isles of P'eng-lai, in the midst of the sea. Here, for the first time, alchemy joins the complex of activities that were supposed to contribute to the prolongation of life.

The Huang-Lao tradition. Also originating in the eastern coastal region (Shantung), alongside these same thaumaturgic (wonder-working) tendencies, was the learned tradition of the HUANG-LAO masters, devotees of the legendary "Yellow Emperor" (Huang-ti) and Lao-tzu. The information on the life of Lao-tzu transmitted by Ssu-ma Ch'ien is probably directly from their teaching. They venerated Lao-tzu as a sage whose instructions, contained in his book, describe the perfect art of government. The Yellow Emperor, with whose reign Ssu-ma Ch'ien's universal history opens, was depicted as a ruler of the Golden Age who achieved his success by applying his teachers' precepts to government. The Yellow Emperor also was the patron of technology; and the classic works of many arcane arts, including alchemy, medicine, sexual techniques, cooking, and dietetics, were all under his aegis. Unlike Lao-tzu, the Yellow Emperor is always the disciple, the unremitting seeker of knowledge, and the Huang-Lao masters' ideal of the perfect ruler.

From the court of the king of Ch'i (in present-day Shantung province), where they were already expounding the Lao-tzu in the 3rd century BCE, the teachings of the Huang-Lao masters soon spread throughout learned and official circles in the capital. Many early Han statesmen became their disciples and, following their teachings, attempted to practice government by inaction (wu-wei); among them there were also scholars who cultivated esoteric arts. Although their doctrine lost its direct political relevance during the reign of the emperor Wu-ti (reigned 141/140–87/86 BCE), their ensemble of teachings concerning both ideal government and practices for prolonging life nonetheless continued to evoke considerable interest and is perhaps the earliest truly Taoist movement for which there is clear historical evidence.

Revolutionary messianism. Among the less welcome visitors at the Han court had been a certain Kan Chung-k'o. At the end of the 1st century BCE he presented to the emperor a "Classic of the Great Peace" (T'ai-p'ing ching) that he claimed had been revealed to him by a spirit who had come to him with the order to renew the Han dynasty. His temerity cost him his life, but the prophetic note of dynastic renewal became stronger during the interregnum of Wang Mang (9–23 CE); and other works—bearing the same title—continued to appear. At this time, promoters of a primitivistic and utopian T'ai-p'ing (Great Peace) ideology continued to support the Imperial Liu (Han) family, claiming that they would be restored to power through the aid of the Li clan. A century and a half later, however, as the power of the Eastern Han dynasty (25–220 CE) declined, the populace no longer hoped for a renewal of Han rule.

The great Yellow Turban Rebellion broke out in the east in 184 CE. Its leader, Chang Chüeh, declared that the “blue heaven” was to be replaced by a “yellow heaven”; and his followers wore YELLOW TURBANS in token of this expectation. Worshiping a “Huang-lao chün,” the movement gained a vast number of adherents throughout eastern China. Though they were eventually defeated by the Imperial forces, the tendency towards messianic revolt continued to manifest itself at frequent intervals. A great many charismatic leaders came from the Li family, and certain of them claimed to be the god Lao-tzu returned to earth; a sage of western China, Li Hung, who had actually lived during the 1st century BCE, became the favorite recurrent figure of later would-be messiahs. Such revolutionary religious movements, which included Taoist ideological elements, remained a persistent feature of medieval Chinese history. The last recorded Li Hung was executed in 1112. These sporadic popular manifestations of revolutionary messianism, though, did not represent the activities of the formal Taoist organization and must be distinguished from the organized religious Taoism that also appeared at the end of the Later Han period.

The development of Taoist religion, 2nd–6th century. The emergence of a “Taocracy.” The protagonist of the Classic of the Great Peace is a celestial master. When another important religious movement began in China's far west about the same time as the group in the northeast arose, in the second half of the 2nd century CE, the same title was given to its founder, CHANG TAO-LING. It is with this Way of the Celestial Masters (T'ien-shih tao) that the history of organized religious Taoism may be said to begin, in that the movement soon spread to all of China and has persisted with an unbroken continuity from that time down to the present day.

In 142 CE, in the mountains of the province of Szechwan, Chang is said to have received a revelation from T'ai-shang Lao-chün (Lord Lao the Most High). The deified Lao-tzu bestowed on Chang his “orthodox and sole doctrine of the authority of the covenant” (cheng-i meng-wei fa), meant as a definitive replacement for the religious practices of the people, which are described as having lapsed into demonism and degeneracy.

The new dispensation at first was probably intended as a substitute for the efete rule of the Han central administration. Chang is said in time to have ascended on high and to have received the title of t'ien-shih, and by the latter part of the 2nd century, under the leadership of his descendants, the T'ien-shih tao constituted an independent religio-political organization with authority throughout the region, a “Taocracy” (rule of Tao), in which temporal and spiritual powers converged. For ceremonial and administrative purposes, the realm was divided into 24 (later 28 and 36) units, or parishes (chih). Here the role of the chi-chiu (“libationer”) seems to have been the cure of disease. Illness was believed to be a sentence pronounced by the SAN-KUAN (Three Officials), judges and custodians of the dead. Using the rising flame and smoke of the incense burner, the libationer submitted petitions (chang) to the appropriate bureau of the three Taoist heavens (san-t'ien).

The officiant came to dispose of a large selection of bureaucratic stock drafts—memorials, complaints, and appeals—all of which were modeled on secular administrative usage. Also effective were written talismans (fu); drawn by the libationer, these would be burned, and the ashes, mixed with water, were swallowed by the demons' victim. The libationer also functioned as a moral preceptor, instructing the faithful in the sect's own highly allegorical interpretation of the Lao-tzu, which they considered to be the revealed work of Lord Lao the Most High. Their fundamental concern with right actions and good works as being most in the spirit of the Tao and consequently ensuring immunity from disease is also shown by their construction of way stations in which provisions and shelter were placed for the convenience and use of travelers, as well as in the numerous injunctions to charity and forbearance recorded in the written codes of the movement.

Both the nuclear communities and the "Taocratic" realm as a whole were bound together by a ritual cycle, of which only fragmentary indications remain. Among the most important ceremonial occasions were the communal feasts (ch'u) offered at certain specific times throughout the year (during the 1st, 7th, and 10th months) as well as on other important occasions, such as initiation into the hierarchy, advancement in rank or function, or the consecration of an oratory. These feasts were of varying degrees of elaborateness, depending on the circumstances. The common essential element, however, was the sharing of certain foods, in prescribed quantities, among masters and disciples. This was envisaged as a communion with the Tao, at once attesting the close compact with the celestial powers enjoyed by the members of the parish and reinforcing their own sense of cohesion as a group.

Much more notorious was the rite known as the Union of Breaths (Hoch'i), a communal sexual ritual said to have been celebrated at each new moon. Several cryptic manuals of instruction for the priest in charge of these proceedings are preserved in the canon, and they depict scenarios of a highly stylized erotic choreography of cosmic significance. Like the communal feasts, these rites might be interpreted as a concentrated and idealized adaptation of older, more diffuse agrarian religious customs. This suggests a pattern of the integration of local practices that has remained characteristic of Taoism throughout its history.

In 215 CE the celestial master Chang Lu, grandson of Chang Tao-ling, submitted to the authority of the Han general Ts'ao Ts'ao, who six years later founded the Wei dynasty in the north. This resulted in official recognition of the sect by the dynasty; the celestial masters in turn expressed their spiritual approbation of the Wei's mandate to replace the Han. Under these conditions a formal definition of the relations of organized Taoism to the secular powers developed. In contrast to the popular messianic movements, Lao-tzu's manifestation to Chang Tao-ling was considered to be definitive; the god was not incarnate in them but rather designated Chang and his successors as his representatives on earth. Under a worthy dynasty, which governed by virtue of the Tao, the role of the celestial masters was that of acting as intermediaries for celestial confirmation and support. Only when a responsible ruler was lacking were the celestial masters to take over the temporal guidance of the people and hold the supreme power in trust for a new incumbent. Abetted by this flexible ideology of compromise, the sect made constant progress at the courts of the Wei and Western Chin dynasties until, by the end of the 3rd century, it counted among its adherents many of the most powerful families in North China.

Interpretative commentaries continued to be written on the classics of speculative Taoism in which the aid of the most diverse philosophies was called upon, not excluding Buddhism. Like the work of the 3rd- and 4th-century scholiasts, these represent the ideas of a tiny minority, the members of the scholar-official class. Though excursions into ever more refined scholasticism continued to be a diversion for them, the real creative vitality of Taoism was to be found elsewhere.

The Southern tradition. The political partition of China into three parts following the collapse of the Han dynasty in 220 CE, the so-called period of the Three Kingdoms, had its spiritual counterpart in certain well-defined regional religious differences. Against the independent dynasties in the north and west stood the empire of Wu, south of the Yangtze River.

A region exposed comparatively late to Chinese influence, this southeastern area had long been famous for its aboriginal sorcerers and dancing mediums. In the course of Chinese colonization, separate learned spiritual traditions developed alongside the ecstatic practices of the populace.

To the court of the emperors of Wu came savants and wonder-workers representing a variety of traditions that were to acquire lasting influence. Among these personages was Ko Hsüan (3rd century CE), who was said to have been initiated into an ancient alchemical tradition. His great-nephew KO HUNG in the next century became one of the most celebrated writers on the various technical means for attaining immortality.

In 317 Lo-yang, capital of the Western Chin dynasty, fell to the Hsiung-nu. This event set off a considerable emigration to the unsubdued region south of the Yangtze River. The Imperial household was followed in its flight by numerous high-ranking dependents and their spiritual ministers. During this period the Way of the Celestial Masters, established at the court of Lo-yang since the early 3rd century, apparently first penetrated in force to the Southeast. While the secular, military menace remained in the North, and factional struggles raged among the emigrants, the Way of the Celestial Masters waged unremitting war against the indigenous sects and cults of DEMONS of the Southeast. Many of the old, established families, settled in the region since the end of the Han dynasty, turned away from local traditions to become members of the Taoist faith of their new political superiors.

The most brilliant synthesis of the Way of the Celestial Masters with the indigenous traditions of the Southeast occurred in the 4th century CE in a family closely related to Ko Hung (see also MAO SHAN). Within this movement many spiritual traditions (especially popular messianism) were adapted to provide an encompassing framework and temporal cogency. Buddhist concepts were integrated into a Taoist system, while Buddhist notions of predestination and REINCARNATION were subtly blended with native Chinese beliefs. Among the more learned traditions, alchemy received particular attention, being adopted for the first time into the context of organized religious Taoism.

Another member of the Ko family was responsible for the second great Taoist scriptural tradition. Ko Ch'ao-fu began composing the Ling-pao ching ("Classic of the Sacred Jewel") about 397 CE. He claimed that they had been first revealed to his own ancestor, the famous Ko Hsüan, early in the 3rd century. In these works the Tao is personified in a series of "celestial worthies" (t'ien-tsun), its primordial and uncreated manifestations. These in turn were worshiped by means of a group of liturgies, which, during the 5th century, became supreme in Taoist practice, completely absorbing the older, simpler rites of the Way of the Celestial Masters. As each celestial worthy represented a different aspect of the Tao, so each ceremony of worship had a particular purpose, which it attempted to realize by distinct means. The rites as a whole were called chai ("retreat"), from the preliminary abstinence obligatory on all participants. They lasted a day and a night or for a fixed period of three, five, or seven days; the number of persons taking part was also specified, centering on a sacerdotal unit of six officiants. One's own salvation was inseparable from that of his ancestors; the Huang-lu chai (Retreat of the Yellow Register) was directed toward the salvation of the dead. Chin-lu chai (Retreat of the Golden Register), on the other hand, was intended to promote auspicious influences on the living. The T'u-t'an chai (Mud and Soot Retreat, or Retreat of Misery) was a ceremony of collective contrition, with the purpose of fending off disease, the punishment of SIN, by prior confession; in Chinese civil law, confession resulted in an automatic reduction or suspension of sentence. These and other rituals were accomplished for the most part in the open, within a specially delimited sacred area, or altar (t'an), the outdoor complement of the oratory. The chanted liturgy, innumerable lamps, and clouds of billowing incense combined to produce in the participants a cathartic experience that assured these ceremonies a central place in all subsequent Taoist practices.

Though Taoism never became the exclusive state religion in the South, its most eminent representatives founded powerful organizations that received considerable official support. LU HSIU-CHING in the 5th century epitomized the Ling-pao tradition, the liturgies of which he codified. His establishment at the great Buddho-Taoist center, Lu Shan (in Kiangsi Province), carried out ceremonies and provided auspicious portents in favor of the Liu-Sung dynasty (420–479), in whose rulers Taoists complacently agreed to recognize the fulfillment of the old messianic prophecies and the legitimate continuation of the Han dynasty. Lu was frequently invited to the capital (present-day Nanking), where the Ch'ung-hsü kuan (Abbey) was founded for him and served as the focal point of the Ling-pao movement.

Like Lu, who was a member of the old aristocracy of Wu, T'ao Hung-ching of the 5th and 6th centuries enjoyed even greater renown as the most eminent Taoist master of his time. He spent years in searching out the manuscript legacy of Yang Hsi and the Hsüs, and in 492 he retired to Mao Shan, where he edited and annotated the revealed texts and attempted to re-create their practices in their original setting. T'ao's fame as a poet, calligrapher, and natural philosopher has persisted throughout Chinese history; he is perhaps best known as the founder of critical pharmacology. T'ao was an intimate friend of the great Liang emperor Wu-ti (of the 6th century), and his Mao Shan establishment was able to survive the proscription of all other Taoist sects in 504. Though whole Taoist families lived under T'ao's spiritual rule at Mao Shan, he himself stressed the need for CELIBACY and full-time commitment to the work of the Tao. In his state-sponsored Ch'u-yang kuan, T'ao appears to have effected a working synthesis of the public rites of the Ling-pao liturgies with the private and individual practices enjoined in the Mao Shan revelations. This dual practice was to remain a feature of all subsequent Taoist sects. T'ao's primary interest, however, was in the SCRIPTURES of the perfected of Shang-ch'ing; and this is reflected in the revelations vouchsafed by these same spiritual agents to a 19-year-old disciple of T'ao's, Chou Tzu-liang, in 515–516. These revelations show a pronounced Buddhist influence, and T'ao was himself reputed to be a master of Buddhist as well as Taoist doctrine. His writings evidence a complete familiarity with Buddhist literature, and it is reported that both Buddhist monks and Taoist priests officiated at his burial rites.

State Taoism in the North. Under the foreign rulers of North China, independent developments likewise were in progress. In 415 K'ou Ch'ien-chih received a revelation from Lao-chün himself. According to this new dispensation, K'ou was designated celestial master and ordered to undertake a total reformation of Taoism. Not only were all popular messianic movements claiming to represent Lao-chün unsparingly condemned, but K'ou's mission was particularly aimed at the elimination of abuses from the Way of the Celestial Masters itself. Sexual rites and the taxes contributed to the support of the PRIESTHOOD were the principal targets of the god's denunciations; "What have such matters to do with the pure Tao?" he irately demanded. The proposed reform was far more radical than that foreseen in the Mao Shan revelations of the Southeast, and K'ou was given concrete temporal power of a sort that the Hsüs had not envisaged. Political and economic factors favored the acceptance of his message at court; Emperor T'ai Wu-ti (5th century) of the Northern Wei dynasty put K'ou in charge of religious affairs within his dominions and proclaimed Taoism the official religion of the empire. The emperor considered himself the terrestrial deputy of the deified Lao-tzu, as is indicated by the name of one of the periods of his reign: T'ai-p'ing chen-chün (Perfect Lord of the Great Peace). The dominant position of Taoism under the Northern Wei, however, apparently did not long survive K'ou Ch'ien-chih's death in 448.

Taoism under the T'ang, Sung, and later dynasties. China's reunification under the T'ang dynasty (618–907) marked the beginning of Taoism's most spectacular success. The dynasty's founder, Li Yüan, claimed to be descended from the Lao-tzu; as his power increased, even the influential Mao Shan Taoists came to accept him as the long-deferred fulfillment of messianic prophecy. This notion was built into the dynasty's state ideology, and the emperor was commonly referred to as the "sage" (sheng). Prospective candidates for the civil service were examined in either the Ling-pao "Classic of Salvation" (Tu-jen ching) or the Mao Shan "Classic of the Yellow Court" (Huang-t'ing ching). Under a series of celebrated patriarchs, the Mao Shan organization dominated the religious life of the age. One of the greatest of the line, Ssu-ma Ch'eng-chen, initiated innumerable government officials and eminent men of letters and served as spiritual master to emperors. When Ssu-ma Ch'eng-chen pointed out that the sacred peaks of the Imperial cult were in reality under the superintendence of the perfected of Shang-ch'ing, officially sponsored shrines were erected to them there; and their propitiation was incorporated into the traditional rites.

The Sung (960–1279) and Yüan (1206–1368) periods witnessed a great religious effervescence, stimulated in part, under the Sung, by the menace of foreign invasion and, during the Yüan, by Tantric (esoteric, or occultic) Buddhism, which was in vogue among the new Mongol rulers of China. The Way of the Celestial Masters, previously eclipsed by Mao Shan, was revitalized by Chang Chi-hsien, the 30th celestial master, and the movement came to be called the Way of Orthodox Unity (CHENG-I TAO).

After the retreat of the Sung government south of the Yangtze River (1126), a number of new Taoist sects were founded in the occupied North and soon attained impressive dimensions. Among them were the T'ai-i (Supreme Unity) sect (founded c. 1140), the Chen-ta tao (Perfect and Great Tao) sect (founded in 1142), and the Ch'üan-chen (Perfect Realization) sect (founded in 1163). In the South, Mao Shan continued to prosper, while the Ko-tsoo sect flourished at the mountain of that name, in Kiangsi province. This was said to be the spot where the 3rd-century immortal, Ko Hsüan, had ascended to heaven; the sect looked to him as its founder and transmitted the Ling-pao scriptures, which Ko Hsüan was first to receive.

During these dynasties, with such prestigious examples as Ch'an (ZEN) Buddhism (emphasizing intuitive meditation) and NEO-CONFUCIANISM (emphasizing knowledge and reason) before them, Taoists did not long delay in constructing interesting syntheses of their own and other beliefs. CONFUCIANISM now joined Buddhism as a fertile source of inspiration. The revelations of Hsü Sun, supposed to have lived in the 4th century CE, to Ho Chen-kung in 1131 inspired the "Pure and Luminous Way of Loyalty and Filial Obedience" (Ching-ming chung-hsiao tao). This sect preached the Confucian cardinal virtues as being essential for salvation, and consequently it won a considerable following in conservative intellectual and official circles.

Another highly popular syncretistic movement of Taoist origin was that of the Three Religions (SAN-CHIAO), so called from its blending of Taoist, Buddhist, and Confucian elements. Its composite moral teachings are represented by popular tracts, the so-called "books on goodness" (SHAN-SHU), which have been in extremely wide circulation since the Ming dynasty (1368–1644).

INFLUENCE

Taoism, Confucianism, and Buddhism. Confucianism is concerned with human society and the social responsibilities of its members; Taoism emphasizes nature and what is natural and spontaneous in humans. The two traditions, one "within society" and the other "beyond society," balance and complement each other. This classic definition is generally correct concerning orthodox Han Confucianism; it neglects some aspects of Confucian thought, such as the speculations on the I-ching, that are considered to be among the Confucian Classics and the prophetic occult (ch'an-wei) commentaries to the classics. As far as Taoism is concerned, this definition neglects the social thought of the Taoist philosophers and the political aspects of Taoist religion. Chinese Buddhism has been viewed not as a Sinified Indian religion but as flowers on the tree of Chinese religions that blossomed under Indian stimulus and that basically maintained its Chinese character.

The first mention of Buddhism in China (65 CE) occurs in a Taoist context, at the court of a member of the Imperial family known for his devotion to the doctrines of Huang-Lao. The Indian religion was at first regarded as a foreign variety of Taoism; the particular Buddhist texts chosen to be translated during the Han period reveal the Taoist preoccupation of the earliest converts with rules of conduct and techniques of meditation. Early translators employed Taoist expressions as equivalents for Buddhist technical terms. Thus, the Buddha, in achieving enlightenment (BODHI), was described as having "obtained the Tao"; the Buddhist saints (ARHAT) become perfected immortals (CHEN-JEN); and "nonaction" (wu-wei) was used to render NIRVANA (the Buddhist state of bliss). A joint sacrifice to Lao-tzu and the Buddha was performed by the Han emperor in 166 CE. During this period occurred the first reference to the notion that Lao-tzu, after vanishing into the west, became the Buddha. This theory enjoyed a long and varied history. It claimed that Buddhism was a debased form of Taoism, designed by Lao-tzu as a curb on the violent natures and vicious habits of the "western barbarians," and as such was entirely unsuitable for Chinese consumption. Although there is no evidence that the earliest Taoist organization, literature, or ceremonies were in any way indebted to Buddhism, by the 4th century there was a distinct Buddhist influence upon the literary form of Taoist scriptures and the philosophical expression of the most eminent Taoist masters.

The process of interaction, however, was a mutual one, Taoism participating in the widening of thought because of the influence of a foreign religion and Buddhism undergoing a partial "Taoicization" as part of its adaptation to Chinese conditions. The Buddhist contribution is particularly noticeable in the developing conceptions of the afterlife; Buddhist ideas of PURGATORY had a most striking effect not only on Taoism but especially on Chinese popular religion. On a more profound level the ultimate synthesis of Taoism and Buddhism was realized in the Ch'an (Zen) tradition (from the 7th century on), into which the paradoxes of the ancient Taoist mystics were integrated. Likewise, the goal of illumination in a single lifetime, rather than at the end of an indefinite succession of future existences, was analogous to the religious Taoist's objective of immortality as the culmination of his present life.

As early as the T'ang dynasty, there are traces of the syncretism of the "Three Religions" (San-chiao), which became a popular movement in Sung and Ming China. A mixture of Confucian ethics, the Taoist system of merits, and the Buddhist concept of reincarnation produced such "books on goodness" (shan-shu) as the Kan ying p'ien ("Tract on Actions and Retributions"). The school of the "Three Religions" was rejected by most Confucians and Buddhists but received wide support in Taoist circles. Many Taoist masters of those periods transmitted nei-tan and other techniques of inner cultivation to their disciples while at the same time preaching the moralism of the "Three Religions" to outsiders.

Taoism in modern times. The principal refuge of Taoism in the 20th century is Taiwan. Its establishment on the island was doubtless contemporary with the great emigration from the opposite mainland province of Fukien in the 17th and 18th centuries. The religion, however, has received new impetus since the 63rd celestial master, Chang En-pu, took refuge there in 1949. On Taiwan, Taoism may still be observed in its traditional setting, distinct from the manifestations of popular religion that surround it. Hereditary Taoist priests (Taiwanese sai-kong) called “blackheads” (wu-t’ou), after their headgear, are clearly set off from the exorcists (fa-shih) or “redheads” (hung-t’ou) of the ecstatic cults. Their lengthy rites are still held, now known under the term chiao (“offering”), rather than the medieval chai (“retreat”). The liturgy chanted, in expanded Sung form, still embodies elements that can be traced back to Chang Tao-ling’s sect. The religion has enjoyed a renaissance since the 1960s, with great activity being carried on in temple building and restoration.

TAO-TE CHING \ˈdaü-ˈdä-ˈjɪŋ\, Pinyin Daodejing (Chinese: “Classic of the Way of Power”), classic of Chinese philosophical literature. The name was first used during the Han dynasty (206 BCE–220 CE); it had previously been called LAO-TZU in the belief that it was written by Lao-tzu, the reputed founder of TAOISM. The problem of authorship is, however, still unresolved. Scholars date the Tao-te ching’s composition to between the 6th and 3rd century BCE.

The Tao-te ching presented a way of life intended to restore harmony and tranquillity to a kingdom racked by widespread disorder. It was critical of the unbridled wantonness of self-seeking rulers and was disdainful of social activism based on the type of abstract moralism and mechanical propriety characteristic of Confucian ethics. The TAO (“Way”) of the Tao-te ching consists in essence of “nonaction” (WU-WEI), understood as no unnatural action, rather than complete passivity. It implies spontaneity, non-interference, letting things take their natural course. Chaos ceases, quarrels end, and self-righteous feuding disappears because the Tao is allowed to flow unchallenged and unchallenging. By instilling in the populace the principle of Tao, the ruler precludes all cause for complaint and presides over a kingdom of great tranquillity.

Over 350 commentaries on the Tao-te ching have been preserved in Chinese and about 250 in Japanese. Since 1900 more than 80 translations have appeared in English.

TAO-TSANG \ˈdaü-ˈdzäŋ\, Pinyin Daozang, also called Taoist Canon \ˈdaü-ist\ (Chinese: “Canon of the Way”), collection of Taoist writings. The original canon, printed by the Taoist emperors of the Sung dynasty (960–1279 CE), comprised almost 5,000 volumes, but many of these were destroyed by imperial decree during the Yüan dynasty (1279–1368). The present Tao-tsang, numbering well over 1,000 volumes, includes philosophical writings and works on Taoist meditation, alchemy, and divine revelation.

TAPAS \ˈtä-päs\ (Sanskrit: “heat,” or “ardor”), in HINDUISM, ascetic practice voluntarily carried out to achieve spiritual power or purification. In the VEDAS, tapas refers to the “inner heat” created by the practice of physical austerities. Mythologically, tapas was the means by which PRAJĀPATI brought the world into existence. In later Hinduism the practice of tapas was especially associated with yogic discipline as a way of purifying the body in preparation for the more exacting spiritual exercises leading to liberation (MOKṢA). Among the austerities are fasting, holding difficult or painful bodily postures, and breath control.

In JAINISM, such ASCETICISM is one of the central means of breaking the cycle of rebirths by preventing new KARMA from forming and getting rid of the old. The Jains distinguish between external tapas, such as fasting, meditating, and living in seclusion, and internal tapas, such as contemplation, CONFESSION, and repentance of SINS.

In early BUDDHISM the monastic life of chastity and poverty was regarded as the only path to Enlightenment. However, the Buddha renounced both extreme self-mortification and self-indulgence in his advocacy of the MIDDLE WAY.

TAPIO \ˈtä-pē-ō\, also called Metsähine \ˈmet-sa-ˈhē-nä\, or Hiisi \ˈhē-sē\, Finnish god of the forest and ruler of animals. As the personified forest, he was sometimes depicted as being the size of a fir tree, like a human being in the front, but like a gnarled old tree from behind. Sometimes Tapio was an especially beautiful woman who enticed hunters or woodcutters staying in the woods overnight; but she, too, turned out to be a rotting stump upon closer scrutiny. Hunters made offerings to Tapio and made sure they did not break any prohibitions in the forest, such as making excessive noise or shooting unusual birds that might be the forest spirit in disguise.

TAQĪYA \tä-ˈkē-yä\ (Arabic: “self-protection”), in ISLAM, practice of concealing one’s belief and foregoing ordinary religious duties when under threat of death or injury to oneself or one’s fellow Muslims.

The QUR’AN allows Muslims to profess friendship with the unbelievers (3:28) and even outwardly to deny their faith (16:106), if doing so would save them from imminent danger, on the condition that their hearts contradict their tongues. MUHAMMAD himself was regarded to have set the first example for the application of taqīya when he chose to migrate to MEDINA rather than face his enemies in MECCA.

Some rules have been laid down as to when a Muslim may or may not use taqīya. Consideration of community rather than private welfare is stressed in most cases. The threat of flogging or temporary imprisonment and other discomforts that remain within tolerable limits do not justify the use of taqīya. A person without responsibilities toward women or children may not use it under any circumstances short of direct and express threat to life.

The Shi’ites made taqīya a fundamental tenet because of their suffering from persecution and political defeats throughout their history. The ‘Ibāḍīya called for prudent fear and avoidance of foolish and unnecessary martyrdom and regarded taqīya as a basic religious requirement. Ultimately, it is left to the conscience of each individual to judge, when the situation arises, whether taqīya is absolutely necessary and whether his private interests or those of the religion and the community are being served.

TAQLĪD \tä-ˈklēd\ (Arabic: “entrustment of authority,” or “copy,” “imitation”), in Islamic law, unquestioning acceptance of the legal decisions of another without knowing the basis of those decisions. Of the four SUNNI legal schools, the SHĀFI’Ī, the MĀLIKĪ, and the ḤANAFĪ all embrace taqlīd, while the ḤANBALĪ reject it. SHI’ITE Muslims hold to an affirmative but quite different understanding of the institution.

Those Sunnis who affirm taqlīd believe that the legal scholars of the early period were uniquely qualified to derive authoritative legal opinions, binding upon the whole Muslim community, from the QUR’AN and the SUNNA of the Prophet. In the early period, a series of great legal scholars exercised independent interpretation (IJTIHĀD) of the sources, carrying out their efforts through the use of such legal tools as analogical reasoning (QIYĀS). In the third Islamic century (9th century CE) and subsequent centuries, with the emergence of legal schools formed around some of the most significant scholars, it came to be widely believed that all important questions of law had been dealt with and that the right of independent interpretation had been withdrawn for future generations. Henceforward, all were to accept the decisions of the early authorities—i.e., to exercise taqlīd toward them. This doctrine is usually expressed as “the closing of the gates of ijtihād” (bāb al-ijtihād).

By contrast, Ḥanbalī scholars and others who follow the teachings of the school (e.g., the modern sect of the Wahhābīs) insist on the necessity of returning directly to the sources to make independent judgments of their meaning. In the 19th and 20th centuries, Muslim modernists engaged in bitter polemics against taqlīd, which they held encourages stagnation of the law and Muslim backwardness.

In its use among Twelver Shi'ites following the Uṣūlī ("rationalist") legal school, taqlīd refers to the necessity for a layman to accept and follow the opinions of a living expert in Islamic law (mujtahid). Every individual who does not himself have the qualifications to interpret the sources of the law must choose a member of the religious class (the 'ULAMĀ') whom he accepts as his marja'-i taqlīd ("source of authority") and whose teachings he observes. When his chosen mujtahid dies, he must select another, because to follow a dead guide is forbidden. Shi'ites following the Akhbārī ("traditionalist") legal school, however, must adhere to the authoritative legal instructions of the IMAMS. They can also follow those of a dead jurist. In both senses taqlīd is compulsory for Shi'ites. See also فِیْهِ.

TĀRĀ \tā-rā\, Tibetan Sgrol-ma \dḁēl-mä\, Buddhist savior-goddess with numerous forms, widely popular in Nepal, Tibet, and Mongolia. She is the feminine counterpart of the Bodhisattva AVALOKITEŚVARA. According to popular belief, she came into existence from a tear of Avalokiteśvara, which fell to the ground and formed a lake. From its waters rose a lotus, which, on opening, revealed the goddess. Like Avalokiteśvara, she is a compassionate deity who helps human beings "cross to the other shore." She is the protectress of navigation and earthly travel, as well as of spiritual travel along the path to Enlightenment.

In Tibet she is believed to be incarnate in every pious woman, and the two wives—a Chinese princess and a Nepali princess—of the first Buddhist king of Tibet, Srong-brtsan-sgam-po, were identified with the two major forms of Tārā. The White Tārā (Sanskrit: Sītatārā; Tibetan: Sgrolldkar) was incarnated as the Chinese princess. She symbolizes purity and is often represented standing at the right hand of her consort, Avalokiteśvara, or seated with legs crossed, holding a full-blown lotus. She is generally shown with a third eye.

The Green Tārā (Sanskrit: Śyāmatārā; Tibetan: Sgrol-ljang) was believed to be incarnated as the Nepali princess. She is considered by some to be the original Tārā and consort of Avalokiteśvara. She is generally shown seated on a lotus throne with her right leg hanging down, wearing the ornaments of a bodhisattva and holding in her hands the closed blue lotus (utpala).

The white and green Tārās, with their contrasting symbols of the full-blown and closed lotus, are said to symbolize between them the unending compassion of the deity who labors both day and night to relieve suffering.

TARANIS \tār-ə-nis\ (probably akin to Old Irish torann, "thunder," and Welsh taran, "peal of thunder"), powerful Celtic deity that was one of three mentioned by the Roman poet Lucan in the 1st century CE; the other two were ESUS ("Lord") and TEUTATES ("God of the People"). According to later commentators, Taranis' sacrificial victims, either human or animal, were placed in great wickerwork images, which were then burned. Taranis was symbolically represented by the wheel and the lightning flash.

TARGUM \tār-gəm\ (Aramaic: "Translation," or "Interpretation"), any of several translations of the Hebrew BIBLE or portions of it into the Aramaic language.

The earliest Targums date from the time after the BABYLONIAN EXILE when Aramaic had superseded Hebrew as the spoken language of the Jews in Palestine; Aramaic was firmly established in Palestine by the 1st century CE, although Hebrew still remained the learned and sacred language. Thus the Targums were designed to meet the needs of unlearned Jews to whom the Hebrew of the OLD TESTAMENT was unintelligible.

The status and influence of the Targums became assured after the Second Temple was destroyed in 70 CE, when SYNAGOGUES replaced the Temple as houses of worship. For it was in the synagogue that it became customary for a meturgeman, or professional interpreter (hence the name Targum) to read aloud from the Old Testament and to translate these readings into Aramaic. Since his object was to give an intelligible rendering of the biblical text, the Targums eventually took on the character of paraphrase and commentary. A meturgeman would generally expand and explain what was obscure, adjust the incidents of the past to the ideas of later times, emphasize the moral lessons to be learned from the biblical narratives, and adapt the rules and regulations of the SCRIPTURES to the conditions and requirements of the current age.

Throughout the Talmudic period of the early centuries of the common era, the tradition of oral translation and exposition was recognized as authoritative. The official recognition of a written Targum, and therefore the final fixing of its text, belongs to the 5th century CE. The best-known, most literal, and possibly the earliest Targum is that of Onkelos on the PENTATEUCH, which appeared in its final revision in the 3rd century CE. Others include the Targum of Pseudo-Jonathan, the SAMARITAN Targum, and the Targum of Jonathan ben Uzziel.

TARHUN \ˈtär-ˌkūn\, also spelled Taru \ˈtär-ü\, Tarhu \-kü\, Tarhunt \-künt\, Tarhunna \tär-ˈkūn-nä\, or Tarhuis \ˈtär-ˌkwēsh\, ancient Anatolian weather god whose name comes from the root tarh-, “to conquer.” His name appears in Hittite and Assyrian records (c. 1400–612 BCE) and later as an element in Hellenistic personal names, primarily from Cilicia. The weather god was one of the supreme deities of the Hittite pantheon, was regarded as the embodiment of the state in action, and played a prominent part in mythology. He was the consort of ARINNITTI, the Hittite sun goddess and principal deity.

In art Tarhun’s symbol was a three-pronged thunderbolt, which he usually carried in one hand while brandishing a club, ax, or other weapon with the other. He is rarely identified by name, and it is often uncertain whether Tarhun or the Hurrian TESHUB was intended. His sacred animal was the bull, and in art Tarhun may be depicted standing on it. JUPITER DOLICHENUS, the god on the bull worshiped by the Roman legions, was a development of Tarhun.

TARĪQA \tä-ˈrē-kə\ (Arabic: “way,” “manner,” or “means”), Muslim spiritual path toward direct knowledge (maʿrifā) of God or reality (ḥaqq). In the 9th and 10th centuries ṭarīqa meant the spiritual path of individual Sufi mystics. After the 12th century, as communities of followers gathered around SHAYKHS (or pīrs, “teachers”), ṭarīqa came to designate the shaykh’s entire ritual system, which was followed by the community or mystic order. Eventually ṭarīqa came to mean the order itself.

Each mystic order claimed a chain of spiritual descent (silsila) from the Prophet MUHAMMAD, established procedures for initiation of members (murīd, IKHWĀN, darwish, fakīr), and prescribed disciplines. By following the path of a known “friend of God,” or Sufi saint, under the guidance of his shaykh, the Sufi might himself achieve the mystical state (ḥāl) of the friends of God. Though sober teachers inveighed against excesses, the search for spiritual ECSTASY sometimes led to such practices as drug taking and wild acrobatics, activities that earned for some of the orders the names whirling, howling, and dancing dervishes. DERVISH orders frequently established monasteries (ribāt, khanka, ZĀWIYA, tekke) in which not only members but also laity were invited to stay.

First established in the 12th century, the orders numbered in the hundreds by the end of the 20th century, with a membership in the millions. The greatest expansion of Sufi ṭarīqas has been in the central Islamic countries, where they played a vital role in the religious life of the Muslim community. Orders also exist in most countries with Muslim populations. Despite efforts to eradicate Sufi orders in Turkey and Saudi Arabia, they still provide Muslims and non-Muslims focal points for spirituality.

TAROT \ˈtar-ō, ta-ˈrō\, any of a set of cards used in fortune-telling and in certain card games. Tarot cards approximating their present form first appeared in Italy and France in the late 14th century.

Early tarot decks were of several types, each varying in the number of cards. The standard modern tarot deck is based on the Venetian or Piedmontese tarot. It consists of 78 cards divided into two groups: the Major Arcana, which has 22 cards (also known as trumps), and the Minor Arcana, which has 56 cards. The cards of the Major Arcana have pictures representing various forces, characters, virtues, and vices. The 22 cards are numbered from I through XXI, with the Fool being unnumbered. The tarots of the Major Arcana are, in order: I Juggler, or Magician; II Papess, or Female Pope; III Empress; IV Emperor; V Pope; VI Lovers; VII Chariot; VIII Justice; IX Hermit; X Wheel of Fortune; XI Strength, or Fortitude; XII Hanged Man; XIII Death; XIV Temperance; XV Devil; XVI Lightning-Struck Tower; XVII Star; XVIII Moon; XIX Sun; XX Last Judgment; XXI World, or Universe; and the Fool.

The 56 cards of the Minor Arcana are divided into four suits of 14 cards each. The suits, comparable to those of modern playing cards, are as follows: wands, batons, or rods (clubs); cups (hearts); swords (spades); and coins, pentacles, or disks (diamonds). Each suit has four court cards (usually named king, queen, knight, and page) and 10 numbered cards. In ascending order, the value progression in each suit is ace to 10, then page (knave, or jack), knight, queen, and king—though the ace is sometimes assigned a high value, as in modern playing cards. The standard deck of modern playing cards was derived from that of the Minor Arcana (with the elimination of the knight).

Originally used for games, from the 18th century the cards began to take on esoteric associations, as certain European writers connected them to diverse traditions of MYSTICISM, DIVINATION, alchemy, and ritual magic. For fortune-telling, each tarot card is ascribed a meaning. The cards of the Major Arcana refer to spiritual matters and important trends in the questioner's life. In the Minor Arcana wands deal mainly with business matters and career ambitions, cups with love, swords with conflict, and coins with money and material comfort. The tarot deck is shuffled by the questioner, and then the fortune-teller lays out a few of the cards in a special pattern called a "spread." The meaning of any card is modified according to whether or not it is upside down, its position in the spread, and the meaning of adjacent cards.

TARPEIA \tär-'pē-ə\, in Roman mythology, daughter of the commander of the Capitol in Rome during the Sabine War. She offered to betray the citadel if the Sabines would give her what they wore on their left arms, i.e., their bracelets; instead they threw their shields on her and crushed her to death. The story may have been an attempt to account for the Tarpeian Rock, a cliff on the Capitoline Hill over which murderers and traitors were thrown.

TASHBĪH \tāsh-'bē, -'bē-hə\ (Arabic: "assimilating"), in ISLAM, ANTHROPOMORPHISM, comparing God to created things. Both tashbīh and its opposite, ta'tīl (divesting God of all attributes), are regarded as SINS in Islamic theology. The difficulty in dealing with the nature of God in Islam arises from the seemingly contradictory views contained in the QUR'AN. On the one hand God is described as unique and not similar to anything that the mind can imagine; on the other hand he is referred to in the language of anthropomorphism—as having eyes, ears, hands, and face, and sitting on his throne and talking and listening.

Some Muslim theologians argued that the Qur'an used such human concepts and idioms because there are no other means of delivering God's message and urged that they be interpreted allegorically rather than literally. AL-ASH'ARĪ, a 10th-century Muslim theologian, asserted that the hands, eyes, and face of God and his sitting and talking must be recognized literally without asking how.

In the literature of the Sufis, God is spoken of in the language and style of ordinary love poetry, which the Sufis interpret allegorically. This is done on the grounds that humans are created after God's own image. When IBN AL-'ARABĪ (Muslim mystic of the 12th century) published his collection of poems Tarjumān al-ashwāq ("The Interpreter of Desires"), the Muslim orthodox rejected his claim of alluding to divine realities and accused him of actually celebrating the charms of his mistress. He wrote a lengthy interpretation of the poetic text to avoid the accusation of tashbīh.

Both tashbīh and ta'tīl were avoided by many theologians who spoke rather of tanzīh (keeping God pure) and of tathbīt (confirming God's attributes). The major reason for the fear of tashbīh is that it can easily lead to paganism and IDOLATRY, while ta'tīl leads to ATHEISM.

TATHĀGATA \tə-'tā-gə-tə\ (Sanskrit and Pāli), one of the titles of a buddha and the one most frequently employed by the BUDDHA GOTAMA when referring to himself. The exact meaning is uncertain; Buddhist commentaries present many explanations. The most generally adopted interpretation is "one who has thus (tathā) gone (gata)" or "one who has thus (tathā) arrived (āgata)," implying that the historical Buddha was only one of many who have in the past and will in the future experience enlightenment and teach others how to achieve it.

In later MAHĀYĀNA Buddhism, Tathāgata came to convey the essential BUDDHA NATURE hidden in everyone. Tathāgata is the "thusness" that makes enlightenment possible. Having Tathāgata within, one yearns for enlightenment. As the true state of all that exists, Tathāgata is synonymous with ultimate reality, otherwise indefinable.

TATIAN \tā-'shən\, Greek Tatianos [b. c. 120 CE, Syria—d. April 173], Syrian compiler of the Diatessaron (Greek: "From Four," or "Out of Four"), a version of the four Gospels arranged in a single continuous narrative that, in its Syriac form, was an important resource for the Syrian church for centuries. Its Greek and Latin versions influenced the Gospel text. Tatian also founded, or at least was closely associated with, the heretical sect of the Encratites, a community integrating a severe ASCETICISM with elements of Stoic philosophy.

Tatian, a pupil of JUSTIN MARTYR, converted to Christianity—rejecting the classical literary and moral values of the Greeks as corrupt and repudiating their intellectualism. He embraced a synthesis of Judeo-Christian MONOTHEISM with the Stoic concept of an intermediary LOGOS (Greek: "word"), creating the rational and purposeful cohesion of the universe; the personal dimension was provided by belief in the fallen soul's ultimate return to the cosmic pneuma (Greek: "spirit") whence it came.

After Justin's martyrdom Tatian broke with the Roman church, returned to Syria about 172, and became associated with a school of the Encratites. During this period Tatian produced the two works that still survive, the Diatessaron and a discourse to the Greeks. The latter, a virulent polemic against Hellenistic (Greek) learning, negatively compared Greek polytheistic theology with the Christian concept of a unique deity whose sublimity transcended the foibles of Greek idols. Tatian submitted that the Judeo-Christian tradition furnished Greek moral philosophy with everything it contained of value, while the former exhibited a selflessness that was absent from the latter.

TA-TS'ANG CHING \dā-'tsāŋ-'jiŋ\ (Chinese: "Great Storehouse Scripture"), Japanese Daizō-kyō \dī-'zō-,kyō\, total body of Buddhist literature deemed canonical in China and Japan and comprising more than 2,000 works in the standard Chinese edition and more than 3,000 in the latest Japanese edition. The canon began with translations of Sanskrit texts in the 1st century, and these translations continued to be made until the 8th or 9th century. Many of the Sanskrit works have perished and are known only from the translations.

The Ta-ts'ang ching includes the THERAVĀDA canonical works, particularly their SARVĀSTIVĀDA versions. All the great and minor MAHĀYĀNA sūtras are there, often in multiple translations. Also included are many late Tantric treatises, many ecclesiastical histories and hagiographic works by Chinese authors, and religious poetry composed during the Yüan and Ming dynasties (13th–17th century).

TAT TVAM ASI \tət-ˈtvəm-ə-sē, -ˈtvəm-\ (Sanskrit: “that you are”), in Hindu philosophy, expression of the relationship between the individual and the absolute, frequently repeated in the sixth chapter of the Chāndogya UPANISHAD (c. 600 BCE), as the teacher Uddālaka Āruṇi instructs his son in the nature of supreme reality. The phrase was given its most literal interpretation by the 8th–9th-century thinker ŚAṂKARA of the ADVAITA (Nondualist) school, for whose doctrine the statement was fundamental.

TATTVASAMGRAHA TANTRA \tə-tvə-ˈsəŋ-grə-hə-ˈtən-trə, ˈtə-twə-\ (Sanskrit: “Symposium of Truth [of All the Buddhas] Tantra”), TANTRA of Chen-yen BUDDHISM.

During the 7th, 8th, and 9th centuries the VAJRAYĀNA forms of Esoteric Buddhism that were developing in India spread to Southeast Asia and to East Asia. In East Asia Esoteric Buddhism became established in the Chen-yen (“True Word”) school in China and in the Tendai (see T’IEN-T’AI) and SHINGON schools in Japan. According to the Chen-yen tradition, developed and systematized forms of the Esoteric tradition were first brought from India to China by three missionary monks: Shubhakarasiṃha, VAJRABODHI, and AMOGHAVAJRA. Shubhakarasiṃha arrived in China from the famous Indian center of learning at Nalanda in 716, and he translated into Chinese the Mahāvairocana Sūtra and a closely related ritual compendium known as the Susīd-dhikara. Vajrabodhi and his disciple Amoghavajra arrived in 720 and produced two abridged translations of the Sarvatathagatatattvasamgraha, also known as the Tattvasamgraha. The Tattvasamgraha and the Mahāvairocana Sūtra became the two basic Chen-yen texts. A fully developed “Five Buddha” complex found its primary expression in the Tattvasamgraha, in which Shakyamuni, as VAIROCANA, appears as the central Buddha.

TAULER, JOHANN \ˈtə-ˈlər\ (b. c. 1300, Strassburg, Bishopric of Strassburg [now Strasbourg, France]—d. June 16, 1361, Strassburg), DOMINICAN, who, with MEISTER ECKHART and HEINRICH SUSO, was one of the chief Rhineland mystics. He was greatly influenced by Eckhart, though Tauler’s teaching, based on ST. THOMAS AQUINAS, stresses practical rather than speculative mystical theology. References to the Friends of God (Gottesfreunde) appear in his sermons, alluding to a circle of like-minded, devout Rhinelanders. Tauler’s sermons, written in Middle High German, were valued highly by MARTIN LUTHER.

TAUROBOLIUM \ˈtɔr-ə-ˈbɔ-lē-əm\, bull sacrifice practiced from about 160 CE in the Mediterranean cult of the GREAT MOTHER OF THE GODS, Cybele. Celebrated primarily among the Romans, the ceremony enjoyed much popularity. The nature and purpose seem to have changed in the 2nd–3rd century. At the beginning the ceremony apparently resembled similar sacrifices performed in the cults of other deities, such as MITHRA. By about 300, however, it had changed drastically. The person dedicating the sacrifice lay in a pit with a perforated board placed over the pit’s opening. A bull was slaughtered above him, and the person in the pit bathed in the blood streaming down. Thus the ceremony, perhaps influenced by CHRISTIANITY, gradually took on the elements of moral purification and seems to have been reserved for the higher initiates.

TAWERET \ˈtə-ˈrɛt\, also called Taurt, or Thoueris, goddess of ancient Egypt, protector of fertility and childbirth, associated also with the nursing of infants. She was depicted as having the head of a hippopotamus (sometimes with the breasts of a woman), the tail of a crocodile, and the claws of a lion. Her image often appeared in household shrines and on AMULETS.

Taweret was connected in particular with the goddess HATHOR. She was also strongly associated with the inundation of the Nile and received particular worship at Jabal al-Silsila, where rituals were performed for the inundation.

TAWHĪD \tə-ˈhēd\ (Arabic, also spelled tauhid (“making one,” “asserting oneness”), in ISLAM, the oneness of God, in the sense that he is one and there is no god but he, as stated in the SHAHĀDA (“witness”) formula: “There is no god but God; MUHAMMAD is the prophet of God.” Tawhīd declares of God that he is a unity, not composed, not made up of parts, but simple and uncompounded. The doctrine of the unity of God and the issues that it raises, such as the question of the relation between the essence and the attributes of God, reappear throughout most of Islamic history. In the terminology of Sufi mystics, however, tawhīd has a pantheistic sense: all essences are divine, and there is no absolute existence besides that of God. To the majority of Muslim scholars, the science of tawhīd is the systematic theology through which a better knowledge of God may be reached; to the Sufis, however, knowledge of God can be achieved only through RELIGIOUS EXPERIENCE and through direct vision. See also ALLĀH; KĀLĀM; MONOTHEISM; SUFISM; IBN ‘ABD AL-WAHHĀB, MUHAMMAD.

TE \ˈdə\, Pinyin de (Chinese: “virtue,” or “power”), in Chinese TAOISM, potentiality of the mysterious TAO, or Way, the undefinable, transcendent reality that produces all things. In contrast, CONFUCIANISM views te as the virtue of internal goodness and proper behavior toward others.

As the activity of Tao, te occurs in all things and is a manifestation of the invisible Tao. In the TAO-TE CHING, te is described as the unconscious functioning of the physical self. Whoever is attuned to this inner process will live in harmony with the irresistible forces of nature. Personal te flourishes when one abandons ambition and the spirit of contention for a life of “naturalness” (TZU-JAN), which allows for awareness of the underlying principle of unity within the universe and encourages others in the community to adopt a similar way of life.

TEGH BAHĀDUR \ˈtæg-ˈbə-hä-dər, -bə-ˈhā-dür\ (b. 1621, Amritsar, Punjab, India—d. Nov. 11, 1675, Delhi), ninth Sikh GURŪ (1664–75). His name literally means “brave swordsman,” a title believed to have been given to him by his father Gurū HARGOBIND (Gurū from 1606 to 1644) after seeing him participate in the skirmishes with the Mughals.

At the time of his father’s death, Tegh Bahadur was not considered for Gurūship. He left Kiratpur, the central Sikh seat, living first in Bābā Bakālā, his mother’s native place, and then traveling extensively. When he did become Gurū, he established a new and thriving seat at Anandpur (“city of ecstasy”). His hymns, which were among the last to be included in the ĀDI GRANTH, sing of the need for courage to resist tyranny. His visit to the Māl-wā region toward the end of his Gurūship attracted large crowds, which put him at loggerheads with the Mughal administration. He was arrested and executed in Delhi in 1675, becoming the second martyr-Gurū (after Gurū ARJAN).

TEILHARD DE CHARDIN, PIERRE \tā-ˈyär-də-shär-ˈdeː\ (b. May 1, 1881, Sarcenat, France—d. April 10, 1955, New York, N.Y., U.S.), French JESUIT, philosopher, and paleontologist known for his theory that man is evolving, mentally and socially, toward a final spiritual unity.

When he was 18, Teilhard joined the Jesuit novitiate at Aix-en-Provence, France. At 24 he began a three-year professorship at the Jesuit college in Cairo. Although ordained a priest in 1911, Teilhard chose to be a stretcher bearer rather than a CHAPLAIN in World War I; his courage on the battle lines earned him a military medal and the Legion of Honor. In 1923, after teaching at the Catholic Institute of Paris, he made the first of his paleontological and geologic missions to China, where he was involved in the discovery (1929) of Peking man's skull. Teilhard enlarged the field of knowledge on Asia's sedimentary deposits and stratigraphic correlations and on the dates of its fossils.

Teilhard returned to France in 1946. Frustrated in his desire to teach at the Collège de France and publish philosophy (all his major works were published posthumously), he moved to the United States, spending the last years of his life at the Wenner-Gren Foundation, New York City, for which he made two paleontological and archaeological expeditions to South Africa.

Teilhard wrote his two major philosophical works, Le Milieu divin (1957; The Divine Milieu) and Le Phénomène humain (1955; The Phenomenon of Man), in the 1920s and '30s, but their publication was forbidden by the Jesuit order during his lifetime. He aimed at a metaphysic of evolution, holding that it was a process converging toward a final unity that he called the Omega point. He attempted to show that what is of permanent value in traditional philosophical thought can be maintained and even integrated with a modern scientific outlook if one accepts that the tendencies of material things are directed, either wholly or in part, beyond the things themselves toward the production of higher, more complex, more perfectly unified beings. A parallel process, the socialization of mankind, would follow an evolutionary development towards a convergence in a single human society.

Teilhard saw the process of organic evolution as a sequence of progressive syntheses whose ultimate convergence point is that of God. When humanity and the material world have reached their final state of evolution and exhausted all potential for further development, a new convergence between them and the supernatural order would be initiated by the Parousia, or SECOND COMING of Christ. Teilhard asserted that the work of Christ is primarily to lead the material world to this cosmic redemption, while the conquest of evil is only secondary to his purpose.

TELAKHON, English Fruit of Wisdom, one of the oldest Buddhist-influenced prophet movements among the Karen hill peoples of Myanmar (Burma). In their mythology, the restoration of their lost Golden Book by their white younger brothers heralds the MILLENNIUM. Ywa, a withdrawn HIGH GOD (see DEUS OTIOSUS) whose offer of the book to their ancestors was ignored, would then return to deliver the Karen from oppression by the Burmans or the British. The movement was founded in the mid-19th century by Con Yu. It banned traditional animal sacrifice, practiced a strict ethic, and maintained Karen culture. In 1962–65 the movement's seventh successive head, the Phu Chaik ("Elder of the Faith"), was presented with vernacular BIBLES by American missionaries. Expectations rose on both sides, and membership (mostly in eastern Myanmar) increased to 10,000, but the Bible was rejected as not revealing the mysteries of Western knowledge. Renewed opposition to the Burmese led to armed clashes and the removal and death of the Phu Chaik in 1967. A similar movement, the Leke (founded 1860), is still in existence but others have become Christian churches or have declined.

TELEGONUS \tə-'le-gə-nəs\, in Greek mythology, son of ODYSSEUS by CIRCE. According to one story, Telegonus went to Ithaca in search of his father, whom he killed unwittingly. His spear had been tipped with the point of a stingray, thus fulfilling the PROPHECY in the Odyssey that death would come to Odysseus "from the sea." Telegonus then married PENELOPE, Odysseus' widow.

TELEMACHUS \tə-'le-mə-kəs\, in Greek mythology, son of ODYSSEUS and PENELOPE. When Telemachus reached manhood, he visited Pylos and Sparta in search of his wandering father. On his return, he found that Odysseus had reached home before him. Then father and son slew Penelope's suitors. According to later tradition, Telemachus married CIRCE (or CALYPSO) after Odysseus' death.

TELLUS \ˈte-ləs\ (Latin: "ground, earth"), also called Terra Mater \ˈter-ə-'mā-tər, -'mā-\, Roman earth goddess. Probably of great antiquity, she was concerned with the productivity of the earth and was later identified with CYBELE. Her temple on the Esquiline Hill dated from about 268 BCE. She was honored in the Fordicidia and Sementivae festivals, both of which centered on fertility and good crops.

TEMLAR \ˈtem-plər\, also called Knight Templar, member of Poor Knights of Christ and of the Temple of Solomon, a religious military order of knighthood established at the time of the Crusades. It was founded during the early years of the kingdom of Jerusalem, when the Crusaders controlled only a few strongholds in the Holy Land, and pilgrims to the holy places were often endangered by groups of Muslim warriors. Pitying the plight of such pilgrims, eight or nine French knights, led by Hugues de Payens, vowed in late 1119 or early 1120 to devote themselves to their protection and to form a religious community for that purpose. Baldwin II, king of Jerusalem, gave them quarters in a wing of the royal palace in the area of the former Jewish Temple, and from this they derived their name.

The Templars were divided into four classes: knights, sergeants, CHAPLAINS, and servants. Only the knights wore the Templars' distinctive regalia, a white surcoat marked with a red cross. Each individual Templar took vows of poverty and chastity.

The Templars performed courageous service in the Holy Land, and their numbers increased rapidly, partly because of the propagandistic writing of ST. BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX, who also wrote their rule of life. They soon became vital in the defense of the Christian Crusader states of the Holy Land, and they garrisoned every town of any size there. At their height the Templars numbered about 20,000 knights.

The Templars also acquired considerable wealth. By the mid-12th century they owned properties scattered throughout western Europe, the Mediterranean, and the Holy Land, and their military strength enabled them to safely collect, store, and transport bullion to and from Europe and the Holy Land. Their network of treasure storehouses and their efficient transport organization caused them to be used as bankers both by kings and by pilgrims to the Holy Land. Thus, the order grew to wield great financial power.

By 1304 rumors (probably false) of irreligious practices and blasphemies committed by the Templars during their secret rites of initiation had begun to circulate. At this juncture, King Philip IV of France had every Templar in France arrested on Oct. 13, 1307, and sequestered all the Templars' property in France. Philip accused the Templars of HERESY and immorality and had many of them tortured in order to secure false confessions to these charges. Pope Clement V, himself a Frenchman, came under strong pressure from Philip, and in response the pope ordered the arrest of the Templars in every country in November 1307. Philip eventually succeeded in his efforts to have the pope suppress the order (March 22, 1312), and the Templars' property throughout Europe was transferred to the rival Hospitaller order or confiscated by the state. Many Templars were either executed or imprisoned, and in 1314 the last grand master of the order, Jacques de Molay, was burned at the stake.

The question of the guilt of the Templars has been a matter of fierce controversy for centuries, but modern opinion inclines to the idea that the Templars were victims of a highly unjust and opportunistic persecution.

TEMPLE, edifice constructed for ritual activity. The English word is borrowed from the Latin templum, which first denoted the ritual space (in the sky or on the ground) delimited by a Roman augur, and later the shrine built within such a space. Depending on the religious tradition, the terms "church," "synagogue," and "mosque" may have equivalent meaning.

Because of ritual requirements, temple architecture varies widely between one religion and another. The ZIGURATS of the Mesopotamian culture were elaborately designed and decorated, and their "stair-step" style ascended to a point where a god or gods could dwell and where only special priests were allowed. Ancient Egypt had temples to gods, but because the primary concern of its religion was the afterlife of souls, its pyramidal tombs became its primary shrines and most familiar architectural heritage.

In the ancient GREEK RELIGION the gods were the most important focus, and Classical Greek temple architecture created structures that emphasized that focus. An inner, windowless room housed an image of a god, and an altar stood outside the temple. Most Greek temples were built of marble or other stone, richly carved and polychromed, and were on a hill or stepped platform. The design and decoration of Greek temples had a profound effect on architecture of later eras in the West, beginning with the Roman.

During the 3rd and 2nd centuries BCE, temples of the ROMAN RELIGION began to evince Greek influence, using the Greek decorative style but placing the altar within the temple and eventually creating entire forums, or meeting places, of which the temple was the center. In Roman temples, the columns soon became engaged rather than freestanding, and circular as well as rectangular temples were built. Byzantine and Western church architecture developed from these bases in the Hellenistic styles.

Muslim temples are usually domed structures decorated with colored tiles on the outside and covering a large central SANCTUARY and arcaded courtyards within. The ASCETICISM and rich symbolism of JAINISM is reflected in that religion's beautifully decorated monastery-like structures in India, both above the ground in simple cloisters and below the ground in caves. Hindu temples, which vary regionally in style, usually consist of a towering shrine symbolizing the cosmic MOUNT MERU and a columned hall surrounded by an elaborate wall marking the four cardinal points of the cosmos. Buddhist temples range from half-buried sanctuaries with richly carved entrances to single, carved towers or statues. The Chinese (and later, Japanese) version of the Buddhist temple tends to be a one-story building of richly carved, painted, or tiled timber constructed around an atrium used for worship. By contrast, the SHINTŌ temples of Japan are simple and rustic in design.

In the Americas, Incan and Mayan temples were constructed of stone and were often highly carved. In general, they were stair-stepped PYRAMIDS, with the shrine at the top. Chichén Itzá, the ruins of which remain in the Yucatán Peninsula, has excellent examples of this type of pre-Columbian temple architecture.

TEMPLE OF THE TOOTH, also known as Dalada Maligawa \ˈdä-lə-də-,mə-lē-ˈgä-wə\, Buddhist temple in Kandy, central Sri Lanka (Ceylon). Here a sacred relic, supposed to be the BUDDHA GOTAMA's left canine tooth, is preserved. This relic is the center of the well-known annual Esala Perahera, a torchlight procession of dancers, dignitaries, and richly decorated elephants.

TEN COMMANDMENTS, also called Decalogue (Greek: deka logoi, "10 utterances"), list of religious precepts that, according to various passages in EXODUS (20:2–17) and Deuteronomy (5:6–21), were divinely revealed to MOSES on MOUNT SINAI and were engraved on two tablets of stone. The rendering in Exodus (Revised Standard Version) appears as follows:

◆ I am the Lord your God, who brought you out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage.

You shall have no other gods before me.

You shall not make for yourself a graven image, or any likeness of anything that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the water under the earth; you shall not bow down to them or serve them; for I the Lord your God am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children to the third and the fourth generation of those who hate me, but showing steadfast love to thousands of those who love me and keep my commandments.

You shall not take the name of the Lord your God in vain; for the Lord will not hold him guiltless who takes his name in vain.

Remember the sabbath day, to keep it holy. Six days you shall labor, and do all your work; but the seventh day is a sabbath to the Lord your God; in it you shall not do any work, you, or your son, or your daughter, your manservant, or your maidservant, or your cattle, or the sojourner who is within your gates; for in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that is in them, and rested the seventh day; therefore the Lord blessed the sabbath day and hallowed it.

Honor your father and your mother, that your days may be long in the land which the Lord your God gives you.

You shall not kill.

You shall not commit adultery.

You shall not steal.

You shall not bear false witness against your neighbor.

You shall not covet your neighbor's wife, or his manservant, or his maidservant, or his ox, or his ass, or anything that is your neighbor's. ◆

Some scholars propose a date for the Ten Commandments between the 16th and 13th centuries BCE because Exodus and Deuteronomy connect the Commandments with Moses and the SINAI COVENANT between YAHWEH and ISRAEL. For those who regard the Ten Commandments as an epitome of prophetic teachings, the date would be some time after AMOS and HOSEA (after 750 BCE). If the Ten Commandments are simply a summary of the legal and priestly traditions of Israel, they belong to an even later period.

The Ten Commandments had no particular importance in Christian tradition until the 13th century, when they were incorporated into a manual of instruction for those coming to confess their SINS. With the rise of Protestant churches, new manuals of instruction in the faith were made available and the Ten Commandments were incorporated into CATECHISMS as a fundamental part of religious training, especially of the young.

TENGU \ˈteŋ-gü\, in Japanese FOLKLORE, mischievous supernatural being, sometimes the reincarnated spirit of one who was proud and arrogant in life. Tengu live in trees in mountainous areas. A group of tengu is headed by a chief, who is dressed in red robes and carries a feather fan. He is served by a group of retainers called koppa tengu ("leaflet" tengu), who act as his messengers. In popular art they are shown as smaller winged creatures with long red noses or beaklike mouths.

TEN LOST TRIBES OF ISRAEL, ten of the original 12 Hebrew tribes, which, under the leadership of JOSHUA, took possession of CANAAN after the death of MOSES. They were named ASHER, DAN, EPHRAIM, GAD, ISSACHAR, MANASSEH, NAPHTALI, REUBEN, SIMEON, and ZEBULUN—all sons or grandsons of JACOB (GENESIS 29:31–30:24; 41:50–52). In 930 BCE the 10 tribes formed the independent Kingdom of Israel in the north and the 2 other tribes, JUDAH and BENJAMIN, set up the Kingdom of Judah in the south (1 Kings 12:20–21). Following the conquest of the northern kingdom by the Assyrians in 721 BCE, the 10 tribes were gradually assimilated by other peoples and thus disappeared from history. Peoples who at various times were said to be descendants of the lost tribes include the NESTORIANS, the MORMONS, the Afghans, the FALASHAS of Ethiopia, the American Indians, and the Japanese. Among the immigrants to the state of Israel were a few who likewise claimed to be remnants of the Ten Lost Tribes. See also SAMBATIAN.

TENRIKYŌ

TENRIKYŌ \ˈten-rē-kyō\ (Japanese: “Religion of Divine Wisdom”), largest of the modern SHINTŌ sects in Japan.

Tenrikyō originated with Nakayama Miki (1798–1887), a peasant from Yamato Province (modern Nara Prefecture), who claimed she became possessed by a god called Tenri Ō no Mikoto (“Lord of Divine Wisdom”) when she was 40 years old. She developed a worship characterized by ecstatic dancing and shamanistic practices, and a doctrine (based on the oracles transmitted through her) emphasizing CHARITY and the healing of disease through mental acts of faith. The sect became popular, though it was often persecuted by state authorities. Her writings and her deeds were considered divine models, and she was widely venerated during her lifetime and since. She was succeeded by Master Iburi (d. 1907); since his death, the leader of the sect has always been a member of the Nakayama family.

Tenrikyō was first considered a branch of the Yoshida sect of Shintō. In 1880 it changed its affiliation to BUDDHISM and from 1908 has been recognized as one of the 13 groups that compose KYŌHA SHINTŌ. Tenrikyō was one of the most powerful religious movements in Japan immediately before World War II and has retained a large following. In the early 21st century its membership was about 1,750,000.

The goal of Tenrikyō is a happy life free from disease and suffering. The center of religious activity is the jiba, a sacred recess in the SANCTUARY of the main temple in Tenri city (Nara Prefecture). The world is said to have been created here, and from the jiba salvation will be extended to the world. Every member of Tenrikyō is expected to carry on missionary work. More than 200 churches have been established worldwide; they serve mainly Japanese living abroad.

TENSHŌ KŌTAI JINGŪ-KYŌ \ˈten-,shō-ˈkō-,tī-ˈjēŋ-gū-kyō\ (Japanese: “Religion of the Shrine of the Heavenly Goddess”), also called Odoru Shūkyō (“Dancing Religion”), a new religious movement of Japan that emerged in the post-World War II period. It was founded by Kitamura Sayo (1900–67), of Yamaguchi Prefecture, whose charismatic preaching took the form of rhythmic singing and dancing. She had a revelation in 1945 that she was possessed by a SHINTŌ deity, Tenshō-Kōtaijin (another name for the Shintō sun goddess AMATERASU Ōmikami). She won followers in Europe and the Americas. Her eccentric behavior and her condemnation of organized institutions of religion and government won her an enthusiastic following, estimated at about 300,000 shortly after her death.

TEREFAH \tə-rā-ˈfä, tə-ˈrā-fə\ (from Hebrew: ṭaraf, “to tear”), also spelled terefa, tref \ˈträf\, or trefa \ˈtrā-fə\, any food, food product, or utensil that, according to Jewish dietary laws (KASHRUTH), is not ritually clean or is not prepared according to law and is thus unfit for Jewish use. The broad connotation of terefah derives from a more specific prohibition against the eating of meat that has been “torn” by a wild animal (e.g., EXODUS 22:31).

Food may be terefah for several reasons. Shellfish, pork, malformed and sick animals, and those which have been improperly slaughtered are forbidden.

TERESA, BLESSED MOTHER \tə-ˈrē-sə, -ˈrā-zə\ in full Blessed Mother Teresa of Calcutta, original name Agnes Gonxha Bojaxhiu (b. Aug. 27, 1910, Üsküp, Kosovo Vilayet, Ottoman Empire [now Skopje, Republic of Macedonia]—d. Sept. 5, 1997, Calcutta, India; beatified Oct. 19, 2003), founder of the Order of the Missionaries of Charity, a Roman Catholic congregation of women dedicated to the poor. She was the recipient of numerous honours, including the 1979 Nobel Prize for Peace.

The daughter of an ethnic Albanian grocer, she went to Ireland in 1928 to join the Sisters of Loretto; six weeks later she sailed to India to become a teacher. In 1946 she experienced a call to devote herself to the care of the sick and the poor. She founded the Order of the Missionaries of Charity in 1948 at a pilgrim hostel near the temple of KALI. In 1950 the order received canonical sanction from Pope PIUS XII, and in 1965 it became a pontifical congregation (subject only to the pope). In 1952 she established a hospice where the terminally ill could die with dignity. Her order also opened centers for the blind, the aged, and the disabled, and it built a leper colony near Asansol, India.

In 1963 the Indian government awarded her the title Padmashri ("Lord of the Lotus") for her services to the people of India. In 1964, on his trip to India, Pope PAUL VI gave her his limousine, which she raffled to help finance her leper colony. In recognition of her apostolate, she was honored in 1971 with the first Pope John XXIII Peace Prize. In 1979 she received the Nobel Prize for Peace for her humanitarian work.

A worsening heart condition forced her retirement in 1997. At the time of her death, her order included centers in more than 90 countries with some 4,000 nuns and hundreds of thousands of lay workers. Within two years of Mother Teresa's death, the process to declare her a saint was begun. She was beatified by Pope JOHN PAUL II on Oct. 19, 2003, reaching the ranks of the blessed in the shortest time in the history of the church.

TERESA OF ÁVILA, SAINT \tā-'rā-sä . . . 'ā-bē-lä, Angl tər-'rē-sə . . . 'ā-vē-lə, original name Teresa de Cepeda y Ahumada (b. March 28, 1515, Ávila, Spain—d. Oct. 4, 1582, Alba de Tormes; canonized 1622; feast day October 15), Spanish nun, one of the great mystics of the ROMAN CATHOLIC church and the author of spiritual classics. She was the originator of the CARMELITE Reform, which restored the austerity and CONTEMPLATIVE character of primitive Carmelite life. St. Teresa was elevated to Doctor of the Church in 1970 by Pope PAUL VI, the first woman to be so honored.

Teresa entered the Carmelite CONVENT of the Incarnation at Ávila, probably in 1535. Within two years her health collapsed, and she was an invalid for three years, during which time she developed a love for mental prayer. After her recovery, she stopped praying. She continued for 15 years in a state divided between a worldly and a divine spirit, until, in 1555, she underwent a religious awakening.

In 1558 Teresa initiated her reform, which required utter withdrawal so that the nuns could meditate on divine law and lead a prayerful life of penance. In 1562 she opened the first convent of the Carmelite Reform. It met with hostility, but she staunchly insisted on poverty. In 1567, she met a Carmelite priest, Juan de Yepes (later ST. JOHN OF THE CROSS, the poet and mystic), and a year later Juan opened the first monastery of the Primitive Rule at Duruelo, Spain.

She spent the rest of her life establishing and nurturing 16 more convents throughout Spain. In 1575, a jurisdictional dispute erupted between the FRIARS of the restored Primitive Rule, known as the Discalced (or "Unshod") Carmelites, and the observants of the Mitigated Rule, the Calced (or "Shod") Carmelites. The Carmelite general, to whom she had been misrepresented, ordered her to retire to Castile and to cease founding convents; Juan was subsequently imprisoned at Toledo in 1577. In 1579, the Discalced Carmelites were given independent jurisdiction, confirmed in 1580 by Pope Gregory XIII. Teresa, broken in health, was then directed to resume the reform. She made exhausting MISSIONS that covered hundreds of miles and was fatally stricken en route to Ávila from Burgos.

Teresa's ascetic doctrine has been accepted as the classical exposition of the contemplative life, and her spiritual writings are among the most widely read. Her Life of the Mother Teresa of Jesus (1611) is autobiographical; the Book of the Foundations (1610) describes the establishment of her convents. Her writings on the progress of the Christian soul toward God are recognized as masterpieces.

TEREUS \tīr-ē-əs, 'tīr-yūs, in Greek mythology, king of Thrace who married Procne, daughter of Pandion, king of Athens. Tereus seduced Procne's sister Philomela, pretending that Procne was dead. To hide his guilt, he cut out Philomela's tongue. She revealed the crime by working the details in embroidery. Procne sought revenge by serving her son Itys for Tereus' supper. When Tereus pursued the two sisters with an axe, the gods took pity and changed Tereus into a hoopoe (or hawk), Procne into a nightingale (or swallow), and Philomela into a swallow (or nightingale).

TERMINUS \tər-mə-nəs (Latin: "Boundary Marker"), in ROMAN RELIGION, boundary stone or post fixed in the ground during a sacrifice. From this sacred object evolved the god Terminus. On February 23 (the end of the old Roman year) the festival called the Terminalia was held. The owners of adjacent lands assembled at the common boundary stone, and each garlanded his own side of the stone. Offerings were made, and a lamb or pig was sacrificed.

TERPSICHORE \,tərp-'si-kə-rē, in GREEK RELIGION, one of the nine MUSES, patron of lyric poetry and dancing (in some versions, flute playing). In some accounts she was the mother of the half-bird, half-woman SIRENS, whose father was the sea god Achelous or the river god Phorcys.

TERTULLIAN \tər-'təl-yən, Latin in full Quintus Septimus Florens Tertullianus (b. c. 155/160, Carthage [now in Tunisia]—d. after 220, Carthage), early Christian theologian, polemicist, and moralist who, as the initiator of ecclesiastical Latin, was instrumental in shaping the vocabulary and thought of Western CHRISTIANITY.

Life. Tertullian was born in Carthage, which was second only to Rome as a cultural center in the West. After completing his education he went to Rome, where he studied further and became interested in the Christian movement, though he did not convert to Christianity until he returned to Carthage toward the end of the 2nd century. He emerged as a leader of the African church, but it is not clear whether he was ordained a priest.

During the next 20 to 25 years Tertullian devoted himself almost entirely to literary pursuits. Fiery and tempestuous, he became a lively and pungent propagandist. He developed an original Latin style, though he was not the most profound writer in Christian antiquity. Like his contemporaries, Tertullian wrote works in defense of the faith (e.g., Apologeticum) and treatises on theological problems against specific opponents: Adversus Marcionem ("Against Marcion," an Anatolian heretic who believed that the world was created by the evil god of the Jews), Adversus Hermogenem ("Against Hermogenes," a Carthaginian painter who claimed that God created the world out of preexisting matter), Adversus Valentinianos ("Against Valentinus," an Alexandrian Gnostic), and De resurrectione carnis ("Concerning the Resurrection of the Flesh"). He also wrote the first Christian book on BAPTISM, De Baptismo; a book on the Christian doctrine of man, De anima ("Concerning the Soul"); essays on prayer and devotion, De oratione ("Concerning Prayer"); and a treatise directed against all HERESY, De praescriptione haereticorum ("Concerning the Prescription of Heretics"). In addition, he addressed himself to a whole range of moral and practical problems: on what is appropriate dress for women and on the wearing of cosmetics in De cultu feminarum ("Concerning the Dress of Women"); on service in the military in De corona ("Concerning the Crown"—a military decoration); on whether one should flee under persecution in De fuga in persecutione ("Concerning Flight in Persecution"); on marriage and remarriage in De exhortatione castitatis ("Concerning the Exhortation to Chastity") and De monogamia ("Concerning Monogamy"); on the arts, theater, and civic festivals in De spectaculis ("Concerning Spectacles"); and on repentance after baptism in De poenitentia ("Concerning Repentance").

Tertullian as a Montanist. Sometime before 210 Tertullian left the Orthodox church to join a new prophetic sectarian movement known as MONTANISM, which had spread from Asia Minor to Africa. His own dissatisfaction with the laxity of contemporary Christians was congenial with the Montanist message of the imminent end of the world and with its stringent and demanding moralism. Montanism rejected any compromise with the ways of the world, and Tertullian defended the movement as its most articulate spokesman. But even the Montanists were not rigorous enough for Tertullian. He eventually broke with them to found his own sect, a group that existed until the 5th century in Africa. According to tradition, he lived to be an old man. His last writings date from approximately 220, but the date of his death is unknown.

In antiquity most Christians never forgave Tertullian for his APOSTASY to Montanism. Later Christian writers mention him only infrequently, and then mostly unfavorably. From the 19th century Tertullian was widely read and was considered one of the formative figures in the development of Christian life and thought in the West.

TESHUB \ˈte-,shüb\, Hurrian weather god, assimilated by the Hittites to their own weather god, TARHUN. One myth about Teshub relates that he achieved supremacy in the pantheon after the gods Alalu, ANU, and Kumarbi had successively been deposed and banished to the netherworld. Another myth, the "Song of Ullikummi," describes the struggle between Teshub and a stone monster that grew out of the sea. Teshub's consort was HEBAT (Queen of Heaven), and they had a son, Sharruma. At the rock SANCTUARY of Yazılıkaya near the ancient Hittite capital, the leading god is named Teshub and is represented treading on the bowed necks of two mountain gods. In other representations he is shown as a standing figure carrying a lituus (a long crook) or driving a chariot drawn by bulls. He reappears in the Kingdom of Urartu as Tesheba, one of the chief gods, and in Urartian art he is depicted standing on a bull.

TETRAGRAMMATON \,te-trə-'gra-mə-,tän\, the four Hebrew letters, YHWH, in the name of God. See YAHWEH.

TEUTATES \ˈtā-ü-,tä-tēz-, tä-ü-'tä-\, also spelled Toutates \ˈtō-,tä-tēz-, ,tō-'tä-\, important Celtic deity, one of three mentioned by the Roman poet Lucan in the 1st century CE, the other two being ESUS ("Lord") and TARANIS ("Thunderer"). The initial element of the name, teut-, meant "tribe" or "people" (akin to Old Irish tuath, "tribe, people, petty kingdom," and Welsh tud, "people, country"), and originally teutates may have been a descriptive term referring to any tutelary deity of a tribe rather than the proper name of a particular god. According to later commentators, victims sacrificed to Teutates were killed by being plunged headfirst into a vat filled with an unspecified liquid, which may have been ale. Teutates was identified with both the Roman MERCURY and MARS. He is also known from dedications in Britain, where his name was written Toutates. The Irish Tuathal Techtmar, one of the legendary conquerors of Ireland, has a name that comes from an earlier form, Teutovalos ("Ruler of the People"); he was probably another manifestation of the god Teutates.

TEZCATLIPOCA \,tā-skät-lē-'pō-kə\, or Tezcatlepoça (Nahuatl, probably from the word tezcatl, "obsidian mirror" coupled with i(h)poca, "it gives off smoke or exhalations"), deity that was the omnipotent, omnipresent protean god of the Aztec pantheon. Tezcatlipoca's cult was brought to central Mexico by the Toltecs about the end of the 10th century CE. Numerous myths relate how Tezcatlipoca expelled the priest-king QUETZALCOATL, the FEATHERED SERPENT, from his capital at TOLLAN (present-day Tula). Taking the form of a wizard, he caused the death of many Toltecs and corrupted the virtuous Quetzalcoatl, thus putting an end to the Toltec golden age. Under his influence HUMAN SACRIFICE was reintroduced into central Mexico. Tezcatlipoca's NAGUAL, or animal disguise, was the jaguar, the spotted skin of which was compared to the starry sky. A creator god, Tezcatlipoca ruled over Ocelotonatiuh ("Jaguar Sun"), the first of the four worlds that were created and destroyed before the present universe.

Tezcatlipoca was often represented with a stripe of black paint across his face and an obsidian mirror in place of one of his feet or on his chest, a mirror that granted him omniscience. The post-Classic (after 900) Quiché MAYA people of Guatemala revered him as a lightning god under the name Hurakan ("One Foot").

In Aztec times (14th–16th century CE), Tezcatlipoca's manifold attributes and functions brought him to the summit of the divine hierarchy, along with HUITZILOPOCHTLI, TLALOC, and Quetzalcoatl. He presided over the tepochcalli ("young men's houses"), which were district schools in which the sons of the common people received education and military training.

The main rite of Tezcatlipoca's cult took place during the fifth ritual month, Toxcatl. Every year at that time, the priest selected a young and supremely handsome war prisoner. For one year he lived in luxury with four women as his companions and received proper instruction in the Aztec arts of music and speech. On the appointed feast day, he climbed the steps of a small temple while breaking flutes that he had played. At the top he was sacrificed by the removal of his heart and was beheaded.

THALIA \thə-'lī-ə, 'thā-lē-ə\, in GREEK RELIGION, one of the nine MUSES, patron of comedy; also, according to the Greek poet Hesiod, a GRACE. She is the mother of the Corybantes, the father being APOLLO. In her hands she carried the comic mask and the shepherd's staff.

THAMYRIS \tha-mə-ris\, also spelled Thamyras, in Greek mythology, Thracian poet who loved the beautiful youth HYACINTHUS. Thamyris' attentions, however, were rivaled by those of the god APOLLO, who jealously reported to the MUSES the boast by Thamyris that he could surpass them in song. The Muses immediately blinded Thamyris and robbed him of his voice and his talent.

THARGELIA \thär-'gē-lē-ə, -'jē-\, in GREEK RELIGION, one of the chief festivals of APOLLO at Athens, celebrated on the sixth and seventh days of Thargelion (April–May). The Thargelia was a first-fruits festival. According to scholars in antiquity, the name was derived from a noun thargēlos, understood as either the bread made from the first fruits or an earthenware vessel in which the grain was prepared.

On the first day of the festival one or two men acting as SCAPEGOATS were first led around the city, then thrown to the ground and whipped on the genitalia seven times. Finally they were driven across the border. Late and unreliable sources state that they were occasionally sacrificed. On the second day of the festival a thanks offering, a PROCESSION, and the official registration of adopted persons took place.

THEISM \'thē-i-zəm\, the view that all limited, or finite, things, though fully real in their own right, are dependent in some way upon, yet distinct from, one supreme or ultimate being, of which one may also speak in personal terms. This being is regarded as beyond human comprehension, perfect, and self-sustained but also peculiarly involved in the world and its events.

Theists characteristically seek support for their contentions in rational argument and appeals to experience. In the history of Western thought, this has given rise to several types of arguments for the existence of God. The four primary types are the cosmological, teleological, ontological, and moral arguments. Frequently these arguments are propounded in combination.

Cosmological arguments begin with a recognition of particular features of the world, or of the fact of its existence, and then infer God as the ultimate cause. The world is seen as dependent upon some being beyond it for its intelligibility and existence. The classic statement of the cosmological argument was given by THOMAS AQUINAS in his Summa Theologica (Part I, Question ii, art. 3).

The teleological argument proceeds from an observation of the functional order of the universe whereby things in the world function toward ends or goals. One version of this argument is, strictly speaking, a form of cosmological argument since it depends upon a notion of final causality, holding that purposeful actions must be ultimately designed or directed by an intelligent purposive being. This argument received its clearest expression in David Hume's critical analysis of the argument from design, in which the universe is seen as an orderly machine.

The ontological argument attempts to show that the concept of God implies the necessity of God's existence. The classic statement of this argument is found in Anselm of Canterbury's Proslogion, which defines God as "that greater than which nothing can be conceived." One form of this argument is based on the claim that existence is a perfection among others and that, since God embraces all perfections, God must exist. Another form of ontological argument asserts that God can only be conceived as a necessary being and therefore cannot be conceived as nonexistent or merely possible.

The moral argument, which rests upon the experience of obligation or moral duty, was developed by Immanuel Kant, who argued that, in order for morality to be rationally justified and hold an influence over human actions, it must be assumed that obedience to obligation will coincide with happiness. Thus, a God must be postulated as the being who rewards worthiness and enables moral life to be rationally understood.

Theism commonly views God as somehow caringly related to the world. This has generally been expressed in some analogy of God to a personal being. Theism has also tended to affirm both the immanence and the transcendence of this ultimate being. Other attributes of God, such as infinity, eternity, omniscience, and omnipotence, are treated by theists in accordance with analogies drawn from human experience. A major problem is to understand how finite and imperfect characteristics can be understood as existing perfectly in God. Another central issue is that of reconciling the claims that God is both omnipotent and perfect with the existence of evil in the world.

It is generally agreed that no theistic argument proves the existence of God in any strict sense. All depend upon certain disputable presuppositions. Such "proofs" are generally seen as means of examining the logical correlates of belief or disbelief. Theists have encountered criticism from those who deny the ability of reason beyond ordinary experience, those who reject the role of reason in favor of revelation alone, and those who accept the rational method but reject the theistic conclusions.

THEMIS \'thē-mis\ (Greek: "Customary Law," or "Sanctioned Practice"), in GREEK RELIGION, personification of justice, goddess of wisdom and good counsel, and the interpreter of the gods' will. According to some sources, she was the daughter of OURANUS and GAEA, although at times she was apparently identified with Gaea. She was Zeus's second consort and by him the mother of the Horae, the Moirai, and, in some traditions, the HESPERIDES. Themis was a giver of oracles, and one legend relates that she once owned the oracle at DELPHI but later gave it to APOLLO.

The cult of Themis was widespread in Greece. She was often represented as a woman of sober appearance carrying a pair of scales.

THEODICY \thē-'ä-də-sē\ (from Greek theos, "god," and dikē, "justice"), justification of God, concerned with reconciling the goodness and justice of God with the observable facts of evil and suffering in the world.

A theological system that posits a creator who is infinitely good is confronted with the problem of explaining the existence of evil in the world. Most theodicies aim at solving this problem. Within polytheistic systems the solution is usually a simple one: evil can be understood simply as the outcome of a conflict of wills, one god set against another. Such an approach is evident also in the various dualist systems, in which the power of evil is held to be separate from and opposed to the power of good (see MANICHAISM; GnosticISM; and ZoroASTRIANISM).

Strict MONOTHEISM, by contrast, must account for evil without positing the existence of a power separate from God, and different thinkers have adopted a variety of strategies in dealing with this problem. In some religions the creator is believed to have fashioned a primal paradise that was subsequently spoiled by human disobedience or sin; such an approach is evident in the GARDEN OF EDEN story in GENESIS. In other systems, the creator fashioned the world but then withdrew from it (see DEUS OTIOSUS); evil can then be explained as the result of a process of decay or degeneration. Most generally, the creator is credited with what is good in the world, while humans are held accountable for evil. The Indian notion of karma—in which human suffering is understood as the direct consequence of misdeeds performed in a previous incarnation—was deemed the most rational solution to the problem by the sociologist MAX WEBER.

THEODORE OF MOPSUESTIA \ˈthē-ə-,dōr . . . ,mäp-sü-ˈes- chē-ə\ (b. c. 350, Antioch, Syria—d. 428/429, Mopsuestia, Cilicia [now part of Turkey]), Syrian theologian, considered the greatest biblical interpreter of his time and the spiritual head of the exegetical School of Antioch.

Theodore studied with his friend JOHN CHRYSOSTOM, who in 369 influenced him to become an ascetic. Entering a monastery near Antioch, he lived and studied there until 378. Ordained in 381, he became bishop of Mopsuestia about 392. He engaged in the theological controversies then plaguing the Eastern church and wrote commentaries on the LORD'S PRAYER, the NICENE CREED, the SACRAMENTS, and most of the biblical books, as well as on theological and practical problems, such as the HOLY SPIRIT, the INCARNATION, PRIESTHOOD, exegetical method, theological controversies, and MONASTICISM. Theodore's works became normative through their translation into Syriac at Edessa (modern Urfa, Turkey).

Instead of the allegorical interpretation employed by the rival exegetical SCHOOL OF ALEXANDRIA, Egypt, Theodore used scientific, critical, philological, and historical methods that anticipated modern scholarship. By considering the historical circumstances in which the biblical books were written, he anticipated the modern view that many of the Psalms belong to the 2nd century BCE and rejected as uncanonical such books as Chronicles, Esdras, and the Catholic Letters. He composed a treatise on ALLEGORY and history, no longer extant, in which he criticized ORIGEN, considered the most influential theologian of the early Greek church, for ignoring the literal sense of SCRIPTURE. Elsewhere, Theodore said that those who interpreted Scripture allegorically "turn everything backwards, since they make no distinction in divine Scripture between what the text says and dreams."

Theologically, Theodore insisted that Christ's person has two natures: divine and human. Basing this Christological issue on a psychological analysis of personality, he believed that the human and divine natures were joined in some kind of union, as between body and soul.

Theodore had a strong impact on the NESTORIAN church, which identified itself with patriarch NESTORIUS of Constantinople, whom the Council of Ephesus (431) had condemned. Adhering to the School of Antioch, the Nestorian church regarded Theodore as the main authority in all matters of faith. The second COUNCIL OF CONSTANTINOPLE (553) condemned Theodore's views and writings, but a Persian council in 484 had acknowledged him as the guardian of right faith. The Church of the East (also known as the Persian, or Nestorian Church) accepted Theodore's theology and is considered Nestorian.

THEODORE STUDITES, SAINT \stü-ˈdī-,tēz, styü-ˈ, also called Theodore of Studios, or Stoudion (b. 759, Constantinople [now Istanbul, Turkey]—d. Nov. 11, 826, Prinkipo, island in the Sea of Marmara; feast day November 11), ABBOT and leading opponent of ICONOCLASM.

Under the influence of his uncle, Abbot Plato of Symbola, later a saint, Theodore became a monk and, later, abbot of a monastery near Mount Olympus in Bithynia (northwestern Turkey). For opposing as adulterous the second marriage of the Byzantine emperor Constantine VI to his mistress Theodote in 795, Theodore was exiled to Thessalonica, Greece. Theodore was recalled by the empress Irene. Thereafter, his religious community moved to the monastery of Studios in Constantinople. In 806 he clashed with the emperor Nicephorus I (who asserted authority over the Eastern church) about the appointment of PATRIARCH Nicephorus of Constantinople. Theodore was condemned by a council and exiled a second time (809–811).

When iconoclasm (the doctrine opposing the veneration of religious images) was revived by the emperor Leo V, Theodore led the opposition and was again exiled (816–820). Recalled by the emperor Michael II, who nevertheless favored the iconoclastic party, Theodore was not allowed to resume his abbacy. With his monks he spent the rest of his life near Constantinople. He had fought for church independence from imperial power; because the patriarchs of Constantinople often had to compromise with the Byzantine emperors, he opposed the patriarchs too.

Most of his works—which include homilies, three polemical treatises against the Iconoclasts, and nearly 600 letters—are in J.-P. Migne, Patrologia Graeca (“Greek Fathers”), vol. 99 (1903).

THEODOTUS THE Gnostic \thē-’ā-də-təs . . . ’näs-tik\ (fl. 2nd century CE), a principal formulator of an eastern brand of Gnosticism.

From the scant data available, Theodotus is known to have taught Gnostic doctrines in Asia Minor c. 160–170, elaborating on the principles of the early-2nd-century Gnostic VALENTINUS. Theodotus’ teachings survive in Excerpta ex Theodoto (“Extracts from Theodotus”), actually a scrapbook that the 2nd–3rd-century Christian philosophical theologian CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA appended to his Stromata (“Miscellanies”). Certain passages integrate the comments of Clement; thus, the unsystematic arrangement of the material causes problems of interpretation.

Essentially, the Gnosticism of Theodotus affirmed that the world is the product of a process of emanations, or radiations, from an ultimate principle of unconditioned being or eternal ideas. Intermediate beings in this hierarchy of perfection include God the creator of matter and Christ the redeemer, who united himself to the man Jesus at his BAPTISM to bring men gnōsis (“knowledge”). Salvation, he concluded, is reserved for believers infused with pneuma (“spirit”).

Theodotus further developed the role of inferior spiritual beings, or ANGELS, and their relation to Christ. He mentions anointing and a EUCHARIST of bread and water as two means of release from the domination of the evil power.

THEOLOGY, speaking or writing about the gods or God. Originating in classical Greek thought concerning the gods of Olympus (with authors such as Homer and Hesiod), theology became an important discipline in the development of JUDAISM, CHRISTIANITY, and ISLAM. The themes of theology are God, humans, the world, salvation, and ESCHATOLOGY.

While the term theology as it originated in the works of Plato and other Greek philosophers denoted the teaching of mythological beliefs, the discipline received its most distinctive content and methodology within Christianity. Largely because of its resultant reflection of the particular concerns and categories of one tradition, theology as a neutral tool applicable to religions in general is a problematic concept. To apply such a framework indiscriminately to other religions can result in forced analogies and false conclusions. In certain Eastern traditions, BUDDHISM, for example, in which no concept of “god” in the Western sense obtains, the enterprise of theology is not applicable.

Even though the extent varies from religion to religion, theology claims in some degree a normative element—arising out of the authority of a divine teacher, personal revelation, or some other kind of spiritual encounter that elicits commitment. It is the precedent of authority that most clearly distinguishes theology from philosophy, the tenets of which are generally based on timeless evidence apprehensible by autonomous reason. Nevertheless, theology does employ reason in addressing many of the same concerns as philosophy.

THEOPHANY \thē-’ā-fə-nē\, manifestation of deity in sensible form. The term has been applied generally to the appearance of the gods in ancient Greece, the Middle East, and particularly in biblical materials. In the OLD TESTAMENT, God is depicted as appearing in human form, in natural cataclysms, in a burning bush, a cloud, or a gentle breeze—forms often associated with the divine “name” or “glory” (originally a visible HALO accompanying the divine appearance). The extension of the term theophany to such NEW TESTAMENT events as the BAPTISM and TRANSFIGURATION of Jesus (also called epiphanies) has been questioned as inappropriate because in Orthodox Christian doctrine Christ himself in his whole life and work and death is the manifestation of God.

THEOSOPHY \thē-’ā-sə-fē\, religious philosophy with mystical concerns that has been of catalytic significance in religious thought in the 19th and 20th centuries. The term theosophy is derived from the Greek theos, “god,” and sophia, “wisdom,” and is generally translated as “divine wisdom.” All theosophical speculation has as its foundation the mystical premise that God must be experienced directly in order to be known at all.

In modern times theosophy has been widely identified with the doctrines promoted by religious mystic Helena Blavatsky through the Theosophical Society. The term may also be used in a more general sense to refer to a certain strain of mystical thought found in such thinkers as the ancient Greek philosophers Pythagoras and Plato, the Gnostic teachers SIMON MAGUS and VALENTINUS, the Neoplatonist philosophers Plotinus and Proclus, the medieval northern European mystics MEISTER ECKHART and NICHOLAS OF CUSA, the Renaissance speculative mystics Paracelsus and Giordano Bruno, the German philosophical mystic JAKOB BÖHME, and the German Romantic philosopher Friedrich Schelling. But the richest and most profound source of theosophical views has been Hindu thought, where they may be traced from the earliest scriptural VEDAS through the UPANISHADS and the BHAGAVAD GĪTĀ to modern times. Elements of theosophy may also be found in the other Asian religions, especially in Islamic SUFISM, BUDDHISM, and TAOISM.

Theosophical speculation places an emphasis on mystical experience: a deeper spiritual reality exists, and direct contact may be established with that reality through intuition, meditation, revelation, or some other state transcending normal human consciousness. A distinction between an inner, or esoteric, teaching and an outer, or exoteric, teaching is commonly accepted, and much attention is devoted to deciphering the meaning concealed in sacred texts. Modern theosophists claim that all WORLD RELIGIONS, including CHRISTIANITY, contain such an inner teaching. Most theosophical speculation reveals a fascination with supernatural or other extraordinary occurrences and with the achievement of higher psychic and spiritual powers. It is held that knowledge of the divine wisdom gives access to the mysteries of nature and to humankind’s deeper being. Despite a recognition of basic distinctions between the exoteric and the esoteric, between the phenomenal world and a higher spiritual reality, and between the human and the divine, which suggests DUALISM, most theosophically inclined writers have affirmed an underlying unity (monism) that subsumes all differentiation.

Since the 19th century theosophy has been identified with the Theosophical Society founded in 1875 in New York City by HELENA PETROVNA BLAVATSKY and HENRY STEEL OLCOTT. The Theosophical Society affirms the following objectives: (1) to form a nucleus of the universal fellowship of humanity, without distinction of race, creed, sex, CASTE, or color; (2) to encourage the study of COMPARATIVE RELIGION, philosophy, and science; and (3) to investigate unexplained laws of nature and the powers latent in human beings. The society insists that it is not offering a new system of thought but merely underscoring certain universal concepts of God, nature, and humanity that may be found in the teachings of all the great religions. One of the society's most controversial claims concerns the existence of a brotherhood of Great Masters, or Adepts, who, it is asserted, have perfected themselves and are directing the spiritual evolution of humanity.

The Theosophical Society almost expired in the United States in the years following Blavatsky and Olcott's removal to India. During the 1880s and '90s it was revived by William Q. Judge (1851–96), an Irish-born American mystic, who succeeded in making the American section the most active unit in the international movement. The American wing, however, was to be repeatedly disrupted by schisms in later years. Following Blavatsky's death in 1891, tensions rapidly escalated between Judge and Olcott, culminating in the secession of the American movement from Indian control in 1895. After Judge's death in 1896, Katherine Tingley (1847–1929) succeeded to the headship of the American section; at her instigation the American headquarters was transferred to Point Loma in California, and the focus of the movement's work was recast along more practical lines. In 1950–51 the headquarters was moved to Pasadena, Calif. A new schism developed, with still a third group claiming to represent theosophy in America. Such sectarianism has declined in recent years.

Though Judge came to dominate the American work after 1891, Olcott maintained an uneasy control over the international movement. Upon his death in 1907, he was succeeded as president in India by the charismatic Englishwoman Annie Besant (1847–1933), whose leadership gave Indians a sense of pride that they were exporting ideas of importance to the West. In 1911 she proclaimed Jiddu Krishnamurti (1895–1986), an obscure Indian youth, as the vehicle of a coming World Teacher, an act that led to much controversy. Krishnamurti subsequently renounced any claims to being a World Teacher and began a career of writing and teaching. Beginning in the 1920s he spent much time in the United States and Europe, where his books have enjoyed considerable popularity.

The influence of the Theosophical Society has been significant, despite its small following. The movement has been a catalytic force in the 20th-century Asian revival of Buddhism and HINDUISM and a pioneering agency in the promotion of greater Western acquaintance with Eastern thought. In the United States it has influenced a whole series of religious movements, including the I AM MOVEMENT, the ROSICRUCIANS, the Liberal Catholic Church, Psychiana, UNITY, and sections of the NEW THOUGHT movement.

THEOTOKOS \,thā-ō-'tō-kōs, thē-'ā-tō-kās\ (Greek: "One Who Has Given Birth to God"), in EASTERN ORTHODOXY, the designation of the Virgin MARY as mother of God. The NESTORIANS, who stressed the independence of the divine and human natures in Christ, opposed its use, on the ground that it compromised the human nature of Christ. The Council of Ephesus (431) anathematized all who denied that Christ was truly divine, and asserted that Mary was truly the mother of God. The COUNCIL OF CHALCEDON (451) used the term in formulating the definition of the hypostatic union (of Christ's human and divine natures).

THERA \'ter-ə\ (Pāli: "Elders"), Sanskrit Sthavirās \stə-'vir-əz\, senior monks of the first Buddhist SANGHA. Adherents of the THERAVĀDA school of BUDDHISM accept as authoritative the Pāli canon of ancient Indian Buddhism and trace their lineage back to the Theras.

THERAGĀTHĀ/THERĪGĀTHĀ \,ter-ə-'gā-tā . . . ,ter-ē-'gā-tā\ (Sanskrit: "Hymns of the Elders/Senior Nuns"), Buddhist lyrics, included in the Suttanipāta (one of the earliest books of the Pāli canon, appearing in the late Khuddaka Nikaya ["Short Collection"] of the Sutta Pitaka). In the works 264 monks speak of their inner experiences and of nature, and some 100 nuns tell of their daily lives. The songs of the monks are said to have been composed when their authors experienced the bliss of enlightenment. Within the collection about 30 different meters can be distinguished, attesting to the prosodic variety of Buddhist lyrics.

THERAPEUTAE \,ther-ə-'pyū-tē\ (Greek: "Worshippers"), singular Therapeutes, Jewish sect of ascetics closely resembling the ESSENES, believed to have settled on the shores of Lake Mareotis in the vicinity of Alexandria, Egypt, during the 1st century CE. The only original account of this community is given in De vita contemplativa (On the Contemplative Life), attributed to Philo of Alexandria.

The origin and fate of the Therapeutae are unknown. They shared with the Essenes a dualistic view of body and soul, but differed from them in that "wisdom," according to Philo, was their main objective. For six days a week members of the community, both men and women, lived apart from one another, praying at dawn and at evening, the interval between being spent entirely on spiritual exercise. On the SABBATH they met in the common SANCTUARY, where they listened to a discourse by the member most skilled in their doctrines and then ate a common meal of bread and water. They read SCRIPTURE, which they interpreted allegorically on the pattern of books composed by the founders of their sect. Philo refers to the composition of "new psalms" to God in a variety of meters and melodies. The sect revered the number 7 and its square, but the most sacred of numbers was 50. Thus, on the eve of the 50th day they observed an all-night festival, with a discourse, hymn singing, and a meal, followed by a sacred vigil.

THERAVĀDA \,ter-ə-'vā-də\ (Pāli: "Way of the Elders"), major form of BUDDHISM prevalent in Sri Lanka, Myanmar (Burma), Thailand, Cambodia, and Laos.

Theravāda, like most other Buddhist schools, claims to adhere most closely to the original doctrines and practices taught by the BUDDHA GOTAMA. Theravādins accept as authoritative the Pāli canon that has its roots in ancient Indian Buddhism, and they trace their sectarian lineage back to the Elders (Sanskrit: Sthaviras; Pāli: THERAS), who followed in the tradition of the senior monks of the first Buddhist SANGHA. To what extent this Theravāda view is historically accurate is difficult to determine. It is nevertheless clear that Theravāda-like traditions that used Pāli as their sacred language did develop before the 1st century CE in parts of India, in parts of mainland southeast Asia, and—most especially—in Sri Lanka. In the early centuries of the 1st millennium CE the Theravāda traditions emerged as the dominant form of Buddhism not only in Sri Lanka but also in Myanmar, Thailand, Cambodia, and Laos. In all these areas the relationship between the Theravādins and royal authority has been very close.

Throughout their history the Theravādins have been a relatively conservative school. Like all the (now defunct) HĪNAYĀNA schools with which they are usually grouped, the Theravādins have focused their attention on the Buddha Gotama and, to a lesser extent, on Metteyya (MAITREYA), the Buddha of the future. At the level of doctrine the Theravādins have maintained a clear ontological disinction between SAMŚĀRA (the realm of suffering) and NIRVANA (release). Their religious goal is to attain the state of an ARAHANT, or fully perfected saint.

In the so-called Theravāda countries there are many Buddhist traditions and contemporary trends that are usually associated with MAHĀYĀNA and even Esoteric (Tantric) orientations. However, the authoritative character of the mainstream Theravāda heritage remains largely intact.

THERESA OF LISIEUX, SAINT \tə-ˈrē-sə . . . lē-ˈzyæ\, also called Saint Theresa of the Child Jesus, or The Little Flower, original name Marie-Françoise-Thérèse Martin (b. Jan. 2, 1873, Alençon, France—d. Sept. 30, 1897, Lisieux; canonized May 17, 1925; feast day October 1), CARMELITE nun whose service to her order, although outwardly unremarkable, was later recognized for its spiritual accomplishments.

Theresa moved with her family to Lisieux in 1877 and was raised by older sisters and an aunt. In the deeply religious atmosphere of her home, her piety developed early and intensively. She entered the Carmelite CONVENT there at the age of 15. Though suffering from depression, feelings of guilt, and religious doubts, she kept the rule to perfection and maintained a smiling, pleasant, and unselfish manner. Before her death from tuberculosis she acknowledged that because of her difficult nature every day had been a struggle. Her burial site at Lisieux became a place of PILGRIMAGE, and a BASILICA bearing her name was built there (1929–54).

The story of Theresa's spiritual development was related in a collection of her epistolary essays, published in 1898 under the title Histoire d'une âme ("Story of a Soul"). Her popularity is largely a result of this work. St. Theresa defined her doctrine of the Little Way as "the way of spiritual childhood, the way of trust and absolute surrender."

THESEUM \thi-ˈsē-əm\, temple in Athens dedicated to HEPHAESTUS and ATHENA as patrons of the arts and crafts. Slightly older than the PARTHENON (i.e., c. 450–440 BCE), it has been known as the Theseum since the Middle Ages, apparently because some of its sculptures represent the exploits of THESEUS. The Theseum is a Doric peripteral (i.e., surrounded by a single row of columns) temple, with 13 columns at the sides and 6 at the ends.

The east pedimental sculpture dealt with the APOTHEOSIS of HERACLES. The frontal metopes represent the labors of Heracles, the lateral the exploits of Theseus. As in the Parthenon there is a sculptured frieze above the exterior of the cella walls, though this extends only over the east and west fronts and the east ends of the sides. The eastern frieze represents a battle scene with seated deities on either hand, the western one a kentauromachia (battle of CENTAURS). The outstanding preservation of the temple is owing to its conversion into a Christian church in the Middle Ages.

THESEUS \ˈthē-sē-əs, ˈthēs-yūs\, great hero of Attic legend, son of Aegeus, king of Athens, and AETHRA, daughter of Pitheus, king of Troezen (in Argolis), or of the sea god, POSEIDON, and Aethra. When Theseus reached manhood, Aethra sent him to Athens. While on the journey he killed Sinis, called the Pine Bender because he killed his victims by tearing them apart between two pine trees. Next Theseus dispatched Phaea the Crommyonian sow (or boar). Then from a cliff he flung Sciron, who had kicked his guests into the sea while they were washing his feet. Later he slew PROCRUSTES, who fitted all comers to his iron bed by hacking or racking them to the right length.

On his arrival in Athens, Theseus found his father married to MEDEA, who recognized Theseus before his father did and tried to persuade Aegeus to poison him. Aegeus, however, finally recognized Theseus and declared him heir to the throne. Theseus successfully attacked the fire-breathing bull of Marathon, after which he killed the Cretan MINOTAUR, half man and half bull, shut up in the legendary Cretan Labyrinth. Theseus had promised Aegeus that if he returned successful from Crete, he would hoist a white sail in place of the black sail with which the fatal ship bearing the sacrificial victims to the Minotaur always put to sea. But he forgot his promise; and when Aegeus saw the black sail, he flung himself from the Acropolis and died.

Theseus then united the various Attic communities into a single state and extended the territory of Attica to the Isthmus of Corinth. Alone or with the Greek hero HERACLES he captured the AMAZON princess ANTIOPE (or Hippolyte). As a result the Amazons attacked Athens, and Hippolyte fell fighting on the side of Theseus. By her he had a son, HIPPOLYTUS. Theseus is also said to have taken part in the Argonautic expedition and the Calydonian boar hunt.

Theseus and his friend PIRITHOUS cooperated to carry off HELEN, then still a child. Theseus later descended to the lower world with Pirithous to help his friend carry off PERSEPHONE, Queen of the Dead. But they were caught and confined in HADES until Heracles came and released Theseus.

When Theseus returned to Athens, he faced an uprising led by a descendant of ERECHTHEUS. Failing to quell the outbreak, Theseus sent his children to Euboea, and after solemnly cursing the Athenians he sailed away to the island of Scyros. Lycomedes, king of Scyros, killed Theseus by casting him into the sea from the top of a cliff. Later, according to the command of the Delphic oracle, the Athenians fetched the bones of Theseus from Scyros and laid them in Attic earth.

Theseus' chief festival, called Theseia, was on the eighth of the month Pyanopsion (October), but the eighth day of every month was also sacred to him.

THESMOPHORIA \,thez-mə-ˈfōr-ē-ə, -ˈfōr-\, in GREEK RELIGION, festival held in honor of DEMETER Thesmophoros and celebrated by women in many parts of the Greek world. The name Thesmophoria is perhaps the primary one, from which the epithet of the goddess was derived; it means “the carrying of things laid down.”

The celebrants were free women who seem to have been married. They observed chastity for several days and abstained from certain foods. The festival lasted three days, although in Attica it was lengthened to five. At least a great part of the Thesmophoria was carried out by torchlight and was accompanied by ceremonial coarse abuse among the women, a common ritual occurrence.

At some time in the festival pigs were thrown into an underground chamber. They were left there until the parts of them not eaten by snakes had had time to rot. The remains were then brought up by women who had observed chastity for three days. These women also carried, or some of the celebrants did, certain ritual objects, including pinecones and figures made of dough, in the shapes of serpents and men. The remains of the pigs were laid on an altar and if taken and mixed with seed were believed to ensure a good crop. Apparently the figures, like the pigs, were also thrown into the chasms. There was the day of fasting, with the women sitting upon the ground. The third day, kalligeneia, was “the fair birth” and may have indicated the happy issue of all the fertility of the ground.

THETIS \ˈthē-tis\, in Greek mythology, NEREID loved by ZEUS and POSEIDON. When THEMIS, however, revealed that Thetis was destined to bear a son who would be mightier than his father, the two gods gave her to PELEUS. Thetis, unwilling to wed a mortal, resisted Peleus’ advances by changing herself into various shapes. But, assisted by the wise CENTAUR CHIRON, Peleus finally captured her.

All the gods brought gifts to their wedding. The child of their union was the warrior ACHILLES, but, according to some authorities, Thetis bore seven children, all of whom perished either when she attempted to render them immortal by fire or when she destroyed them as the tokens of an unwilling alliance. She had a SANCTUARY at Sparta.

THIRTEEN ARTICLES OF FAITH, also called Thirteen Principles, MOSES MAIMONIDES’ summary of the basic tenets of JUDAISM. They first appeared in his commentary on the Mishnah Kitāb al-Sirāj. Maimonides’ statement, although presented by him as a form of dogma, was a personal concept and has been much debated and revised. The numerous versions of the Articles of Faith include the hymn Yigdal, which was written about 1300 and has been adopted into most prayer services.

The contents of the Articles are as follows: (1) God’s existence is perfect and the cause of all else that exists; (2) God’s unity is unparalleled; (3) God has no corporeal nature; (4) God is eternal; (5) God should be worshiped exclusively; (6) God communicates through prophecy; (7) MOSES is the greatest of all prophets; (8) Moses received the entire TORAH; (9) Moses’ law is eternally complete and immutable; (10) God is omniscient; (11) God punishes sinners and rewards those who keep Torah; (12) the MESSIAH is coming; and (13) the dead will rise.

THIRTY-NINE ARTICLES, the doctrinal statements of the Church of England. With THE BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER, they present the liturgy and doctrine of that church. The Thirty-nine Articles developed from the Forty-two Articles, written in 1553. These had been partly derived from the Thirteen Articles of 1538, designed as the basis of an agreement between Henry VIII and the German Lutheran princes, which had been influenced by the Lutheran AUGSBURG CONFESSION (1530).

The Forty-two Articles were eliminated when Mary I restored ROMAN CATHOLICISM (1553). In 1563 the Canterbury Convocation drastically revised the Forty-two Articles. A final revision by Convocation in 1571 produced the Thirty-nine Articles, which were approved by Elizabeth I and imposed on the clergy. They deal briefly with the doctrines accepted by Roman Catholics and Protestants alike and more fully with points of controversy. They are often studiously ambiguous, however, because the Elizabethan government wished to make the national church as inclusive of different viewpoints as possible. Assent to them was, into the 19th century, required for a university degree in Britain.

The status of the Thirty-nine Articles varies in the several churches of the ANGLICAN COMMUNION. Since 1865, Church of England clergy have had to declare only that the doctrine in the Articles is “agreeable to the Word of God,” while, in the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States, neither clergy nor laity is required formally to subscribe to them.

THOMAS, SAINT \ˈtā-məs\ (b. probably Galilee—d. traditionally 53 CE, Madras, India; Western feast day December 21, feast day in Roman and Syrian CATHOLIC churches July 3, in the Greek church October 6), one of the Twelve APOSTLES. His name in Aramaic (Te’oma) and Greek (Didymos) means “twin.” He is called Judas Thomas (i.e., Judas the Twin) by the Syrians.

According to John 20:19–29 Thomas was not among those disciples to whom the risen Christ first appeared, and, when they told the incredulous Thomas, he requested physical proof of the RESURRECTION (hence the phrase “doubting Thomas”). Thomas’ subsequent history is uncertain. According to the 4th-century Ecclesiastical History of EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA, he evangelized Parthia (modern Khorasan). Later Christian tradition says he extended his apostolate into India, where he is recognized as the founder of the Church of the Syrian Malabar Christians, or Christians of St. Thomas. In the apocryphal Acts of Thomas, originally composed in Syriac, his martyrdom is cited under the king of Mylapore at Madras, where are to be found St. Thomas Mount and San Thomè Cathedral, his traditional burial place. His relics, however, supposedly were taken to the West and finally enshrined at Ortona, Italy. Other works accredited to Thomas are the gnostic Gospel of Thomas, The Book of Thomas the Athlete, and Evangelium Joannis de obitu Mariae (“The Message of John Concerning the Death of Mary”).

THOMAS À KEMPIS \ˈtā-məs-ä-ˈkem-pis\, original name Thomas Hemerken (b. 1379/80, Kempen, near Düsseldorf, the Rhineland [now in Germany]—d. Aug. 8, 1471, Agnietenberg, near Zwolle, Bishopric of Utrecht [now in The Netherlands]), Christian theologian, the probable author of De Imitatione Christi (IMITATION OF CHRIST), a devotional book that, with the exception of the BIBLE, has been considered the most influential work in Christian literature.

About 1392 Thomas went to Deventer, Neth., headquarters of the learned BRETHREN OF THE COMMON LIFE, a community devoted to education and the care of the poor, where he studied under the theologian Florentius Radewyns, the founder of the Congregation of Windesheim. Thomas joined the Windesheim congregation at Agnietenberg monastery, where he remained for over 70 years. He took his vows in 1408, was ordained in 1413, and devoted his life to copying manuscripts and to directing novices.

Although the authorship is in dispute, he probably wrote the Imitation. Simple in language and style, it emphasizes the spiritual rather than the materialistic life, affirms the rewards of being Christ-centered, and supports Communion as a means to strengthen faith. His writings offer what is possibly the best representation of the DEVOTIO MODERNA, a religious movement that made religion intelligible and practicable for the “modern” attitude arising in the Netherlands at the end of the 14th century. Thomas stresses ASCETICISM rather than MYSTICISM, as well as moderate, not extreme, austerity. A critical edition of his Opera Omnia (17 vol., 1902–22; “Complete Works”) was published by M.J. Pohl.

THOMAS AQUINAS, SAINT \ə-ˈkwī-nəs\, also called Aquinas, Italian San Tommaso d’Aquino, byname Doctor Angelicus (b. 1224/25, Roccasecca, near Aquino, Terra di Lavoro, Kingdom of Sicily—d. March 7, 1274, Fossanova, near Terracina, Latium, Papal States; canonized July 18, 1323; feast day January 28, formerly March 7), Christian philosopher, theologian, and poet who developed his own conclusions from Aristotelian premises and systematized Latin theology. He is recognized by the ROMAN CATHOLIC church as its foremost Western philosopher and theologian.

Thomas was born in 1224 or 1225 at Roccasecca, Italy, and was offered as a prospective monk at the monastery of Monte Cassino near his home when he was still a young boy. In 1239 Thomas was forced to return to his family when the emperor expelled the monks in a conflict with the pope. He was then sent to the University of Naples, where he first encountered the scientific and philosophical works that were being translated from the Greek and the Arabic. In this setting Thomas decided to join the DOMINICANS. In 1256 he began teaching theology in one of the two Dominican schools incorporated in the University of Paris, and in 1259 Thomas was appointed theological adviser and lecturer to the papal Curia. From 1265 to 1267 he taught at the CONVENT of Santa Sabina in Rome until, in November 1268, he was sent to Paris, where he became involved in a doctrinal polemic concerning faith and reason.

IBN RUSHD (Averroës), the great Spanish Arabic commentator on Aristotle, had asserted that two truths—one of faith, the other of reason—can, in the final analysis, be contradictory, and his EXEGESIS and rational style of thought was attracting disciples in the faculty of arts at the University of Paris. Aquinas protested against the counter-orthodoxy of this trend. His own debt to Aristotle meant, however, that in 1270 Thomas was discredited along with the Averroists for his sanction of the autonomy of reason under faith. This dispute had called into question the very method of theology. According to Aquinas, reason is capable of operating within faith and yet according to its own laws. While the philosopher relies solely on reason, the theologian accepts authority and faith as his starting point and then proceeds to conclusions using reason. Thomas was the first to present theology systematically in this way, and in doing so he raised a storm of opposition. Even today this opposition endures.

In 1266 Thomas composed a treatise—De regimine principum (“On the Government of Princes”)—that described experimental and rational attempts at government. In the face of this movement, theologians of a traditional bent firmly resisted any form of a determinist philosophy which, they believed, would atrophy liberty, dissolve personal responsibility, destroy faith in Providence, and deny the notion of a gratuitous act of creation. Imbued with Augustine’s doctrines, they asserted the necessity and power of GRACE for a nature torn asunder by SIN. The optimism of the new theology concerning the religious value of nature scandalized them.

Contrary to their suspicions, Thomas taught a continuous creation in which the dependence of the created on the creative wisdom guarantees the reality of the order of nature. God, without surrendering his sovereignty, conforms his government over the universe to the laws of a creative Providence that wills each being to act according to its proper nature. This autonomy finds its highest realization in the rational creature: humans are self-moving in their intellectual, volitional, and physical existence. “To take something away from the perfection of the creature is to abstract from the perfection of the creative power itself.” This metaphysical axiom, which is also a mystical principle, is the key to St. Thomas’ spirituality.

In 1273, BONAVENTURE, a Franciscan friar and a colleague of Thomas’ at Paris, leveled a critique at the Aristotelian ideas of philosophy as distinct from theology, a physical nature that has determined laws, a soul that is bound up with the body, and the denial of the Platonic-Augustinian theory of knowledge based upon exemplary Ideas or Forms. The disagreement was profound. Certainly, all Christian philosophers taught the distinction between matter and spirit. Some viewed the material world merely as a stage on which the history of spiritual persons is acted out and their salvation or damnation determined. In this history, the human plays a brief role only to escape as quickly as possible into the realm of pure spirit. Thomas, on the contrary, situated the human ontologically at the juncture of two universes. Within the human condition there is both a distinction between spirit and nature and an intrinsic homogeneity of the two. For Aristotle, form is that which makes a thing to be what it is; form and matter are the two intrinsic causes that constitute every material thing. For Thomas, then, the body is the matter and the soul is the form of man. The objection was raised that he was not sufficiently safeguarding the transcendence of the spirit.

Thomas Aquinas died on March 7, 1274, at the CISTERCIAN abbey of Fossanova. In 1277 the masters of Paris condemned a series of 219 propositions, of which 12 were those of Thomas, and produced for several centuries a resistance to the cosmic and anthropological realism of Aquinas. Nonetheless, he was canonized a saint in 1323, officially named doctor of the church in 1567, and proclaimed the protagonist of orthodoxy during the modernist crisis at the end of the 19th century.

THOMISM \ˈtō-mi-zəm\, philosophical and theological system developed by THOMAS AQUINAS in the 13th century, by his later commentators, and by modern revivalists of the system, known as neo-Thomists.

Medieval Thomism. Although making respectful use of Aristotle and the Platonists, and AUGUSTINE and the CHURCH FATHERS, Aquinas' originality was shown in treating existence as the supreme act or perfection of being in God as well as in created things, in reserving the creative act to God alone, and in distinguishing between God and creatures by a real composition of existence and essence as principles in all created beings. Also characteristic was his teaching that the human soul is a unique subsistent form, substantially united with matter to constitute human nature. Aquinas held that both man and lower creatures have a natural tendency or love toward God, that supernatural GRACE perfects and elevates our natural abilities, and that blessedness consists formally in knowing God Himself, a knowledge accompanied by our full love of God.

This body of Thomistic doctrines was critically explained and developed during subsequent centuries. The later 13th century was crowded with treatises attacking and defending basic positions of St. Thomas, especially on the unicity of the human substantial form and the distinction of essence and existence. Encouragement toward consulting Aquinas' own writings came with the adoption of his doctrine by the DOMINICAN Order (1278, 1279, 1286), his CANONIZATION by Pope John XXII (1323), and the special place accorded to his works at the COUNCIL OF TRENT. The Dominican Jean Capréolus (c. 1380–1444), called the Prince of the Thomists, was the first to make a direct study of the texts of St. Thomas. Another major Dominican commentator was Tomaso de Vio, Cardinal Cajetan, who made elaborate expositions of St. Thomas' Summa theologiae and De ente et essentia (On Being and Essence). Cajetan moved beyond Aquinas to propose the influential division of kinds of analogy into inequality, attribution, and proportionality, and that the human soul's immortality can be supported only by probable reasons.

After the mid-16th century, the Thomistic commentators became involved in intricate theological controversies on grace and preemption. Highly systematized presentations of opposing views were introduced into the commentaries on the Summa theologiae made by the Spanish Dominican theologian Domingo Bañez and the Spanish JESUIT authors Francis Toletus and Gabriel Vázquez. But the new Renaissance tendency to give separate treatment to philosophical and theological issues, as well as the pressures of seminary education, undermined the usefulness of the commentary form of approach to St. Thomas. A new trend is present in the Dominican John of St. Thomas (1589–1644), who issued a separate Cursus Philosophicus ("Course in Philosophy") and then a Cursus Theologicus ("Course in Theology") in Thomistic thought. Using the framework of logic, philosophy of nature, and metaphysics, John assembled the philosophical teachings of St. Thomas under these systematic headings and reformulated the material for theology students. There were original features in his logic, including the distinction between formal and objective concepts and the stress on intentional signs.

Modern Thomism. In most Catholic seminaries and universities of the early 19th century more attention was paid to Descartes, Locke, and Wolff than to Aquinas. The modern revival of authentic Thomism began at this time in Italy. Vincent Buzzetti (1777–1824) and the Jesuit teacher Serafino Sordi (1793–1865) were instrumental in urging a direct study of the text of Aristotle and Aquinas. The revolutions of 1848 had a decisive influence upon both the Holy See and the Society of Jesus toward finding sound principles on God, man, and society in the works of St. Thomas. In editions of their philosophy manuals appearing after 1850, this renewal of Thomistic thought was advocated by three influential Jesuit writers in Italy and Germany: Luigi Taparelli d'Azeglio, Matteo Liberatore, and Joseph Kleutgen. Their own positions in epistemology, metaphysics, and social theory remained eclectic, but they did give impetus to the work of studying St. Thomas and the other Scholastics in the light of modern intellectual and social issues. Decisive support for this movement came with Pope Leo XIII's ENCYCLICAL Aeterni Patris (1879). It noted the importance of sound doctrine for meeting today's problems and called especially for a recovery of the wisdom of St.

Thomas. St. Thomas was declared the universal patron of Catholic schools, and a canon (1366, par. 2) in the new Code of Canon Law (1917) required philosophy and theology teachers to adhere to the method, doctrine, and principles of St. Thomas.

Thomists of the 20th century concentrated on a historical investigation of St. Thomas' doctrine in its medieval context and a rethinking of that doctrine in reference to contemporary problems. After World War II, Thomists faced three major tasks: to develop an adequate philosophy of science, to take account of phenomenological and psychiatric findings, and to evaluate the ontologies of existentialism and NATURALISM.

THOR \ˈthór\, deity common to all the early Germanic peoples, foe to the race of GIANTS but benevolent toward mankind. He was generally secondary to the god ODIN, who in some traditions was his father; but in Iceland, and perhaps among all northern peoples except the royal families, he was apparently worshiped more than any other god. There is evidence that a corresponding deity named Thunor, or Thonar, was worshiped in England and continental Europe, but little is known about him.

Thor's name was the Germanic word for thunder, and it was the thunderbolt that was represented by his hammer, the attribute most commonly associated with him. The hammer, MJOLLNIR, had many marvelous qualities, including that of returning to the thrower like a boomerang; it is frequently carved on runic stones and funerary stelae.

Among Thor's chief enemies was the world serpent JÖRMUNGAND (Jörmungandr), symbol of evil. According to tradition, Thor failed to smash the skull of Jörmungand, and the two are destined to kill each other in the RAGNARÖK (the end of the world of gods and men).

THOTH \ˈtōth, ˈthōth, ˈtōt \ (Greek), Egyptian Djhuty \jə-ˈhū-tē\, Egyptian god of the moon, reckoning, learning, and writing. He was held to be the inventor of writing, the creator of languages, the scribe, interpreter, and adviser of the gods, and the representative of the sun god, RE. His responsibility for writing was shared with the goddess Seshat. The cult of Thoth was centered in the town of Khmunu (Hermopolis; modern al-Ashmūnayn) in Upper Egypt.

In the myth of OSIRIS, Thoth protected ISIS during her pregnancy and healed the eye of her son HORUS, which had been wounded by Osiris' adversary SETH. He weighed the hearts of the deceased at their judgment and reported the result to Osiris and his fellow judges. Thoth's sacred animals were the ibis and the baboon; millions of mummified bodies of these animals have been found in cemeteries near Hermopolis and Memphis. Thoth was usually represented in human form with an ibis's head. The Greeks identified Thoth with their god Hermes; a collection of religious texts is attributed to "Hermes Trismegistos," which should thus be understood as "Thoth, the thrice great."

THREAD CROSS, Tibetan mdos \ˈdɔ\, object made usually of two sticks bound together in the shape of a cross, with colored threads wound around their ends to resemble a cobweb, used in Tibetan magical rituals to entrap evil spirits. They are probably pre-Buddhist, or BON, in origin but now are used by Buddhist priests. Those used in purification ceremonies at the New Year or for persons suffering from illness or misfortune are broken up and burned.

THREE WEEKS, Hebrew Bein Hametzarim ("Between the Straits"), in JUDAISM, period of mourning running from the 17th day of TAMMUZ, the fourth month of the Jewish religious year, to the 9th day of Av (TISHA BE-AV), the fifth month (variously, about June to August). The observance commemorates the days between the first breaching of the walls of Jerusalem in 586 BCE by Babylonian troops to the subsequent destruction of the First TEMPLE OF JERUSALEM. Marriages and haircuts are forbidden. During the nine days of Av meat and wine are forbidden except on the SABBATH, the blessing of the NEW MOON is omitted, and prophecies of doom from JEREMIAH and ISAIAH are read in the SYNAGOGUE on the three Sabbaths that fall within this period. The period ends with a 24-hour fast.

THREE WORLDS ACCORDING TO KING RUANG \rū-ˈaŋ, -ˈɛŋ \ (Thai: "Traiphumikatha"), 14th-century COSMOLOGY that is the oldest known full-length text written in Thai. See BUDDHISM.

THRYM \ˈθrɛm, ˈθrɪm \, in Germanic mythology, GIANT who stole MJOLLNIR, the hammer of the god THOR. Thrym asked as ransom for the hand of the goddess FREYJA in marriage, and she refused. Thor, dressed as a woman, attended the wedding in her place, recovered his hammer, and slaughtered Thrym and the other giants in attendance.

THUNDERBIRD \ˈθən-dər-bərd \, in Native North American mythology, powerful spirit in the form of a bird which watered the earth and caused vegetation to grow. Lightning flashed from its beak, and thunder was the beating of its wings. It was often portrayed with an extra head on its abdomen and was frequently accompanied by lesser bird spirits, usually in the form of eagles or falcons.

Although it is best known in North America, evidence of similar figures has been found throughout Africa, Asia, and Europe.

THUNDERER, in BALTIC RELIGION, sky deity usually known as Perkūnas (Lithuanian) or PĒRKONS (Latvian).

THYRSUS \ˈθər-səs \, in GREEK RELIGION, staff carried by DIONYSUS and his votaries (Bacchae, Maenads). In Greek art after 530 BCE the Bacchae were usually depicted as holding the thyrsus, a staff shown as a stalk of giant fennel (narthex) segmented like bamboo, sometimes with ivy leaves inserted in the hollow end. Bacchae were depicted and described using them as weapons. Some scholars believe they were fertility symbols.

TIAMAT \ˈtē-ä-mät \, in MESOPOTAMIAN RELIGION, primal goddess, a personification of salt water and mother of the gods. When conflict between her husband Apsu and the other gods resulted in Apsu's death, Tiamat made war upon the other divinities, backed by an army of DEMONS she had created. Her battle with, and defeat at the hands of, the god MARDUK forms the substance of the Babylonian creation epic known as the enuma elish. From her body Marduk fashioned the heavens and the earth. See KINGU.

TIARA \tē-'ar-ə, -'är-\, in ROMAN CATHOLICISM, triple crown worn by the pope or carried in front of him, used during nonliturgical functions such as PROCESSIONS. Beehive-shaped, it is about 15 inches high and is made of silver cloth and ornamented with three diadems, as well as with two streamers, known as lappets, hanging from the back. The tiara probably developed from the Phrygian cap, or frigium, a conical cap worn in the Greco-Roman world. In the 10th century the tiara was pictured on papal coins, and by the 14th century it was ornamented with three crowns.

TIBETAN BUDDHISM, distinctive form of BUDDHISM that evolved from the 7th century CE in Tibet. It is based mainly on MĀDHYAMIKA and YOGĀCĀRA philosophies and utilizes the symbolic ritual practices of VAJRAYĀNA (Esoteric Buddhism). Tibetan Buddhism also incorporates the monastic disciplines of early THERAVĀDA Buddhism and the shamanistic features of the indigenous Tibetan religion, BON. Characteristic of Tibetan Buddhism is the large segment of the population actively engaged in religious pursuits (up until the Chinese Communist takeover in 1959, an estimated one-quarter of the inhabitants were members of religious orders); its system of "reincarnating lamas"; the merger of the spiritual and temporal authority in the office and person of the DALAI LAMA; and the vast number of divine beings (each with its own family, consort, and pacific and terrifying aspects), which are considered symbolic representations of the psyche by some Tibetans.

Buddhism was transmitted into Tibet mainly during the 7th to 10th centuries by such teachers as the 8th-century Tantric master PADMASAMBHAVA and the MAHĀYĀNA teacher ŚĀNTRAKṢITA. In 1042 the reformer and teacher ATĪSA came to Tibet, and within a century the major sects of Tibetan Buddhism had emerged. The DGE-LUGS-PA, the order of the Dalai and the PANCHEN LAMAS, has been the politically predominant Tibetan sect from the 17th century until 1959.

Tibetans succeeded in translating all available Buddhist literature in India and Tibet; many texts lost in the country of their origin are known only from their Tibetan translations. The Tibetan canon is divided into the Bka'-gyur, consisting of the supposedly canonical texts, and the Bstan'-gyur, consisting of commentaries by Indian masters.

In the second half of the 20th century Tibetan Buddhism spread to the West, particularly after the subjugation of Tibet to Chinese Communist rule sent many refugees, including highly regarded "reincarnated LAMAS," or tulkus, out of their homeland.

TIELE, CORNELIS PETRUS \tē-lə\ (b. Dec. 16, 1830, Leiden, Neth.—d. Jan. 11, 1902, Leiden), Dutch theologian and scholar, who had great influence on the comparative STUDY OF RELIGION.

Educated at the seminary of the Remonstrant Brotherhood (see ARMINIANISM and REMONSTRANT), Tiele served as pastor at Moordrecht and Rotterdam, then as professor at the Remonstrant Seminary. In 1877 he was appointed at the University of Leiden as professor of the history of religions. Among Tiele's numerous works are Outlines of the History of Religion to the Spread of the Universal Religions (1877) and his Gifford Lectures, published as Elements of the Science of Religion, 2 vol. (1897–99).

T' IEN \t'yen\, Pinyin Tian (Chinese, literally, "Sky" or "Heaven"), in indigenous Chinese religion, the supreme power reigning over lesser gods and humans. The term T'ien may refer to a deity, to impersonal nature, or to both.

The first mention of T'ien seems to have occurred early in the Chou dynasty (1111–255 BCE). As a god, T'ien is sometimes perceived to be an impersonal power in contrast to SHANG-TI ("Supreme Ruler"), but the two are closely identified and the terms frequently used synonymously. Both T'ien and Shang-ti had influence over the fertility of the clan and its crops; sacrifices were offered to these powers solely by the king and, later, by the emperor.

Chinese rulers were traditionally referred to as Son of Heaven (t'ien-tzu), and their authority was believed to emanate from heaven. Beginning in the Chou dynasty, sovereignty was explained by the concept of the T' IEN-MING (Mandate of Heaven), a grant of authority that depended on the ruler's virtue. Since his virtue was believed to be reflected in the harmony of the empire, social and political unrest were traditionally considered signs that the mandate had been revoked and would soon be transferred to a succeeding dynasty.

In later years T'ien was often likened to impersonal nature or to fate. Scholars generally agreed that T'ien was the source of moral law, but for centuries they debated whether T'ien responded to human pleas and rewarded and punished human actions or whether events merely followed the order and principles established by T'ien.

T' IEN-MING \t'yen-'miŋ\, Pinyin Tianming (Chinese: "Mandate of Heaven"), in Confucian thought, the notion that heaven (T'ien) conferred directly upon an emperor, the Son of Heaven, the right to rule. The doctrine had its beginnings in the early Chou dynasty (c. 1122–221 BCE).

The continuation of the mandate was believed to be conditioned by the personal behavior of the ruler, who was expected to possess i ("righteousness") and JEN ("benevolence"); hence, some Confucianists taught that a tyrannical ruler not only lost his right to rule but also should be removed by revolution, if necessary.

T' IEN-SHIH TAO \t'yen-'shə-'daü, -'shər-\, Pinyin Tianshidao (Chinese: "Way of the Celestial Masters"), also called Five Pecks of Rice, Chinese (Wade-Giles romanization) Wu-tou-mi \wü-'dō-'mē\, Pinyin Wudoumi, great Taoist-inspired popular movement that occurred near the end of China's Han dynasty (206 BCE–220 CE) and greatly weakened the government. The T'ien-shih tao became a prototype of the religiously inspired popular rebellions that were to erupt periodically throughout China for the next 2,000 years. It was founded by CHANG TAO-LING in 142 CE, who is said to have received a revelation from T'ai-shang Lao-chün (Lord Lao the Most High—i.e., the deified LAO-TZU), who bestowed on him his "orthodox and sole doctrine of the authority of the covenant" (cheng-i meng-wei fa).

Chang was succeeded as t'ien-shih ("celestial master") by his son Chang Heng, who was in turn succeeded by his son Chang Lu. Taking advantage of discontent among the impoverished peasantry of central China, Chang Lu formed an army and set up an independent theocratic state. He was joined by another Taoist leader, Chang Hsiu (no relation), and together they extended the rebellion until it covered all of present-day Szechwan province. For ceremonial and administrative purposes, the realm was divided into 24 (later 28 and 36) units, or parishes (chih). The focal point of each was the oratory, or "chamber of purity" (ching-shih), which served as the center for communication with the powers on high. Here the chi-chiu ("libationer"), the priestly functionary, officiated. Each household contributed a tax of five pecks of rice to the administration, whence came the other common name of the movement, the Way of the Five Pecks of Rice (Wu-tou-mi tao).

The ritual activities of the libationer seem principally to have been directed toward the cure of disease by prescribed ceremonial means. Believed to be a punishment for evil deeds, whether committed by the sufferer himself or by an ancestor, illness was in fact a sentence pronounced by the SAN-KUAN (Three Officials), judges and custodians of the dead. The sentence was carried out by the spectral hordes of the Six Heavens (Liu-t'ien), a posthumous dwelling place of all unhallowed mortals. Using the rising flame and smoke of the incense burner in the center of the oratory to transmit the message borne by spirits exteriorized from within his own body, the libationer submitted petitions (chang) to the appropriate bureau of the three Taoist heavens (San-t'ien). The Taoist canon contains long lists of the "officials and generals" (kuan chiang), each specializing in a different sort of complaint, who would respectively pronounce on the appeal and marshal the celestial forces against the offending DEMONS.

Also effective were written talismans (fu), drawn by the libationer, these would be burned, and the ashes, mixed with water, were swallowed by the demons' victim. The libationer also functioned as a moral preceptor, instructing the faithful in the sect's own highly allegorical interpretation of the Lao-tzu, which they considered to be the revealed work of Lord Lao the Most High.

Chang Lu eventually came into conflict with Chang Hsiu and killed him. In 215 CE Chang Lu surrendered to the Han general Ts'ao Ts'ao, who rewarded him with high rank and a princely fief. Despite his surrender, it is with the T'ien-shih tao that the history of organized religious TAOISM may be said to begin, in that there has been an unbroken continuity from that time down to the present day.

T' IEN-T' AI \t'yen-'tī\, Japanese Tendai \t'en-,dī\, Korean Ch'ōnt'ae \ch'ōn-'te\, rationalist school of Buddhist thought that takes its name from the mountain in southeastern China where its founder and greatest exponent, CHIH-I, lived and taught in the 6th century. The chief SCRIPTURE of the school is the LOTUS SUTRA, and the school is thus also known as the Fa-hua (Japanese: Hokke), or Lotus, school.

The basic philosophical doctrine is summarized as the triple truth, or chikuan ("perfected comprehension"): (1) all things (DHARMAS) lack reality; (2) they, nevertheless, have a temporary existence; (3) they are simultaneously unreal and temporarily existing—being the middle, or absolute, truth, which includes and yet surpasses the others. Because existence is ever-changing, the phenomenal world is regarded as identical with the world as it really is.

The doctrine of the triple truth was first taught by Huiwen (550–577); but Chih-i, the third patriarch, is regarded as the founder of the school. Chih-i organized the whole of the Buddhist canon according to the supposition that all the doctrines were present in the mind of the BUDDHA GOTAMA at the time of his enlightenment but were unfolded gradually according to the mental capacities of his hearers. The Lotus Sutra was considered the supreme doctrine.

In 804 SAICHŌ, a Japanese monk, was sent to China expressly to study the T'ien-t'ai tradition. The inclusiveness of the T'ien-t'ai school, which arranged all Buddhist learning into one grand hierarchical scheme, was attractive to Saichō. On his return to Japan he attempted to incorporate ZEN meditation, vinaya discipline, and esoteric cults into T'ien-t'ai. The Tendai school, as it is called in Japanese, also encouraged an amalgamation of SHINTŌ and BUDDHISM in the Ichijitsu ("One Truth"), or Sannō Ichijitsu Shintō. Saichō's efforts to establish a Tendai ritual of ORDINATION in keeping with MAHĀYĀNA teachings and independent from the kaidan ("ordination center") at Nara bore results only after his death but was an important step in the Mahāyāna development in Japan.

After the death of Saichō, rivalry broke out between two factions of the school, which separated in the 9th century into the Sammon and the Jimon sects, headed by the two monks ENNIN and Enchin. A third branch, the Shinsei, emphasizes devotion to the Buddha Amida.

TIETÄJÄ \t'ye-ta-ya\, principal religious specialist of the Baltic Finns, functioning in the tradition of the Finno-Ugric SHAMAN.

As a shamanic specialist, the tietäjä's main task was to act as the community's first line of defense against hostile supernatural forces, whether they originated in the otherworld or with sorcerers and other evil-minded people. The term tietäjä literally means "knower," implying that as the specialist he knew more than ordinary humans about the nature of the supernatural world and of techniques for dealing with it. He could be called on to aid in almost any problem that was either not adequately understood or not amenable to correction by ordinary means. He was consulted mostly in matters of illness, but he also served as priest, diviner, judge, name giver, spokesman, and entertainer. The overall status of the tietäjä was higher in the agricultural society than that of the shaman in the hunting and fishing milieu because of his additional social influence and political power accruing from his multiple roles.

TIJĀNĪYA \tē-jā-'nē-ə\, especially exclusivist and proselytizing order of Sufi mystics widespread in northern and western Africa and the Sudan. Founded by Aḥmad at-Tijānī (1737–1815), formerly of the Khalwatī order, about 1781 in Fez, Morocco, it places great emphasis on good intentions and actions rather than on elaborate or extreme ritual. Unlike the QĀDIRĪYA and Sanūsīya orders, the Tijānīya did not conduct resistance activities against European colonization in north Africa during the 19th and 20th centuries. Under the leadership of al-Hajj 'UMAR TAL (d. 1864) of west Africa, however, they engaged in an expansionist JIHAD against unbelievers and Europeans until contained by the French and overcome by local enemies. See also SUFISM; ṬĀRIQA.

TILAK \tī-lək\, Sanskrit tilaka, in HINDUISM, mark generally made on the forehead, either as an ornament or to indicate one's sectarian affiliation. The marks are made by hand or with a metal stamp, using ash from a sacrificial fire, sandalwood paste, turmeric, cow dung, clay, charcoal, or red lead. Among some sects the mark is made on 2, 5, 12, or 32 parts of the body as well as on the forehead. Among Śaivas (see ŚAIVISM), the tilak is usually three horizontal parallel lines across the forehead, with or without a red dot. Sometimes a crescent moon or trident denotes a Śaiva. Among Vaiṣṇavas (see VAISNAVISM), the tilak generally involves a pattern of two or more vertical lines resembling the letter U and representing the footprint of VISHNU, with or without a central line or dot.

TILLICH, PAUL (JOHANNES) \tī-lik\, Angl -lik\ [b. Aug. 20, 1886, Starzeddel, Brandenburg, Ger.—d. Oct. 22, 1965, Chicago, Ill., U.S.], German-born American theologian and philosopher whose discussions of God and faith illuminated and bound together the realms of traditional CHRISTIAN-

ITY and modern culture. Some of his books, notably The Courage to Be (1952) and Dynamics of Faith (1957), reached a large public audience. The three-volume Systematic Theology (1951–63) was the culmination of his rigorous examination of faith.

The son of a theologically conservative father, Tillich was, however, taught the classical ideals of free thought and reason in German secondary schools. Indeed, the question of how to enjoy the freedom to explore life without sacrificing the essentials of a meaningful tradition was to appear as a major theme in Tillich's theological work: the relation of heteronomy to autonomy and their possible synthesis in theonomy. Heteronomy (alien rule) is the cultural and spiritual condition when traditional norms and values become rigid, external demands threatening to destroy individual freedom. Autonomy (self-rule) is the inevitable and justified revolt against such oppression, which nevertheless entails the temptation to reject all norms and values. Theonomy (divine rule) envisions a situation in which norms and values express the convictions and commitments of free individuals in a free society. These three conditions Tillich saw as the basic dynamisms of both personal and social life. His decisive encounter with the problem came during his theological studies at the University of Halle (1905–12), where he was forced to match the doctrinal position of the Lutheran Church, based on the established confessional documents, against the THEOLOGICAL LIBERALISM and scientific EMPIRICISM that dominated the academic scene in Germany at that time.

Ordained a Lutheran clergyman, Tillich served as a military CHAPLAIN during World War I. The war was a shattering experience to him as evidence of the bankruptcy of 19th-century humanism and the inadequacy of autonomy as sole guide. The chaotic situation in Germany after the armistice convinced him that Western civilization was nearing the end of an era. Tillich consequently joined the Religious-Socialist movement, whose members believed that the impending cultural breakdown was an opportunity for creative social reconstruction.

In most of Tillich's writings from this period, he was using the insight he had gained at Halle as a norm in analyses of religion and culture, the meaning of history, and contemporary social problems. Das System der Wissenschaften nach Gegenständen und Methoden (1923; "The System of the Sciences According to Their Subjects and Methods") was his first attempt to render a systematic account of man's spiritual endeavors from this point of view. As early as 1925 he was also at work on what was to become his major opus, Systematic Theology, 3 vol. (1951–63).

Tillich's passionate concern for freedom made him an early critic of Hitler and the Nazi movement, and in retaliation he was barred from German universities in 1933—the first non-Jewish academician "to be so honored," as he wryly put it. He joined the faculty at Union Theological Seminary in New York, and he emerged as an "apostle to the skeptics" during the years following World War II. At Union Seminary (1933–55), Harvard University (1955–62), and the University of Chicago (1962–65), he engaged in searching dialogue concerning the meaning of human existence. His public lectures and books reached large audiences; in such works as The Courage to Be and Dynamics of Faith, he argued that the deepest human concern drives us into confrontation with a reality that transcends our own finite existence. In these books Tillich shows a profound grasp of the problems brought to light by modern psychoanalysis and existentialist philosophy.

Systematic Theology is in five parts: questions about the powers and limits of human reason prepare one for answers given in revelation; questions about the nature of being lead to answers revealing God as the ground of being; questions about the meaning of existence are answered by the New Being made manifest in JESUS CHRIST; questions about the ambiguities of human experience point to answers revealing the presence of the HOLY SPIRIT in the life process; and questions about human destiny and the meaning of history find their answers in the vision of the KINGDOM OF GOD. Modern "Christian atheists" who cite Tillich in support of their "God is dead" claim overlook the fact that for Tillich the disappearance of an inadequate concept of God was the beginning of a grander vision of God.

In his last years Tillich expressed some doubts about the viability of any systematic account of man's spiritual quest. But he never abandoned the insight that all of man's cultural and spiritual life could be illuminated by the "Protestant principle" of JUSTIFICATION by faith; he was still working out its implications at his death in 1965. Tillich believed himself to be a "boundary man," standing between an old heritage imbued with a sense of the sacred and the new secular orientation of MODERNISM. He asserted that his vocation was to mediate between the concerns voiced by faith and the imperatives of a questioning reason, thus helping to heal the ruptures threatening to destroy Western civilization in the 20th century.

TINIA \ˈti-nē-ə\, also called Tin, or Tina, principal Etruscan deity, god of the thunderbolt, sky, and storm. Tina together with his wife Uni and Menerva (or Menrva, Roman MINERVA) formed the supreme triad of the Etruscan pantheon (see ETRUSCAN RELIGION).

TIPITAKA: see TRIPITAKA.

TIRESIAS \tī-ˈrē-sē-əs, -zē-\, in Greek mythology, a blind Theban seer. In the Odyssey he retained his prophetic gifts even in the Underworld, where the hero ODYSSEUS was sent by CIRCE to consult him. At Thebes he played an active part in the tragic events concerning Laius, the king of Thebes, and his son OEDIPUS. Later legend told that he lived for seven (or nine) generations, dying after the expedition of the SEVEN AGAINST THEBES, and that he had once been turned into a woman as the result of killing the female of two coupling snakes; on killing the male he regained his own sex. His blindness was variously explained. One theory was that it was a punishment for revealing the secrets of the gods, which he had learned from his mother, the NYMPH Chariclo. Another theory was that he had enraged HERA, who had contended to her husband, ZEUS, that women had less pleasure in sex than men, by telling her that sex gave women 10 times more pleasure than it gave men. Hera thereupon struck him blind, but Zeus gave him the gift of PROPHECY. A third explanation was that Tiresias was blinded by ATHENA because he had watched her undressing to bathe.

TIRMIDHĪ, AL- \āl-ˈtir-mi-ˌthē\, in full Abū ʿĪsā Muhammad ibn ʿĪsā ibn Sawra ibn Shaddād al-Tirmidhī (d. c. 892), Arab scholar and author of one of the six canonical collections of spoken traditions (HADITH) attributed to the Prophet MUHAMMAD.

Al-Tirmidhī journeyed to Khorāsān, to Iraq, and to the Hejaz in search of material for his collection and studied with such renowned scholars of Hadith as AHMAD IBN HANBAL, AL-BUKHĀRĪ, and Abū Dāʿūd al-Sijistāni.

His canonical collection al-jāmi' al-ṣaḥīḥ ("The Sound Collection") includes every spoken tradition that had ever been used to support a legal decision, as well as material relating to theological questions, to religious practice, and to popular belief and custom. Of special interest are his critical remarks on the links in the chains of transmission (ISNĀDS).

In the Kitāb al-sham'ā'il ("Book of Good Qualities"), al-Tirmidhī presented those Hadiths specifically commenting on the character and life of Muhammad.

TĪRTHA \ˈtir-tə\, in HINDUISM, a holy river, mountain, or other place made sacred through association with a deity or saint. Honored as the seven holiest Hindu cities are Kāśī (modern VARANASI, Uttar Pradesh), the center of SHIVA worship; AYODHYA (Oudh, in Uttar Pradesh), birthplace of RĀMA; Mathura (in Uttar Pradesh), scene of KRISHNA'S nativity; Dvaraka (in Gujarāt state), where the adult Krishna ruled as king; Kanchipuram (Tamil Nadu state), where the temple to the Goddess is built in the shape of a YANTRA; Hardwar (in Uttar Pradesh), the spot where the GAṄGĀ (Ganges) River is said to have come to Earth; and Ujjain (Madhya Pradesh), site of a famous Shiva LINGA.

The śakti-pīṭhās, or spots that mark where pieces of the body of Shiva's wife SATĪ fell to earth, are particularly sacred to the devotees of the Goddess ŚAKTI. The four great abodes of the gods, located at the four corners of India—Badrīnātha in the north, Dwārkā in the west, Rāmeswaram in the south, and Puri in the east—attract large numbers of pilgrims yearly. Hindus undertake PILGRIMAGE (called the tīrthayātrā) as an act of devotion, to carry out a vow, to appease a deity, or to seek prosperity. Upon reaching a tīrtha Hindus usually bathe (snāna), circumambulate the temple or holy place (pradakṣiṇā), make an offering, carry out a rite such as the ŚRĀDDHA ceremony that is performed in honor of dead ancestors, have their names recorded by priests, and listen to expositions of music and religious discourses.

TĪRTHAṆKARA \ˈtir-ˈtəŋ-kə-rə\ (Sanskrit: "Ford-Maker"), also called Jina \ˈji-nə\ ("Victor"), in JAINISM, a savior who has succeeded in crossing over life's stream of rebirths and has made a path for others to follow. MAHĀVĪRA (6th century BCE) was the last Tīrthaṅkara to appear. His predecessor, PĀRŚVANĀTHA, lived about 250 years earlier. According to Jain belief, each cosmic age produces its own group of 24 Tīrthaṅkaras, the first of whom—if it is an age of descending purity—are GIANTS, but they decrease in stature and appear after shorter intervals of time as the age proceeds.

The names of the 24 Tīrthaṅkaras are attributed to dreams by their mothers before their births or to some other circumstance surrounding their entry into the world. The word -NĀTHA, "lord," may be added as an honorific to their names. The first of the 24 Tīrthaṅkaras is Ṛṣab-hanātha, also known as Ādinātha, or the "First Lord." The last two Tīrthaṅkaras, Pārśvanātha and Vardhamāna, known later as Mahāvīra, "Great Hero," are the two for whom there is historical evidence. Malli, the 19th Tīrthaṅkara, is believed by the ŚVETĀMBARA sect to have been a woman, while the DIGAMBARAS maintain that Malli was male. Jain believers pay homage to images of the 24 Tīrthaṅkaras as representatives of great beings in the hope that they may be filled with a sense of renunciation and the highest virtues and thus encouraged along the path toward their final liberation.

TIRUPATI \ˈtir-ü-pə-tē\, city, southeastern Andhra Pradesh state, southern India. Tirupati is known as the abode of the Hindu god Veṅkaṭeśvara, Lord of Seven Hills, a form of VISHNU, and familiarly called Bālājī. About six miles northwest of Tirupati rises the sacred hill of Tirumala, attaining a height of 2,500 feet. It was considered so holy that before 1870 non-Hindus were not permitted to ascend it. At the hill's summit is the main temple dedicated to Veṅkaṭeśvara. This temple, nestled among sacred waterfalls and reservoirs, is a fine example of Dravidian art and is one of the wealthiest, most important PILGRIMAGE centers in India, attracting visitors from all parts of India and abroad, many of whom perform a characteristic rite of TONSURE to express their devotion to Śrī Veṅkaṭeśvara. Tradition associates the founding of the temple atop Tirumala with the 11th-century theologian RĀMĀNUJA, and the ŚRĪ VAISNAVA sectarian association there remains strong. The Tirupati-Tirumala temple complex supports Sri Venkateswara University, founded in 1954, and has in more recent years become active in providing funds to build Hindu temples outside of India.

TIRUPPAN \ˈtir-ü-pən\, also called Tiruppanalvar, one of the "later" or "minor" South Indian poet-saint devotees of VISHNU known as the Ālvārs. Very little is known about either the work or the life of Tiruppan. His name means "the saint who was a bard," and legend has it that Tiruppan was indeed a member of this group, which, by the 9th or 10th centuries, had become an "untouchable" CASTE.

A Tamil poem attributed to Tiruppan (the Amalan ati piran) in which the author reflects on his emotional response upon seeing a statue of Vishnu reclining in the temple of Srirangam received great attention among later poets and theologians in the ŚRĪ VAISNAVA tradition and apparently influenced some of the Sanskrit literature of that sect. The later tradition also elaborated the life story of the poet-saint. Born of low caste parents (or adopted by UNTOUCHABLES in another variant), Tiruppan was wholly dedicated to Vishnu and continually sang his praises. The principal event in the legend, however, depicts Tiruppan being barred from the temple by a Brahmin because of his low caste. Vishnu himself intervenes and commands the haughty Brahmin to carry the poet-saint into the temple on his shoulders. Such a tale perhaps reflects a real struggle that occurred between the Tamil hymnists and popular saints, on the one hand, and the Brahmin temple establishment on the other.

TISCHENDORF, KONSTANTIN VON \fōn-'ti-shən-'dōrf\, in full Lobegott Friedrich Konstantin von Tischendorf (b. Jan. 18, 1815, Lengefeld, Saxony [Germany]—d. Dec. 7, 1874, Leipzig), German biblical critic who made extensive and invaluable contributions to biblical textual criticism, famous for his discovery of the Codex Sinaiticus, a celebrated manuscript of the BIBLE.

In 1844 Tischendorf went as a student to the Middle East. While working in the library of the Monastery of St. Catherine in the Sinai Peninsula, he discovered, among some old parchments, leaves of what were among the oldest biblical manuscripts that he had ever seen. He took 43 of these leaves back with him to Leipzig, and in 1846 he published a facsimile edition. In 1859 Tischendorf returned to the monastery and procured for the tsar Alexander II what is now known as the Codex Sinaiticus for a sum that has been estimated at about $7,000. In 1933 the codex was purchased from the Soviet government by the British Museum. These manuscripts date probably from the latter half of the 4th century, were probably written in Egypt, and include most of the OLD TESTAMENT and the entire NEW TESTAMENT, as well as the Letter of Barnabas and part of the Shepherd of Hermas.

In numerous writings, Tischendorf presented the results of his work. His eighth edition of the Greek New Testament is considered to be of most value to contemporary textual critics.

TISHA BE-AV \tē-'shā-bə-'āv; 'ti-shə-'bōv, -bāv\, English Ninth of Av, in JUDAISM, traditional day of mourning for the destruction of the First and Second Temples (see TEMPLE OF JERUSALEM). According to the TALMUD and tradition, also occurring on Av 9 were the decree that the Jews would wander 40 years in the wilderness, the end of the second Jewish revolt against Rome in 135 CE, the establishment in 136 of a PAGAN temple in Jerusalem, and the expulsion of the Jews from Spain in 1492. A 24-hour fast is observed. The liturgy includes the reading of the Lamentations of Jeremiah, plus the recital of dirges (qinot) and certain passages from the OLD TESTAMENT. If Tisha be-Av falls on the SABBATH, the observance is postponed one day. Tisha be-Av marks the end of a period of mourning called the THREE WEEKS.

TISHTRYA \tish-trē-\, ancient Iranian god identified with the star Sirius. Tishtrya's principal myth involves a battle with a demonic star named APAUSHA ("Nonprosperity") over rainfall and water. In a combat that was reenacted in a yearly equestrian ritual, Tishtrya and Apausha, assuming the forms of a white stallion and a horse of horrible description, respectively, battle along the shores of the Varu-Karta sea. Initially Apausha is victorious, but after receiving worship Tishtrya conquers him, driving him away "along a path the length of a race course." At this point Tishtrya causes the cosmic sea to surge and boil, and then another star, Satavaisa (Fomalhaut), rises with the cloud-forming mists that are blown by the wind in the form of "rain and clouds and hail to the dwelling and the settlements (and) to the seven continents." As one of the stars "who contains the seeds of waters" (i.e., who cause rain), Tishtrya was also intimately connected with agriculture. He battled and defeated the shooting stars, identified as witches, especially one called "Bad Crop" (Duzhyarya). In ZOROASTRIANISM, Tishtrya was at some point, probably in late Achaemenian times, identified with the western Iranian astral deity, Tiri (MERCURY in Sasanian astronomy).

TITAN \tī-tən\, in Greek mythology, any of the children of OURANUS (Heaven) and GAEA (Earth) and their descendants. According to Hesiod's Theogony, there were 12 original Titans: the brothers OCEANUS, Coeus, Crius, Hyperion, Iapetus, and CRONUS and the sisters Thea, RHEA, THEMIS, MNEMOSYNE, PHOEBE, and Tethys. At the instigation of Gaea the Titans rebelled against their father, who had shut them up inside her body. Cronus deposed Ouranus by castrating him, and himself became king. But one of Cronus' sons, ZEUS, rebelled against his father, and a struggle then ensued between them in which most of the Titans sided with Cronus. Zeus and his brothers and sisters finally defeated the Titans after 10 years of fierce battles (the Titanomachia). The Titans were then imprisoned by Zeus in a cavity beneath Tartarus.

TITHE (from Old English teogotha, "10th"), custom dating back to OLD TESTAMENT times and adopted by the Christian church whereby lay people contributed a 10th of their income for religious purposes, often under ecclesiastical or legal obligation. The money (or its equivalent in crops, farm stock, etc.) was used to support the clergy, maintain churches, and assist the poor. Tithing was also a prime source of subsidy for the construction of many magnificent cathedrals in Europe.

Tithing became obligatory as CHRISTIANITY spread across Europe. It was enjoined by ecclesiastical law from the 6th century and enforced by secular law from the 8th century. In the 14th century Pope GREGORY VII, in an effort to control abuses, outlawed lay ownership of tithes.

Although MARTIN LUTHER approved in general of paying tithes to the temporal sovereign, following the Protestant REFORMATION opposition to the obligation grew. Tithes were repealed in France during the Revolution (1789), without compensation to tithe holders. Other countries abolished certain kinds of tithes and indemnified the holders. The late 19th century saw an end to tithes in Italy, Ireland, and Scotland, and in England by 1936. New methods of taxation were developed in those countries that provided financial support of the church out of government funds. Remnants of the tithing system do exist, however, in certain Protestant European countries. In Germany, for example, citizens must pay a church tax unless they formally renounce membership in a church.

The EASTERN ORTHODOX churches never accepted the idea of tithes, and Orthodox church members have never paid them, nor was tithe ever a legal requirement in the United States. Members of certain churches, however, including the Latter-day Saints and SEVENTH-DAY ADVENTISTS, are required to tithe, and some Christians in other churches do so voluntarily.

TITHONUS \tī-'thō-nəs, tī-\, in Greek mythology, son of LAOMEDON, king of Troy, and of Strymo, daughter of the river Scamander. EOS (Aurora) fell in love with Tithonus and took him to Ethiopia, where she bore Emathion and MEMNON. When Eos requested that ZEUS grant him eternal life the god consented to her request. However, Eos forgot to ask also for eternal youth, and as a result her husband grew astonishingly old. Eos shut him away in a room, but eventually the gods took pity on him, and he was transformed into a cicada.

TI-TS'ANG \ˈdē-ˈtsäj\ : see KŞITIGARBHA.

TJURUNGA \tyü-ˈrəŋ-gə, chü-, also spelled churinga \chü-ˈriŋ-gə\, in AUSTRALIAN ABORIGINAL RELIGION, ritual object that is a representation or manifestation of a mythical being of the Dream Time. An Aranda word, tjurunga traditionally referred to sacred things, such as rites, objects, BULL-ROARERS, paintings, and songs. The term is generally applied to flat, oval, worked stones, normally incised with sacred designs, and to wooden boards ranging in length from about 2 inches to 10 feet or so and bearing intricate patterns of mythological significance. Most tjurunga were used in men's rituals; some small objects figured in women's rituals and still smaller objects in men's love magic.

At initiation, boys are introduced to the rituals and tjurunga of their local descent group and to those of others. Later they receive their own tjurunga object and the knowledge that goes with it (or them). At death, the tjurunga is sometimes buried with the corpse, or the dead person's spirit might seek the place where its tjurunga "body" (that is, the mythic being itself) rested.

Tjurunga represent in essence the personalities of members of the local descent groups connected with them. They are a symbol of communication between humans and the mythological time called THE DREAMING, between humans and the mythic beings, and between the material aspects of ordinary living and the human spiritual heritage.

TLACHTLI \ˈtläch-tlē\, ball court used for the ritual BALL GAME played throughout PRE-COLUMBIAN MESO-AMERICA on a variety of courts. The word tlachtli is the Classical Nahuatl word for both the game and the court in which it was played. Possibly originating among the Olmecs (La Venta culture, c. 800–c. 400 BCE) or earlier, the game spread to subsequent cultures, among them those of Monte Albán and El Tajín; the Maya (as pok-ta-pok); and the Toltec, Mixtec, and Aztec. There are various myths, especially those in the Popul Vuh, that mention the ball game, sometimes as a contest between day and night deities. It is still played in isolated regions.

The court was shaped like a capital I with serifs and oriented north-south or east-west. Players used elbows, knees, and hips to knock a rubber ball into the opponent's end of the court; in post-Classic times (after c. 900 CE), the object was to hit the ball through one of two vertical stone rings (placed on each side of the court). A sacrificial cult was part of ball court ritual.

TLALOC \ˈtlä-lök\ (Nahuatl, probably from tlāl-, "earth," and -oc "[he] lies," hence literally, "He Who Lies on the Earth" or "He Who Rests on the Land"), Aztec rain god. Representations of a rain god wearing a peculiar mask, with large round eyes, a labial band, and long fangs, date at least to the Teotihuacán culture of the highlands (3rd to 8th century CE). His characteristic features were strikingly similar to those of the Maya rain god CHAC of the same period.

Tlaloc had been one of the main deities of the agricultural communities of central Mexico, when the northern tribes invaded and brought with them the astral cults of the sun (HUITZILOPOCHTLI) and the starry night sky (TEZCATLIPOCA). Aztec syncretism placed both Huitzilipochtli and Tlaloc at the head of the pantheon. The rain god's HIGH PRIEST, the Quetzalcóatl Tlaloc Tlamacazqui ("Feathered Serpent, Priest of Tlaloc") ruled with a title and rank equal to that of the sun god's high priest.

In the Aztec divinatory calendars, Tlaloc was the eighth ruler of the days and the ninth lord of the nights. Five months of the 18-month ritual year were dedicated to water deities and rain cults. Children were sacrificed to Tlaloc on the first month, Atlcaualo ("Water Absent"), and on the third, Tozoztontli ("The Small Vigil"). During the sixth month, Etzalqualiztli ("The Eating of Etzalli"), the rain priests ceremonially bathed in the lake; they imitated the cries of waterfowls and used magic "fog rattles" (ayauhchicauaztli) in order to obtain rain. The 13th month, Tepeilhuitl ("The Festival of the Mountains"), was dedicated to the mountain Tlaloque; small idols made of amaranth paste were ritually killed and eaten. A similar rite was held on the 16th month, Atemoztli ("Descent of the Water").

Tlaloc was not only highly revered, but he was also greatly feared. He could send out the rain, cause devastating storms, or provoke drought and hunger. Certain illnesses, such as dropsy, leprosy, and rheumatism, were said to be caused by Tlaloc and his fellow deities. Although the dead were generally cremated, those who had died from one of the special illnesses or who had drowned or who had been struck by lightning were buried. Tlaloc bestowed on them an eternal and blissful life in his paradise, Tlalocan.

Associated with Tlaloc was his companion CHALCHIUHTLICUE ("She Having a Skirt of Precious Green Stone"), also called Matlalcueye ("She Having a Green Skirt"), the goddess of freshwater lakes and streams. See PRE-COLUMBIAN MESO-AMERICAN RELIGIONS.

TLAZOLTÉOTL \,tlä-söl-'tä-ō-təl\ (Nahuatl: "Filth Deity"), also called Ixcuina, or Tlaelquani, Aztec goddess who represented sexual desire and misbehavior; she was probably introduced from the lowlands of Huasteca. Tlazoltéotl was an important and complex earth goddess who became patroness of adulterers and promiscuous women. She was known in four guises, associated with different stages of life. As a young woman, she was a carefree temptress. In her second form she was the destructive goddess of gambling and uncertainty. In her middle age she was the great goddess able to absorb human wrongdoing, and, in her final manifestation, she was a destructive and terrifying hag preying upon youths. Tlazoltéotl was thought to provoke sexual activity, but she could also forgive wrongdoers and removed corruption from the world by eating sexual filth. She was portrayed in an elaborate headdress of unspun cotton and carried a broom which was a symbol of filth and its removal.

TŌDAI TEMPLE \'tō-,dī\, Japanese Tōdai-ji \,tō-'dī-jē\ ("Great Eastern Temple"), monumental Japanese temple complex and center of the Kegon sect of Japanese BUDDHISM (see HUA-YEN), located in Nara. The main buildings were constructed between 745 and 752 CE under the emperor Shōmu and marked the adoption of Buddhism as a state religion. The temple was the largest and most powerful monastery in Japan during the Nara period (710–784). The original building was destroyed in 1180, and the present Daibutsu Hall, with its colossal bronze Buddha, dates from the early 18th century. It is the largest wooden building in the world. The 53-foot "Great Sun Buddha," or Roshana, was installed in 752 CE. The huge Shōsō House survives; it is the main repository for the temple's treasures, including 600 personal objects belonging to the emperor Shōmu and more than 9,000 works of fine and decorative art.

TOHORAH \,tō-hō-'rā\, in JUDAISM, the system of ritual purity practiced by ISRAEL. Purity (tohorah) and uncleanness (tum'ah) carry forward Pentateuchal commandments that Israel—whether eating, procreating, or worshipping God in the Temple—must avoid sources of contamination, the principal one of which is the corpse (Numbers 19). There are other prohibitions in addition to avoiding the presence of death. Leviticus 11 presents the catalog of foods that are clean or unclean; Israelites may eat of the former, but not the latter. Leviticus 12 goes over the uncleanness that results from childbirth; Leviticus 13–14 deal with a skin ailment (once identified with leprosy), that scripture deems analogous to the condition of the corpse; and Leviticus 15 covers the uncleanness of a woman in her menstrual period (a Niddah), a woman whose uncleanness is brought about by other excretions, and the uncleanness of a man brought about by analogous excretions. Leviticus also outlines lesser forms of uncleanness; e.g., that which results from seminal fluid.

All Israel was to follow the prohibitions on unclean food, and those forbidding sexual relations during a woman's menstrual period or when either partner was affected by the uncleanness of the sexual organs. In addition, Leviticus outlines several injunctions that apply only to the Temple priests and their families. Thus, when the priestly CASTE ate their rations of the crops set aside for them and their portion of the animal meat sacrificed at the altar, they were to do so in a condition of cultic cleanness. They accordingly immersed themselves in ritually "fit" immersion pools of water before eating. When ordinary people came to the Temple, they too observed the rules of cultic cleanness, and therefore the priestly prohibitions applied to all Israelites during the times of participation in the Temple cult. That consideration could affect many at the time of the PILGRIM FESTIVALS, i.e., PASSOVER, SHAVUOT, and SUKKOT. (It should be noted that before 70 CE some sects—the PHARISEES, the ESSENES, and those people represented by the law codes found in the DEAD SEA SCROLLS, for example—kept the rules of cultic purity in eating food even when at home. This practice, however, was not widespread.)

With the destruction of the second Temple and the de-emphasis in the importance of animal sacrifice and therefore also of the priestly caste, certain purificatory rituals could no longer be performed. One such instance is the ceremony of the RED HEIFER (Numbers 19.) This ceremony was meant to purify Israel of corpse uncleanness, and in its abeyance all Israel bears this impurity. But, even though after 70 CE, in the absence of the Temple, attaining cultic cleanness no longer pertained, uncleanness rules governing food and sexual relations continued to apply. An important distinction must be made, however, that in matters of public worship it was only in the Temple, not the SYNAGOGUE, that considerations of cleanness applied; thus, no one would refrain from attending or participating in synagogue worship by reason of having contracted uncleanness. In present day Judaism, rather, the biblical regulations regarding cultic purity are observed primarily in the case of menstrual uncleanness, which governs when sexual intercourse may take place, and the cleanness of hands, which always are ritually washed prior to meals. Through this latter ritual, observant Jews understand themselves to consume all food as though it were in the sanctified status of a Temple offering, so that their home table can be imagined as the Temple altar itself, a locus of the divine presence.

The MISHNAH greatly amplified the Pentateuchal definition of what is affected by uncleanness, how uncleanness is transmitted, and the way in which uncleanness is removed. The Mishnah's Division of Purities treats the interplay of persons, food, and liquids. Dry inanimate objects or food are not susceptible to uncleanness (Leviticus 11:34, 37). What is wet is susceptible. So liquids activate the system. What is unclean, moreover, emerges from uncleanness through the operation of liquids, specifically, through immersion in fit water that is of requisite volume and in natural condition. Liquids thus also deactivate the system. Therefore, water in its natural condition, not affected by human intervention, is what concludes the process by removing uncleanness. (See MIRVAH.)

The uncleanness of persons, furthermore, is also signified by body liquids (or flux) in most cases. (Additionally, the uncleanness that comes from contact with a corpse is conceived to be a kind of effluent, a viscous gas, but is thought to flow like a liquid; Mishnah tractate Ohalot.) Utensils for their part only receive uncleanness when they form receptacles that are able to contain liquid (Mishnah Tractate Kelim). So the invisible flow of fluidlike substances or powers transmits uncleanness and the visible fluid of fit water purifies.

Some of these prohibitions may have been borrowed by Israel from other cultures, and they no doubt had a multiplicity of meanings. In Judaism as it has evolved, however, what is unclean has come to be perceived as abnormal and disruptive of the economy of nature, and what is clean is normal and constitutive of the economy and the wholeness of nature. What is unclean is restored to a condition of cleanness through the activity of nature alone (e.g., naturally flowing water that has collected in sufficient volume to afford immersion). Procreation and sustenance of life define what is at stake in the condition of cleanness, en route to the state of sanctification, as in the hierarchical statement by RABBI Phineas ben Yair in the Mishnah tractate Sotah 9:15: Rabbi Yair says, "Heedfulness leads to cleanliness, cleanliness leads to cleanness, cleanness leads to abstinence, abstinence leads to holiness, holiness leads to modesty, modesty leads to the fear of SIN, the fear of sin leads to piety, piety leads to the Holy Spirit, the Holy Spirit leads to the RESURRECTION of the dead, and the resurrection of the dead comes through ELIJAH, blessed be his memory, AMEN."

TOHOROT \tō-hō-rōt\ (Hebrew: "Purifications"), last of the six major divisions, or orders (SEDARIM), of the MISHNAH. Tohorot consists of 12 tractates that deal with ritual impurity and rites of purification: Kelim ("Vessels"), Ohalot ("Tents"), Nega'im ("Plagues"), Para ("Cow"), Tohorot ("Purifications"), Miqwa'ot ("Ritual Baths"), Nidda ("A Menstruous Woman"), Makhshirin ("Predisposers"), Zavim ("Those with Unclean Discharges"), Ṭevul yom ("Daytime Bathers"), Yadayim ("Hands"), and Uqtzin ("Stalks"). The Talmuds YERUSHALMI and BAVLI both have GEMARA on Nidda but on none of the other tractates.

TOLLAN \tōl-län\, also called Tula \t'ü-lä\, ancient capital of the Toltecs in Mexico; it was primarily important from about 900 CE to about 1200. Although its exact location is not certain, an archaeological site near the contemporary town of Tula in Hidalgo state has been the persistent choice of historians. Some scholars, however, believe it more likely to be the site of Teotihuacán near Mexico City.

The archaeological remains near contemporary Tula are concentrated in two clusters at opposite ends of a low ridge. The original urban area covered at least three square miles and the town probably had a population in the tens of thousands. The major civic center consists of a large plaza bordered on one side by a five-stepped temple PYRAMID, which was probably dedicated to the god Quetzalcóatl. The sides of the five terraces were covered with painted and sculptured friezes of marching felines and canines, birds of prey devouring human hearts, and human faces extending from the jaws of serpents. A stairway on the south side led to a highly ornamented temple at the summit.

Other structures include a palace complex, two other temple pyramids, and two courts for the ceremonial BALL GAME. Separated from the main temple pyramid by a narrow alley are the partial remains of what may have been the palace of the ruler of Tollan, the excavated portions of which consist of three great halls. In general, the art and architecture of Tollan show a striking similarity to that of Tenochtitlán, the Aztec capital, and the artistic themes indicate a close approximation in religious ideology and behavior. Many scholars believe that the Aztecs' concept of themselves as warrior-priests of the sun god was directly borrowed from the people of Tollan.

TOMB, in the strictest sense, home or house for the dead; the term is applied loosely to all kinds of graves, funerary monuments, and memorials. In many cultures the dead were buried in their own houses, and the tomb form may have developed out of this practice, as a reproduction in permanent materials of primeval house types. Thus prehistoric tomb BARROWS were usually built around a round hut in which the body was placed. Later, brick and stone tombs appeared, often of great size, but still preserving primitive house forms.

In many cultures and civilizations the tomb was superseded by, or coexisted with, monuments or memorials to the dead; sometimes, as in ancient Greece, the bodies were burned and the ashes put in funerary urns. In medieval Christian thought, the tomb was considered an earthly prototype and symbol of a heavenly home. This concept appeared in the Roman CATACOMBS, the walls of which were decorated with scenes of the resurrected in paradise. The church building itself sometimes functioned as a tomb (e.g., HAGIA SOPHIA in Istanbul was the tomb of the emperor Justinian). Since the Renaissance, the idea of the tomb as a home has died out, except as a faint reminiscence in the mausoleums sometimes erected above graves or serving as burial vaults in modern cemeteries. TOMINAGA NAKAMOTO \tō-mē-'nä-gä-nä-'kä-mō-tō\ (b. 1715—d. 1746), Japanese Neo-Confucian scholar who is famous for his theory of the development of CONFUCIANISM, BUDDHISM, and SHINTŌ. His was a critical and historical approach to these traditions that anticipated the introduction of Western methods of interpretation in the 19th century.

TONALPOHUALLI \tō-näl-pō-'wäl-lē\ (Nahuatl: "Count of Days"), 260-day sacred almanac of many ancient Meso-American cultures, including the Maya, Zapotec, and Aztec, which set the date for rituals and was a means of DIVINATION. It is a cycle of days resulting when the numbers 1 to 13 are juxtaposed with 20 day names: 1 Alligator, 2 Wind . . . 13 Reed, 1 Jaguar, etc. Each combination of name and number occurs once in 260 (20 × 13) days. The cycle is still observed by the Mixe (Oaxaca) and the Maya, among others.

TONATIUH \tō-'nä-tē-ü\ (Nahuatl: "the Sun"), in Meso-American religion, Nahua sun deity of the fifth and final era (the Fifth Sun). In most myths of the Nahua peoples, including those of the Aztecs, there were four eras that preceded the era of Tonatiuh, each of which ended by cataclysmic destruction.

mic destruction. Tonatiuh was associated with the eagle (at sunrise and sunset) and, in Aztec versions, with the deity HUITZILOPOCHTLI.

Tonatiuh was constantly threatened by the immense effort of making his journey across the sky each day. The worship of Tonatiuh, whose sustenance required human blood and hearts, involved militaristic cults and frequent HUMAN SACRIFICE to ensure perpetuation of the world.

Tonatiuh is best known as he is depicted in the center of the Aztec calendar, with his eagle's claw hands clutching human hearts.

TONGUES, SPEAKING IN, also called glossolalia (from Greek glōssa, "tongue," and lalia, "talk, chatter"), utterances approximating words and speech, usually produced during states of intense religious excitement. According to religious interpretations of the phenomenon, the speaker is possessed by a supernatural spirit, is in conversation with divine beings, or is the channel of a divine proclamation. Glossolalia occurred in some of the ancient GREEK RELIGIONS and in various primitive religions. There are references to ecstatic speech in the OLD TESTAMENT (1 Samuel 10:5–13, 19:18–24; 2 Samuel 6:13–17; 1 Kings 20:35–37), and in CHRISTIANITY it has occurred periodically since the beginning of the church.

Glossolalia first occurred among the followers of Jesus at PENTECOST when "they were all filled with the HOLY SPIRIT and began to speak in other tongues, as the Spirit gave them utterance" (Acts 2:4). The apostle PAUL referred to it as a spiritual gift (1 Corinthians 12–14) and claimed that he possessed exceptional ability in that gift (1 Corinthians 14:18). The account in Acts (4:31, 8:14–17, 10:44–48, 11:15–17, 19:1–7) indicates that in the beginning of the Christian church the phenomenon reappeared wherever conversion and commitment to Christianity occurred.

The greatest emphasis upon the gift in the early church was made by followers of the 2nd-century prophet MONTANUS. His EXCOMMUNICATION in about 177 and the later decline of the sect probably contributed to a climate of opinion unfavorable to speaking in tongues, and the practice declined.

During later church history, glossolalia occurred in various groups. In modern times, it occurred during various Protestant revivals in the United States in the early 20th century. These revivals resulted in the establishment of many Pentecostal churches, which in the late 20th century had more than 8,000,000 members. During the 20th century speaking in tongues also occurred occasionally in some of the older Christian churches as part of the charismatic movement.

TONSURE, in various religions, ceremony of initiation in which hair is clipped from the head as part of the ritual marking one's entrance into a new stage of religious development or activity.

Tonsure has been used in both the ROMAN CATHOLIC and the EASTERN ORTHODOX churches on occasions of solemn personal dedication to God. Until it was abolished by Pope Paul VI (effective in 1973), tonsure was the ceremony by which a man was initiated into the clerical state and became eligible for ORDINATION to the PRIESTHOOD. Early Christian ascetics may have imitated similar religious practices among the ancient Greeks and Semites.

In BUDDHISM tonsure is performed as a part of the ceremony of ordination as a novice (pravrajyā ceremony) and as a monk (upasampadā ceremony). Thereafter, the monk keeps his head and face clean-shaven. Jain monks also cut their hair as a sign of renouncing the worldly life—traditionally, by plucking out the hairs one by one (see JAINISM). Both Jain and Buddhist customs are theoretically in imitation of their teachers MAHĀVĪRA and the BUDDHA GOTAMA, who cut off their hair upon embarking on the spiritual life.

In HINDUISM the first tonsure undergone by a young boy (the ceremony of cūḍākaraṇa) is one of the saṃskāras, or personal SACRAMENTS, that mark the boy's transition from an infant to a child. It is usually performed when the boy is about two years old. The Hindu tonsure leaves a tuft of hair (the cūḍa) at the crown of the head. Tonsure formerly marked other Hindu RITES OF PASSAGE, such as the putting on of the sacred thread or the change of ritual status incurred by the death of the father (customs now largely observed only symbolically). Full tonsure is performed as part of the initiation rite into most Hindu ascetic orders.

TORAH \tō-'rā, 'tō-rə, 'tōr-ə\, with the Prophets (Nebi'im) and the Writings (Ketubim), one of the three parts of the Hebrew SCRIPTURES. The Torah is composed of the books of GENESIS, EXODUS, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy and has a written and an oral part. Both parts are held to represent God's statement of his will and plan for the world, but while the former is read as a verbatim record of God's word of his will, the latter, as written down in the sayings of the great sages, is not represented as a verbatim record, since much that is deemed part of the Torah is assigned to named sages, upward to MOSES himself. In the theology of JUDAISM, ISRAEL meets God in the Torah, and it is through study of the Torah with the sage that the encounter takes place.

Jewish tradition states that the nations of the world were offered the Torah but declined; only Israel accepted. The main points of insistence of the whole of Israel's life and history come to full symbolic expression in that single word: Torah. Torah stood for salvation and accounted for Israel's this-worldly condition and the hope, for individual and nation alike, of life in the world-to-come.

TORII \tō-'rē-ē, Angl 'tōr-ē-ē, 'tōr-ē, 'tōr-\ (Japanese: "bird perch"), symbolic gateway marking the entrance to the sacred precincts of a SHINTŌ shrine in Japan. The torii characteristically consists of two cylindrical vertical posts topped by a crosswise rectangular beam extending beyond the posts on either side and a second crosswise beam a short distance below. The torii, often painted bright red, demarcates the boundary between sacred space of the shrine and ordinary space. Torii also identify other sacred places, such as a mountain or rock.

TOSAFOT \tō-sā-'fōt\ (Hebrew: "additions"), also spelled tosaphoth, critical remarks and notes on passages of the TALMUD that were written by Jewish scholars in Germany, Italy, and especially France during the 12th to 14th centuries. Tosafot may have been meant to be commentaries on the MISHNAH and the GEMARA or supplements to systematic commentary by RASHI on the BAVLI.

The first tosafists (ba'ale ha-tosafot) were Meir ben Samuel and Judah ben Nathan, two of Rashi's sons-in-law who lived in northern France. The most highly regarded tosafist, however, was Rabbeno Tam (JACOB BEN MEIR TAM), Rashi's grandson. All editions of the Bavli (since its first printing in Venice, 1520–23) carry Rashi's commentaries on the inside margin of the page, with the tosafot located on the outside margin. This arrangement, however, is not followed in some modern editions in translation.

TOSEFTA \tō-sef-'tä, tō-'sef-tə\ (Aramaic: "Supplement," or "Addition"), supplements to the MISHNAH, c. 300 CE. As a compilation of laws assigned to the names of authorities called tannaim (repeaters of legal traditions) who occur also in the Mishnah, the Tosefta generally depends upon and follows the topical program and organization of the Mishnah. Approximately a third of its statements cite and gloss a passage of the Mishnah; a sixth is completely independent of the law of the Mishnah on a topic treated by the Mishnah; and about half respond to and amplify rules of the Mishnah and can be fully understood only in the context of the Mishnah's laws.

The Tosefta arranges its materials in this order: (1) Mishnah-citation and gloss; (2) secondary amplification of the Mishnah's laws; (3) free-standing rules of its own. Some passages of the Tosefta generalize upon cases put forth in the Mishnah, with a more comprehensive picture of matters. Others recast the law of the Mishnah, reframing issues under debate in the Mishnah in secondary and more refined terms than those of the Mishnah. In some cases, the premises of the rule of the Tosefta are logically prior to those of the Mishnah. It follows, in those instances, that the formulation of the Mishnah's law or problem builds upon that of the Tosefta's counterpart. Seen whole, the Tosefta serves as the Mishnah's first commentary, but with the proviso that it contains some passages autonomous of the Mishnah and others logically antecedent to the Mishnah's counterparts.

TOTEMISM \tō-tə-'mi-zəm\, complex of ideas and practices based on the belief in KINSHIP or a mystical relationship between humans and natural objects, such as animals and plants. The term totem derives from the Ojibwa (Algonquian Indian) word ototeman, signifying a brother-sister blood relationship. Totemism refers to a wide variety of relationships, including the reverential and genealogical, between social groups or individual persons and animals or other natural objects, the so-called totems.

In its strictest sense, totemism is restricted to the association of a group of persons with the totem object. A society may be said to exhibit totemism if it is divided into an identifiable and apparently fixed number of clans, each of which has a specific relationship to an animate or inanimate species (totem); if a member of such a clan ordinarily cannot change his membership, and if people living in the same locality belong to different totemic clans. A totem may be a feared, emulated, or dangerous hunted animal; an edible plant; or any staple food. Very commonly connected with origin legends and with instituted morality, the totem is generally associated with strict rules of avoidance or ritualized contact. Membership in the totemic group is in some sense inherited and lifelong, regulating relationships of the child to his or her blood kin, and designating families that provide acceptable partners for procreation. Totem, ritual prohibitions, and exogamy (marriage outside the group) are in these societies inextricably intertwined.

John Ferguson McLennan wrote the first significant theoretical treatment of totemism in his study "The Worship of Animals and Plants" (1869). Totemism attracted wide attention during the flowering of sociology and cultural anthropology in the first decades of the 20th century. The most incisive critique, one that denied the reality of totemism, was supplied by the French ethnologist Claude Lévi-Strauss in Totemism (1963). Later, in The Savage Mind (1966), Lévi-Strauss compared the idea of totemism with his "science of the concrete."

TOTEM POLE, carved and painted log, mounted vertically, constructed by the Native Americans of the northwest coast of the United States and Canada. There are seven principal kinds of totem pole: memorial, or heraldic, poles, erected when a house changes hands to commemorate the past owner and to identify the present one; grave markers (tombstones); house posts, which support the roof; portal poles, which have a hole through which a person enters the house; welcoming poles, placed at the edge of a body of water to identify the owner of the waterfront; mortuary poles, in which the remains of the deceased are placed; and ridicule poles, on which an important individual who had failed in some way had his likeness carved upside down.

The carving on totem poles separates and emphasizes the flat, painted surfaces of the symbolic animals and spirits depicted on them. Each pole generally has from one (as with a grave marker) to many (as with a family legend) animal images on it.

The significance of the real or mythological animal carved on a totem pole is its identification with the lineage of the head of the household, as the animal is displayed as a type of family crest. More widely known, but in fact far less common, are the elaborately carved tall totem poles that relate an entire family legend in the form of a pictograph. Each animal or spirit carved on the pole has meaning, and when combined on the pole in sequence, each figure is an important symbol constituent of a story or myth.

TRADITION, patterns of belief and practice, usually identified with the mythic actions of superhuman beings, that have been inherited, transmitted, or established from generation to generation. Tradition is usually set in opposition to modernity and SECULARISM, while the secular world is often held to be clearly in opposition to the religious world, as monks (the religious) are opposed to the laity (the secular or worldly.) The term "traditional" is also used in place of "primitive" when speaking of religions that do not share a written history.

TRANSCENDENTAL MEDITATION (TM), movement founded by the MAHARISHI MAHESH YOGI that was popular in the West during the 1960s. TM is based more on the practice of specific techniques of meditation than on a set of religious or philosophical beliefs. As a monk in India in the 1940s and '50s the Maharishi developed a form of meditation that could be easily practiced by people in the modern world. In 1958 he began teaching it in India, and in 1959 he made his first tour of the West.

Transcendental Meditation uses one of a variety of Sanskrit MANTRAS, each of which is a short word or phrase that, repeated in the mind, helps the user still the activity of thought and find a deeper level of consciousness. Through this process it is claimed that the practitioner finds deep relaxation, which leads to enhanced inner joy, vitality, and creativity. The perspective behind TM, based on VEDĀNTA philosophy, is called the Science of Creative Intelligence.

TRANSFIGURATION, FEAST OF THE, in CHRISTIANITY, commemoration of the occasion upon which JESUS CHRIST took three of his disciples, PETER, JAMES, and JOHN, up on Mount Tabor, where MOSES and ELIJAH appeared and Jesus was transfigured, his face and clothes becoming white and shining as light (Mark 9:2–13; Matthew 17:1–13; Luke 9:28–36). The festival celebrates the revelation of the eternal glory of the Second Person of the TRINITY, which was normally veiled during his life on earth.

It is not known when the festival was first celebrated, but it was kept in Jerusalem as early as the 7th century and in most parts of the Byzantine Empire by the 9th century. It was gradually introduced into the Western church, and its observance was fixed as August 6.

TRANSUBSTANTIATION, in CHRISTIANITY, change by which the substance (though not the appearance) of the bread and wine in the EUCCHARIST becomes Christ's Real Presence—that is, his body and blood. In ROMAN CATHOLICISM and some other Christian churches the doctrine—which was first called transubstantiation in the 12th century—aims at safeguarding the literal truth of Christ's Presence while emphasizing the fact that there is no change in the empirical appearances of the bread and wine.

The doctrine of transubstantiation was incorporated into the documents of the fourth LATERAN COUNCIL (1215) and of the COUNCIL OF TRENT (1545–63). In the mid-20th century some Roman Catholic theologians shifted the emphasis from a change of substance to a change of meaning and coined the terms transsignification and transfinalization to be used in preference to transubstantiation. In his *ENCYCLICAL *Mysterium fidei in 1965, however, Pope Paul VI called for a retention of the dogma of transubstantiation together with the terminology in which it has been expressed.

TRAPPIST, member of the Order of the Reformed Cistercians of the Strict Observance (O.C.S.O.), a branch of the Roman Catholic CISTERCIANS, founded by the converted courtier Armand de Rancé (1626–1700), who had governed the Cistercian abbey of La Trappe in France, which he transformed (1662) into a community practicing extreme austerity of diet, penitential exercises, and absolute silence. He became its regular ABBOT in 1664 and remained so for more than 30 years.

In 1792 the monks were ejected from La Trappe, and a number of them, led by Dom Augustine de Lestrange, settled at Fribourg, Switz., where they made several foundations before their expulsion in 1798. A period in Russia and Germany was followed in 1814 by a return to La Trappe; they were the first religious order to revive after the French Revolution. By the late 20th century there were abbeys worldwide. The three existing congregations of Trappists were united by Pope LEO XIII as the independent Reformed Cistercians of the Strict Observance.

TRENT, COUNCIL OF \ˈtrɛnt\, 19th ecumenical council of the ROMAN CATHOLIC church (1545–63), highly important for its sweeping decrees on self-reform and for its dogmatic definitions that clarified virtually every doctrine contested by the Protestants. Despite internal strife, external dangers, and two lengthy interruptions, the council played a vital role in revitalizing the Roman Catholic church in many parts of Europe.

Though Germany demanded a general council following the EXCOMMUNICATION of the German REFORMATION leader MARTIN LUTHER, Pope Clement VII held back for fear of renewed attacks on his supremacy. France, too, preferred inaction, afraid of increasing German power. Clement's successor, Paul III, however, was convinced that Christian unity and effective church reform could come only through a council. After his first attempts were frustrated, he convoked a council at Trent (northern Italy), which opened on Dec. 13, 1545.

Period I (1545–47): Initially the council laid the groundwork for future declarations: the Niceno-Constantinopolitan Creed was accepted as the basis of Catholic faith; the canon of OLD TESTAMENT and NEW TESTAMENT books was definitely fixed; tradition was accepted as a source of faith; the Latin VULGATE was declared adequate for doctrinal proofs; the number of SACRAMENTS was fixed at seven; and the nature and consequences of ORIGINAL SIN were defined. After months of intense debate, the council ruled against Luther's doctrine of JUSTIFICATION by faith alone: man, the council said, was inwardly justified by cooperating with divine GRACE that God bestows gratuitously. By enjoining on bishops an obligation to reside in their respective sees, the church effectively abolished plurality of bishoprics. Political problems forced the council's transfer to Bologna and finally interrupted its work altogether.

Period II (1551–52): Before military events forced a second adjournment of the council, the delegates finished an important decree on the EUCHARIST that defined the Real Presence of Christ in opposition to the interpretation of HULDRYCH ZWINGLI, the Swiss Reformation leader, and the doctrine of TRANSUBSTANTIATION as opposed to that of Luther. The sacrament of penance was extensively defined, extreme unction (anointing of the sick) explained, and decrees issued on episcopal jurisdiction and clerical discipline.

Period III (1562–63): Pope Paul IV (1555–59) was opposed to the council, but it was reinstated by Pius IV (1559–65). The council defined that Christ is entirely present in both the consecrated bread and the consecrated wine in the Eucharist but left to the pope the practical decision of whether or not the CHALICE should be granted to the laity. It defined the MASS as a true sacrifice; issued doctrinal statements on holy orders, matrimony, PURGATORY, INDULGENCES, and the veneration of saints, images, and relics; and enacted reform decrees on clerical morals and the establishment of seminaries.

By the end of the 16th century, many of the abuses that had motivated the Protestant Reformation had disappeared, and Roman Catholicism had reclaimed many of its followers in Europe. The council, however, failed to heal the SCHISM that had sundered the Western Christian church.

TREPANNING, also spelled trephining, practice of making a hole, one to two inches across, in the skull of a human, perhaps as a primitive method of providing disease with a means of escape. Trepanned skulls of prehistoric date have been found in Britain, France, and other parts of Europe and in Peru. Many of them show evidence of healing and, presumably, of the patient's survival. The practice still exists among people in parts of Algeria and in Melanesia, though it is fast becoming extinct in those places. Some New Age religionists, however, were practicing trepanning in the late 1990s.

TRICKSTER TALE, in ORAL TRADITIONS worldwide, anecdote of deceit and violence perpetrated by an animal-human with special powers. Usually grouped in cycles, these tales feature a trickster-hero who within a single society may be regarded as creator god and innocent fool, evil destroyer and childlike prankster.

Trickster stories may be told in a variety of situations ranging from pure amusement and entertainment to serious, sacred occasions. A single tale may be told or the narrative may be a complex series of interrelated incidents. The characteristic trickster tale is in the form of a picaresque adventure: the trickster was "going along"; he encountered a situation to which he responded by knavery or stupidity; he met a violent or ludicrous end; and then the next incident is told. Frequently, he is accompanied by an animal companion who either serves as a stooge or tricks the trickster.

Coyote, the trickster of Native American tales from California, the Southwest, and the plateau region, is perhaps the most widely known. In the Pacific Northwest the trickster is the Raven, Mink, or Blue Jay—each of whom is also viewed as a transformer figure, responsible for bringing the ordered world out of CHAOS, and a cultural hero, credited with transmitting the skills of survival, such as fire making, from the gods to humans. Wisakedjak, anglicized to Whiskey Jack, is a cultural hero trickster of the Eastern Woodlands. Another is Nanabozho (the Hare), who in the Southeast is called Rabbit and who became identified with the African Hare trickster as Brer Rabbit. South American tricksters include Fox of the Chaco people, who is always bested, and the Twins of the Amazon region, one of whom plays tricks that end badly and are then repaired by the other, a cultural hero.

In East, Central, and southern Africa and the western Sudan, the trickster is the Hare. In West Africa the Spider (Ghana, Liberia, and Sierra Leone) or the Tortoise (the Igbo and Yoruba people of Nigeria) is the trickster. Many African tribes also have tales about human tricksters (e.g., the stories of Yo in Benin). In most African cycles the trickster is smaller in stature and strength than his opponents but much more clever and always well in control of the situation. He is ruthless, greedy, and a glutton and often outwits his opponent through a calculating suaveness combined with sheer lack of scruples. Although in an occasional cycle the trickster is an admirable figure, in most cases any good that results from his actions is inadvertent. In other African tales, particularly those of the spider Anansi, the trickster often appears as a rival of the sky god who steals the Sun or tricks him in one way or another. In this function he shows some similarity to the Yoruba trickster god Eshu, who constantly opposes the other gods and thwarts their intentions.

TRIKAYA \tri-'kă-yə\ (Sanskrit: "three bodies"), in MAHĀYĀNA Buddhism, concept of the three bodies, or modes of being, of the buddha: the dharmakaya (body of essence), the unmanifested mode, and the supreme state of absolute knowledge; the sambhogakaya (body of enjoyment), the heavenly mode; and the nirmanakaya (body of transformation), the earthly mode, the buddha as he appeared on earth or manifested himself in an earthly BODHISATTVA, an earthly king, a painting, or a natural object, such as a lotus. The concept applies not only to the BUDDHA GOTAMA but to all other buddhas as well.

TRIMŪRTI \tri-'mūr-tē\ (Sanskrit: "three forms"), in HINDUISM, triad of the three great gods, BRAHMĀ, VISHNU, and SHIVA. Scholars consider the trimūrti doctrine an attempt to reconcile different monotheistic approaches with one another and with the philosophic doctrine of ultimate reality [BRAHMAN]. The doctrine was given classical expression in Kālidāsa's poem Kumārasambhava (c. 4th–5th century CE). In trimūrti symbolism, the three gods are collapsed into a single form with three faces. Each god is in charge of one aspect of creation, with Brahmā as creator, Vishnu as preserver, and Shiva as destroyer.

TRINITY, in Christian doctrine, the unity of Father, Son, and HOLY SPIRIT as three persons in one God-head.

Neither the word Trinity nor the explicit doctrine appears in the NEW TESTAMENT, nor did JESUS and his followers intend to contradict the SHEMA in the OLD TESTAMENT: "Hear, O Israel: The Lord our God is one Lord" (Deuteronomy 6:4). The earliest Christians, however, had to cope with the implications of the coming of Jesus Christ and of the presumed presence and power of God among them—i.e., the Holy Spirit, whose coming was connected with the celebration of the PENTECOST. The Father, Son, and Holy Spirit were associated in such New Testament passages as Matthew 28:19 and 2 Corinthians 13:14, and thus it established the basis for the doctrine of the Trinity.

The doctrine developed gradually over several centuries and through many controversies. The COUNCIL OF NICAEA in 325 stated the crucial formula for that doctrine in its CONFESSION that the Son is "of the same substance [homoousios] as the Father," even though it said very little about the Holy Spirit. Over the succeeding half century, ATHANASIUS both defended and refined the Nicene formula, and, by the end of the 4th century, under the leadership of BASIL of Caesarea, GREGORY OF NYSSA, and GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS (the Cappadocian Fathers), the doctrine of the Trinity had taken substantially the form it has maintained ever since. See also INCARNATION.

TRIPITĀKA \tri-'pi-tə-kə\ (Sanskrit: "Triple Basket"), Pāli Tiṭṭhaka \ti-\, total canon of the southern schools of BUDDHISM, pejoratively dubbed HĪNAYĀNA ("Lesser Vehicle") by the self-styled MAHĀYĀNA ("Great Vehicle") schools. The collections that constitute this southern canon were nearly all compiled in South Asia within 500 years of the time of the Buddha (between about 500 BCE and the beginning of the Common Era). They appeared in two languages—in Pāli within the THERAVĀDA school and in Sanskrit among the SARVĀSTIVĀDA, MAHĀSANGHIKA, and other schools that did not survive the demise of Buddhism in India. The collection that has been best preserved is the Pāli version that remains authoritative for contemporary Theravadins.

Each school's canonical collection differed. There was more agreement on the first two sections, the VINAYA PĪṬAKA and the SUTTA PĪṬAKA than on the third, the ABHIDHAMMA PĪṬAKA. The first of the three, which is also the earliest and smallest, provides for the regulation of monastic life. The second and largest contains the sermons and doctrinal and ethical discourses attributed to the BUDDHA GOTAMA or, in a few cases, to his disciples. The Abhidhamma Piṭaka, which was absent in some schools and had quite different contents in its different versions, is basically a schematization of doctrinal material from the suttas. In the northern schools of Buddhism, particularly those of eastern Asia, the term Tripitaka was sometimes used to refer to collections of texts that were considered to be "canonical" or authoritative. The Tripitaka in this extended sense contained a great variety of texts that included, as a small component, translations of segments of the early Hīnayāna texts.

TRIRATNA \trē-'rət-nə\ (Sanskrit: "three jewels"), Pāli tiratana, the three components of the Buddhist and Jain creeds. In BUDDHISM the triratna comprises the BUDDHA, the DHARMA (doctrine, or law), and the SANGHA (the monastic order, or community of believers). From the time of the Buddha, initiation into the order has consisted of the formal recognition of the trinity in the words "I go to the Buddha for refuge, I go to the Doctrine for refuge, I go to the Order for refuge." In JAINISM the three jewels (also referred to as ratnatraya) are understood as samyagdarśana ("right faith"), samyagjñāna ("right knowledge"), and samyakcāritra ("right conduct"). One of the three cannot exist exclusive of the others, and all are required for spiritual liberation. The triratna is symbolized frequently in art as a trident.

TRITON \'trī-tən\, in Greek mythology, DEMIGOD of the sea; he was the son of POSEIDON and AMPHITRITE. According to Hesiod, Triton dwelt with his parents in a golden palace in the depths of the sea. Some traditions stated that there were many Tritons. He was represented as human down to his waist, with the tail of a fish. Triton's special attribute was a twisted seashell, on which he blew to calm or raise the waves.

TROELTSCH, ERNST \'trœlch\ (b. Feb. 17, 1865, Haunstetten, near Augsburg, Bavaria—d. Feb. 1, 1923, Berlin), German scholar of considerable influence on younger theologians of his time for his insistence that the church reexamine its claims to absolute truth.

Troeltsch's father, a medical practitioner, early instilled in his son a passion for scientific observation and led him to see problems of history and civilization within a framework of the development of the sciences. Troeltsch decided to study theology because, according to an autobiographical sketch, this seemed to him at that time the only study in which his historical, philosophical, and social interests could meet in the investigation of a worthwhile subject matter. He studied Lutheran theology at the universities of Erlangen, Göttingen, and Berlin, becoming in turn Privatdocent (lecturer) at Göttingen, extraordinary (associate) professor at Bonn (1892), and ordinary (full) professor in the chair of theology at Heidelberg (1894).

During 21 years at Heidelberg he published, besides his Grundprobleme der Ethik (1902; Fundamental Problems of Ethics), a large number of articles on various subjects thematically linked with the development of the Christian churches. Many of these were later integrated into his best-known work, Die Soziallehren der christlichen Kirchen und Gruppen (1912; The Social Teaching of the Christian Churches), which spanned the disciplines of theology, social history and theory, PHILOSOPHY OF RELIGION, and philosophy of history. In that work he explored the relationships between and within social and cultural groups in the context of the social ethics of the Christian churches, denominations, and sects. In 1915, realizing that his strength lay more in the philosophy of religion than in orthodox theology, he moved to a chair of philosophy at Berlin, a post he held until his death in 1923.

Influence of his thought. Troeltsch was both fascinated and troubled by “historicism” (historical relativism): the view that whatever is valued, pursued, conceived, or achieved at any given time or place is only understandable in the context of the conditions of that time or place. Although the view seemed inescapable, he surmised that it applied inadequately to the norms that govern human conduct. If consistently applied, the historicist view would make any present understanding of past ages impossible. The historically changing dogmas of the church had to be Within PROTESTANTISM, Troeltsch made important contributions to the study of the origins of LUTHERANISM and CALVINISM and their differing social ethics and social impact. Here he was in close sympathy concerning the nature of PROTESTANT ETHICS with his friend the German sociologist and economist MAX WEBER (1864–1920). Troeltsch was familiar with the Marxist approach to sociology and found its perspective on the socioeconomic substructure of civilization exciting, yet he rejected Marxism in favor of a more flexible conception of the interaction of cultural, social, and economic factors.

After his death, a course of five undelivered lectures was published under a title that puts his work in perspective: Der Historismus und seine Überwindung (“Overcoming Historical Relativism”), a more revealing title than that of the English edition (Christian Thought: Its History and Application). Three volumes of Troeltsch’s collected works appeared toward the end of his life, a fourth being published after his death (Gesammelte Schriften, 4 vol., 1922–25).

TROILUS \ˈtrɔɪ-ləs, ˈtrɔɪ-ə-ləs\, in Greek mythology, son of PRIAM and HECUBA. In the Iliad, Troilus was killed before the action of Greece’s war with Troy began. In medieval literature he was portrayed as an innocent young lover betrayed by a girl (Briseida or Cressida) who abandoned him for the Greek hero DIOMEDES. The 14th century saw two important treatments of the Troilus and Cressida theme: Giovanni Boccaccio’s poem Il filostrato and Geoffrey Chaucer’s Troilus and Criseyde (based mainly on Boccaccio). Their story was also the subject of Shakespeare’s play Troilus and Cressida.

TROJAN HORSE, huge, hollow wooden horse constructed by the Greeks to gain entrance into Troy during the Trojan War. The horse was built by Epeius. The Greeks, pretending to desert the war, sailed to the nearby island of Tenedos, leaving behind Sinon, who persuaded the Trojans that the horse was an offering to ATHENA that would make Troy impregnable. Despite the warnings of Laocoon and CASSANDRA, the horse was taken inside the walls. That night warriors emerged from it and opened the city’s gates to the returned Greek army. The story is mentioned in the Odyssey, and it is told at length in the Aeneid.

TRUE CROSS, Christian relic, reputedly the wood of the cross on which JESUS CHRIST was crucified. Legend relates that the True Cross was found by ST. HELENA, mother of Constantine the Great, during her PILGRIMAGE to the Holy Land about 326.

The earliest historical reference to veneration of the True Cross occurs in the mid-4th century. By the 8th century the accounts were enriched by legendary details describing the history of the wood of the cross before it was used for the CRUCIFIXION.

Veneration of the True Cross gave rise to the sale of its fragments, which were sought as relics. JOHN CALVIN pointed reconciled with the absolute aspects of revealed truth interpreted anew by every generation. Despite this, many theologians (including PAUL TILlich) have seen in Troeltsch only a critic of the certainties of CHRISTIANITY.

out that all the extant fragments, if put together, would fill a large ship, an objection regarded as invalid by some ROMAN CATHOLIC theologians who claimed that the blood of Christ gave to the True Cross a kind of material indestructibility, so that it could be divided indefinitely without being diminished. Such beliefs resulted in the multiplication of relics of the True Cross wherever CHRISTIANITY expanded in the medieval world, and fragments were deposited in most of the great cities and in a great many abbeys. Reliquaries designed to hold the fragments likewise multiplied, and some precious objects of this kind survive.

TS'AI-SHEN \tʃi-ʃhən\, Pinyin Caishen, Chinese god (or gods) of wealth. During the two-week New Year celebration, incense is burned in Ts'ai-shen's temple (especially on the fifth day of the first lunar month), and sometimes friends exchange the traditional New Year greeting "May you become rich" ("Kung-hsi fa-ts'ai").

The Ming dynasty novel Feng-shen yen-i relates that when a HERMIT, Chao Kung-ming, employed magic to support the collapsing Shang dynasty (12th century BCE), Chiang Tzu-ya, a supporter of the subsequent Chou-dynasty clan, made a straw effigy of Chao and, after 20 days of incantations, shot an arrow made of peach-tree wood through the heart of the image, killing Chao. Later, during a visit to the temple of Yüan Shih, Chiang was rebuked for causing the death of a virtuous man. He carried the corpse, as ordered, into the temple, apologized, extolled Chao's virtues, canonized Chao as Ts'ai-shen, god of wealth, and proclaimed him president of the Ministry of Wealth.

Another account identifies Ts'ai-shen as Pi Kan, put to death by order of Chou Hsin, last Shang emperor, for criticizing the emperor's dissolute life. Chou Hsin is said to have exclaimed that he now had a chance to verify the rumor that every sage has seven openings in his heart.

TSAO-CHÜN \dʒä-ʃjün\, Pinyin Zaojun, in Chinese mythology, the Furnace Prince who by alchemy produced gold dinnerware that conferred immortality on the diner. The Han dynasty emperor Wu-ti offered the first sacrifice to Tsao-chün in 133 BCE. At that time, Tsao-chün's chief duty was to watch over the furnace that produced gold.

The Han emperor Hsüan-ti (reigned 74–48/49 BCE) is said to have seen Tsao-chün in human form: he called himself Ch'an Tzu-fang, wore yellow garments, and had unkempt hair. About the 7th century (the similarity of names caused Tsao-chün to be identified with Tsao-shen, god of the kitchen (or hearth), who in turn was later confused with Ho-shen, the god of fire.

TSENG-TZU \dʒɛŋ-ʃdzə\, Pinyin Zengzi, also called Tseng Ts'an \-ʃtsän\ (b. 505 BCE—d. c. 436 BCE), Chinese philosopher, disciple of CONFUCIUS, believed to be the author of the TA-HSÜEH ("Great Learning"), which extols the virtues chung ("loyalty") and shu ("reciprocity").

Tseng-tzu was highly influential in reaffirming the Confucian emphasis on Hsiao ("filial piety"). He enumerated the three degrees of FILLIAL PIETY: honoring father and mother, not disgracing them, and being able to support them.

TSONG-KHA-PA \dʒɔŋ-gä-bä\ (b. 1357—d. 1419), Tibetan LAMA who founded a new Tibetan Buddhist sect known as the DGE-LUGS-PA, literally "Model of Virtue" but more commonly referred to as the Yellow Hat sect to distinguish it from the older Red Hat sect. Hoping to restore monastic discipline Tsong-kha-pa enforced CELIBACY, required the wearing of yellow robes, and insisted on adherence to a rigorous routine. The sect eventually gained considerable influence in Mongolia; with Mongol aid Tsong-kha-pa's successors were eventually (1642) installed as the rulers of Tibet with the title DALAI LAMA.

TSO-WANG \dʒwɔ-ʃwäng\, Pinyin zuowang (Chinese: "sitting and forgetting"), term for a Taoist meditation technique first seen in the ancient text known as the CHUANG-TZU. It is a method that recommends the practice of stilling the body and mind ("sitting") and the progressive "forgetting" of selfish attachments and the distractions of desire. Eventually combined with Buddhist meditational techniques and theory, tso-wang was one of the most important methods of spiritual and mental cultivation leading to an enlightened "return" to the primordial TAO.

TUATHA DÉ DANANN \tū-ə-thə-ʃd'ä-ʃdä-nən\ (Middle Irish: "People of the Goddess Danu"), in Celtic mythology, race inhabiting Ireland before the arrival of the MILESIAINS (the ancestors of the modern Irish). They were said to have been skilled in magic, and the earliest reference to them relates that, after they were banished from heaven because of their knowledge, they descended on Ireland in a cloud of mist. They disappeared into the hills when overcome by the Milesians. The Leabhar Gabhála (Book of Invasions), a fictitious history of Ireland from the earliest times, treats them as actual people, and they were so regarded by native historians up to the 17th century. There can be no doubt that this "race" represents the Celtic pantheon, as several main characters, notably LUGUS and NUADU, are found in Continental British place-names or inscriptions. In popular legend they have become associated with the numerous fairies still supposed to inhabit the Irish landscape.

TU BI-SHEVAṬ \tū-bi-ʃhə-ʃvät-, -ʃhvät\ (Hebrew: "Fifteenth of Shevaṭ"), minor Jewish festival of the new year of trees, or arbor day, occurring on Shevaṭ 15 (January or early February). Thereafter, the fruit of a tree is considered, for tithing, to belong to a new year. Certain penitential prayers are omitted from the liturgy, and fasting is not allowed. Among ASHKENAZI Jews, fruits—traditionally, 15 different kinds—are eaten and often accompanied by the recital of Psalms. Among Sephardic Jews, Tu bi-Shevaṭ is a significant festival, a "feast of fruits" accompanied by songs called complás. In modern Israel, the day has become popular in symbolizing the reclaiming of land from the desert for agriculture. Schoolchildren plant trees and sing songs.

TUKĀRĀM \tū-kä-ʃräm\ (b. 1598? or 1608?, Dehu, near Pune, India—d. 1649), Marathi poet who is often considered the most powerful voice in the language. His abhaṅgas—"unbroken" outpourings—are among the most famous Indian poems.

The son of a shopkeeper, Tukārām was orphaned in childhood. Failing in business and family life, he renounced the world and became an itinerant ascetic. Tukārām is thought to have written over 4,000 abhaṅgas, most of which were addressed to the god Viṭhobā of PANDHARPUR.

TU KUANG-T'ING \tū-ʃgwäng-t'ing\, Pinyin Du Guangting (b. 850—d. 933), Taoist scholar of the T'ang period who contributed to the development of Taoist liturgical ritual and the blending of the T'ien-shih and Ling-pao SCRIPTURES. His ideas on Taoist ritual were especially influential in the articulation of the common Taoist "fasting," or chia, rites and of the liturgies, or chiao, of communal renewal. He also wrote a famous commentary on the TAO-TE CHING and several important hagiographical accounts of Taoist immortals and adepts.

TULSĪDĀS \ˈtʉl-sē-ˈdās, tʉl-sē-ˈdās\ (b. 1532?, 1543?, India—d. 1623, Varanasi), Indian poet whose principal work, the RĀMCAṚITMĀNAS (“Sacred Lake of the Acts of Rāma”), is often regarded as the greatest achievement of medieval Hindi literature and has exercised an abiding influence on the Hindu culture of northern India.

The Rāmcaritmānas expresses par excellence the religious sentiment of BHAKTI to the god RĀMA, especially as mediated through the devotion of his brother Lakṣmaṇa, his monkey devotee HANUMĀN, and his wife SĪTĀ. In all these cases, the sentiment is reciprocal—the strength of Rāma’s own devotion being one of his defining traits. Another resource for bhakti is the sheer power of Rāma’s name (rām NĀM). Tulsīdās’s eclectic approach to doctrinal questions allowed him to rally wide support for the worship of Rāma in northern India, and the success of the Rāmcaritmānas has been a prime factor in elevating the worship of Rāma to a place of dominance in the religious sensibility of many regions of north and central India.

Little is known about Tulsīdās’ life. Seven locales claim to be his birthplace. He apparently lived most of his adult life at Varanasi, which helps to account for the prominent role played by Shiva—that city’s principal deity—in the Rāmcaritmānas’s frame story. The Rāmcaritmānas was written between 1574 and 1576 or 1577. The poem, written in Avadhi, an Eastern Hindi dialect, consists of seven cantos of unequal lengths. Although the ultimate source of the central narrative is the Vālmīki RĀMĀYAṆA, Tulsīdās’ immediate source was the Adhyātma Rāmāyaṇa, a late medieval recasting of the epic that had already sought to harmonize the ADVAITA system and the Rāma cult. The influence of the BHĀGAVATA-PURĀṆA, the chief SCRIPTURE of the KRISHNA cult, is also discernible, with that of a number of minor sources.

Eleven other works are attributed with some certainty to Tulsīdās. These include Kṛṣṇagītāvalī, a series of 61 songs in honor of Krishna; Vinayapatrikā, a series of 279 verse passages addressed to Hindu sacred places and deities (chiefly Rāma and Sītā); and Kavitāvalī, telling incidents from the story of Rāma.

TUMULUS \ˈtʉ-myə-ləs, ˈtyü-, ˈtə-\, prehistoric grave form in continental Europe. See BURIAL MOUND.

TUNG CHUNG-SHU \ˈdʉŋ-ˈjʉŋ-ˈshü\, Pinyin Dong Zhongshu (b. c. 179 BCE, Kuang-ch’uan, China—d. c. 104 BCE, China), scholar instrumental in establishing CONFUCIANISM as the state cult of China and as the basis of official political philosophy—a position it was to hold for 2,000 years. As a philosopher, Tung merged the Confucianist and YIN-YANG schools of thought.

As a chief minister to the emperor Wu (c. 140–87 BCE) of the Han dynasty, Tung was chiefly responsible for the dismissal of all non-Confucian scholars from government. His proposal that Confucianism become the unifying ideology of the Han empire was put into effect, as were his proposals to set up an imperial college (t’ai-hsüeh) for training promising students and to require nobles and governors to recommend annually persons of talent and good moral character for official appointment. Out of these institutional means developed the civil-service examinations that became the basis of recruitment into the bureaucracy.

As a philosopher, Tung made the theory of the interaction between heaven (t’ien) and humanity his central theme. The emperor is heaven’s ambassador on earth, and natural catastrophes are heaven’s way of warning the emperor to examine his personal conduct and correct his mistakes. Yang (light, positive, male) and yin (dark, negative, female) are the two fundamental forces of the universe and as such should be kept in harmony. The ruler has the duty to preserve that harmony. He may reform institutions when necessary but may never alter or destroy the basic moral principles of heaven. Confucian scholars are to interpret the portents and thus exercise a check on the policies of the ruler.

Tung’s Ch’un-ch’iu fan-lu (“Luxuriant Dew of the Spring and Autumn Annals”), an interpretation of the classic “Spring and Autumn Annals” (Ch’un-ch’iu), is one of the most important philosophical works of the Han period.

TUN-HUANG \ˈdʉn-ˈhwǎŋ\, Pinyin Dunhuang, city in western Kansu sheng (province), China. Situated in an oasis in the Kansu-Sinkiang desert, Tun-huang is at the far-western limit of traditional Chinese settlement along the Silk Road across Central Asia. It was the first trading town reached by foreign merchants entering Chinese-administered territory from the west.

Tun-huang was one of the chief places of entry for Buddhist monks and missionaries from the kingdoms of Central Asia, and these Buddhists founded the first of Tun-huang’s caves—known as the Cave of the Thousand Buddhas (Ch’ien-fo Tung)—in 366 CE. From this period onward the town became a major Buddhist center and place of PILGRIMAGE, until the fall of the Western Hsia dynasty in the early 13th century. There were numbers of monastic communities (many of them non-Chinese) that played a predominant role in local society and to which successive governors were generous patrons. In one of the cave temples a rich collection of about 60,000 paper manuscripts, printed documents, and fragments dating from the 5th to the 11th century was walled up about 1015. This collection included not only Buddhist but also Taoist, Zoroastrian, and Nestorian scriptures, as well as vast numbers of secular texts.

TUONELA \ˈtʉ-ó-nā-lä, ˈtwò-\: see MANALA.

TURIN, SHROUD OF \ˈtʉ-rēn, Angl ˈtʉr-in, ˈtyür-; tʉ-ˈrin, tyü-\, Italian Santa Sindone, length of linen that for centuries was purported to be the burial garment of JESUS CHRIST; it has been preserved since 1578 in the royal chapel of the Cathedral of San Giovanni Battista in Turin, Italy. Measuring 14 feet 3 inches long and 3 feet 7 inches wide, it seems to portray images of the back and front of a gaunt, 5-foot 7-inch man—as if a body had been laid lengthwise along one half of the shroud while the other half had been doubled over the head to cover the whole front of the body from face to feet. The images contain markings that allegedly correspond to the STIGMATA of Jesus, as well as various stains of what is presumed to be blood.

The shroud first emerged in 1354 in the hands of Geoffroi de Charnay, seigneur de Lirey. In 1389, when it went on exhibition, it was denounced as false by the local bishop of Troyes, who declared it “cunningly painted, the truth being attested by the artist who painted it.” The Avignon ANTI-POPE Clement VII (reigned 1378–94) sanctioned its use as an object of devotion provided that it were exhibited as a “representation” of the true shroud, but subsequent popes accepted its authenticity. The shroud was damaged by fire and water in 1532. It was moved to the new Savoyard capital of Turin in 1578.

Scholarly analyses have been applied to the shroud since the late 19th century. It was early noticed (1898) that the images on the shroud seem to have the character of photographic negative. Beginning in the 1970s, tests were made to determine whether the images were the result of pigments, scorches, or other agents; none proved conclusive. In 1988 three laboratories concluded by carbon-14 dating that the cloth of the shroud had been made sometime between 1260 and 1390 CE. The ROMAN CATHOLIC church accepted the results and announced that the Shroud of Turin was not authentic, but encouraged Christians to continue venerating the shroud as an inspiring pictorial image of Christ. More recently, however, a vigorous campaign has been launched by those who wish to vindicate its authenticity.

TURNUS \ˈtər-nəs\, in Roman legend, king of the Rutuli (an ancient Italic tribe on the coast of Latium), and the accepted suitor of Lavinia, daughter of LATINUS, king of the Latins. After Latinus betrothed Lavinia instead to the hero AENEAS, Turnus, joined by the Rutuli and the Latins, made war against Aeneas and the Trojans. Though Turnus was protected by the goddess JUNO, Aeneas finally succeeded in killing him.

ṬŪSĪ, NAṢĪR AL-DĪN AL- \ˈtū-sē\ (b. Feb. 18, 1201, Ṭūs, Khorāsān—d. June 26, 1274, Baghdad), outstanding Persian philosopher, scientist, and mathematician.

Al-Ṭūsī became astrologer to the Ismāʿīlī governor Naṣīr al-Dīn ʿAbd al-Raḥīm, and later, pretending to be an ISMĀʿĪLĪ, lived and studied at the castle of Alamut, headquarters of the Ismāʿīlī terrorist sect, the Assassins. In 1256 he betrayed the defenses of the fortress to the invading Mongols, whose army he joined; Hülegü Khan took him along as a confidential adviser when he attacked and destroyed Baghdad in 1258. Al-Ṭūsī used his office as head of the ministry of religious bequests to build a fine observatory at Marāgheh. A man of exceptionally wide erudition, he wrote many books in Arabic and Persian. He improved upon earlier Arabic translations of Euclid, Ptolemy, Autolycus, Theodosius, Apollonius, and others and made original contributions to mathematics and astronomy, including an accurate table of planetary movements. His Tajrīd al-ʿaqāʾid is a highly esteemed treatise on SHĪʿITE dogmatics. His most famous and popular work is The Nasirean Ethics, a treatise on ethics in the Greek tradition resting upon the 11th-century Tahdhīb al-akhlāq of Ibn Miskawayh, which he drafted while a prisoner of the Assassins and later revised for his Mongol master. Al-Ṭūsī was a Twelver Shīʿite but is credited with a number of distinctively Ismāʿīlī dissertations, notably the Tasavvurat.

TʻU-TI \ˈtū-ˈdē\, Pinyin Tudi (Chinese: “Earth or Place God”), in Chinese popular religions, type of god whose deification and functions are determined by local residents. The chief characteristic of a Tʻu-ti is his limitation to a single place—e.g., a bridge, a street, a temple, a public building, a private home, or a field. Tʻu-ti is often identified with the god of riches and is always subservient to the Chʻeng-huang, the spiritual magistrate of the city.

In most cases, these gods originated as historical persons who in life came to the assistance of their respective communities in times of need. It is supposed that deifying such persons and offering sacrifices to them will move them to show similar solicitude after death. If misfortunes visit a locality, the Tʻu-ti is judged to have lost interest and a new patron is chosen.

TWELVE, THE, also called The Twelve Prophets, or The Minor Prophets, book of the Hebrew Bible that contains the books of 12 minor prophets—Hosea, Joel, AMOS, Obadiah, Jonah, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, ZEPHANIAH, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi—consolidated into the last of eight books in the second division of the Hebrew Bible, known as NEBʿIM, or the Prophets.

TWELVE TRIBES OF ISRAEL, in the OLD TESTAMENT, the Hebrew people who took possession of the Promised Land under the leadership of JOSHUA. Because the tribes were named after sons or grandsons of JACOB (whose name was changed to Israel by God, GENESIS 32:28; 35:10), the Hebrew people became known as Israelites.

Ten of the tribes (REUBEN, SIMEON, JUDAH, ISSACHAR, ZEBULUN, GAD, ASHER, BENJAMIN, DAN, and NAPHTALI) were named after sons of Jacob by his first wife, Leah; by Zilpah, Leah’s maidservant; by Rachel (his second wife); and by Bilhah, the maidservant of Rachel (Genesis 29:31–30:24; 35:16–18). Two tribes—MANASSEH and EPHRAIM—were named after sons of Joseph—Joseph being a son of Rachel and Jacob (Genesis 41:50–52). The 10 tribes that settled in northern Palestine became known as the TEN LOST TRIBES OF ISRAEL.

TYAGARAJA \ˈtyə-gə-ˈrā-jə\ (b. 1767, Tamil Nādu, India—d. 1847), Indian composer renowned in southern India for his Telugu kīrtanas (devotional songs) and ragas. These songs were mostly in praise of RĀMA. Tyagaraja is regarded as an exponent of gāna-mārga—i.e., salvation through devotional music.

TYCHĒ \ˈtī-kē\, in GREEK RELIGION, goddess of chance, and a capricious dispenser of good and ill fortune. Hesiod called her the daughter of the Titan OCEANUS and Tethys; other writers attributed her fatherhood to ZEUS. She was also associated with the more beneficent Agathos Daimon, a good spirit, protective of individuals and families, and with NEMESIS, who represented punishment of overprosperous man and so was believed to act as a moderating influence. Among her monuments was a temple at Argos, where the legendary PALAMEDES is said to have dedicated to her the first set of dice, which he is supposed to have invented.

TYLOR, SIR EDWARD BURNETT \ˈtī-lər\ (b. Oct. 2, 1832, London, Eng.—d. Jan. 2, 1917, Wellington, Somerset), English anthropologist regarded as the founder of cultural anthropology. His most important work, Primitive Culture (1871), influenced by Darwin's theory of biological evolution, developed the theory of an evolutionary, progressive relationship between "primitive" and modern cultures.

Tylor was the son of a prosperous QUAKER brass founder. He attended a Quaker school until he was 16, when, barred by his faith from entering a university, he became a clerk in the family business. In 1855 he traveled to America and in 1856 to Cuba, where he met the archaeologist and ethnologist Henry Christy. Christy was on his way to Mexico to study remnants of the ancient Toltec culture in the Valley of Mexico, and he persuaded Tylor to accompany him. The expedition lasted for six months, and after its conclusion Tylor returned to England. His experiences were published in his first book, Anahuac; or, Mexico and the Mexicans Ancient and Modern (1861). Although mainly a travelogue, Anahuac contains elements that characterize Tylor's later work: a firm grasp on factual data, a sense of cultural differences, and a curious combination of empirical methods with occasional hints of the superiority of a 19th-century Englishman in judging other cultures.

After Anahuac, Tylor published three major works. Researches into the Early History of Mankind and the Development of Civilization (1865) elaborated the thesis that cultures past and present, civilized and "primitive," must be studied as parts of a single history of human thought. Tylor's fame, however, is based chiefly upon the publication of Primitive Culture. In it he again traced a progressive development from a "savage" to a civilized state and pictured primitive man as an early philosopher applying his reason to explain events in the human and natural world that were beyond his control, even though his scientific ignorance produced erroneous explanations. Tylor identified the earliest form of RELIGIOUS BELIEF as "animism," a belief in spiritual beings, arrived at by primitive attempts to explain the difference between the living body and the corpse and the separation of soul and body in dreams.

Primitive Culture also elaborated upon a theme that became a central concept in his work: the relation of the life of primitive to that of modern populations. Thus, "culture," he argued, should be studied not only in the artistic and spiritual achievements of civilizations but in human technological and moral accomplishments made at all stages of development. Tylor noted how customs and beliefs from a distant past seemed to have lived on into the modern world, and he became well-known for his examination of such "survivals," a concept that he introduced. His evolutionary view of human development was endorsed by most of his colleagues and, of course, by Charles Darwin, who had established biological evolution as the key to human development. Tylor's evolutionary theory was rejected by most scholars as both ethnocentric and purely conjectural by the close of the 20th century.

TYNDALE, WILLIAM \ˈtīn-dəl\ (b. c. 1490–94, near Gloucestershire, Eng.—d. Oct. 6, 1536, Vilvoorde, near Brussels, Brabant), English biblical translator, humanist, and Protestant martyr.

Tyndale was an instructor at the University of Cambridge, where, in 1521, he became convinced that the BIBLE alone should determine the practices and doctrines of the church and that every believer should be able to read the Bible in his own language. After church authorities in England prevented him from translating the Bible there, he went to Germany in 1524. His NEW TESTAMENT translation, strongly influenced by that of MARTIN LUTHER, was completed in 1525 and printed at Cologne and, when ROMAN CATHOLIC authorities suppressed it, at Worms. Tyndale was working on an OLD TESTAMENT translation when he was captured in Antwerp; he was executed at Vilvoorde in 1536.

At the time of his death, several thousand copies of his New Testament had been printed; however, only one intact copy remains today at London's British Library. The first vernacular English text of any part of the Bible to be so published, Tyndale's version became the basis for most subsequent English translations, beginning with the KING JAMES VERSION of 1611.

TYPHON \ˈtī-fän\, also spelled Typhaon \tī-ˈfā-än\, in Greek mythology, youngest son of GAEA (Earth) and Tartarus. He was a grisly monster with a hundred dragons' heads who was conquered and cast into the underworld by ZEUS, but continued as the source of destructive winds. In other accounts, he was confined in the land of the Arimi in Cilicia or under Mount Etna or in other volcanic regions, where he was the cause of eruptions. Among his children by his wife, ECHIDNA, were the hell-hound Cerberus, the multi-headed HYDRA, and the CHIMERA.

TYR \ˈtīr, ˈtīr, ˈtūr\, Old Norse Týr, Old English Tīw \ˈtē-ū\, or Tiu, one of the oldest gods of the Germanic peoples. He was apparently the god of the formalities of war, especially treaties. In the most famous myth about him, as a guarantee of good faith, he placed his hand between the jaws of the monstrous wolf FENRIR while the gods, pretending sport but intending a trap, bound the wolf; when Fenrir realized he had been tricked he bit off Tyr's hand (hence Tyr's identification as the one-handed god).

TZU-JAN \ˈdzə-ˈrän\, Pinyin ziran (Chinese: "self-so," "naturalness"), in TAOISM, an ideal state of human existence that results from living in complete harmony with the forces of nature. As everything in the world has its natural state, Taoists strive to attain a state of complete spontaneity in order to become what nature intended them to be. As a consequence, life becomes exceedingly simple; and such things as life and death, good health and illness are accepted as part of the irresistible cycle of nature, which ceaselessly makes and unmakes the world. This process is best achieved by first observing the ever-changing world and then "fatalistically" abstaining from struggle against powers beyond one's control.

TZU-SSU \ˈdzə-sə\, Pinyin Zisi, also called K'ung Chi \kūŋ-ˈjē\ (b. 483—d. 402 BCE), Chinese philosopher, grandson of CONFUCIUS, native of the state of Lu (present Shandong province), and traditional author of the Doctrine of the Mean. This classic reaffirms Confucius' interpretation of the mean as the state of equilibrium (CHUNG-YUNG) of the exemplary man and broadens the concept through discussion of the "timely mean" (shih-chung) that is relative and varies according to situation.

UCHIMURA KANZŌ \ü-'chē-mü-rä-'kän-zō\ (b. May 2, 1861, Edo [now Tokyo], Japan—d. March 28, 1930, Tokyo), Japanese religious thinker and critic, an important formative influence on many writers and intellectual leaders of modern Japan.

Uchimura came from a samurai (warrior) family and studied at the Sapporo Agricultural School, where he was baptized in 1871. Refusing foreign missionary help, in 1882 he founded his own independent Japanese Christian Church. He continued his studies in the United States (1884–88) and returned to Japan to teach in Tokyo. There he became the center of controversy in 1891 when he questioned the divinity of the emperor by refusing to bow when presented with the Imperial Rescript on Education. Among his writings are Kirisuto-shinto no nagusame (1893; "Consolations of a Christian"), Kyuanroku (1893; "Seeking Peace of Mind"), and Yo wa ikanishite Kirisuto-shinto to narishi ya (1895; "How I Became a Christian"). Uchimura's interpretation of CHRISTIANITY emphasized the central importance of the BIBLE and the individual conscience and denied the need for a church or SACRAMENTS, a tradition still known in Japan by the word he coined for it, mukyōkai ("nonchurch movement").

UDĀSĪS \ü-'dä-sē\ (Punjabi: "Detached Ones"), monastic followers of Srīchand (1494–1612?), the elder son of GURŪ NĀNAK (1469–1539). The authoritative text of the Udāsī movement is the Mātrā ("Discipline"), a hymn comprised of 78 verses and attributed to Srīchand. The Mātrā emphasizes the need for spiritual elevation, to be attained by living an ascetic life of CELIBACY and detachment from the world. The UDĀSĪS wear matted hair and have the ICON of Srīchand as the central object of worship in their temples.

After Nānak's death, Srīchand established a dehrā ("center") in his father's name, and his movement started from there. By the middle of the 18th century, Udāsīs had 25 centers in the Punjab, and their number grew to over 100 with the coming of Sikh political dominance in the area.

The relationship between Sikhs and Udāsīs is historically complex. Many Udāsī beliefs, devotional practices, and modes of living are in clear opposition to mainstream Sikh doctrine, reflecting ascetic and iconic dispositions that are generally identified as Hindu. Indeed, Srīchand remained in fierce competition with Nānak's nominated successors. Yet the fact that he was Nānak's son meant that he enjoyed a degree of respect in the eyes of Nānak's successors and their followers. Moreover, while many Sikhs, especially Jats, harbored a marked distaste for celibacy and all it represents, others accepted the complementary relationship between householders and ascetics that characterizes many Indian religious traditions. Thus it was not unseemly that Udāsīs took custody of some GURDWARĀS (Sikh places of worship) during the period of Sikh persecution by the Mughal state in the 18th century or that, as part of his liberal policy toward religious establishments, Maharaja Ranjit

Singh (1780–1839) gave revenue-free land grants to the Udāsī centers. With the turn of the 20th century, however, lines of religious definition became increasingly firm in the Punjab, and the Udāsīs came to view themselves as an ascetic group within the larger Hindu—not Sikh—fold. Today their largest center is in Haridwār.

UGARIT \yü-'gär-it, 'yü-gä-rit\, ancient city lying in a large artificial mound called Ras Shamra, six miles north of Al-Lādhiqiyyah (Latakia) on the Mediterranean coast of northern Syria. Its ruins, about half a mile from the shore, were first uncovered by the plow of a peasant at Al-Bayḍā Bay. Excavations were begun in 1929.

Ugarit's history. The most prosperous and the best-documented age in Ugarit's history, dated from about 1450 to about 1200 BCE, produced great royal palaces and temples and shrines, with a high priests' library and other libraries on the acropolis. Some of the family vaults built under the stone houses show strong Mycenaean influence. Mycenaean and Cypriot pottery in great amounts has also been found.

After the discovery of the temple library, which revealed a hitherto unknown cuneiform alphabetic script as well as an entirely new mythological and religious literature, several other palatial as well as private libraries were found, along with archives dealing with all aspects of the city's political, social, economic, and cultural life. Scribes used four languages: Ugaritic, Akkadian, Sumerian, and Hurrian. Seven different scripts were used in this period: Egyptian and Hittite hieroglyphic and Cypri-Minoan, Sumerian, Akkadian, Hurrian, and Ugaritic cuneiform. These show clearly the cosmopolitan character of the city.

Soon after 1200 BCE Ugarit came to an end. Its fall coincided with the invasion of the Northern and Sea Peoples and certainly with earthquakes and famines. In the Iron Age and during the 6th–4th century BCE, there were small settlements on the site (Leukos Limen).

Ras Shamra religious and mythological texts. Most of what is known about Canaanite religion is derived from the tablets discovered at Ras Shamra. The principal god was EL, but the jurisdiction over rainfall and fertility was delegated to BAAL, or HADAD. Other important deities included RESHEPH, lord of plague and the nether world; KOTHAR, the divine craftsman; ASHERAH, consort of El; and ASTARTE, goddess of fertility. Many of these texts, including the "Legend of Keret," the "Aghat Epic" (or "Legend of Danel"), the "Myth of Baal-Aliyan," and the "Death of Baal," reveal an Old Canaanite mythology. A tablet names the Ugaritic pantheon with Babylonian equivalents; El, Asherah of the Sea, and Baal were the main deities. By similarities of theme and character, it is now evident that the patriarchal stories in the OLD TESTAMENT were not merely transmitted orally but were based on written documents of Canaanite origin, the discovery of which at Ugarit has led to a new appraisal of the Old Testament.

ŪSANG \ʼə-ē-ˈsāŋ\ (b. 625, Korea—d. 702, Korea), Buddhist monk and founder of the Hwaōm (Chinese: HUA-YEN) sect of Korean BUDDHISM. He devoted himself to the propagation of the teaching of the Avatamsaka Sūtra.

Ūsang became a monk about 650, and at age 37 he went to China, where he studied under the direction of Chih-yen, the 2nd patriarch of the Chinese Hua-yen (Garland) sect. While in China he wrote his major work, An Explanatory Diagram on the Garland World System, which is still read widely in the Buddhist circles of East Asia. On returning home in 671, he built the Pusōk Temple as the center of the Hwaōm sect.

UJIGAMI \ʼü-jē-ˈgä-mē\, in SHINTŌ, tutelary deity of a village or geographic area. Originally the term referred to the ancestral deity (KAMI) of a family or clan (uji), blood KINSHIP forming the basis of the spiritual relationship. The extent of the ujigami's protection was later enlarged to cover those who lived with the clan or near it and since has extended over the parish into which one is born. Ujiko are those who live or were born within the geographic boundaries of the tutelary deity and who help manage the shrine affairs.

UKEMOCHI NO KAMI \ü-ˈke-ˈmō-ˈchē-nō-ˈkä-mē\ (Japanese: "Goddess Who Possesses Food"), in SHINTŌ mythology, the goddess of food. She is also sometimes identified as Wakaukanome ("Young Woman with Food") and is associated with Toyuke (Toyouke) Ōkami, the god of food, clothing, and housing, who is enshrined in the Outer Shrine of the GRAND SHRINE OF ISE.

According to the legend recounted in the NIHON SHOKI ("Chronicles of Japan"), the moon god, Tsukiyomi, was dispatched to earth by his sister, the sun goddess AMATERASU, to visit Ukemochi no Kami. (According to the KOJIKI, "Records of Ancient Matters," it was another brother, the storm god SUSANOO, who was sent on the mission.) The food goddess welcomed him by facing the land and disgorging from her mouth boiled rice, turning toward the sea and spewing out all kinds of fishes, and turning toward the land and disgorging game. She presented these foods to him at a banquet, but he was displeased at being offered the goddess's vomit and drew his sword and killed her. When he returned to heaven and informed his sister of what he had done, she became angry and said, "Henceforth I shall not meet you face to face," which is said to explain why the sun and the moon are never seen together.

Another messenger sent to the food goddess by Amaterasu found various stuffs produced from her dead body. From her head came the ox and the horse; from her forehead, millet; from her eyebrows, silkworms; from her eyes, panic grass [a cereal]; from her belly, rice; and from her genitals, wheat and beans. Amaterasu had the food grains sown for humanity's future use and, placing the silkworms in her mouth, reeled thread from them, thereby beginning the art of sericulture—the production of raw silk.

UKKO \ʼük-kō\, in Finnish folk religion, god of thunder, one of the most important deities. The name Ukko is derived from ukkonen, "thunder," but it also means "old man" and is used as a term of respect. Ukko had his abode at the center of the sky; hence he was often called Jumala, "Heaven God." He controlled rainfall, and sacrifices were directed toward him at the beginning of the planting season and in times of drought.

ʼULAMĀʼ \,ü-lə-ˈmä, ʼü-lə-ˈmä\ (Arabic), also spelled ulema, the learned of ISLAM, those who possess the quality of ʼilm, "learning," in its widest sense. From the ʼulamā, who are versed theoretically and practically in the Muslim sciences, come the religious teachers of the community—theologians (mutakallimun), canon lawyers (MUFTIS), judges (qadis), professors—and high state religious officials. They receive their education in Islamic colleges (MADRASAS). In a narrower sense, ʼulamā may refer to a council of learned men holding government appointments in a Muslim state.

Historically, the ʼulamā have been a powerful class, and in early Islam it was their consensus (IJMĀʼ) on theological and juridical problems that determined the communal practices of future generations. Although there is no PRIESTHOOD in Islam, and every believer may perform priestly functions such as leading the liturgical prayer, the ʼulamā have played an important political and clerical role.

In modern times the ʼulamā have lost ground to the Western-educated classes; although they have been abolished in Turkey, their hold on conservatives in the rest of the Muslim world remains firm. As a result of the 1978–79 revolution in Iran, SHIʼITE ʼulamā became dominant in that country's religious and political affairs and inspired opposition movements in the Persian Gulf region and Lebanon. Some Sunni ʼulamā have given support to Islamic opposition movements in countries such as Syria and Egypt.

ULL \ʼül\, Old Norse Ullr \ʼü-lər\, in Norse mythology, god of snowshoes, hunting, the bow, and the shield, commonly called upon for aid in individual combat. He resided at Ydalir (Yew Dales).

Ull must have been a very prominent deity in the Norse pantheon at one time because, according to one tradition, the god ODIN was replaced by Ull during one of his long journeys. In addition, Ull's name appears as part of many Swedish and Norwegian place-names.

ULSTER CYCLE \ʼəl-stər\, Irish Gaelic Ulaid Cycle \ʼü-ləthʼ\, in ancient Irish Gaelic literature, a group of legends and tales dealing with the heroic age of the Ulaid, a people of northeast Ireland from whom the modern name Ulster derives. The stories, set in the 1st century BCE, were recorded from ORAL TRADITION between the 8th and 11th century and are preserved in the 12th-century manuscripts The Book of the Dun Cow (c. 1100) and The Book of Leinster (c. 1160) and also in later compilations, such as The Yellow Book of Lecan (14th century). Mythological elements are freely intermingled with legendary elements that have an air of authenticity. Events center on the reign of the semi-historical King CONOR (CONCHOBAR MAC NESSA) at EMAIN MACHA (near modern Armagh) and his Knights of the Red Branch (i.e., the palace building in which the heads and arms of vanquished enemies were stored). A rival court at Connaught is ruled by King Ailill and Queen MEDB. The chief hero of the Red Branch is the Achilles-like CÚ CHULAINN, born of a mortal mother, Dechtire, the sister of King Conor, and a divine father, the god Lug of the Long Arm.

Most of the stories are short prose narratives, using verse for description and for scenes of heightened emotion. They fall into types such as destructions, cattle raids, or elopements. The longest tale and the closest approach to an epic is TÁIN BÓ CÚAILGNE (The Cattle Raid of Cooley), dealing with a conflict between the men of Ulster and of Connaught. One tale portrays the familiar father-son duel, in which Cú Chulainn unknowingly kills his own son, who has come to seek him. Another tale, BRICRIU'S FEAST, contains a beheading game that is the source for Sir Gawayne and the Grene Knight. The tale having the most profound influence on later Irish literature is The Fate of the Sons of Usnech, the tragic love story of DEIRDRE and Noise, which was retold in dramatic form in the 20th century by John Millington Synge and William Butler Yeats.

‘UMAR TAL \,ü-mär-‘täl\, in full al-Hājj ‘Umar ibn Sa‘īd Tal, also spelled el-Hadj Omar ibn Sa‘īd Tal (b. c. 1797, Halvar, Fouta-Toro [now in Senegal]—d. Feb. 12, 1864, near Hamdalahi, Tukolor empire [now in Mali]), West African Tukolor leader who, after launching a JIHAD (holy war) in 1854, established a Muslim realm, the Tukolor empire, between the upper Sénégal and Niger rivers (in what is now upper Guinea, eastern Senegal, and western and central Mali). The empire survived until the 1890s under his son, Aḥmadu Seku.

‘Umar Tal was born in the upper valley of the Sénégal River, in the land of the Tukolor people. His father was an educated Muslim who instructed students in the QUR‘AN, and ‘Umar, a mystic, perfected his studies with North African scholars who initiated him into the Tijānī brotherhood. At the age of 23, ‘Umar set out on a pilgrimage to MECCA and was received with honor in the countries through which he traveled. Muhammad Bello, emir of Sokoto in Nigeria, offered him his daughter Maryam in marriage. Enriched by this princely alliance, ‘Umar had become an important personage when he reached Mecca about 1827. He visited the tomb of the Prophet in MEDINA, returned to Mecca, and then settled for a while in Cairo. In Mecca he was designated CALIPH for black Africa by the head of the Tijānī brotherhood.

‘Umar returned to the interior of Africa in 1833. Trained for political leadership by his father-in-law, with whom he spent several years, and his position strengthened by the title of caliph, he now decided to convert the Africans to ISLAM. Upon the death of Bello, he departed for his native country, hoping to conquer the Fouta region with the assistance of the French, in exchange for a trade treaty, an agreement the French declined because of ‘Umar’s growing strength. In northeastern Guinea, where he established himself, he wrote down his teachings in a book called Kitāb rimāḥ hizb al-raḥīm (“Book of the Spears of the Party of God”). Deriving his inspiration from SUFISM he defined the Tijānī “way” as the best one for saving one’s soul and for approaching God. He recommended meditation, self-denial, and blind obedience to the SHAYKH. He gained many followers in Guinea, but, when in 1845 he went to preach in his own country, he met with little success.

In March 1854 ‘Umar issued an order for a jihad to sweep away the PAGANS and bring back the Muslims who had strayed from the fold. In 1855 he defeated the Bambaras of Mali and forcibly converted them, yet these conversions proved to be ineffectual. To defend his authority ‘Umar had 300 hostages executed, but revolt broke out again as soon as his armies were removed.

‘Umar was to spend the next 10 years trying to contain his empire. When ‘Umar attacked the Fulani people of the Masina, who were Muslims, followers of the Qādirī brotherhood, his mission turned into a fratricidal war. ‘Umar, recognizing the danger to his divine mission, proposed a duel with Aḥmadu III, the leader of the Fulani army, but the latter refused. ‘Umar won the battle, and Aḥmadu was captured and beheaded.

In 1863, attacked by the Tuaregs, the Moors, and the Fulani, ‘Umar’s army was destroyed. He withdrew to the city of Hamdalahi, where he was besieged. He escaped and took refuge in a cave but was killed when the cave was blown up with gunpowder.

Al-Hājj ‘Umar Tal’s empire lasted 50 years, from 1848 to 1897, when it was annexed by the French. Few of the Mali people still remember it, except the descendants of the Tijānī initiates or the Fulani and Bambaras, who suffered his cruelties. The mosque of Dinguiraye in Guinea is all that remains of ‘Umar’s empire.

‘UMRA \‘üm-rə\, “minor PILGRIMAGE” undertaken by Muslims in MECCA at anytime of the year. It is also meritorious, though optional, for Muslims residing in Mecca. As in the HAJJ, the pilgrim begins the ‘umra by assuming the state of ihrām (ritual purity). Following a formal declaration of intent (niyya) to perform the ‘umra, he enters Mecca and circles the sacred shrine of the KA‘BA seven times. He may then touch the Black Stone, pray at the sacred stone Maqām Ibrāhīm, drink the holy water of the Zamzam spring, and touch the Black Stone again, though these ceremonies are supererogatory. The sa‘y, running seven times between the hills of aṣ-Ṣafā and al-Marwah, and the ritual shaving of the head complete the ‘umra.

Pilgrims have the choice of performing the ‘umra separately or in combination with the hajj. In its present form, the ‘umra dates from Muhammad’s lifetime and is a composite of several pre-Islamic ceremonies that were reinterpreted in monotheistic terms and supplemented by Muslim prayers.

UNIATE CHURCH \‘yü-nē-,at, -ət\: see EASTERN RITE CHURCH.

UNIFICATION CHURCH, byname of Holy Spirit Association for the Unification of World Christianity, religious movement that was founded in South Korea in 1954 by SUN MYUNG MOON. The movement shifted its base to New York City in 1971. Its network of missionary, cultural, and economic enterprises extends to more than 100 countries and is said to involve more than 3,000,000 believers. Only about 10,000, with considerable turnover, are members of the highly visible American branch.

The movement, influenced by YIN-YANG motifs and Korean shamanism, seeks to establish divine rule on earth through the restoration of the family based on the union of the Lord and Lady of the Second Advent (believed to be Moon and his wife, Hak Ja Han). According to Unification doctrine, God's efforts to reestablish rightful order reached a provisional climax in JESUS, who, by exemplifying individual oneness with God, inaugurated the kingdom spiritually but was prevented by his CRUCIFIXION from restoring divine rule through procreative marriage. The completion of Christ's thwarted work is believed to be approaching its final stages in the mission conferred on Moon by the ascended Jesus.

Unification stresses communal and devotional discipline as well as unreserved commitment to practical work such as fund-raising, business operations, and educational, missionary, and humanitarian activity. The church has been criticized for its recruitment practices (which have been said to include protein starvation and brainwashing), appeals for money, business policies, and alleged violation of tax and immigration laws.

UNITARIANISM, religious movement that stresses the free use of reason in religion, holds generally that God exists only in one person, and denies the divinity of JESUS CHRIST.

Theological foundations for the view of God as a unity and for the humanity of Jesus are found in 2nd- and 3rd-century MONARCHIANISM and in the teachings of ARIUS (c. 250–c. 336) and his followers (Arians)—both groups of early Christians whose doctrines were later declared heretical by the church. In the 16th-century Protestant REFORMATION, certain liberal, radical, and rationalist reformers revived the Platonic emphasis on reason and the unity of God. Chief among these was FAUSTUS SOCINUS, whose theology stressed the complete humanity of Jesus, a view still held by most Unitarians and Universalists. Another important early figure was Ferenc Dávid, who was convicted as a heretic for teaching that prayers could not be addressed to Jesus (since Jesus was merely human). He died in prison in 1579. The church that Dávid founded in Transylvania is the world's oldest extant Unitarian body.

The mainstream of British Unitarianism and American Unitarianism grew out of Calvinist PURITANISM. Calvin's doctrine of providence, coupled with an increasingly scientific view of the universe, led to an increased emphasis on reason and morals among the more liberal Calvinist clergy. Joseph Priestley, an English scientist and dissenting minister, was among those who began preaching "Unitarian CHRISTIANITY," emphasizing Jesus' humanity, God's omnipotence, and the rational faculty of man. The English Unitarians became a force in Parliament, the professions, and social reform. The name "Free Christian" was adopted by some groups who opposed the name "Unitarian" as sectarian and divisive. The movement fared somewhat less well in Scotland and Ireland.

American Unitarianism developed out of New England Congregationalist churches that rejected the 18th-century revival movement. The Transcendentalist movement of the 19th century injected Unitarianism with a new interest in the intuitive and emotional aspects of religion. When Unitarianism spread into the Middle West, its religious fundamentals changed to human aspiration and scientific truth, rather than Christianity and the BIBLE.

Both British and American Unitarian groups formed national associations in 1825. In 1961 American Unitarians merged with the national organization of Universalist churches, with whom they shared a history of liberal idealism. In polity, most Unitarians and Universalists are congregational. Forms of worship, based on Protestant tradition, vary widely from group to group.

UNITAS FRATRUM \('ü-nē,-täs-'frä-trüm, 'yü-ni,-tas-'frä-träm\) (Latin: "Unity of Brethren"), Protestant religious group inspired by HUSSITE spiritual ideals in Bohemia in the mid-15th century. They followed a simple life of NONVIOLENCE, using the BIBLE as their sole rule of faith. They denied TRANSUBSTANTIATION but received the EUCHARIST and deemed religious HYMNS of great importance. In 1501 they printed the first Protestant hymnbook, and in 1579–93 they published a Czech translation of the Bible (the Kralice, or Kralitz, Bible), the outstanding quality of which made it a landmark in Czech literature. About the mid-16th century, Unitas emigrants moved into Poland and survived there for some two centuries. By the 17th century the Unitas Fratrum constituted more than half of the Protestants in Bohemia and Moravia.

The Unitas Fratrum joined the Czech estates in their fight with the Holy Roman emperor Ferdinand I (Thirty Years' War), and in 1627 an imperial edict outlawed all Protestants in Bohemia. The Unitas was destroyed, with all its churches, its Bible, and its hymnbooks, and its members were forcibly "catholicized" or exiled. Remnants of the group eventually found refuge in Saxony and under the name of Herrnhuters had great religious influence through their missionary activities. Both the MORAVIAN CHURCH and the Evangelical Czech Brethren Church trace their origin to the Unitas Fratrum.

UNITED HOUSE OF PRAYER FOR ALL PEOPLE, Pentecostal Holiness church founded by Bishop Charles Emmanuel ("Sweet Daddy") Grace (1881/84?–1960).

After leaving a job as a cook on a Southern railway, he began to preach, assuming the name "Grace" and proclaiming himself "Bishop." He established a house of worship in 1926 in Charlotte, N.C., and later moved to Newark, N.J. He claimed to be an emissary of God with authority to grant or withhold salvation. The death of Grace led to temporary difficulties for the group over tax litigation and the succession to Grace's leadership.

UNITED SYNAGOGUE OF AMERICA

The church is headquartered in Washington, D.C., and has a reported active membership of 25,000.

UNITED SYNAGOGUE OF AMERICA (USA), central federation of some 835 Conservative Jewish congregations located in the United States and Canada. It was organized in 1913 by Solomon Schechter, a Talmudic scholar and spokesman for the Conservative movement. The United Synagogue has administrative divisions for youth activities, Jewish education, adult studies, music, social action, dietary laws, and congregational standards. The USA is affiliated with the National Federation of Jewish Men's Clubs, THE RABBINICAL ASSEMBLY, and the Women's League for Conservative Judaism.

UNITY SCHOOL OF CHRISTIANITY, also called Unity, religious movement founded in Kansas City, Mo., in 1889 by Charles Fillmore (1854–1948) and his wife, Myrtle (1845–1931). Mrs. Fillmore believed that spiritual healing had cured her of tuberculosis. As a result, the Fillmores began studying spiritual healing. They were deeply influenced by Emma Curtis Hopkins, a former follower of MARY BAKER EDDY. Unity, however, is closer to NEW THOUGHT, which in general emphasizes the primacy of mind and spiritual healing. Until 1922 it was a member of the International New Thought Alliance.

Unity developed gradually as the Fillmores attempted to share their insights concerning religion and spiritual healing. They began publishing magazines, books, and pamphlets and started the service known as Silent Unity, which, through prayer and counseling, helps people by telephone and by mail. After World War I, the Fillmores began developing Unity Village, 15 miles from Kansas City and eventually covering 1,400 acres, and by 1949 all departments of Unity were there. After Charles Fillmore's death, Unity was led by the Fillmores' sons and grandchildren.

Unity emphasizes spiritual healing, prosperity, and practical CHRISTIANITY. Unlike some New Thought groups, it stresses its agreements with traditional Christianity. Illnesses are considered unnatural and curable by spiritual means. The practice of medicine, however, is not rejected. There is no definite creed, although a statement written by Charles Fillmore, the Unity Statement of Faith, is available in a pamphlet. Unity is tolerant of the beliefs and practices of others.

It has been reported that as many as 2,500,000 requests for aid are received by Silent Unity each year. All are answered by mail or by telephone free of charge, but many persons who make requests give a contribution. Unity also conducts classes for interested individuals and a course of study for those who wish to become Unity ministers and teachers in the approximately 300 Unity centers, which are located in many states in the United States and abroad. Unity ministers must complete a course of study and be approved by the Unity School of Christianity. The Unity movement is thought to reach some 6,000,000 persons, most of whom, however, are not members.

UNIVERSALISM, belief in the salvation of all souls. Although Universalism has appeared at various times in Christian history, most notably in the works of ORIGEN of Alexandria in the 3rd century, as an organized movement it had its beginnings in the United States in the middle of the 18th century. Building on Enlightenment thought, the Universalists believed it impossible that a loving God would ELECT only a portion of mankind to salvation and doom the rest to eternal punishment. They insisted that punishment in the afterlife was for a limited period during which the soul was purified and prepared for eternity in the presence of God.

The forerunner of Universalism in the United States was George De Benneville (1703–93), who in 1741 migrated from Europe to Pennsylvania, where he preached and practiced medicine. The early Universalist movement was given its greatest impetus by the preaching of John Murray (1741–1815), who moved from England to colonial America in 1770. He propagated the doctrine throughout most of the colonies, often against much opposition from orthodox Christians who believed that Universalism would lead to immorality. Near the close of the 18th century Hosea Ballou introduced a Unitarian conception of God and reinterpreted the death of Jesus: it was not a vicarious ATONEMENT for the SINS of mankind but rather a demonstration of God's infinite and unchangeable love for his children. Ballou also stressed the use of reason in religion.

From the 19th century, Universalists felt a close kinship with Unitarians, since the two groups shared many views and practices. Various attempts to unite the national bodies of the two denominations, the Universalist Church of America and the American Unitarian Association, culminated in the formation of the Unitarian Universalist Association in 1960 and formal merger in 1961. Each Universalist church is free to choose its own form of worship. Simple, nonliturgical services are most common, with great emphasis put on the sermon.

From the beginning, Universalists have differed widely in matters of belief. Liberalism, freedom of individual interpretation, tolerance of diversity, agreement on methods of approaching theological and church issues, and belief in the inherent dignity of man have been the strongest elements keeping the movement together. Universalists generally stress the use of reason in religion and modification of belief in the light of the discoveries of science. Thus, the miraculous elements of traditional CHRISTIANITY are rejected as incompatible with modern knowledge. Jesus is considered a great teacher and worthy of imitation, but he is not held to be divine. A broader conception of Universalism began to emerge in the 20th century. Although stressing their ties to the Christian tradition, Universalists were exploring the universal elements of religion and seeking closer relationships with non-Christian religions.

UNTOUCHABLE, also called Harijan \hə-'ri-jən\, or DALIT \dɑ-'lit\, in traditional Hindu society, any member of a wide range of Hindu groups outside the traditional four-tiered class structure and, more generally, any person outside the CASTE system.

Many different hereditary castes have been traditionally subsumed under the title of untouchable, each of which subscribes to the social rule of endogamy (marriage exclusively within the caste community) that governs the caste system in general.

Traditionally, the groups characterized as untouchable were those whose occupations and habits of life involved polluting activities, of which the most important were (1) taking life for a living (for example, fishermen), (2) killing or disposing of cattle or working with their hides, (3) pursuing activities that brought the participant into contact with emissions of the human body (for instance, sweepers and washermen), (4) handling corpses, and (5) eating the flesh of cattle or of domestic pigs and chickens, a category into which many of the indigenous tribes of India fell. Because of the pollution associated with these jobs and the castes responsible for them, the untouchables have been disadvantaged and discriminated against for many centuries; they have been prohibited from entering upper-caste temples and from drawing water from the wells used by those above them in the caste hierarchy or sharing the same food. The very sight of an untouchable was thought to defile those of higher caste. Religious texts going back thousands of years have been used to legitimate the oppression of the untouchable, in part by arguing that untouchability is a just punishment for evil deeds committed in a former life. These factors led many untouchables to seek emancipation through conversion to CHRISTIANITY, ISLAM, or BUDDHISM.

The use of the term “untouchable” and the disadvantages associated with it were declared illegal in the constitutions adopted by India in 1949 and Pakistan in 1953. In much of India, prejudice and discrimination against those so labeled continues. Owing in part to Dalit leaders like BHIMRAO RAMJI AMBEDKAR, the most grievous abuses have been outlawed, and legislation provides formerly untouchable groups with educational and vocational privileges and representation in parliament and penalizes those who prevent anyone from enjoying religious, occupational, and social rights on the grounds that he or she is an untouchable.

UPĀDHI (Sanskrit: “imposition”), in Indian philosophy, the concept of adventitious limiting conditions. In BHEDĀBHEDA philosophy, the concept of upādhi is used to account for the relationship between BRAHMAN, the supreme being, and its product, the world: Brahman and world are nondifferent in their essence but are different inasmuch as limiting conditions such as time and space, adventitious to this essence, are imposed on them.

UPANAYANA \ü-pə-nə-yə-nə\, Hindu ritual of initiation, restricted to the three upper VARNAS, or social classes; it marks the male child's entrance into the life of a student (brahmacārī) and his acceptance as a full member of his religious community. The ceremony is performed between the ages of 5 and 24.

After a RITUAL BATH the boy is dressed as an ascetic and brought before his GURU, who invests him with a deerskin to use as an upper garment, a staff, and the sacred thread (upavīta, or yajñopavīta). The thread, consisting of a loop made of three symbolically knotted and twisted strands of cotton cord, is normally worn over the left shoulder and diagonally across the chest to the right hip. It identifies the wearer as DVĪJA, or “twice-born,” the second birth understood as having taken place with the imparting by the guru to the student of the “Gāyatrī” MANTRA, a sacred verse of the ṚG VEDA.

The initiation ceremony concludes with the student's kindling of the sacrificial fire and his begging for alms, symbolic of his dependence on others during his brahmacārī period. The observance of upanayana is increasingly confined to more orthodox Hindus, particularly BRAHMINS. Although the DHARMA ŚĀSTRA claims that marriage is a woman's upanayana, there are also such RITES OF PASSAGE for girls, but from oral, non-Sanskrit sources.

A corresponding rite among PARSIS is called nowzād (Persian: “new birth”); it invests both six-year-old boys and girls with a thread worn around the waist. Some scholars suggest that this indicates a common and ancient Indo-Iranian origin of the two ceremonies.

UPANISHAD \ü-'pə-ni,-shəd, -'pä-ni,-shäd\, Sanskrit Upaniṣad (“Connection”), any of the speculative texts of the VEDAS that contain elaborations in prose and verse.

The Upanishads, of which some 108 are known, record the views of Hindu teachers and sages who were active as early as 1000 BCE and who flourished about 600 BCE. The texts form the basis of later Indian philosophy. They represent the final stage in the tradition of the Vedas; the teaching based on them is known as the VEDĀNTA (Sanskrit: “Conclusion of the Veda”). The older Upanishads may be part of the BRĀHMAṆAS (commentaries) of their respective Vedas but are distinguished from them by increased philosophical and mystical questioning and by their diminished concern with Vedic deities and sacrificial rites.

The special philosophical concern of the Upanishads is with the nature of reality. There is a development toward the concept of a single supreme being, and knowledge is directed toward reunion with it. Some of the Upanishads equate ĀTMAN (the self) with BRAHMAN (ultimate reality). The nature of morality and of eternal life are discussed, as are themes such as the transmigration of souls and causality in creation.

UPĀSAKA \ü-'pä-sə-kə\, feminine upāsikā (Sanskrit: “servant”), lay devotee of the BUDDHA GOTAMA. The term refers to any Buddhist who is not a member of a monastic order, but its modern usage in Southeast Asia more often connotes the pious person who visits the monastery on the weekly holy days and who undertakes special vows.

BUDDHISM has always accepted men and women of any race, social class, or CASTE. Believers must affirm the TRIRATNA (“Threefold Refuge”), which includes the Buddha, the DHARMA (teachings), and the SANGHA (community of believers). The layperson must observe the five precepts (not to kill, steal, commit sexual misconduct, lie, or take intoxicants) and must give alms to the monasteries.

The THERAVĀDA Buddhist tradition distinguishes between the religious paths of the layperson and the monk; achievement of NIRVANA (spiritual emancipation) is considered possible only if a devotee renounces worldly life and joins a monastic order. The MAHĀYĀNA tradition of Tibet and East Asia, however, recognizes several celebrated spiritual masters who at the same time have been married householders.

UPASAMPADA \ü-pə-'səm-pə-dä\, Buddhist rite of higher ORDINATION, by which a novice becomes a monk, or BHIKṢU. Ordination is not necessarily permanent and may be repeated. A candidate for ordination must be at least 20 years old, have parental consent, be exempt from military service, be free from debt and from contagious disease, and have received at least some instruction in BUDDHISM.

The ceremony may be performed on any day determined to be auspicious, except during VASSA (varsā), the rainy season retreat. It takes place within the SANCTUARY in the presence of ordained monks. The pabbajja, or ceremony of ordination to the rank of novice, is repeated even if the candidate has undergone it previously. He dons the garments of a monk and repeats the TRIRATNA (“Threefold Refuge”) of the BUDDHA, the DHARMA (teaching), and the SANGHA (community of believers) and the 10 precepts (basic rules of ethical conduct for a monk); the candidate then stands before the assembly in the company of his sponsors and is questioned on his fitness to be received into the order. The assembly is questioned three times, and, if there is no objection the candidate is accepted into the PRIESTHOOD. Female novices are ordained nuns (bhikṣuṇīs) in a similar rite.

UPPSALA \ü-p, -sä-lä\, city and capital of the län (county) of Uppsala, east-central Sweden. Originally known as Östra Aros, it was founded as a trading post at the head of navigation on the Fyris River at a point a few miles from Gamla (Old) Uppsala, which was the political and religious center of the ancient kingdom of Svea. Adam of Bremen described the pre-Christian temple there: the building was made of wood covered in gold and reputedly contained statues of THOR, WODAN (ODIN), and Fricco (FREY). By the 13th century the new Uppsala had become a royal residence and an important commercial center. Although it later relinquished its political primacy to Stockholm, Uppsala has remained a religious center as the seat of the archbishop of Sweden.

‘UQQĀL \ü-'käl\ (Arabic: “the wise”), singular ‘aqil \ä-kil\, in the DRUZE religion, elite of initiates who alone know Druze doctrine (ḥikma, literally “wisdom”), participate fully in the Druze religious services, and have access to Druze SCRIPTURE. The religion is kept secret from the rest of their numbers, who are known as juhḥāl (“the ignorant”), and from the outside world. Any Druze man or woman deemed worthy is eligible for admission into the ‘uqqāl.

Once initiated, the ‘uqqāl adopt distinctive dress and white turbans and must pursue lives of religious piety, sobriety, and virtue. They abstain from alcohol and tobacco and attend secret Thursday-evening services at the khilwa, a house of worship usually located outside the village. The ‘uqqāl are further bound by the seven Druze principles of conduct: utter honesty under all circumstances but specifically avoidance of theft, murder, and adultery; Druze solidarity; renunciation of other religions; avoidance of unbelievers; belief in the oneness of God; acceptance of God’s acts; and submission to God’s will.

The ‘uqqāl may deepen their knowledge of Druze doctrine until some become “the generous,” ajāwīd. The more learned or devout among the ‘uqqāl are distinguished as SHAYKHS and after special schooling devote themselves to the study and copying of the religious texts.

The ‘uqqāl bear responsibility for the juhḥāl, who are denied the possibility of spiritual growth. The juhḥāl, whose lives are not so restricted morally as those of the ‘uqqāl, are aware of the doctrine of the unity of God and possess mythologies of creation and of tanāsukh, transmigration, in which Druze souls are always reborn as Druze souls.

URBAN II, POPE, original name Odo of Châtillon-sur-marne, or Odo of Lagery, or of Lagny, (b. c. 1035, Châtillon-sur-Marne, or Lagery, or Lagny, Champagne, France—d. July 29, 1099, Rome) pope (1088–99) who launched the CRUSADES.

Odo, born of noble parents, was archdeacon in the diocese of Reims and then prior superior (c. 1070–74) at CLUNY. In 1079 he went to Rome on a mission for his abbot; while there he was made cardinal and bishop of Ostia by GREGORY VII. During the INVESTITURE CONTROVERSY, Odo remained loyal to the legitimate papacy. He was elected pope on March 12, 1088.

As pope, Urban worked to secure his position against the antipope. Despite attempts at reconciliation, he was unable to come to terms with the emperor Henry IV. Although Urban had been recognized in England since 1095, conflict between ANSELM, who was named archbishop of Canterbury, and King William II strained relations between Urban and the king. Despite a long-standing conflict between Philip I of France and Urban, France emerged as an important supporter of the papacy. Urban also obtained special support from the Normans of southern Italy and Sicily.

In 1095, Urban initiated the First Crusade, his most important accomplishment. His call, issued at the council of Clermont, was enthusiastically supported by the knights of Christian Europe. His idea for a crusade sprang from his notion of the unity of all Christendom and from his experiences with the struggles against the Muslims in Spain and Sicily. Support for the crusade, which enjoyed success with the conquest of Jerusalem in 1099, strengthened Urban’s position in his contest with the antipope. Urban’s pontificate also contributed to the development of the ROMAN CURIA, the administrative body of the papacy (the term Curia Romana first appeared in a bull written by Urban in 1089), and to the gradual formation of the College of Cardinals. Urban was beatified in 1881 by POPE LEO XIII.

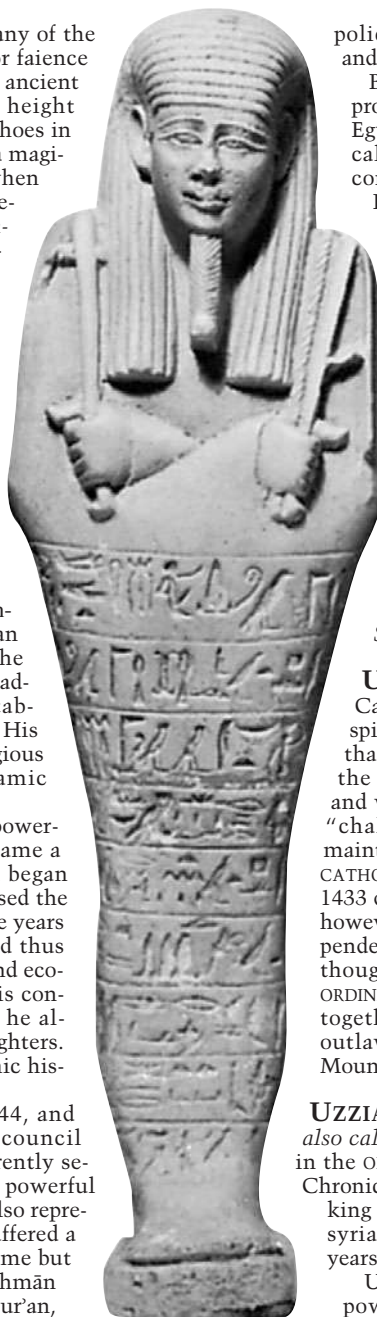

USHABTI FIGURE \ü-'shāb-tē, -'shab-\, any of the small statuettes made of wood, stone, or faience that are often found in large numbers in ancient Egyptian tombs. The figures range in height from four to nine inches and often hold hoes in their arms. Their purpose was to act as a magical substitute for the deceased owner when the gods requested him to undertake menial tasks in the afterlife. The word ushabti is sometimes translated “answer-er,” on the assumption that it is a derivative of usheb (“to answer [for]”); however, this etymology is not easily reconcilable with shawabti, the earlier form of the word, the origin of which is unclear. During the New Kingdom (1539–1075 BCE) the figures were made to resemble the tomb owner by being fashioned in the form of a MUMMY bearing the owner’s name.

‘UTHMĀN IBN ‘AFFĀN \üth-'mān-i-bən-af-'fān\ (d. June 17, 656, Medina, Arabian Peninsula), third CALIPH to rule after the death of MUHAMMAD. He centralized the administration of the caliphate and established an official version of the QUR’AN. His death marked the beginning of open religious and political conflicts within the Islamic community.

‘Uthmān was born into the rich and powerful Umayyad clan of MECCA, and he became a wealthy merchant. When Muhammad began preaching in Mecca c. 615, he soon aroused the hostility of the Umayyads, but about five years later ‘Uthmān accepted Muhammad and thus became the first convert of high social and economic standing. Muhammad valued this contact with the Meccan aristocracy, and he allowed ‘Uthmān to marry one of his daughters. ‘Uthmān’s role in the first years of Islamic history was essentially passive.

‘Umar, the second caliph, died in 644, and ‘Uthmān was elected successor by a council named by ‘Umar before his death, apparently selected as a compromise when the more powerful candidates canceled each other out. He also represented the Umayyad clan, which had suffered a partial eclipse during the Prophet’s lifetime but was now reasserting itself. As caliph ‘Uthmān promulgated an official version of the Qur’an, which had existed in various versions. He continued the conquests that had steadily increased the size of the Islamic empire, but the victories now came at a greater cost and brought less booty in return. ‘Uthmān tried to create a cohesive central authority to replace the loose tribal alliance that had emerged under Muhammad. He established a system of landed fiefs and distributed many of the provincial governorships to members of his family. Thus much of the treasure received by the central government went to ‘Uthmān’s family and to other provincial governors rather than to the army. As a result of his policies, ‘Uthmān was opposed by the army, and he was often dominated by his relatives.

By 650 rebellions had broken out in the provinces of Egypt and Iraq. In 655 a group of Egyptians marched upon MEDINA, the seat of caliphal authority. ‘Uthmān, however, was conciliatory, and the rebels headed back to Egypt. Shortly thereafter, however, another group of rebels besieged ‘Uthmān in his home, and, after several days of desultory fighting, he was killed. See also COMPANIONS OF THE PROPHET.

UTNAPISHTIM \üt-nä-'pish-tim\, in the Babylonian GILGAMESH epic, survivor of a mythological flood whom Gilgamesh consults about the secret of immortality. Utnapishtim was the only man to escape death, since, having preserved human and animal life in the great boat he built, he and his wife were deified by the god ENLIL. Utnapishtim directed Gilgamesh to a plant that would renew his youth, but the hero failed to return with it to his home city. See NOAH; ZIUSUDRA.

UTRAQUIST \'yü-trə-kwist, 'ü-\, also called Calixtin, or Calixtine \kə-'liks-tin\, any of the spiritual descendants of JAN HUS who believed that the laity, like the clergy, should receive the EUCHARIST under the forms of both bread and wine (Latin utraque, “each of two”; calix, “chalice”). The Utraquists were moderates, maintaining amicable relations with the ROMAN CATHOLIC church, and the Council of Basel in 1433 declared them to be true Christians. When, however, the Utraquists developed into an independent church, Rome withheld approval, even though Roman bishops officiated at Utraquist ORDINATIONS to the PRIESTHOOD. The Utraquists, together with all other Protestant sects, were outlawed in Bohemia after the Battle of White Mountain in 1620.

UZZIAH \ə-'zī-ə\, also spelled Ozias \ð-'zī-əs\, also called Azariah \a-zə-'rī-ə\, or Azarias \-'rī-əs\, in the OLD TESTAMENT (2 Kings 14:21–22; 15:2–3; 2 Chronicles 26), son and successor of Amaziah, and king of JUDAH for 52 years (c. 791–739 BCE). Assyrian records indicate that he reigned for 42 years (c. 783–742).

Uzziah’s reign marked the height of Judah’s power. He fought successfully against other nations, exacted tribute from the AMMONITES, and expanded Judah westward with settlements in Philistia. Jerusalem’s walls were reconstructed, towers were added, and engines of war were mounted at strategic points. A large army was also maintained. According to the biblical record, Uzziah’s strength caused him to become proud: he attempted to burn incense in the Temple, an act restricted to priests. When the priests attempted to send him from the Temple, the king became angry and was immediately stricken with leprosy. His son Jotham ruled for his father until Uzziah died.

VAHANA \ˈvə-hə-nə\ (Sanskrit: “mount,” or “vehicle”), in Hindu mythology, the creature that serves as the vehicle and as the sign of a particular deity. The vahana accompanies, pulls the chariot of, or serves as the seat or mount of his god. The vahana is used on banners and emblems to identify the god or the cult affiliation of the devotee.

Some scholars understand the concept as a way of incorporating local theriomorphic (animal form) deities into the classical pantheon of Hindu deities. Others suggest the mythological pattern might have been borrowed from Mesopotamian art and mythology. The vahanas of the major gods, such as SHIVA’s bull Nandi and VISHNU’s bird GARUDA, have a considerable mythology of their own.

The vahanas of other gods include the hamsa (goose or swan) of BRAHMA, the rat of GANEŚA, the peacock of SKANDA, the elephant Airavata of INDRA, the parrot of KĀMA, the owl of LAKŚMĪ, the lion of PĀRVATĪ, and the man of KUBERA.

VAILALA MADNESS \vī-ˈlā-lə\, CARGO CULT of the Papua area (now Papua New Guinea) that began in 1919. This movement was based on the revelations of local prophets that the ancestors were withholding European material goods from indigenous peoples. Cult doctrines included the iconoclastic destruction of old ceremonial objects and the moral, social, and logistical preparation for the arrival of vast quantities of Western “cargo,” expected to be delivered by ship or plane. Cargo cults such as the Vailala Madness were widespread in New Guinea, the Bismarcks, and parts of the Solomons and New Hebrides, and some of the movements were highly political and explicitly anticolonial in character.

VÄINÄMÖINEN \ˈvɑ-ē-nɑ-mœ-ē-nen, Angl \ˈvɑ-nə-moi-nən\, in Finnish mythology, seer and culture hero credited with the invention of the kantele, a harp-like instrument. He played a prominent role in the KALEVALA.

VAIRĀGĪ \vī-ˈrɑ-gē\, in HINDUISM, a religious ascetic who principally worships a form of VISHNU. Vairāgīs generally wear white robes, in contrast to the ochre-colored robes worn by Śaiva ascetics (see ŚAIVISM), while their TILAK is never made of ash and is always vertical in design. Most reside in monastic communities called sthānas (“spots” or “places”); but the militant nagna (“naked”) vairāgīs form their own groups, called akhāṛās. In the past, battles between groups of naked ascetics belonging to different sects centered mainly on bathing and processional rights during PILGRIMAGE assemblies, such as the KUMBH MELA.

VAIROCANA \vī-ˈrō-chə-nə\ (Sanskrit: “Illuminator”), also called Mahāvairocana \mə-ˈhɑ-vī-ˈrō-chə-nə\ (“Great Illuminator”), recognized by many MAHĀYĀNA and Esoteric Buddhists (that is, Tantric, see VAJRAYĀNA) as the supreme buddha who is the cosmic counterpart of Śākyamuni in his teaching mode. Some traditions view Vairocana and Mahāvairocana as separate, but others conflate them into one deity.

Vairocana is a great celestial buddha with a Vedic background. In the Mahāyāna/Esoteric tradition (particularly in Tibet) he is given special prominence in the set of five DHYĀNI or self-born buddhas. In some contexts he is regarded as the progenitor of the other four; in some cases Mahāvairocana becomes the buddha who transcends the set of five in which Vairocana is included. Vairocana is given a special role in the Avatamsaka Sūtra (and in the HUA-YEN/Kegon school) where he is recognized as the solar buddha who is both the ultimate reality of the cosmos and the one who pervades all of its component parts.

In the Esoteric tradition there are two texts—the Mahāvairocana Sūtra and Tattvasaṃgraha—in which Mahāvairocana is installed as the supreme buddha and associated with highly sophisticated forms of Esoteric ritual. These texts played a significant role in TIBETAN BUDDHISM, but in East Asia they became the most authoritative texts for the Ch’en-yen school in China and the much more important SHINGON sect in Japan. In the Shingon school Mahāvairocana is known as Dainichi Nyorai (“Great Sun Buddha”) or Roshana. He is frequently represented in Japanese painting and sculpture. As the supreme buddha, his characteristic gesture is the MUDRĀ of the six elements, in which the index finger of the left hand is clasped by the five fingers of the right, symbolizing the uniting of the five elements of the material world (earth, water, fire, air, and ether) with the spiritual world (consciousness).

VAIŚEŚIKA \vī-ˈshā-shi-kə\ (Sanskrit: “Distinction,” or “Characteristic”), one of the six orthodox systems (DARŚANS) of Indian philosophy, significant for its NATURALISM.

The Sanskrit philosopher Kaṇāda Kāśyapa (2nd–3rd century CE?) expounded its theories and is credited with founding the school. Important later commentaries were written by Praśastapāda, Udayana, and Śrīdhara. The VAIŚEŚIKA school fused entirely with the NYĀYA school by the 11th century. Thereafter the combined school was referred to as Nyāya-Vaiśeśika.

The Vaiśeśika school attempts to identify, inventory, and classify the entities and their relations that present themselves to human perceptions. It lists six categories of being (padārthas), to which was later added a seventh. These are:

(1) Dravya, the substratum that exists independently of all other categories, and the material cause of all compound things produced from it. Dravyas are nine in number: earth, water, fire, air, ether, time, space, spirit, and mind.

(2) Guṇa, or quality, which in turn is subdivided into 24 individual species.

(3) KARMA, or action. Both guṇa and karma inhere within dravya and cannot exist independently of it.

(4) Sāmānya, or genus, which denotes characteristic similarities that allow for two or more objects to be classed together.

(5) Viśeṣa, or specific difference, which singles out an individual of that class, and for which this school of philosophy is named.

(6) Samavāya, or inherence, which indicates things inseparably connected.

To these six was later added abhāva, nonexistence or absence. Four absences are recognized: previous absence, as of a new product; later absence, as of a destroyed object; total absence, as of color in the wind; and reciprocal absence, as of a jar and a cloth, neither of which is the other.

The Vaiśeṣika system holds that the smallest, indivisible, indestructible part of the world is an atom (aṇu). All physical things are a combination of the atoms of earth, water, fire, and air. Inactive and motionless in themselves, the atoms are put into motion by God's will and through the unseen forces of moral merit and demerit.

VAIṢNAVA-SAHAJĪYĀ \ˈvīsh-nə-və-sə-hə-ˈjē-yā-,shə-ˈ- see SAHAJĪYĀ.

VAIṢNAVISM \ˈvīsh-nə-vi-zəm\, also called Vishnuism \ˈvīsh-nü-i-zəm\, or Viṣṇuism, worship of the god VISHNU and of his INCARNATIONS, principally as RĀMA and as KRISHNA. It is one of the major forms of modern HINDUISM—with ŚAIVISM and ŚĀKTISM.

A major characteristic of Vaiṣṇavism is the emphasis on BHAKTI, or religious devotion. The ultimate goal of the devotee is to escape from the cycle of birth and death to enjoy the presence of Vishnu. This cannot be achieved without the grace of God. For his part, the devotee must cultivate the auxiliary disciplines of KARMA and JÑĀNA.

Sectarian Vaiṣṇavism began in the cult of Vāsudeva-Krishna, who may have been a Yādava tribal leader (c. 7th–6th century BCE). The VĀSUDEVA cult coalesced with others worshipping the deified sage Nārāyaṇa so that by about the 2nd century CE Vāsudeva, Krishna, and Nārāyaṇa appeared in the BHAGAVAD GĪTĀ as interchangeable names of Lord Vishnu. The cult of the pastoral Krishna was soon added.

The philosophical schools of Vaiṣṇavism differ in their interpretation of the relationship between individual souls and God. The doctrines of the most important schools are (1) VIŚIṢṬĀDVAITA (“qualified monism”), associated with the name of RĀMĀNUJA (11th century) and continued by the ŚRĪ VAIṢNAVA sect, prominent in South India; (2) DVAITA (“dualism”), the principal exponent of which was MADHVA (13th century), who taught that although the soul is dependent on God the two are separate entities; (3) dvaitādvaita (“dualistic monism”), taught by NIMBĀRKA (12th century), according to which the world of souls and matter is both different and not different from God; (4) śuddhādvaita (“pure monism”) of VALLABHA, which explains the world without the doctrine of MĀYĀ (illusion); (5) acintya-bhedābheda (“inconceivable duality and nonduality”), the doctrine of CAITANYA, in which the relation between the world of souls and matter and God is not to be grasped by thought but is both different and nondifferent.

In addition to these philosophical schools, each of which has its own sectarian following, Vaiṣṇavism also includes a number of popular expressions of devotionism, which were furthered in the late medieval period by the vernacular writings of RĀMĀNANDA and his disciples and by Vaiṣṇava poets such as TULSĪDĀS in the Hindi area, MĪRĀBĀĪ in Gujarāt, and NĀMDEV and TUKĀRĀM in the Marāthā country.

VAIŚYA \ˈvīsh-yə\, also spelled Vaishya, third highest in ritual status of the four VARNAS, or social classes, of Hindu

India, traditionally described as commoners. Legend states that the varṇas sprang from Prajapati—in order of status, the BRAHMIN (white) from his head, the KṢĀTRIYA (red) from his arms, the VAIŚYA (yellow) from his thighs, and the ŚŪDRA (black) from his feet. Vaiśyas were commoners who engaged in productive labor, agricultural and pastoral tasks, and trading. Early SCRIPTURES show that Vaiśyas could and occasionally did rise even to the rank of Brahmin, as in the case of the two sons of Nābhāgarīṣṭa, mentioned in the sacred work Harivaṃśa.

Like the two higher classes, Vaiśyas are DVĪJA, or “twice-born,” achieving their spiritual rebirth when they assume the sacred wool thread at the UPANAYANA ceremony. Vaiśyas, along with Kṣātriyas, are credited in history with favoring the rise of the reformist religious beliefs of BUDDHISM and JAINISM. In modern times, the Vaiśya class has become a stepping-stone used by Indians to raise their status in the system through modified behavior and via the adoption of more prestigious CASTE names.

VAJRA \ˈvəj-rə\, Tibetan Rdo-Rje \ˈdōr-jā\, five-pronged ritual object extensively employed in Tibetan Buddhism. Vajra, in Sanskrit, has both the meanings of “thunderbolt” and “diamond.” Like the thunderbolt, the vajra cleaves through ignorance. The thunderbolt was originally the symbol of the Hindu god INDRA (who became the Buddhist Śakra) and was employed by the Tantric master PADMASAMBHAVA to conquer the non-Buddhist deities of Tibet. Like the diamond, the vajra destroys but is itself indestructible and is thus likened to śūnya (that is, the all-inclusive void).

In ritual use the vajra is frequently employed in conjunction with the bell (Sanskrit ghaṇṭā; Tibetan dril bu). The various gestures (MUDRĀS), when correctly executed, are believed to have considerable metaphysical power; the vajra (symbolizing the male principle, fitness of action) is held in the right hand and the bell (symbolizing the female principle, intelligence) in the left hand, the interaction of the two ultimately leading to enlightenment. In art the vajra is an attribute of many divinities, such as the celestial Buddha AKṢOBHYA and his manifestation as VAJRAPĀṆĪ (In Whose Hand Is the Vajra). The vajra is the symbol of the VAJRĀYĀNA school of BUDDHISM. The viśva-vajra is a double vajra.

VAJRABODHI \ˈvəj-rə-ˈbō-dē\, Indian Buddhist monk who helped transmit BUDDHISM to China. Vajrabodhi and his disciple AMOGHAVAJRA arrived in China in 720, where they produced two abridged translations of the Sarvatathagatatattvasamgraha (“Symposium of Truth of All the Buddhas”), also known as the Tattvasamgraha. This work and the Ma-hāvairocana Sūtra became the two basic Chen-yen texts.

VAJRAPĀṆĪ \ˌvəj-rə-ˈpā-nē\ (Sanskrit: “Thunderbolt-Bearer”), in Buddhist mythology, one of the great celestial BODHISATTVAs of the MAHĀYĀNA and Esoteric (VAJRAYĀNA) traditions. Vajrapāṇi first appears as one of the two attendants of the BUDDHA GOTAMA, probably as a replacement for INDRA who seems to have played this role at an earlier date. Later, in the Esoteric, or Tantric, tradition, he emerged as the bodhisattva who headed one of the three major Buddha “families” that were recognized. His “family” consisted of fierce deities he was able to control through the use of his VAJRA (thunderbolt).

VAJRAYĀNA \ˌvəj-rə-ˈyā-nə\ (Sanskrit: “Vehicle of the Diamond” [or “Thunderbolt”]), a form of Esoteric (Tantric) BUDDHISM that emerged in India in the 1st millennium CE. This form of Esoteric Buddhism developed rapidly in India and subsequently spread to Tibet, where it has remained the dominant tradition in TIBETAN BUDDHISM.

Vajrayāna Buddhists extended MAHĀYĀNA Buddhism by recognizing new buddhas, BODHISATTVAs, and related figures, including many who exhibited a fierceness not previously associated with members of the Buddhist pantheon, as well as a significant number who were feminine. Vajrayāna teachers also extended Mahāyāna doctrine by placing a special emphasis on the notion that Enlightenment arises from the realization that seemingly opposite principles are in truth one. The passive concepts sūnyatā (“voidness”) and prajñā (“wisdom”), for example, must be resolved with the active karuṇā (“compassion”) and upāya (“means”). This fundamental polarity in the world, and its resolution, as well, are often expressed through symbols of sexuality.

The most crucial Vajrayāna innovations occurred at the level of practice. The distinctive genre of Vajrayāna texts (the TANTRAS), and the ORAL TRADITIONS associated with them, focus very strongly on matters of ritual practice and correlated meditative techniques. These practices and techniques involved use of MANTRAS (sacred sounds, syllables, or phrases), the widespread deployment of visual or iconographic symbols (including sacred MANDALAS depicting various configurations of the Buddhist cosmos) and—in some relatively rare cases—yogically-disciplined sexual activities. The Vajrayānists believed that these practices and techniques could lead, even in this life, to the attainment of Buddhahood itself.

VĀKI \ˈva-kē\, supernatural power believed by the Baltic Finns to reside in various natural sites, objects, and animals. Vāki was often conceived of as an impersonal power, but it also referred to the agents of the power, diffuse spiritual entities that frequent natural sites or man-made places, such as cemeteries or other religious locales. People with special gifts were able to see the individual entities that constituted what was generally conceived as a vague impersonal power.

VALENTINE, SAINT \ˈva-lən-tīn\ (d. 3rd century, Rome; feast day February 14), name of two legendary martyrs whose lives seem to be historically based. One was a Roman priest and physician who suffered martyrdom during the persecution of Christians by the emperor Claudius II Gothicus and was buried on the Via Flaminia. Pope St. Julius I reportedly built a BASILICA over his grave. The other, bishop of Terni, Italy, was martyred, apparently also in Rome, and his relics were later taken to Terni. St. Valentine’s Day as a lovers’ festival dates at least from the 14th century.

VALENTINUS \ˌva-lən-ˈtī-nəs\ (fl. 2nd century CE), Egyptian religious philosopher, founder of a Roman and Alexandrian GNOSTIC school. Valentinian communities, founded by his disciples, provided the major challenge to 2nd- and 3rd-century Christian theology.

Valentinus studied philosophy at Alexandria, was said to have been educated by Theodas, a pupil of ST. PAUL, and was baptized a Christian. According to documentary fragments of 2nd- and 3rd-century theologians, Valentinus moved to Rome about 136 and for some 25 years expounded his synthesis of Christian and Near Eastern Gnostic teaching. Aspiring to be bishop of Rome, he left the Christian community when he was passed over for that office around 140 CE.

On abandoning Rome about 160 for Cyprus, and possibly Alexandria, Valentinus continued to develop his system of religious philosophy. He is the reputed author of the Gospel of Truth, which achieved a fusion of Christian Pauline theology with Gnostic principles. The Valentinian system developed into Eastern and Western forms, although the earlier structure was similar to Pauline mystical theology, with its emphasis on the instrumentality of Christ’s death and RESURRECTION in effecting salvation. Valentinian doctrine had a notable influence on the later rise of anthropocentric modes of Christian spirituality, leaving traces in every era of the church down to the present, culminating in the emergence of a Western prototype, PELAGIANISM.

VALHALLA \ˌval-ˈhɑ-lə, -ˈhɑ-\, Old Norse Valhöll \ˈvāl-hœl\, in GERMANIC RELIGION, hall of slain warriors, who live blissfully under the leadership of the god ODIN. Valhalla is depicted as a splendid palace, roofed with shields, where the warriors feast on the flesh of a boar slaughtered daily and made whole again each evening. They drink mead that flows from the udders of a goat, and their sport is to fight one another every day, with the slain being revived in the evening. Thus they will live until the RAGNARÖK, when they will march out the 540 doors of the palace to fight at the side of Odin against the GIANTS.

VALKYRIE \ˌval-ˈkir-ē, -ˈkī-rē; ˈval-kə-rē\, also spelled Walkyrie \ˌvāl-ˈkir-ē, -ˈkī-rē; ˈvāl-kə-rē\, Old Norse Valkyrja (“Chooser of the Slain”), in GERMANIC RELIGION, any of a group of maidens who were sent by the god ODIN to the battlefields to choose the slain who were worthy of a place in VALHALLA. They rode to the battlefield on horses, wearing helmets and shields; in some accounts, they flew through the air and sea. Some Valkyries had the power to cause the death of the warriors they did not favor; others guarded the lives and ships of those dear to them. They were associated with fairness, brightness, and gold, as well as bloodshed.

VALLABHA \ˈvəl-ləb, -lə-bə\, also called Vallabhācārya \ˈvəl-lə-,bə-ˈchär-yə\ (b. 1479?, Cauḍānagar, near Raichur, Madhya Pradesh, India—d. 1531, Banaras), Hindu philosopher and founder of the important and influential devotional sect, the Vallabha SAMPRADĀYA, also known as the puṣṭi-mārga (“the way of flourishing”). Vallabha’s sect propagated the doctrine of BHAKTI (devotion) to KRISHNA.

Born to a Telegu Brahmin family, Vallabha initiated his first disciple in 1494 at Gokul, across the JAMUNĀ River from Mathura, upon receiving a revelation of Krishna. Nearby Govardhan, the sacred mountain of Braj, became the center of his activities; Krishna’s manifestation in an image as lord of the mountain (Govardhanāthjī) is said to have coincided exactly with Vallabha’s own birth. With funding from a wealthy merchant, Vallabha constructed a new temple to Govardhanāthjī (Śrī Nāthjī for short), which housed the life-size image until it fled the advances of the Mughal emperor Aurangzeb in 1669. Śrī Nāthjī eventually was resettled in NATHDVARA, near Udaipur, western Rajasthan, which is the present headquarters of the sect. A strong basis in the merchant communities of north and west India continues to serve as its backbone; lineal descendants of Vallabha are the GURUS in its several baiṭhaks or gaddis (“seats”).

Vallabha’s theological system is called śuddhāvaita (“pure nondualism”), and is notable for its thoroughgoing (“pure”) affirmation of the phenomenal world, which it regards as an emanation and expression—although in veiled form—of Krishna himself. Hence God is never to be worshiped by renunciation or self-deprivation, but by regarding every aspect of this world, including one’s physical substance, as Krishna’s gracious gift. The community’s ritual life bears this out, with punctilious attention to regular offerings of music, decoration, and cuisine and a proscribing of anything unjoyful, which would show ingratitude for the Lord’s bounty. It finds ritual expression not just in the eschewing of any monastic order as part of the sect but in the insistence that each Vallabhite temple is a havelī, a part of the home of one of Vallabha’s descendants and therefore a feature of his family life. As initiates, all members of the sampradāya belong to that family. Similarly, home worship is the community’s main ritual focus.

Vallabha was married and had two sons, though surprisingly he became a SANNYĀSĪ (ascetic) shortly before his death. His son Viṭṭhala succeeded him as head of the sect and was probably its organizational genius, even more so than his father.

VĀMANA \ˈvā-mə-nə\, fifth of the 10 AVATARS of the Hindu god VISHNU. He made his appearance when the DEMON king Bali ruled the entire universe and the gods had lost their power. One day the dwarf Vāmana visited the court of Bali and begged of him as much land as he could step over in three paces. The king laughingly granted the request. Vāmana with one step covered the whole earth, and with the second step the midworld between earth and heaven. As there was nowhere left to go, the demon king lowered his head and suggested Vāmana place his foot on it for the promised third step. Vāmana was pleased, and with the pressure of his foot sent Bali down below to rule the netherworld.

VAMSA \ˈvəm-sə\, particular class of Buddhist literature that in many ways resembles conventional Western histories. The word vamśa means “lineage,” or “family,” but when it is used to refer to a particular class of narratives it can be translated as “chronicle,” or “history.” These texts, which may be ecclesiastically oriented, dynastically oriented, or both at the same time, usually either relate the lineage of a particular individual, king, or family or describe in concrete terms the history of a particular object, region, place, or thing.

Three of the most famous vamśas in the South Asian context are the Buddhavamśa, Dipavamśa, and Mahāvamśa.

The Buddhavamśa provides an account of the lineage of 24 buddhas who preceded the historical Buddha, Gotama. The Dipavamśa primarily chronicles the history of the island of Ceylon (Sri Lanka) from the time of the BUDDHA GOTAMA until the end of the reign of Mahāsena (4th century CE). The Mahāvamśa, attributed to Mahānāma, is also a history of Ceylon, but it is composed in a more refined and polished style, and it includes more details than the Dipavamśa.

Some vamśas are devoted to chronicling particular objects or places of note in Buddhist history. The Dā- thāvamaṣa, for example, tells the history of the Buddha's tooth relic until it reached Ceylon in the 9th century CE. The Thūpavaṃsa, dating from the 13th century, purports to be an account of the history and construction of the great STUPA in Ceylon during the reign of King Duttagāmaṇi in the 1st century BCE. The Sāsanavaṃsa, compiled in the 19th century, is a Burmese text of ecclesiastical orientation that charts the history of central India up to the time of the third Buddhist council and then provides an account of the missionary activities of monks in other countries. The Sangītivamaṣa, an 18th-century text from Thailand, combines many of these themes, since it gives an account of the Buddha lineage; presents a history of BUDDHISM in India, Sri Lanka, and, especially, Thailand; and provides an account of the decline of the Buddhist age.

VANIR \ˈvā-nir\, in GERMANIC RELIGION, race of gods responsible for wealth, fertility, and commerce and subordinate to the warlike AESIR. As reparation for the torture of their goddess Gullveig, the Vanir demanded from the Aesir monetary satisfaction or equal status. Declaring war instead, the Aesir suffered numerous defeats before granting equality. The Vanir sent their gods NJÖRD and FREY to live with the Aesir and received Hoenir and MIMIR in exchange. The birth of the poet-god KVASIR resulted from the peace ritual in which the two races mingled their saliva in the same vessel. Only three Vanir are known, namely Njörd, the god of the wealth of the sea, and his children Frey and FREYJA.

VARĀHA \və-ˈrā-hə\, third of the 10 AVATARS of the Hindu god VISHNU. When the DEMON Hiraṇyākṣa dragged the earth to the bottom of the sea, Vishnu took the form of Varāha, a boar, in order to rescue it. Varāha and Hiraṇyākṣa fought for a thousand years. Varāha slew the demon and raised the earth out of the water with his tusks. The myth reflects an earlier creation legend of PRAJĀPATI, who assumed the shape of a boar to lift the earth up out of the primeval waters.

VARANASI (VĀRĀNASĪ) \vā-ˈrā-nə-sē, vār-ä-ˈnə-sē\, also called Banaras, Benares \bə-ˈnär-əs\, or Kāśī \kə-ˈshē\, city, southeastern Uttar Pradesh state, northern India. It is located on the left bank of the GAṄGĀ RIVER (Ganges River) and is one of the seven sacred cities of the Hindus.

Varanasi is one of the oldest continuously inhabited cities in the world, and was already an important center of religious learning when the BUDDHA GOTAMA (6th century BCE) came there to preach his first sermon at nearby Sarnath. The city remained a center of religious, educational, and artistic activities as attested by the celebrated Chinese traveler HSÜAN-TSANG, who visited it in about 635 CE. Many of Varanasi's temples were destroyed—sometimes more than once—during the period of Muslim domination that began with the establishment of the Delhi Sultanate in 1206, with the result that no major religious structure survives intact from a period before the rule of the Mughal emperor Aurangzeb in the 17th century. By the same token, however, Varanasi's significant Muslim presence has contributed greatly to its religious landscape. In the late 17th century, with the dissolution of the Mughal empire, Varanasi became the seat of an independent Hindu kingdom. It lasted until British annexation in 1794, when a new period of interreligious ferment—this time with Christian missionaries—began.

Many of the foci of religious life in modern-day Varanasi, including the temples of Viśvanāth ("Lord of the World," i.e., SHIVA) and the goddess Annapūrṇā, which are at the heart of the city, date to the period of 18th century reconstruction, financed especially by MARĀTHĀ commercial interests. Others, such as the Tulsī Mānas temple that honors the 16th–17th-century saint TULSIDĀS and his RĀMCARITMĀNAS, are 20th-century creations. At Sarnath, a few miles north of Varanasi, there are ruins of ancient Buddhist monasteries, as well as temples built by the MAHĀBODHI SOCIETY, headquartered in Sri Lanka, and by Japanese, Burmese, and Tibetan Buddhists. Varanasi has perhaps the finest river frontage in India, with miles of ghāts, or steps, for religious bathing; an array of shrines, temples, and palaces rises tier on tier from the water's edge. The sacred city is bounded by a circumambulatory road known as Pañcakoṣī; many Hindus hope to walk this road and to visit the city once in a lifetime. Some also hope to die there in old age, for it is said that to die in Varanasi is to gain instant access to liberation (MOKṢA). This follows from the city's reputation as being the living emblem (LIṄGA) of Shiva, connecting this plane of existence with the beyond, and from its position on the Gaṅgā, which is believed to have eternally purifying powers. Similarly, unlike any other city, Varanasi positions its most important CREMATION ground, Manikarnikā Ghāt, at the very center of its riverfront rather than exiling it to the periphery of urban settlement. More than one million pilgrims visit Varanasi each year.

VARṆA \ˈvər-nə, ˈvər- \, any of the four traditional social classes of Hindu India. The meaning of the word (Sanskrit: "color") suggests that class distinctions were originally based on differences in degree of skin pigmentation, but the notion of "color" may be regarded as a classification device.

The ṚG VEDA hymn 10.90 declares that the BRAHMĪN, the KṢATRIYA, the VAIŚYA, and the ŚŪDRA issued forth at creation from the mouth, arms, thighs, and feet of the primeval person (puruṣa), respectively. The Śūdras, representing the indigenous non-Aryan population, live in servitude to the other three, who are "twice-born" (DVĪJA) after undergoing the ceremony of spiritual rebirth (UPANAYANA) that initiates them into manhood. The Vaiśyas, in turn, contrast as commoners with the governing classes—i.e., the secular Kṣatriyas and the sacerdotal Brahmins. Brahmins and Kṣatriyas themselves contrast in that the former are their priests, while the latter have actual political dominion.

Within the system of the four classes (cāturvarṇya), the traditional lawgivers specified different obligations for each: the task of the Brahmin is to study and advise, the Kṣatriya to protect, the Vaiśya to cultivate, and the Śūdra to serve. The four-class system, however, was more a social model than a reality. A move to accommodate others not so distinguished led to the unofficial construction of a fifth class, the pañcama (Sanskrit: "fifth"), which include the "untouchable" (aspr̥ṣṭa) classes—and others who are outside the system and, consequently, avarṇa ("classless").

In modern times, individual CASTES have sought to raise their social rank by identifying with a particular varṇa and demanding its privileges of rank and honor.

VARUṆA \ˈvə-rū-nə \, in the Vedic phase of HINDUISM, the god-sovereign, the personification of divine authority. He is the ruler of the sky realm and the upholder of cosmic and moral law (ṛta), a duty shared with the group of gods known as the Ādityas, of whom he was the chief. He is often invoked with MITRA, who represents the juridical side of their sovereignty, or the alliance between humans, while Varuṇa represents the relationship between human and divine. In later Hinduism, Varuṇa plays a lesser role. He is guardian of the west and is associated with oceans and waters. He is often attended by the river goddesses GAṄGĀ and JAMUNĀ.

VASSA \ˈvə-sə \ (Pāli: "rains"), traditional Buddhist monastic retreat observed in Southeast Asia during the annual monsoon period. The practice may derive from the ancient custom among South Asian ascetics of retiring to a forest grove, usually near a village, during the rainy season when travel was difficult. There they continued their meditative quest and begged alms from local townspeople. Such retreats were well known in India by the time of the BUDDHA GOTAMA (6th century BCE), who after his enlightenment is said to have spent the rainy season in a sheltered spot in the forest near VARANASI.

The Buddha's followers adopted the vassa. After his death they continued to gather during the monsoon to recite the rules of Buddhist discipline and to reaffirm their commitment to the Buddha's vision of DHARMA. As the monastic community (SANGHA) became wealthier, more permanent meditation and study centers, or VIHARAS, were constructed. With the ascendancy of the Mauryan king AŚOKA (3rd century BCE), who admired and followed the Buddha's teachings, these viharas flourished throughout northeast India. The viharas are the institutional precursors of both the great Buddhist monastic centers, or MAHĀVIHĀRAS, of South and Southeast Asia and of the custom of the annual retreat still practiced in THERAVĀDA Buddhist countries. The vassa has been largely forgotten by MAHĀYĀNA Buddhists, especially those in China and Japan. In Thailand, where Buddhist males customarily spend some time in a monastery, vassa is a favored period for temporarily experiencing the life of a monk. Seniority as a monk is measured by the number of vassa seasons spent in a monastery.

VASUBANDHU \ˈvə-sü-ˈbən-dü \ (fl. 4th/5th century CE), Indian Buddhist philosopher and logician, brother of the philosopher ASAṄGA. His conversion from SARVĀSTIVĀDA to MAHĀYĀNA Buddhism is attributed to Asaṅga. Vasubandhu refined classical Indian syllogistic logic and wrote several sāstras ("treatises") holding that all seemingly external objects are only mental representations. He is the reputed author of the Abhidharmakośa, a systematization of Sarvāstivāda doctrine written before his conversion.

VĀSUDEVA \ˈvə-sü-ˈdā-və \, in HINDUISM, the patronymic of KRISHNA, who, in one tradition, was a son of Vāsudeva. Worshipers of Vāsudeva, or Krishna, formed one of the first theistic devotional movements within Hinduism. Merging with other groups, namely the BHĀGAVATA, they represented the beginnings of modern VAIŚNAVISM. In the earliest parts of the MAHĀBHĀRATA the divinity of Krishna appears open to doubt, but in the BHĀGAVAD GĪTĀ (1st–2nd century CE), Vāsudeva-Krishna was identified with the god VIŠṆU.

VATICAN CITY, in full State of the Vatican City, Italian Stato della Città del Vaticano, ecclesiastical state, seat of the ROMAN CATHOLIC church, and an enclave in Rome, situated on the west bank of the Tiber River. The Holy See is the name given to the government of the Roman Catholic church, which is led by the pope as the bishop of Rome and extends over Catholics throughout the world.

Vatican City is the world's smallest fully independent nation-state. Medieval and Renaissance walls form its boundaries except on the southeast, at St. Peter's Square. The most imposing structure is St. Peter's Basilica, built during the 4th century and rebuilt during the 16th century. Situated over the tomb of St. Peter the Apostle, it is the second largest religious building in Christendom.

From the 4th century to 1870, the Vatican controlled territory around Rome and served as capital of the Papal States. In 1929 Vatican City's sovereignty was recognized by the Fascist Italian government in the Lateran Treaty.

The pope is the head of the Roman Catholic church and has absolute executive, legislative, and judicial powers within Vatican City. Since 1984 a pontifically appointed commission of five cardinals headed by the Secretariat of State has been charged with the city's routine administration. Income is derived from the contributions of Roman Catholics worldwide, from interest on investments, and from the sale of stamps, coins, and publications.

Vatican City has numerous cultural attractions. The Vatican Museums and Galleries, the frescoes by Michelangelo in the Sistine Chapel and by Pinturicchio in the Borgia Apartment, and Raphael's Stanze ("Rooms") attract tourists from throughout the world. Years of restoration work on the Sistine Chapel frescoes, completed in 1994, revealed the vibrant color of Michelangelo's work. The Vatican Apostolic Library contains some 150,000 manuscripts and 1.6 million printed books, many from pre-Christian and early Christian times. The Vatican publishes its own daily newspaper, and its press prints books and pamphlets in 30 languages. Since 1983 the Vatican has produced its own television programs; its radio broadcasts are heard in dozens of languages. Vatican City was designated a UNESCO World Heritage site in 1984.

VATICAN COUNCIL, FIRST \ˈvɑ-ti-kən\, 20th ecumenical council of the ROMAN CATHOLIC church (1869–70), convoked by POPE PIUS IX (reigned 1846–78). The council, which was never formally dissolved, promulgated two doctrinal constitutions: Dei Filius, a schema on Roman Catholic faith, which deals with faith, reason, and their interrelations; and Pastor Aeternus, which deals with the authority of the POPE.

The statement on the pope's authority was approved only after long and heated debate both preceding and during the council. The decree states that the true successor of ST. PETER has full and supreme power of jurisdiction over the whole church; that he has the right of free communication with the pastors of the whole church and with their flocks; and that his primacy includes the supreme teaching power to which JESUS CHRIST added the prerogative of infallibility, whereby the pope is preserved from error when he teaches definitively that a doctrine concerning faith or morals is to be believed by the whole church. The original schema had not included a statement of PAPAL INFALLIBILITY, but the majority of the council fathers, urged on by Pius IX, overrode vociferous opposition from those who argued that a formal statement was inopportune. Pope PIUS XII (reigned 1939–58) made the first infallible declaration in 1950 when he decreed the dogma of the bodily assumption of MARY into heaven.

VATICAN COUNCIL, SECOND, also called Vatican II, 21st ecumenical council of the ROMAN CATHOLIC church (1962–65), announced by Pope JOHN XXIII (reigned 1958–63). Among its notable enactments were the "Dogmatic Constitution on the Church," which provided for greater involvement of the laity in the church's missionary vocation; the "Dogmatic Constitution of Divine Revelation," which maintained an open attitude toward scholarly study of the Bible; the "Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy," which authorized the use of vernacular languages in the MASS in place of Latin; and the "Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the World of Today," which acknowledged the changes humanity had experienced in the modern world and attempted to orient the church toward contemporary culture. Observers from other Christian churches were invited to Vatican II in a gesture of ECUMENISM. To Eastern Orthodox and Protestant Christians the council extended the hand of fraternal understanding. To the Jewish community it addressed words of reconciliation and regret for Christian ANTI-SEMITISM. To the world religions it spoke of the church's admiration for the spiritual values that had been preserved in those traditions.

The legacy of Vatican II is a divided one. For some Catholics, the promise of reform remained unfulfilled; for others, the council undermined traditional church teachings and liturgy. This ambiguity was apparent during the papacy of PAUL VI (reigned 1963–78), who implemented the council's reforms but also issued decrees confirming traditional teachings on clerical CELIBACY and artificial birth control. JOHN PAUL II (reigned 1978–2005) moved away from the episcopal collegiality stressed at Vatican II in favor of centralized papal authority, opposed admitting women or openly gay men to the priesthood, and advocated stricter adherence to Catholic theology. However, he also noted the importance of revising theology to accommodate modern science. His most important activity—fully in the spirit of Vatican II—was his outreach to other faiths, especially JUDAISM.

VĀTSĪPUTRĪYA: see PUDGALAVĀDIN.

VAYU \ˈvā-yü\, ancient Iranian wind-god, likely related to the Hindu god Vāyu; he was connected both with battle (as an AVATAR of the war-god Vrthraghna) and with fate. Vayu was eclipsed following Zoroaster's reforms but re-emerged in the AVESTA (see ZOROASTRIANISM AND PARSISM).

VEDA \ˈvā-də\, sacred hymn or verse composed in archaic Sanskrit and current among the Indo-European-speaking peoples who entered India from the Iranian regions. No definite date can be ascribed to the composition of the Vedas, but the period of about 1500–1200 BCE is generally accepted. The hymns formed a liturgical body that in part grew up around the cult of the SOMA ritual and the sacrifice. They extolled the hereditary deities, who personified natural and cosmic phenomena such as fire (AGNI), sun (SŪRYA and Savitṛ), dawn (Uṣas), storms (the RUDRAS), war and rain (INDRA), honor (MITRA), divine authority (VARUNA), and creation (Indra, with some aid of VISHNU). Hymns were composed to these deities and were recited or chanted during rituals. All the Vedas seem to have been preserved orally.

The foremost collection, or Saṃhitā, of hymns, from which the hotṛ (chief priest) drew the material for his recitations, is the ṚG VEDA. Sacred formulas known as MANTRAS were recited by the priest responsible for the sacrificial fire and the carrying out of the ceremony; these mantras and verses were drawn into Saṃhitās known as Yajurveda. Other priests, headed by the udgātṛ ("chanter"), performed recitations of verses that came to be arranged as a separate Saṃhitā, the SĀMA VEDA ("Veda of the Chants"). To these Vedas—known as the trayī-vidyā ("threefold knowledge")—is added the ATHARVA VEDA, a collection of hymns, medical cures, and incantations that represents popular religion and is partly outside the Vedic sacrifice.

Vedic literature—the Saṃhitās and their commentaries, the BRĀHMAṆAS, the ĀRANYAKAS, and the UPANISHADS—was considered ŚRUTI, the product of divine revelation.

VEDĀNTA \ˈvā-ˈdān-tə\, one of the six orthodox systems (DARŚANS) of Indian philosophy and the one that forms the basis of most modern schools of HINDUISM. The term means the "conclusion" (anta) of the Vedas; it applies to the UPANISHADS and to the school that arose out of the "study" (mīmāṃsā) of the Upanishads. Thus Vedānta is also referred to as Vedānta-Mīmāṃsā ("Reflection on Vedānta"), Uttara-Mīmāṃsā ("Reflection on the Latter Part of the Vedas"), and Brahma-Mīmāṃsā ("Reflection on Brahman").

The three fundamental Vedāntic texts are: the Upanishads; the Brahma SŪTRAS (also called Vedānta Sūtras), which are very brief, even one-word interpretations of the doctrine of the Upanishads; and the BHAGAVAD GĪTĀ, which, because of its immense popularity, was drawn upon for support of the doctrines found in the Upanishads.

Several schools of Vedānta developed, differentiated by their conceptions of the nature of the relationship and the degree of identity between the individual self (ĀTMAN) and the absolute (BRAHMAN). These range from the nondualism (ADVAITA) of the 8th-century philosopher ŚAṂKARA to the THEISM (VIŚIṢṬĀDVAITA) of the 11th–12th-century thinker RĀMĀNUJA and the DUALISM (DVAITA) of the 13th-century thinker MADHVA.

The Vedāntic schools do, however, hold in common a number of beliefs; transmigration of the self (SAMSĀRA) and the desirability of release from the cycle of rebirths; the authority of the VEDA on the means of release; that Brahman is both the material (upādāna) and the instrumental (nimitta) cause of the world; and that the self (ātman) is the agent of its own acts (KARMA) and therefore the recipient of the fruits, or consequences, of action (phala).

VEDĀNTADEŚIKA \vā-'dān-tā-'dā-shi-kə\, also called Veṅkaṭanātha (b. 1268, Tuppure, near Kānchīpuram, Vijayanagar, India—d. 1370, Śrīrangam), leading theologian of the VIŚIṢṬĀDVAITA school of philosophy and founder of the Vaṭakalai, a subset of the Śrīvaiṣṇavas, a religious movement of South India.

Vedāntadeśika was born into a distinguished Śrī Vaiṣṇava family that followed the teachings of RĀMĀNUJA. He married and had a family but lived on alms in order to devote himself fully to his philosophic and literary efforts. He was a prolific writer in Sanskrit, Prakrit, and Tamil; his more than 100 works include commentaries on Vaiṣṇava scriptures; Nyāya-parīśuddhi, a comprehensive work on Viśiṣṭādvaita logic; Yādavābhyudaya, a poetic work on the life of Krishna; Samkalpa-sūryodaya, an allegorical drama; and devotional hymns.

According to Vedāntadeśika's interpretation of PRAPATTI (surrender to the GRACE of God), some effort is required on the part of the worshiper to secure God's grace, just as the baby monkey must cling to its mother (the markaṭa-nyāya, or "monkey logic"). This view—together with ritual and linguistic differences—became the basis for the split between the two subsects, the Vaṭakalai and the Teṅkalai, who held that God's grace is unconditional and that the human soul is as unassertive as a kitten carried by its mother.

VED-AVA \vā-'dā-vā\, among the Mordvins of Russia, spirit believed to rule the waters and their bounty; she is known as Vete-ema among the Estonians and Veen emo among the Finns. Fishermen sacrificed to Ved-ava as a personification of their concerns, giving her the first of their catch and observing numerous prohibitions while fishing; she was also responsible for promoting fertility. In appearance Ved-ava resembled a mermaid: she had long hair that she combed while seated on a stone, large breasts, and a fishlike lower body. She could often be seen or heard playing music to entice people, but seeing Ved-ava generally boded misfortune, most often drowning. Ved-ava has also been thought of as the spirit of a drowned person or, at other times, simply as a personification of the water itself.

VEDIC CHANT \vā-'dik\, Hindu religious chant, the expression of hymns from the VEDAS. The practice dates back at least 3,000 years and is probably the world's oldest continuous vocal tradition. The earliest collection, or Saṁhitā, of Vedic texts is the ṚG VEDA, containing 1,028 hymns. These are chanted in syllabic style—a type of heightened speech with one syllable to a tone. Three levels of pitch are employed: a basic reciting tone is embellished by neighboring tones above and below, which are used to emphasize grammatical accents in the texts. The Ṛg Veda hymns are the basis for a later collection, the Sāmaveda ("Veda of the Chants"), the hymns of which are sung in a style that is more florid, melodic, and melismatic (one word to two or more notes) rather than syllabic, and the range of tones is extended to six or more.

VEDIC RELIGION, also called Vedism \vā-'di-zəm\, the religion of the ancient Indo-European-speaking peoples who entered India about 1500 BCE from the region of present-day Iran; it takes its name from the collections of sacred texts known as the VEDAS. The Vedas provide at present our only textual resource for understanding the religious life of ancient India. Though it is impossible to say when Vedism eventually gave way to "classical" HINDUISM with its characteristic pantheon (e.g., VISHNU, SHIVA, DURGĀ) and practices (e.g., PŪJĀ), a decrease in literary activity among the Vedic schools from the 5th century BCE onward can be observed, and about this time texts of a specifically Hindu character began to appear.

Vedic texts. The only extant Vedic materials are the Vedas, composed and compiled from about the 15th to the 5th century BCE. The language of the Vedas is an archaic Sanskrit. The oldest and most important texts are the four collections (Saṁhitā) that we call the Veda, or Vedas. The ṚG VEDA, or "Veda of Verses," the earliest of these, is composed of about 1,000 hymns mostly arranged to serve the needs of priestly families. The YAJUR VEDA, or "Veda of Sacrificial Formulas," contains prose formulas and verses applicable to various cultic rites. The SĀMA VEDA, or "Veda of Chants" is made up of a selection of verses (drawn almost wholly from the Ṛg Veda) and musical notation intended as an aid to the performance of sacred songs. Finally, the ATHARVA VEDA is less sophisticated and more heterogeneous in character, containing prayers and SPELLS for health and social well-being, some specifically addressing the needs of rulers.

To each Veda is attached a body of prose writings of later date called BRĀHMANAS (c. 800–600 BCE), which are intended to explain the ceremonial applications of the texts. Further appendices, the Āraṇyakas (c. 600 BCE) and the UPANISHADS (c. 700–500 BCE), respectively expound the symbolism of the more difficult rites and speculate on the nature of the universe and the human relation to it.

When Vedic religion gradually developed into Hinduism between the 6th and 2nd centuries BCE, these texts were exalted as the most sacred literature of Hinduism. They are known as ŚRUTI, or the divinely revealed section of Hindu literature, in contrast to religious literature known as SMṚTI, texts based on human memory.

Mythology and ritual. The complex Vedic ceremonies, for which the hymns of the Ṛg Veda were composed, centered on the ritual sacrifice of animals and with the pressing and drinking of a sacred intoxicating liquor called SOMA. The basic Vedic rite was performed by offering these edibles to a sacred fire, and this fire, which was itself deified as AGNI, carried the oblations to the gods of the Vedic pantheon. The god of highest rank was INDRA, a warlike god who conquered innumerable human and DEMON enemies and vanquished the sun. Along with VARUNA, the upholder of the cosmic and moral laws, Vedism had many other lesser deities, among whom were gods, DEMIGODS, and demons.

The rites of Vedic sacrifice were relatively simple in the early period, when the Rg Veda was composed. Every sacrifice was performed on behalf of an individual, the yajamāna ("sacrificer"), who bore the expenses. The altar (vedī) was a quadrangle marked out by hollowing or slightly raising the ground. The agnyādheya ("installation of the fire") was a necessary preliminary to all the large public rituals and was preceded by the patron's fast. Domestic (grhya) rites were observed by the householder himself or with the help of a single priest and were performed over the domestic hearth fire. Some occurred daily or monthly, and others accompanied a particular event, such as the SAMSKĀRAS. The grand rites (śrauta, or vaitānika) performed in public, lasted several days or months and required the services of many priests. Most characteristic of the public ceremonies was the soma sacrifice, which ensured the prosperity and well-being of both humans and gods. Animal sacrifice—the killing of a ram—existed either independently or as an integral part of the sacrifice of soma. The celebrated AŚVAMEDHA, or "horse-sacrifice," was an elaborate variant of the soma sacrifice.

Development and decline. Over the centuries, the Vedic rites grew so complex and were governed by so many rules that only highly trained Brahmins and priests could carry them out correctly. In reaction against this trend (as well as the growing power of the Brahmins), Vedic thought in its late period became more speculative and philosophical in approach. In the Aranyakas, Vedic ritual is interpreted in a symbolic rather than a literal manner, and the Upanishads question the very assumptions on which Vedism rested. From this emerged the idea of BRAHMAN, an encompassing cosmic principle in which each individual entity participates by virtue of its self (ātman). The equation of ĀTMAN (the self) with Brahman (ultimate reality) became the principal basis of Hindu metaphysics. The spread in the 8th to 5th centuries BCE of the related concepts of REINCARNATION, KARMA, and the attainment of release from this cycle by meditation rather than sacrifice marked the end of the Vedic period and the appearance of Hinduism.

The legacy of Vedic worship is apparent in several aspects of modern Hinduism. The Hindu rite of initiation (UPANAYANA) is a direct survival of Vedic tradition, while sacrifices performed according to Vedic rites continue to be performed occasionally. The idea of there being a pure Vedic period or strand in India's religious life—as distinguished from a broader, more vulgar range of subsequent or ancillary Hindu practice and belief—became a potent force in India in the 19th century (see ĀRYA SAMĀJ).

VEJOVIS \ˈwā-ˌyō-wis, ˈvā-ˌyō-vis\, also spelled Vediovis, or Vedivs, in ROMAN RELIGION, a god worshiped at Rome between the two summits of the Capitoline Hill (the Arx and the Capitol) and on Tiber Island (both temples date from just after 200 BCE) and at Bovillae, 12 miles southeast of Rome. His name may be connected with that of JUPITER (Jovis): he may be a "little Jupiter" or a "sinister Jupiter" or "the opposite of Jupiter" (i.e., a CHTHONIC, or Underworld, god). The last seems most likely, since his offering was a she-goat humano ritu; the term humano ritu has been defined both as on behalf of the dead and as a substitute for a HUMAN SACRIFICE.

VELNS \ˈvalns\ (Latvian), Lithuanian Velnius \ˈvʲel-nʲəs\, in ancient SLAVIC RELIGIONS, the devil, who has a well-defined role, such as few other peoples have documented so well. Besides the usual outer features, several characteristics are especially emphasized. Velns, for instance, is a stupid devil. In addition, the Balts are the only colonized people in Europe who have preserved a large amount of FOLKLORE that in different variations portrays the devil as a German landlord. Another evil being is the Latvian Vilkacis, Lithuanian Vilkatas, who corresponds to the werewolf in the traditions of other peoples. The belief that the dead do not leave this world completely is the basis for both good and evil spirits. As good spirits the dead return to the living as invisible beings (Latvian velis, Lithuanian vele), but as evil ones they return as persecutors and misleaders (Latvian vadatajs, Lithuanian vaidilas).

VENUS \ˈvē-nəs\, ancient Italian goddess associated with cultivated fields and gardens and later identified with the Greek goddess APHRODITE.

Venus had no worship in Rome in early times, as the scholar Marcus Terentius Varro (116–27 BCE) shows, attesting that he could find no mention of her name in the old records. This is corroborated by the absence of any festival for her in the oldest Roman calendar and by her lack of a FLAMEN (special priest). Her cult among the Latins, however, seems to be very old, for she had apparently at least two ancient temples, one at Lavinium, the other at Ardea, at which festivals of the Latin cities were held. How she came to be identified with so important a deity as Aphrodite remains a puzzle. The name Venus is grammatically a feminine form of what most likely was originally a neuter abstract noun stem (venes-*), meaning "charm, qualities exciting desire," and earlier "desire, wish." This root—as exemplified by the derivatives venerari, "to solicit the good will of (a deity) by propitiatory acts, worship," and venenum, "magic herb or potion"—seems to have linked the notions "desire" and "propitiatory magic to fulfill one's desire."

That Venus' identification with Aphrodite took place fairly early is certain. A contributory reason for it is perhaps the date (August 19) of the foundation of one of her Roman temples. August 19 is the Vinalia Rustica, a festival of Jupiter; hence, he and Venus came to be associated, and this facilitated their equation, as father and daughter, with the Greek deities Zeus and Aphrodite. She was, therefore, also a daughter of Dione, was the wife of Vulcan, and was the mother of Cupid. Like Aphrodite, she was famous in myth and legend for her romantic intrigues and affairs with both gods and mortals, and she became associated with many aspects, both positive and negative, of femininity. As Venus Verticordia, she was charged with the protection of chastity in women and girls. But the most important cause of the identification was the reception into Rome of the famous cult of Venus Erycina—i.e., of Aphrodite of Eryx (Erice) in Sicily. This reception took place during and shortly after the Second Punic War. A temple was dedicated to Venus Erycina on the Capitol in 215 BCE and a second outside the Colline gate in 181 BCE. The latter developed in a way reminiscent of the temple at Eryx with its harlots, becoming the place of worship of Roman courtesans, hence the title of dies meretricum ("prostitutes' day") attached to April 23, the day of its foundation.

The gens Iulia, the clan of Julius Caesar and Augustus, claimed descent from Iulus, the son of AENEAS; Aeneas was the alleged founder of the temple of Eryx and, in some legends, of the city of Rome also. From the time of Homer onward, he was made the son of Aphrodite, so that his descent gave the Iulii divine origin. Julius Caesar dedicated a temple (46 BCE) to Venus Genetrix, and as Genetrix (“Begetting Mother”) she was best known until the death of Nero in 68 CE. But despite the extinction of the Julio-Claudian line, she remained popular, even with the emperors; Hadrian completed a temple of Venus at Rome in 135 CE.

As a native Italian deity, Venus had no myths of her own. She therefore took over those of Aphrodite and, through her, became identified with various foreign goddesses. The most noteworthy result of this development is perhaps the acquisition by the planet Venus of that name. The planet was at first the star of the Babylonian goddess Ishtar and thence of Aphrodite. Because of her association with love and with feminine beauty, the goddess Venus has been a favorite subject in art since ancient times; notable representations include the statue known as the Venus de Milo (c. 150 BCE) and the painting The Birth of Venus.

VENUS, in astronomy, second major planet from the sun. Named for the Roman goddess of love and beauty, it is, after the moon, the most brilliant natural object in the nighttime sky. Venus comes closer to the Earth than any other planet.

Venus is probably the celestial figure that has received the most extensive elaboration in the mythologies of the world. Before the Romans identified the planet with their goddess, the Mesopotamian civilizations personified the star as the goddess Inanna-Ishtar, viewed as a being sometimes female and at other times hermaphroditic. African cultures also have been significantly impressed by this planet, as can be seen in the figure of a Zulu heavenly goddess who determines the agricultural work of the women but even more as the evening and morning star, who are the wives of the moon. In the royal culture of Mwene Monomotapa (Rhodesia) and its influences in Buganda and southern Congo, the king is related to the moon, and his wedding with the Venus women is a type of HIEROS GAMOS (sacred marriage). In large areas of Africa the concept of “Venus wives of the moon” is preserved, although the moon is usually considered as the wife (or sister) of the sun.

This concept was most likely prevalent at a time when the moon-king ideology was widespread in the eastern half of Africa from the Nile to South Africa.

The ancient Mayan civilization of the Americas had a highly developed astronomical tradition, in which the planet Venus figures prominently. The DRESDEN CODEX contains very precise Venusian and lunar tables and a method of predicting solar eclipses. The duration of the solar year had been calculated with amazing accuracy, as well as the synodical revolution of Venus.

VERALDEN-RADIEN \ˈve-ä-räl-dän-ˈrä-dē-en\, also called Veralden-Olmai \-ˈöl-,mī\ (Sami: “Ruler of the World”), the deity believed by the Sami (Lapps) to be closest to the starry heaven. Because the deity is associated with the pillar supporting the heavens, he is also responsible for the continued maintenance of life. Veralden-radien is believed to support all growth. The goddess of childbirth, MADDERAKKA, receives the souls of unborn children from him, while he takes the souls of the departed down to yabme-aimo, the Sami realm of the dead. He was also the object of a phallic cult; each autumn a bull reindeer was traditionally sacrificed to him, then its genitalia were tied around his statue and the blood smeared over the statue.

The worship of Veralden-radien has many Scandinavian features; he is often mentioned in connection with the Swedish deity FREY, and the Saxon world-supporting pillar Irminsul, which may have influenced some of the mythological concepts of the Sami.

VERETHRAGHNA \,vər-ə-ˈthräg-nə, ˈvər-ə-,thräg-\, also called Bahrān, in ZOROASTRIANISM, spirit of victory. Together with MITHRA, Verethraghna shares martial characteristics that relate him to the Vedic war-god INDRA. In Zoroastrian texts, Verethraghna appears as an agent of Mithra and RASHNU, the god of justice, and as the means of vengeance for Mithra in his capacity of god of war.

Verethraghna was an especially popular deity in Sāsānian Iran, where five kings bore his name. The 14th yasht, or hymn, of the AVESTA is dedicated to Verethraghna, and the 20th day of the month is named for him.

VESSANTARA \ve-ˈsən-tə-rə\, also called Viśvāntara \vish-ˈvān-tə-rə\, or Phra Wes \ˈprā-ˈwes\, in Buddhist mythology, a previous INCARNATION of the BUDDHA GOTAMA. A crown prince, Vessantara was famous for his vast generosity, and, to the despair of his more practical-minded father, he accepted banishment to the forest, where he attained the ultimate self-abnegation by giving away his children and his wife and in some accounts even his own eyes. These and all the rest were restored to him miraculously, and, responding to the demands of his countrymen, he returned home to become the best of kings. This tradition underscores the characteristic Buddhist combination of the ideals of universal kingship and universal religious preeminence.

An integral part of the harvest celebrations in many Buddhist countries is the sacred performance of an episode in the life of a buddha or a BODHISATTVA. In Thailand, the recitation of the story of Phra Wes constitutes one of the most important festival events of the agricultural calendar.

VESTA \ˈves-tə\, in ROMAN RELIGION, goddess of the hearth, identified with the Greek HESTIA. Her worship was observed in every household along with that of the PENATES and the Lares (see LAR), and her image was sometimes encountered in the household shrine.

The state worship of Vesta was much more elaborate. Her SANCTUARY was traditionally a circular building, in imitation of the early Italian round hut and symbolic of the public hearth. The Temple of Vesta in the Roman Forum was of great antiquity and underwent many restorations and rebuildings in both republican and imperial times. There burned the perpetual fire of the public hearth attended by the VESTAL VIRGINS. This fire was officially extinguished and renewed annually on March 1 (originally the Roman new year), and its extinction at any other time, either accidentally or not, was regarded as a portent of disaster to Rome. The temple's innermost sanctuary was not open to the public; once a year, however, on the Vestalia (June 7–15), it was opened to matrons who visited it barefoot. The days of the festival were unlucky. On the final day occurred the ceremonial sweeping out of the building, and the period of ill OMEN did not end until the sweepings were officially disposed of by placing them in a particular spot along the Clivus Capitolinus or by throwing them into the Tiber.

Vesta was represented as a fully draped woman. As goddess of the hearth fire, Vesta was the patron deity of bakers, hence her connection with the donkey, usually used for turning the millstone, and her association with Fornax, the spirit of the baker's oven. She is also found allied with the primitive fire deities CACUS AND CACA.

VESTAL VIRGIN \ˈves-təl\, in ROMAN RELIGION, any of the six priestesses, representing the daughters of the royal house, who tended the state cult of the goddess VESTA. Chosen between the ages of 6 and 10 by the PONTIFEX maximus ("chief priest"), they served for 30 years, during which time they had to remain virgins. Afterward they could marry, but few did, as it was considered unlucky. Those chosen as Vestal Virgins had to be of the required age, be of freeborn and respectable parents (though later the daughters of freedmen were eligible), have both parents alive, and be free from physical and mental defects. The Vestal Virgins' duties included tending the perpetual fire in the Temple of Vesta, fetching water from a sacred spring, preparing ritual food, caring for objects in the temple's inner SANCTUARY, and officiating at the public worship of Vesta (the Vestalia, June 7–15). Failure to attend to their duties was punished by a beating; violation of the vow of chastity, by burial alive. The Vestal Virgins enjoyed many honors and privileges, including emancipation from their fathers' rule.

VICAR (from Latin vicarius, "substitute"), an official acting in some special way for a superior, primarily an ecclesiastical title in the Christian church. In the Roman Empire as reorganized by Emperor Diocletian (reigned 284–305), the vicarius was an important official, and the title remained in use for secular officials in the Middle Ages. In the ROMAN CATHOLIC church, "vicar of Christ" became the special designation of the popes starting in the 8th century, replacing the older title of "vicar of ST. PETER."

In the early church, the name vicar, or legate, was used for the representative of the pope to the Eastern councils. Beginning in the 4th century, vicar of the apostolic see or vicar apostolic came to mean a residential bishop with certain rights of surveillance over neighboring bishops. By the 13th century a vicar was an emissary sent from Rome to govern a DIOCESE that was without a bishop or in special difficulties. The Roman Catholic church in England was governed by vicars apostolic from 1685 until 1850 when POPE PIUS IX reestablished the English hierarchy. In modern times vicars apostolic are generally titular bishops appointed to rule territories not yet organized into dioceses.

In the Church of England, a vicar is the priest of a PARISH the revenues of which belong to another, while he himself receives a stipend.

VIHARA \vi-ˈhär-ə\, early type of Buddhist monastery consisting of an open court surrounded by open cells accessible through an entrance porch. The viharas in India were originally constructed to shelter the monks during the rainy season. They took on a sacred character when small STUPAS (housing sacred relics) and images of the Buddha were installed in the central court.

Examples exist still in western India, where the viharas were often excavated into the rock cliffs. This tradition of rock-cut structures spread along the trade routes of Central Asia (as at Bāmiān), leaving many splendid monuments rich in sculpture and painting.

As the communities of monks grew, great monastic establishments (mahāvihāras, "great viharas") developed. Renowned centers of learning, or universities, grew up at Nālanda, in present-day Bihār state, during the 5th to 12th centuries and at Nāgārjunakoṇḍa, Andhra Pradesh, in the 3rd–4th century.

VIMALAKĪRTI SŪTRA \,vi-mə-lə-ˈkir-tē-ˈsü-trə\, also called Vimalakīrtinirdeśa Sūtra, MAHĀYĀNA Buddhist SŪTRA. It dates from no later than the 3rd century CE, based on its earliest Chinese translations, and most likely from the 1st or 2nd centuries CE.

In the sūtra the layman and householder Vimalakīrti, who is also, significantly, a model BODHISATTVA, instructs deities, learned Buddhist ARAHANTS, and lay people in all matters concerning the nature of enlightenment and Buddhist truth. He does so while lying sick in bed, although this is just a ruse designed to draw an audience of visitors who have come to wish him well and inquire about his health. As crowds of well-wishers come to see him, Vimalakīrti employs his superior understanding of “skill in means” (upāya) to teach them about the nature of “emptiness” (śūnyatā), the Mahāyāna Buddhist doctrine that culminates in the counter-intuitive claim that NIRVANA and SAMSĀRA, at an ultimate level, are not different.

Throughout the sūtra several famous Hinayāna Buddhist arahants are ridiculed for what Mahāyāna practitioners perceived as their selfish pursuit of nirvana, for their incomplete understanding of the nature of enlightenment, or for their pursuit of wisdom without compassion in aiding others. Vimalakīrti, by contrast, explains how a bodhisattva is able to live in the world, engaging it fully, even to the point of partaking in its pleasures, passions, and defilements, without being attached to them, constrained by them, or corrupted by them. The sūtra reaches its peak dramatic moment when Vimalakīrti asks his audience of bodhisattvas to describe the nature of non-duality. After each of them has responded verbally to his question, using technical, philosophical language, Vimalakīrti, prompted by his chief MANJUŚRĪ to supply his own answer, responds with silence, indicating that true understanding of non-duality is ineffable.

VINAYA PĪṬAKA \ˈvi-nə-yə-ˈpi-tə-kə\ (Pāli and Sanskrit: “Basket of Discipline”), the oldest and smallest of the three sections of the Buddhist canonical TRIPĪṬAKA and the one that regulates monastic life. It varies less from school to school than does either the Sutta (discourses of the BUDDHA GOTAMA and his disciples) or Abhidhamma (scholastic) sections of the canon, and the rules themselves are basically the same even for MAHĀYĀNA schools. Three works compose the Pāli Vinaya:

1. Sutta Vibhaṅga (“Classification of the Suttas”; corresponds to Vinaya Vibhaṅga in Sanskrit), an exposition of the monastic rules (PĀTIMOKKHA) and the disciplinary actions prescribed for each offense, arranged according to severity. Each rule is accompanied by the story of the incident that first prompted the Buddha’s ruling and an early word-for-word commentary on the rules. In some instances there is also a later discussion of exceptions.

2. Khandhaka (“Divisions”; Sanskrit Vinaya Vastu, “Vinaya Subjects”), a series dealing with such matters as admission to the order; monastic ceremonies; rules governing food, clothing, lodging, and the like. As in the Sutta Vibhaṅga, an account is given of the occasion when each regulation was formulated by the Buddha. The arrangement is chronological and provides a picture of the evolving life of the early monastic community.

3. Parivāra (“Appendix”), a classified digest of the rules in the other Vinaya texts, apparently confined to the THERAVĀDA school. Compare ABHIDHAMMA PĪṬAKA; SUTTA PĪṬAKA.

VIOLENCE AND RELIGION, two realms that seem to be intricately related. Most religions share a history of bloody conflicts and holy wars, myths and epics that are filled with horrendous battles, and important symbols of violence such as the executioner’s cross in CHRISTIANITY. Sacrifice, or ritual killing, is central to many religions.

Although there is no agreed upon explanation concerning the relation between violence and religion there are several theories that do attempt to explain it. SIGMUND FREUD in Totem and Taboo (1913) asserted that “In the beginning was the deed,” this deed being the killing of the senior male (father) by the younger males (sons) in order to obtain females for themselves. This act of killing, Freud argued, is the origin of civilization, and religion was the consequence of the younger males’ guilt which led to the institution of prohibitions, laws, and a projected almighty father as constraints against such violence. Rene Girard has extended Freud’s thesis in Violence and the Sacred (1972) by arguing that the release of violent impulses is based on the displacement of mimetic desire, the urge to imitate the father.

Walter Burkert, in Homo Necans (1983), believes that the vast corpus of violent myths and the history of bloody sacrifices are best explained as a means of confronting the reality of death; ritual violence thus contributes to social solidarity and group survival and acts as a constraint on violence outside of the sacred sphere. Maurice Bloch, meanwhile, has argued that religion and politics are two sides of the same coin—power. Thus, sacrifice can be seen, on the one hand, as the ritual formalization of, and thus a constraint on, violence as a religious/political act. On the other hand, however, it can also become the ritualization of power/violence. Religious violence then becomes political power at work through covert means. The basic problem with all of these explanations is they assume the satisfaction of certain needs, and thus are subject to the difficulties that afflict many functionalist theories of religion. See also FUNCTIONALISM.

VIPASSANA \vi-ˈpā-sə-nə\, in THERAVĀDA Buddhism, method of insight meditation. Vipassana requires concentration (produced by exercises such as concentrating on one’s breathing), which lead to one-pointedness of mind. This one-pointedness of mind is then used to attain direct insight into the saving truth that all reality is without self and impermanent and is filled with suffering, even exalted states of consciousness. This insight, from the Buddhist perspective, gives direct access to progress along the path and to the actual attainment of NIRVANA itself.

VIRACOCHA \,bē-rä-ˈkō-chä\, also spelled Huiracochoa \,wē-rä-\, or Wiraqoca, creator deity originally worshiped by the pre-Inca inhabitants of Peru and later assimilated into the Inca pantheon (see PRE-COLUMBIAN SOUTH AMERICAN RELIGIONS). A god of rain, he was believed to have created the sun and moon on the waters and foam of Lake Titicaca. After forming the rest of the heavens and the earth, Viracochoa traditionally wandered through the world teaching men the arts of civilization. At Manta (Ecuador) he walked westward across the waves of the Pacific Ocean, promising to return one day.

The cult of Viracochoa was extremely ancient, but he probably entered the Inca pantheon at a relatively late date. The Incas believed that Viracochoa was a remote being who left the daily working of the world to the surveillance of the other deities that he had created. He was actively worshiped by the nobility, who urgently called upon him in times of crisis.

VĪRĀŚAIVA \,vē-rə-ˈshī-və\, also called Liṅgāyat \liŋ-ˈgä-yət\, member of a Hindu sect with a wide following in

VIRGIN BIRTH

South India that worships SHIVA as the only deity. The followers take their name ("LIṄGA-wearers") from the small representations of a liṅga worn on a cord around the neck, in place of the sacred thread worn by most orthodox upper CASTE Hindu men.

The sect is generally regarded as having been founded by BASAVA in the 12th century, but he may have furthered an already existing creed. Philosophically, their qualified spiritual monism and their conception of BHAKTI ("devotion") as an intuitive and loving knowledge of God show the influence of the 11th- and 12th-century thinker RĀMĀNUJA.

The Viraśaiva's earlier overthrow of caste distinctions has been modified in modern times, but the sect continues to be strongly anti-Brahminical and opposed to worship of any image other than the liṅga. In their rejection of the authority of the VEDAS, the doctrine of transmigration of souls, child marriage, and ill treatment of widows, they anticipated the social-reform movements of the 19th century.

VIRGIN BIRTH, fundamental doctrine of orthodox CHRISTIANITY, based on the infancy narratives in the GOSPELS of MATTHEW and LUKE, that JESUS CHRIST had no natural father but was conceived by MARY through the power of the HOLY SPIRIT. It was universally accepted in the Christian church by the 2nd century, was enshrined in the APOSTLES' CREED, and was not seriously challenged until the 19th century. It remains a basic article of belief in ROMAN CATHOLICISM, EASTERN ORTHODOXY, and most Protestant churches. ISLAM also accepts the Virgin Birth of Jesus.

A corollary of this doctrine is that of Mary's perpetual virginity, in the birth of the child (i.e., freedom from the pain of child-birth) and throughout her life. This doctrine, found in the writings of the CHURCH FATHERS and accepted by the COUNCIL OF CHALCEDON (451), is part of the teaching of the Orthodox and Roman Catholic churches and is also maintained by some Anglican and Lutheran theologians.

VISHNU \ˈvish-nū\, Sanskrit Viṣṇu ("All-Pervading"), one of the principal Hindu deities, worshiped as the protector and preserver of the world and restorer of DHARMA (moral order). Vishnu, like SHIVA, is a syncretic personality who combines many lesser cult figures and local heroes. He is known chiefly through his AVATARS (incarnations), particularly RĀMA and KRISHNA.

Vishnu was not a major deity in the Vedic period. A few hymns of the ṚG VEDA associate him with the sun and relate the legend of his three strides across the universe (see VĀMANA). Legends of other avatars are found in the early literature and by the time of the MAHĀBHĀRATA they begin to be identified with Vishnu. In theory, Vishnu manifests a portion of himself anytime he is needed to fight evil, and his appearances are innumerable; but in practice, 10 are most commonly recognized.

Temple images of Vishnu often depict him in the company of his consorts LAKṢMĪ (also called Śrī) and Bhūmidevī (Earth) or reclining on the coils of the serpent Śeṣa, asleep on the cosmic ocean during the period between the periodic annihilation and renewal of the world. Vishnu holds in his four (sometimes two) hands the śaṅkha (conch), cakra (discus), gadā (club), or padma (lotus). On his chest is the curl of hair known as the śrīvatsa mark, a sign of his immortality, and around his neck he wears the auspicious jewel Kaustubha. Vishnu is usually depicted as dark complexioned, a distinguishing feature also of his incarnations.

Vishnu's mount is the vulturelike bird GARUḌA; his heavenly abode is called Vaikuṅṭha. Among the 1,000 names of Vishnu (repeated as an act of devotion by his worshippers) are VĀSUDEVA, Nārāyaṇa, and Hari.

VISHVA HINDU PARISHAD \ˈvish-və-ˈhin-dū-ˈpə-ri-ˌshəd\ ("All-Hindu Council"), commonly known as VHP, organization founded in Bombay in 1964 as a religious and cultural group with several objectives: to unify and raise consciousness among the Hindus in India; to protect and spread Hindu ethical and spiritual values; to establish contacts with the Hindu diaspora around the world; and to work for CASTE reform and the amelioration of the condition of the lower castes. The VHP is organizationally structured into two levels, a central body of secular and spiritual leaders and "advisory committees" at the state level composed of representatives of the various participating religious communities.

The VHP maintains close ties with the Rashtriya Swayamsevak Sangh, or RSS, and shares much of the same ideology of Hindu nationalism and Hindu cultural pride. It is distinctive from the RSS and other similar organizations by virtue of the central place it gives to Hindu religious leaders from a variety of sects and its emphasis on articulating ideas and practices to which Hindus, in India and elsewhere, of all stripes can ascribe. Like other such groups, it rejects the notion of the secular state and what it perceives to be the "pampering" of religious minorities in India. The VHP also claims to combat Hindu "weakness," stemming from external threats and internal divisions and has developed rituals and doctrines designed to unify and thereby strengthen the Hindu community in India and abroad (inclusive of Jains, Buddhists, and Sikhs who are also regarded as part of this “Hindu community”). As an important organization in the Hindu nationalist movement, the VHP is also controversial among secularists and the minority religious communities in India.

Vishnu with his consort Lakṣmī, from the temple dedicated to Pārśvanātha at Khajrāho, Madhya Pradesh, India, c. 950–970 CE

VISION QUEST, among the Native American hunters of the eastern woodlands and the Great Plains, an essential part of a youth’s initiation into adulthood. The boy (or rarely, the girl) was sent out from the camp after a period of instruction and purification on a solitary vigil involving fasting and prayer in order to gain some sign of the presence and nature of his GUARDIAN SPIRIT.

In some traditions the youth would watch for an animal who behaved in a significant way; in others he discovered an object (usually a stone), which resembled some animal. In the predominant form, he had a dream in which his guardian appeared (usually in animal form), instructed him, took him on a visionary journey, and taught him songs. Upon receiving these signs and visions he returned to his home, indicated his success, and sought out a religious specialist for help in interpreting his visions.

The techniques of the vision quest underlie every visionary experience of the Native American, from those of the ordinary man to the visions of the great prophets and SHAMANS. Among some South American Indians, the vision quest, like the guardian spirit, is confined exclusively to the shamans (a category that can include numerous individuals within a group). See also NATIVE AMERICAN RELIGIONS.

VIŚIṢṬĀDVAITA \vi-'shish-tād-'vī-tə\ (Sanskrit: “Qualified Nondualism”), one of the principal schools of VEDĀNTA. This school grew out of the Vaiṣṇava devotional movement prominent in South India from the 7th century on. One of the early Brahmins who began to guide the movement was Nāthamuni (10th century), head priest of the temple at Śrīraṅgam (in modern Tamil Nadu state). He was succeeded by Yāmuna (11th century), who wrote some philosophic treatises but no commentaries.

The most towering figure is his successor, RĀMĀNUJA (c. 1050–1137). Rāmānuja was the first of the Vedānta thinkers who made the identification of a personal God with the BRĀHMAN of the UPANISHADS and the Vedānta SŪTRAS the cornerstone of his system. For him the relation between the infinite and the finite is like that between the soul and the body. Soul and matter are totally dependent on God for their existence, as is the body on the soul.

God has two modes of being, as cause and as product. As cause, he is in his essence qualified only by his perfections; as product, he has as his body souls and the phenomenal world. For Rāmānuja, release is the joy of the contemplation of God. This joy is attained by a life of exclusive devotion (BHAKTI) to God. God will return his GRACE, which will assist the devotee in gaining release.

Viśiṣṭādvaita flourished after Rāmānuja, but a schism developed over the importance of God’s grace. For the Sanskrit-using school, the Vaṭakalai (“the Northern Branch”), God’s grace in gaining release is important, but man himself should make his best efforts. This school is represented by the thinker Veṅkaṭanātha, who was known by the honorific name of VEDĀNTADEŚIKA (“Teacher of Vedānta”). The Tamil-using school, the Teṅkalai (“the Southern Branch”), holds that God’s grace alone is necessary.

The influence of Viśiṣṭādvaita spread far to the north, where it played a role in the devotional renaissance of VAIṢṆAVISM, particularly under the Bengali devotee CAITANYA (1485–1533). In southern India the philosophy itself is still an important intellectual influence.

VIŚUDDHIMAGGA \vi-'sü-dē-'mā-gə\ (Pāli “Path to Purification”), encyclopedic and masterful summary and exposition of Buddhist teaching of the MAHĀVIHĀRA branch of the THERAVĀDA school. It was written during the reign of the Sri Lankan king Mahānāma in the 5th century CE by the great Buddhist commentator BUDDHAGHOSA. Along with two other notable counterparts, Dhammapāla and Buddhadatta, Buddhagosa wrote new commentaries on Theravāda doctrine in Pāli, based on older Sinhalese commentaries that dated from the early centuries CE. The Visuddhimagga is perhaps the most famous of Buddhagosa’s considerable literary output. It organizes its material broadly under three headings: SĪLA (morals), SAMĀDHI (meditation), and paññā (wisdom), but it also comments on and explains a wide range of details of Buddhist doctrine through the use of narrative and by means of direct quotation from and explanation of the canonical texts of the TIPITAKA, presenting Theravāda doctrines as a systematic whole. In addition, the Visuddhimagga contains a detailed description of Buddhist meditative techniques and can be regarded as a general reference work on Theravāda doctrine.

VIŚVAKARMA \'vish-və-'kər-mən, -'kär-\ (Sanskrit: “All Accomplishing”), in HINDUISM, the architect of the gods. Viśvakarma is the divine carpenter and master craftsman who fashioned the weapons of the gods and built their cities, their chariots, and the mythical city, Laṅkā. He revealed the sciences of architecture and mechanics to men and is the patron deity of workmen, artisans, and artists.

VITAL, ḤAYYIM BEN JOSEPH \vē-'täl\ (b. 1543, Safed, Palestine [now Zefat, Israel]—d. May 6, 1620, Damascus [now in Syria]), one of Judaism’s outstanding Qabbalists.

In Safed, in about 1570, Vital became the disciple of ISAAC BEN SOLOMON LURIA, the leading Qabbalist of his time, and after Luria’s death (1572) Vital professed to be the sole interpreter of the Lurian school. He became the leader of Palestinian Jewish Qabbalism and served as RABBI and head of a YESHIVA in Jerusalem (1577–85). His major work was the ‘Etz ḥayyim (“Tree of Life”), an exposition of Lurian Qabbalah, which also appeared in altered editions by rivals that he repudiated. His son Samuel published accounts of Vital’s dreams and visions posthumously under the title Shivḥe R. Ḥayyim Vital. (See QABBALAH.)

VIVEKANANDA \'vē-vā-kə-'nən-də\, also spelled Vivekānanda, original name Narendranath Datta (b. Jan. 12, 1863, Calcutta, India—d. July 4, 1902, Calcutta), Hindu spiritual leader and reformer who attempted to combine Indian spirituality with Western material progress.

Born into an upper-middle-class Kāyastha family in Bengal, he was educated at a Western-style university where he was exposed to Western philosophy, CHRISTIANITY, and science. He subsequently joined the BRAHMO SAMAJ (Society of Brahman), dedicated to eliminating child marriage and illiteracy and determined to spread education among women and the lower CASTES, and became the most notable disciple of RAMAKRISHNA. Always stressing the universal and humanistic side of the VEDA (by which he meant principally the UPANISHADS) as well as belief in service rather than dogma, Vivekananda attempted to infuse vigor into Hindu thought. He was an activating force behind the VEDĀNTA movement in the United States and England, which traces its intellectual lineage to the 8th-century philosopher ŚAMKARA, attempts to integrate all religious systems into its own, and owes its particular energy to the vision and example of Ramakrishna, Vivekananda's teacher and GURU. In 1893 Vivekananda appeared in Chicago as a spokesman for HINDUISM at the World's Parliament of Religions. Thereafter he lectured throughout the United States and England, making converts to the Vedānta movement and establishing a network of Vedānta Societies.

On his return to India with a small group of Western disciples in 1897, Vivekananda founded the Ramakrishna mission at the monastery of Belur Maṭh on the GAṄGĀ RIVER near Calcutta. Self-perfection and service were his ideals, and the order continues to stress them.

VODYANOY \və-d'ə-'nɔɪ\, in Slavic mythology, the water spirit, essentially an evil and vindictive spirit. Anyone bathing after sunset, on a holy day, or without having first made the sign of the cross risks being drowned by the vodyanoy. He can assume many different forms. The vodyanoy lives alone in his particular body of water and is known to favor rivers with strong currents and swamps.

VOHU MANAH \vō-'hü-ma-'näh, -'na\ (Avestan: "Good Mind"), in ZOROASTRIANISM, one of the six amesha spentas ("beneficent immortals") created by AHURA MAZDĀ to assist him in furthering good and destroying evil. Because the prophet Zoroaster was, in a vision, conducted into the presence of Ahura Mazda by Vohu Manah, any individual who seeks to know Ahura Mazda must approach him through this immortal.

Since Vohu Manah is the closest of the AMESHA SPENTAS to Ahura Mazda, the second month of the Zoroastrian calendar is dedicated to him. His sacred animal is the cow.

VOLADORES, JUEGO DE LOS \'hwā-ġō-'thā-lōs-,bō-lä-'thō-rās\ (Spanish: "game of the fliers"), ritual dance of Mexico, possibly originating among the pre-Columbian Totonac and Huastec Indians. Four or six men (the voladores, or "flyers") dance on a platform atop a pole 60 to 90 feet high; at the end of the dance, they circle downward around the pole as the ropes that fasten them to it unwind. The number of dancers preserves the pre-Christian ritual orientation to the four points of the compass plus the zenith and the nadir.

VORŠUD \vör-'shüd\, among the Finno-Ugric Udmurt (Votyak) people, family spirit, literally "luck protector"; the term also designates a birchbark container kept in the family shrine, or kuala, as a receptacle for offerings and possibly as an image of the protector. The voršud was believed to watch over the welfare and prosperity of the family members worshiping at the kuala. The voršud case was kept on a shelf on the back wall of the kuala resting on a bed of twigs, which were renewed for ceremonies. The original voršud case was handed down from father to eldest son, but lesser voršud could also be made as the family expanded. The new voršud had to be made in the old kuala, left there for a while, and then transferred with some ashes from the hearth to dedicate the new shrine.

VOUDOU \'vü-'dü\, also spelled voodoo, French voudou \vō-'dü\, national folk religion of Haiti. Voudou is a mixture of ROMAN CATHOLIC ritual elements, which date from the period of French colonization, and theological and magical elements taken from AFRICAN RELIGIONS, which were brought to Haiti by slaves formerly belonging to the Yoruba, Fon, Kongo, and other peoples of Africa. The term voudou is derived from the word vodun, which denotes a god, or spirit, in the language of the Fon people of Benin (formerly Dahomey).

Although voodooists profess belief in a distant supreme God, the effective divinities are a large number of spirits called the loa, which can be variously identified as local or African gods, deified ancestors, or Catholic saints. The loa are believed to demand ritual service, which thereby attaches them to individuals or families. In voodoo ritual services, a number of devotees congregate at a temple, usually a meeting place, where a priest or priestess leads them in ceremonies involving song, drumming, dance, prayer, food preparation, and the ritual sacrifice of animals. The voodoo priest, or houngan, and the priestess, or mambo, also act as counselors, healers, and expert protectors against SORCERY or WITCHCRAFT.

The loa are thought by devotees to act as helpers, protectors, and guides to people. The loa communicate with an individual during the cult services by possessing him during a trance state in which the devotee may eat and drink, perform stylized dances, give supernaturally inspired advice to people, perform medical cures, or display special physical feats; these acts exhibit the incarnate presence of the loa within the entranced devotee. Many urban Haitians believe in two sharply contrasting sets of loas, a set of wise and benevolent ones called Rada loas, and a harsher, more malevolent group of spirits called Petro loas. Petro spirits are called up by more agitated or violent rituals than those which evoke Rada spirits.

A peculiar, and much sensationalized, aspect of voodoo is the zombi. A zombi is regarded as being either a dead person's disembodied soul that is used for magical purposes, or an actual corpse that has been raised from the grave by magical means and is then used to perform agricultural labor in the fields as a sort of will-less automaton. In actual practice, certain voodoo priests do appear to create "zombis" by administering a particular poison to the skin of a victim, who then enters a state of profound physical paralysis for a number of hours.

For decades the Roman Catholic church in Haiti denounced voodoo and even advocated the persecution of its devotees, but because voodoo has remained the chief religion of at least 80 percent of the people in Haiti, the Catholic church by the late 20th century seemed resigned to coexisting with it.

VOW, sacred voluntary promise to dedicate oneself or members of one's family or community to a special obligation that goes beyond usual requirements.

In the ancient Middle East, individuals often made vows to a deity to perform certain acts or to live in a certain way in return for a divine favor. HANNAH, the mother of the OLD TESTAMENT judge Samuel, for example, vowed that if YAHWEH, the God of Israel, would grant her a son she would devote him to the service of the Lord. Persons dedicated to the service of Yahweh might be released from their vows, however, by paying a certain amount of money.

Ancient ROMAN RELIGION encouraged vows to a deity in the name of the state, thereby putting the vow-giver in debt to the gods until the vows were fulfilled. During wars, vows were made to MARS, the god of war, to sacrifice a large number of animals in exchange for support in battle.

Among the Vikings, vows to the gods, often considered a type of prayer, were viewed as sacrosanct, and those who broke vows were cast out of their community.

Vows are very common in HINDUISM, BUDDHISM, and JAINISM. Buddhist monks vow to practice 10 precepts, which include NONVIOLENCE, chastity, and honesty. Buddhist laymen and laywomen also take on some of the vows of monks and nuns at some time or times during their lives. MAHĀYĀNA Buddhists sometimes adopt the vow of the BODHISATTVA, which is very strict. Jain monks follow the five vows, or vratas of MAHĀVĪRA—renunciation of killing, lying, taking what is not given, sexual pleasures, and all attachments.

In JUDAISM, vows (Hebrew nedarim) may be positive or negative. A positive nedar is a voluntary pledge to consecrate something to God or to do something in God's honor that is not required by law. A negative nedar (Hebrew issar) is a voluntary pledge to abstain from or deprive oneself of a legitimate pleasure. ROMAN CATHOLIC religious orders in general take three vows—poverty, chastity, and obedience—and in some cases an added vow of stability, i.e., to remain in a monastery. In PROTESTANTISM, vows are made during certain rites (e.g., CONFIRMATION, ORDINATION, and marriage ceremonies).

VRINDĀBAD \ˈvrɪn-dā-bəd\, also called Vrindavana, or Brindaban, North Indian town about 80 miles south of Delhi on the west bank of the Yamuna River. It is the sacred center of the Hindu deity KRISHNA and those who worship him. It is especially important to the sect known as the Gauḍīya Vaiṣṇavas and is a major pilgrimage site.

It was in Vrindābad and its surrounding forests that the key events of Krishna's mythological life took place, and as such it functions as a kind of heavenly world in which a religious drama unfolds apart from and transcendent of the normal confines of ordinary human society. It was here that Krishna was born, lived his precocious childhood, and grew into the attractive and intoxicating youth who would lure young maidens into the forest to participate in his divine play and circle dance. For the devotees of Krishna, these events and the mythological participants in them are paradigms for the ideal religious setting and salvific imaginative relationships the devotee forms with the deity.

As a historical locale, Vrindābad was the site where the founder of the Gauḍīya Vaiṣṇavas (see VAISNAVISM), the Bengali poet-saint CAITANYA, sent a group of theologians to reside. These theologians became known as the Six Gosvamins of Vrindābad and were responsible for systematizing the beliefs and practices of the group.

VULCAN \ˈvəl-kən\, in ROMAN RELIGION, god of fire, particularly in its destructive aspects as volcanoes or conflagrations. He was associated with the Greek god HEPHAESTUS. His worship was very ancient, and at Rome he had his own priest (FLAMEN). His chief festival, the Volcanalia, was held on August 23 and was marked by a rite in which the heads of Roman families threw small fish into the fire. Vulcan was invoked to avert fires, as his epithets Quietus and Mulciber ("[Fire] Allayer") suggest. His temples were located outside the city.

VULGATE (from Latin editio vulgata, "common version"), Latin BIBLE used by the ROMAN CATHOLIC church, primarily translated by ST. JEROME. In 382 Pope Damasus commissioned Jerome, the leading biblical scholar of his day, to produce an acceptable Latin version of the Bible from the various translations then being used. His revised Latin translation of the GOSPELS appeared about 383. Using the SEPTUAGINT Greek version of the OLD TESTAMENT, he produced new Latin translations of the Psalms (the so-called Gallican Psalter), THE BOOK OF JOB, and some other books. Later, he decided that the Septuagint was unsatisfactory and began translating the entire Old Testament from the original Hebrew versions, completing it about 405.

Jerome's translation was not immediately accepted, but from the mid-6th century a complete Bible with all the separate books bound in a single cover was commonly used. It usually contained Jerome's Old Testament translation from the Hebrew, except for the Psalms; his Gallican Psalter; his translation of the books of Tobias (Tobit) and Judith (apocryphal in the Jewish and Protestant canons); and his revision of the Gospels. The remainder of the NEW TESTAMENT was taken from older Latin versions, which may have been slightly revised by Jerome. Certain other books found in the Septuagint—the APOCRYPHA for Protestants and Jews; the DEUTEROCANONICAL BOOKS for Roman Catholics—were included from older versions.

In 1546 the COUNCIL OF TRENT decreed that the Vulgate was the exclusive Latin authority for the Bible, but it required also that it be printed with the fewest possible faults. The so-called Clementine Vulgate, issued by Pope Clement VIII in 1592, became the authoritative biblical text of the Roman Catholic church. From it the Confraternity Version was translated in 1941.

WACH, JOACHIM \ˈvæk\ (b. Jan. 25, 1898, Chemnitz, Ger.—d. Aug. 27, 1955, Orselina, Switz.), Protestant theologian and a prominent scholar in the STUDY OF RELIGION.

As a professor of the history of religion at the University of Leipzig (1929–35) and the University of Chicago (1945–55), Wach contributed significantly to the field of study that became known as the SOCIOLOGY OF RELIGION. He is credited with introducing into American scholarship the phenomenological method of analyzing RELIGIOUS BELIEFS and practices. He established the discipline known as the comparative study of religion (Religionswissenschaft) at the University of Chicago and is considered the founder of the Chicago School, which stressed methodology in the study of religion.

Wach conceived Religionswissenschaft as a comparative, phenomenological, and psychological approach to religion, including the theoretical (or mental), the practical (or behavioral), and the institutional (social) aspects of religion. Among Wach's writings in English are Sociology of Religion (1944), Types of Religious Experience—Christian and Non-Christian (1951), and The Comparative Study of Religions (1958). His publication Das Verstehen, 3 vols. (1926–33), remains a classic.

WAHHĀBĪS: see MUWAḤḤIDŪN.

WAKAN \wä-ˈkän\ (Dakota and Lakota wakha, “sacred, consecrated,” or cognates in other Siouan languages), also called wakonda, or wakanda \wä-ˈkän-də\, among various Native American groups, spiritual power belonging to some natural objects, people, horses, and celestial and terrestrial phenomena. Wakan has no essential characteristics in itself; rather, it is a kind of holiness or wonderfulness inherent in some objects. Wakan, and the wakan beings who bestow it, may be conceived of as weak or strong powers; the weak powers can be ignored, but the strong ones must be placated. Poisonous plants and reptiles can contain wakan, as can intoxicating drinks. Compare MANA.

WAKE, watch or vigil held over the body of a dead person before burial and sometimes accompanied by festivity; also, in England, a vigil kept in commemoration of the dedication of the PARISH church. The latter type of wake consisted of an all-night service of prayer and meditation in the church. These services, officially termed Vigiliae by the church, appear to have existed from the earliest days of Anglo-Saxon CHRISTIANITY.

Side by side with these church wakes there existed the custom of “holding a wake over” a corpse. The custom appears to predate Christianity in England. The Anglo-Saxons called the custom lich-wake, or like-wake (from Old English lic, a corpse). With the introduction of Christianity, the offering of prayer was added to the vigil. As a rule, the corpse, with a plate of salt on its breast, was placed under the table, on which was liquor for the watchers. These private wakes soon tended to become drinking orgies. With the REFORMATION and the consequent disuse of prayers for the dead, the custom of waking became obsolete in England but survived in Ireland. Many countries and peoples have a custom equivalent to waking, which is, however, distinct from funeral feasts.

WALDENSES \wól-ˈden-sēz\, also spelled Valdenses, French Vaudois, Italian Valdesi, members of a Christian movement that originated in 12th-century France. Waldenses sought to follow the example of JESUS CHRIST by living in poverty and simplicity. The name has been applied to members of a modern church (centered on the Franco-Italian border) that formed when remnants of the earlier movement became Swiss Protestant Reformers.

Early ROMAN CATHOLIC and Waldensian sources are few and unreliable, and little is known with certainty about the reputed founder, Valdes (also called Peter Waldo, or Valdo). As a layman, Valdes preached in Lyon (1170–76), but ecclesiastical authorities were disturbed by his lack of theological training and by his use of a non-Latin version of the BIBLE. Valdes attended the third LATERAN COUNCIL (1179) in Rome and was confirmed in his vow of poverty by Pope Alexander III. Probably during this council Valdes made his Profession of Faith (which still survives); it is a statement of orthodox beliefs such as accused heretics were required to sign. Valdes did not receive the ecclesiastical recognition that he sought. Undeterred, he and his followers (Paupers: “Poor”) continued to preach; the archbishop of Lyon condemned him, and Pope Lucius III placed the Waldenses under ban with his bull Ad Abolendam (1184), issued during the SYNOD of Verona.

Thereafter, the Waldenses departed from the teaching of the Roman Catholic church by rejecting prayers for the dead, veneration of the saints, the notion of PURGATORY, and the authority of secular courts. Their views were based on a simplified biblicism, moral rigor, and criticism of abuses in the church. Their movement spread throughout Europe, and Rome responded with EXCOMMUNICATION, active persecution, and execution. By the end of the 13th century the sect was virtually eliminated in some areas, and for safety the survivors abandoned their distinctive dress. By the end of the 15th century they were confined mostly to the French and Italian valleys of the Cottian Alps.

A second period in their history began when the French reformer Guillaume Farel introduced REFORMATION theology to the Waldensian ministers (barbes) in 1526. At a conference at Cianforan in 1532 most Waldenses accepted secular law courts and CELIBACY for their barbes and agreed to accept only two SACRAMENTS (BAPTISM and Holy Communion) and the doctrine of PREDESTINATION as presented by the Protestants in attendance. By adapting themselves to Geneva forms of worship and church organization, they became in effect a Swiss Protestant church. Persecution continued, however, until they received full civil rights in 1848.

During the second half of the 19th century, Waldensian emigrants arrived in Uruguay and later moved from there to the United States. There, strengthened by arrivals from France and Switzerland, they established small communities in Missouri, Texas, and Utah and, most importantly, around Valdese, in Burke county, N.C.

WALĪ ALLĀH, SHAH \wä-'lĕ-ä-'lā\, also spelled Wali'llah, full name Shah Wali Allāh al-Dihlāwī (b. 1702/03, Delhi [India]—d. 1762, Delhi), Indian theologian who first attempted to reassess Islamic theology in light of modern changes.

Walī Allāh received a traditional Islamic education from his father and is said to have memorized the QUR'AN at the age of seven. In 1732 he made a PILGRIMAGE to MECCA, and he then remained in the Hijaz (now in Saudi Arabia) to study religion with eminent theologians. He reached adulthood at a time of disillusionment following the death in 1707 of Aurangzeb, the last of the great Mughal emperors of India. Because large areas of the empire had been lost to Hindu and Sikh rulers of the Deccan and the Punjab, Indian Muslims had to accept the rule of non-Muslims.

Walī Allāh believed that the Muslim polity could be restored to its former splendor by a policy of religious reform that would harmonize the religious ideals of ISLAM with the changing social and economic conditions of India. According to him, religious ideas were universal and eternal, but their application could meet different circumstances. The main tool of his policy was the doctrine of tatbiq, whereby the principles of Islam were reconstructed and reapplied in accordance with the Qur'an and the HADITH. He thereby allowed the practice of IṬTIHĀD (independent thinking by jurists in matters relating to Islamic law), which hitherto had been curtailed. As a corollary, he reinterpreted the concept of taqdir (determinism) and condemned its popularization, qismat (absolute predetermination). Walī Allāh held that humans could achieve their full potential by their own exertion in a universe that was determined by God. Theologically, he opposed the veneration of saints or anything that compromised strict MONOTHEISM. He was jurisprudentially eclectic, holding that a Muslim could follow any of the four schools of Islamic law on any point of dogma or ritual.

The best known of Walī Allāh's writings was Asrār al-dīn ("The Secrets of Belief"). His annotated Persian translation of the Qur'an is still popular in India and Pakistan.

His synthesis of theology, philosophy, and MYSTICISM with Ḥanafī jurisprudence reinvigorated Islam so effectively that it became the prevailing understanding of religion among 'ULAMĀ' in India until well into the 20th century.

WANDERING JEW, in Christian legend, character doomed to live until the end of the world because he taunted JESUS on his way to the CRUCIFIXION. A reference in John 18:20–22 to an officer who struck Jesus at his arraignment before Annas is sometimes cited as the basis for the legend. The medieval English chronicler Roger of Wendover states that there was in Armenia a man formerly called Cartaphilus who claimed he had been Pontius Pilate's doorkeeper and had struck Jesus on his way to Calvary, urging him to go faster. Jesus replied, "I go, and you will wait till I return." Cartaphilus was later baptized Joseph and lived piously among Christian clergy, hoping in the end to be saved. An Italian variant of the story named the culprit as Giovanni Buttadeo ("Strike God").

The legend was revived in 1602 in a German pamphlet, "Kurze Beschreibung und Erzählung von einem Juden mit Namen Ahasverus" ("A Brief Description and Narration Regarding a Jew Named Ahasuerus"). The popularity of the pamphlet may have been the result of the anti-Jewish feeling aroused by belief that the ANTICHRIST would appear in 1600 and be aided by the Jews. Appearances of the wandering Jew were reported in various European cities. As late as 1868 he was reputedly seen in Salt Lake City, Utah.

The wandering Jew has been the subject of many works of literary and visual art. One of the best-known treatments is Eugène Sue's Romantic novel Le Juif errant, 10 vol. (1844–45; The Wandering Jew). Gustave Doré produced a series of 12 wood engravings on the theme in 1856.

WANG CHE \'wāŋ-'jə\, Pinyin Wang Zhe, also called Wang Ch'ung-yang \'chūŋ-'yāŋ\ (b. 1112—d. 1170), founder of the Ch'üan-chen (Perfect Realization) sect of TAOISM, in 1163. After receiving secret teachings, Wang established a monastery in Shantung to propagate the Way of Perfect Realization as a synthesis of CONFUCIANISM, Taoism, and Ch'an (ZEN) BUDDHISM. Wang's new sect flourished with the imperial patronage.

WANG CH'UNG \'wāŋ-'chūŋ\, Pinyin Wang Chong (b. 27 CE, K'uei-chi, China—d. 100?, K'uei-chi), one of the most original and independent Chinese thinkers of the Han period (206 BCE–220 CE). A rationalistic naturalist, Wang helped pave the way for the critical spirit of the next philosophical period and prepared China for the advent of Neo-Taoism.

Wang opposed contemporary CONFUCIANISM, declaring that natural things occur spontaneously and rejecting the notion that human actions influence the workings of the natural universe (e.g., a bad king will produce bad weather). A rationalist, he insisted that any theory must be supported by concrete evidence and experimental proof. He stated that humans, though noble and intelligent, have no exceptional position in the universe.

Wang has never been greatly popular in China, though in the 20th century the prevailing critical spirit, scientific method, and revolt against the past attracted new attention to his ideas. His outstanding work is the trenchant and critical Lun-heng ("Disquisitions").

WANG YANG-MING \ˈwɑŋ-ˈyɑŋ-ˈmɪŋ\, Pinyin Wang Yang-ming, canonized as Wen-ch'eng \ˈwən-ˈtʃəŋ\, Japanese Oyōmei \ō-ˈyō-mā\ (b. 1472, Yu-yao, Chekiang province, China—d. 1529, Nan-an, Kiangsi), Chinese scholar-official whose idealistic interpretation of NEO-CONFUCIANISM influenced philosophical thinking in East Asia for centuries. Though his government career was rather unstable, his suppression of rebellions brought a century of peace to his region. His philosophical doctrines, emphasizing understanding of the world from within the mind, were in direct conflict with the RATIONALISM espoused by CHU HSI, a highly esteemed Neo-Confucianist of the 12th century, and Wang's "false teaching" was for a time proscribed.

Wang was the son of a high government official. Having failed in the metropolitan civil service examinations in 1493 and 1495, he shifted his interest to military arts and Taoist studies, focusing on techniques for immortality. In 1499, however, Wang passed the "advanced scholar" (chin-shih) examination and held several government positions. In 1504 he returned to Peking (Beijing), supervised provincial examinations in Shantung, and then became a secretary in the Ministry of War. In 1505 he began to lecture on Confucianism.

A critical event occurred in 1506, when Wang was banished to remote Kweichow as head of a dispatch station. The hardship and solitude brought him to the sudden conviction that to investigate the principles of things is not to seek for them in actual objects, as the rationalistic Chu Hsi had taught, but in one's own mind. Thus he brought Idealist (HSIN-HSÜEH) Neo-Confucianism—as first taught by a 12th-century philosopher, Lu Hsiang-shan—its highest expression. A year later he pronounced another epoch-making theory: that knowledge and action are one. One knows FILIAL PIETY, he argued, only when one acts upon it, and correct action requires correct knowledge.

As a magistrate in Kiangsi in 1510, he carried out many reforms. An imperial audience followed and then a series of appointments of increasing rank, and by 1516 he was named governor of southern Kiangsi and adjacent areas. Bandits and rebels had controlled Kiangsi for decades. In four military campaigns in 1517–18, Wang eliminated them. He carried out reconstruction, tax reform, joint registration, establishment of schools, and the "community compact" to improve community morals and solidarity. In 1519 he suppressed a rebellion led by Chu Ch'en-hao, prince of Ning. Though accused by his enemies of collaboration with the prince, Wang was exonerated and made governor of Kiangsi.

In 1521 the new emperor appointed him war minister and awarded him the title of earl of Hsin-chien. His father died in 1522, however, and after mourning him he stayed home for more than five years and discussed doctrines with followers, who now numbered in the hundreds. These conversations and those earlier constitute his main work, Ch'uan-hsi lu (Instructions for Practical Living). In 1521 he had enunciated his doctrine of complete realization of the innate knowledge of the good. In June 1527 Wang was called to suppress a rebellion in Kwangsi. He succeeded in six months. He became very ill and died on his way back in Nan-an, Kiangsi, in 1529.

Because a powerful minister hated him, his earldom and other hereditary privileges were revoked. Some who protested were dismissed or banished; his teachings were severely proscribed. Thirty-eight years later (1567), a new emperor honored him with the title of marquis of Hsin-chien and the posthumous title of Wen-ch'eng (Completion of Culture). Beginning in 1584 he was offered sacrifice in the Confucian temple, the highest honor. Wang's philosophy spread all over China for 150 years and greatly influenced Japanese thought during that time. He is regarded as one of the greatest Chinese thinkers in the past 2,000 years.

WAR OF THE SONS OF LIGHT AGAINST THE SONS OF DARKNESS, THE, Hebrew Megillat Milḥamat B'ne, or Beb'ne Ḥoshekh, one of the most important DEAD SEA SCROLLS intended to guide the Sons of Light, a sect whom most scholars believe to have been the Essenes, at the end of time in their war with the enemies of Israel, the Sons of Darkness.

The War Rule, discovered in Cave I of QUMRĀN in 1947, is a manual for military organization and strategy, including detailed specifications for battle gear and signals. It is also a theological discourse that develops the doctrine of the spirits of truth and perversity mentioned in the sect's Rule of the Community. The scroll portrays an apocalyptic 40-year "holy war": the ELECT of Israel will be joined by an angelic host, while the devil and the evil ANGELS will fight alongside other nations of the earth. The victory of the forces of light would signal the final destruction of evil, after which the God of Israel would rule eternally in justice.

Most scholars identify the enemy "Kittim" of the scroll as Romans, who invaded and occupied Judaea in 63 BCE. If this is so, the major sections of the scroll (probably a composite work) were written after that date but before 68 CE, when the Qumrān community was disbanded because of the Jewish revolt of 66–70 CE.

WĀSIL IBN 'AṬĀ' \ˈwā-shēl-,i-bən-ä-ˈtā\, in full Wāsil Ibn 'Aṭā' al-Ghazzāl, also called Abū Ḥudhayfa (b. c. 700, Arabia—d. 748, Arabia), Muslim theologian considered the founder of the MU'TAZILA school of theology.

Wāsil studied under the celebrated ascetic Ḥasan al-Baṣrī in Basra, Iraq, and met other influential religious figures there. In Wāsil's time discussions began that led to the development of Islamic speculative theology. At first theological controversies among Muslims were closely tied to political events, the principal issue being the legitimacy of the rule of the Umayyad house, which seized power after the death of the fourth CALIPH, 'ALĪ.

Wāsil's doctrinal formulations gave the Mu'tazila faction coherence as a religious sect. At the same time, both Wāsil and the Mu'tazila became involved in a revolutionary movement led by the 'Abbāsids that was to result in the overthrow of the Umayyads. Wāsil gathered around himself many devoted believers and ascetics, whom he often sent out as emissaries to spread his doctrines in distant provinces. See also KALĀM.

WATER, RELIGIOUS ASPECTS OF, derive from the nature of water as one of the most plentiful and essential of compounds, vital to life, and participating in virtually every process that occurs in plants and animals. Many of the qualities of water make it appear to be animated; on this basis it is psychologically understandable that water (e.g., rain, sea, lakes, and rivers) might become a natural phenomenon worthy of worship. Water is always in motion, changes color, reflects the world, “speaks” with murmuring and roaring, brings new life to dried-out vegetation, refreshes humans and animals, and heals. Because it cleanses it is also most suitable for purification. Water also demonstrates destructive forces (seaquakes, floods, and storms). The most important mythical-religious facts symbolized by water are the following: the primal matter; the instrument of the purification and expiation; a vivifying force; a fructifying force; and a revealing and judging instrument.

The conception of a primal body of water from which everything is derived is especially prevalent among peoples living close to coasts or in river areas—e.g., the Egyptian Nu (the primordial ocean), the Mesopotamian Apsu (the primeval watery abyss), and TIAMAT (the primeval chaos dragon). The earth may be taken from or emerge from the primeval water; heavenly beings appear on the emerged earth; and birds lay an egg that is later divided into two halves (heaven and earth) on the chaotic sea.

Water is viewed as an instrument for purification and expiation, especially in arid areas. Cultic acts, in such areas, generally take place only after LUSTRATIONS, sprinkling, or immersion in water. The same view holds true for entry into new communities or into life (e.g., BAPTISM). Myths of a great flood are widespread over Eurasia and America. This flood, which destroys with a few exceptions a disobedient original population, is an expiation by the water, after which a new type of world is created.

Water is viewed as vivifying, like the heaven-sent rain-water that moistens the earth. Water also is equated with the flowing life forces of the body (e.g., blood, sweat, and semen). The African Ashanti designate their patrilineal groups as ntoro, which means water, river, and semen, and the Wogeo of Papua call their patrilineal clans Dan (i.e., both water and semen). The myth of the Kasuar ancestress of the But of Papua related how Kasuar’s blood became sea (and salt).

Wherever early archaic culture spread the myth of the world parents heaven and earth, there also was a belief that heaven fructifies the earth with heaven’s seed. The springs, pools, and rivers on the earth, therefore, bring fertility. Rites in which water serves as a substitute for semen or the fertility of men are numerous. Battles of gods and heroes with mythical beings, beasts, and monsters that hold back the fructifying water are widespread in mythology. The liberation of water during the mythical battle is equivalent to the end of the dry season or a drought.

Water also serves as an instrument that reveals and judges. Reflections in the water led to a whole series of oracles originating from an alleged prophetic or divinatory power of water. The custom of water DIVINATION is found in ancient Europe, North Africa, the Near East (e.g., Babylonian fortune telling by means of cups), eastern and northern Asia (where the use of metal mirrors by the SHAMANS often replaces the water), and in Southeast Asia and Polynesia.

Water is also used as a judging element: in ordeals believed to demonstrate the judgment of the gods, water ordeals (e.g., immersion in water), as well as the more frequent fire ordeals, appear. Here also the purifying character of the water plays a role.

WEBB, CLEMENT CHARLES JULIAN \ˈweb\ (b. June 25, 1865, London, Eng.—d. Oct. 5, 1954, Pitchcott, Buckinghamshire), English scholar and philosopher who contributed to the study of the societal aspects of religion.

A fellow and tutor in philosophy at Magdalen College, Oxford, from 1889 to 1922, Webb served as the first Oriel Professor of the Philosophy of the Christian Religion at Oriel College, Oxford, from 1920 to 1930. Cautious of extreme claims, Webb criticized the theories of the pioneer sociologists ÉMILE DURKHEIM and Lucien Lévy-Bruhl, who had treated religion as only a social phenomenon, in his Group Theories of Religion and the Individual (1916). Two of his works—God and Personality (1918) and Divine Personality and Human Life (1920)—discussed the relationship between divine personality and human social, political, scientific, and religious activities.

WEBER, MAX \ˈvā-bər\ (b. April 21, 1864, Erfurt, Prussia [Germany]—d. June 14, 1920, Munich, Ger.), German sociologist and political economist best known for his thesis of the “Protestant Ethic,” relating PROTESTANTISM to capitalism, and for his ideas on bureaucracy. Through his insistence on the need for objectivity in scholarship and his analysis of human action in terms of motivation, Weber profoundly influenced sociological theory.

Weber enrolled at the University of Heidelberg in 1882, interrupting his studies after two years to fulfill his year of military service at Strassburg (Strasbourg). During this time he became very close to the family of his mother’s sister, Ida Baumgarten, and her husband, the historian Hermann Baumgarten, whose influence on Weber’s intellectual development was profound. After his release from the military, Weber finished his studies at the University of Berlin while living at home. In 1893 he received a temporary position in jurisprudence at the University of Berlin and married Marianne Schnitger, a second cousin.

Weber’s great capacity for disciplined intellectual effort, together with his unquestionable brilliance, brought the reward of meteoric professional advance. Only a year after his appointment at Berlin, he became a full professor in political economy at Freiburg, and then, in 1896, at Heidelberg. His work in this period focused on the agrarian history of ancient Rome, the evolution of medieval trading societies, the agrarian problems of the German east, the German stock exchange, and the social basis of the decline of Latin antiquity.

After a lengthy bout with a nervous condition, Weber was able to resume scholarly work in 1903, though he did not teach again until after World War I. He had resigned his professorship at Heidelberg at the height of his illness, but came into an inheritance in 1907 that made him independent.

Die protestantische Ethik und der Geist des Kapitalismus (1904–05; The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism, 1930), his best-known and most controversial work, Weber noted the statistical correlation in Germany between interest and success in capitalist ventures and Protestant background. He attributed the relationship to certain accidental psychological consequences of the notions of PREDESTINATION and the calling in Puritan theology, notions that were deduced with the greatest logical severity by Calvin and his followers.

In Calvin's formulation, the doctrine of predestination invested God with such omnipotence and omniscience that sinful humanity could know neither why nor to whom God had extended the GRACE of salvation. The psychological insecurity that this doctrine imposed on Calvin's followers was too great, and they began to look for loopholes that would indicate the direction of divine will. The consequence was an ethic of unceasing commitment to one's worldly calling and ascetic abstinence from any enjoyment of the profit reaped from such labors. The practical result of such beliefs and practices was the most rapid possible accumulation of capital.

Weber's political sociology is concerned with the distinction between charismatic, traditional, and legal forms of authority. CHARISMA refers to the gift of spiritual inspiration underlying the power of religious PROPHECY and political leadership. Throughout his life Weber believed that life was essentially a flux, a non-rational flow which human beings "rationalized" through various world-views. Human history he saw as a struggle between emotion (the nonrational) and calculating reason (rational), between the charismatic leader and the technocrat. Thus the history of religions was a history of the rationalization and demystification of the world through RELIGIOUS BELIEFS and practices beginning with myths and rituals and ending with impersonal bureaucratic organizations. Further tracing the relation between religion and RATIONALISM, in his work on the SOCIOLOGY OF RELIGION Weber claimed that the doctrine of KARMA in India was the most rational solution to the THEODICY problem since it removed the mystery of evil by placing it solely in the actions and responsibilities of each individual.

Weber's most powerful impact on his contemporaries came in the last years of his life, when, from 1916 to 1918, he argued against Germany's annexationist war goals and in favor of a strengthened parliament. He stood for sobriety in politics and scholarship against the apocalyptic mood in the months following Germany's defeat. His last achievements were assisting in the drafting of the new constitution and in the founding of the German Democratic Party.

WEN-TI \wən-'dē\, Pinyin Wendi, also called Wen Ch'ang \-ch'äng\, or Wen-ch'ang-ti-chün \-'jün\, Pinyin Wen Chang, or Wenchangdijun, Chinese god of literature, charged by the JADE EMPEROR (Yü-huang) with keeping a log of men of letters and a register of their titles and honors so that he can mete out rewards and punishments to each according to his merit.

WEN-TI is said to have had 17 REINCARNATIONS, during the ninth of which he appeared on earth as Chang Ya. He is said to have lived during T'ang dynasty times (618–907 CE) or during the 3rd or 4th century or earlier. His brilliant writing led to his canonization during the T'ang dynasty and to his appointment as lord of literature in the 13th century. Because Chang is said to have lived at Tzu-t'ung in Szechwan province, in that region he is worshiped as Tzu-t'ung Shen (Spirit of Tzu-t'ung). He has two assistants, K'uei Hsing, the god of examinations, with whom he is sometimes confused, and Chu I (Red Coat).

WESAK \wā-'säk\, also spelled Vesak, Sanskrit Vaiśākha, Pāli Vesākha, most important of the THERAVĀDA Buddhist festivals, commemorating the birth, Enlightenment, and death of the BUDDHA GOTAMA. The event is observed on the full-moon day of the lunar month Vesākha, which falls in April or May. The day is observed as a public holiday in many Southeast Asian countries. It is marked by devotional services and deeds intended to be meritorious, such as the presentation of food or alms to monks or the release of captive birds in memory of the Buddha's compassion.

WESLEY, CHARLES \wes-lē, commonly 'wez-\ (b. Dec. 18, 1707, Epworth, Lincolnshire, Eng.—d. March 29, 1788, London), English clergyman, poet, and HYMN writer, who, with his elder brother John, started the Methodist movement in the Church of England.

After attending Westminster School, Wesley was elected to Christ Church, Oxford, in 1726. He underwent a spiritual awakening during the winter of 1728–29 and initiated, with his brother and two other undergraduates, the Holy Club. In 1735, in order to aid his brother John in a MISSION to Georgia (in North America), he accepted holy orders.

Charles was subject to extremes of emotion, and his spiritual despair and physical exhaustion in Georgia led him to return to England after only a few months. With the help of the Moravians, like his brother John, he found spiritual peace. On Whitsunday, May 21, 1738, he found himself "at peace with God." He became an eloquent preacher for the Methodist cause and translated the Gospel into hymns, which became important means of evangelism.

Personal and professional disagreements between Charles and his brother after 1749 caused an estrangement between the two, and Charles withdrew from active leadership of the Methodist societies. His work as an evangelist and hymn writer for METHODISM, however, had already made its permanent mark. He published more than 4,500 hymns and left some 3,000 in manuscript. Among Wesley's best-known hymns are "Love divine, all loves excelling"; "Hark, the herald angels sing"; "Christ the Lord is ris'n today"; "Soldiers of Christ, arise"; "Rejoice, the Lord is king"; and "Jesu, lover of my soul."

WESLEY, JOHN (b. June 17, 1703, Epworth, Lincolnshire, Eng.—d. March 2, 1791, London), Anglican clergyman, evangelist, and founder, with his brother Charles, of the Methodist movement in the Church of England.

John Wesley was the second son of Samuel, a former NONCONFORMIST (dissenter from the Church of England) and rector at Epworth, and Susanna Wesley. Graduating in 1724 from Christ Church, Oxford, he was made a deacon in 1725 and the following year was elected a fellow of Lincoln College. After assisting his father at Epworth and Wroot, he was ordained a priest on Sept. 22, 1728.

Recalled to Oxford in October 1729 to fulfill the residential requirements of his fellowship, John joined his brother Charles, Robert Kirkham, and William Morgan in a religious study group that was derisively called the "Methodists" because of their emphasis on methodical study and devotion. Taking over the leadership of the group from Charles, John helped it to grow in numbers. The Methodists, also called the Holy Club, were known for their frequent communion services and for fasting two days a week. After 1730, the group began visiting Oxford prisoners, teaching them to read, paying their debts, and seeking employment for them. The Methodists also distributed food, clothes, medicine, and books to the poor. When the Wesleys left the Holy Club in 1735, it disintegrated.

Following his father's death in April 1735, John was persuaded to oversee the spiritual lives of the colonists and to preach to the Native Americans as an agent for the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. Accompanied by Charles, who was ordained for this MISSION, John was introduced to some Moravian emigrants who appeared to him to possess the spiritual peace for which he had been searching. The mission proved abortive.

Back in London, John met a Moravian, Peter Böhler, who convinced him that all he needed was faith. He also discovered MARTIN LUTHER'S commentary on the Letter of Paul to the Galatians, which emphasized the doctrine of JUSTIFICATION by GRACE through faith alone. On May 24, 1738, in London, during a meeting of Moravians under the auspices of the Church of England, Wesley's conviction was transformed into a personal experience when Luther's preface to the commentary to the Letter of Paul to the Romans was read.

From this point onward, at the age of 35, Wesley viewed his mission as one of preaching salvation by faith. Rejected by the Church of England, he tried to inject spiritual vigor into various religious societies by introducing "bands"—i.e., small groups of members within each society who were of the same sex and marital status and who were prepared to share secrets with each other and to receive rebukes. For such groups Wesley drew up Rules of the Band Societies in 1738.

For a year he worked through church societies, but resistance to his methods grew. In 1739, Wesley organized converts into societies for fellowship and spiritual growth. To avoid unworthy members, Wesley published, in 1743, Rules for the Methodist Societies. To promote new societies he became an itinerant preacher. Because most ordained clergymen did not favor his approach, Wesley sought the services of laymen, who also became itinerant preachers and helped administer the Methodist societies.

Many of Wesley's preachers had gone to the American colonies, but after the American Revolution most returned to England. Because the bishop of London would not ordain some of his preachers to serve in the United States, Wesley took it upon himself, in 1784, to do so. He also declared his independence from the Church of England.

WESTERN WALL, Hebrew Ha-Kotel Ha-Ma'aravi, also called Wailing Wall, in the Old City of Jerusalem, a place of prayer and PILGRIMAGE sacred to the Jewish people. It is the only remains of the Second Temple of Jerusalem, held to be uniquely holy by the ancient Jews and destroyed by the Romans in AD 70. The authenticity of the Western Wall has been confirmed by tradition, history, and archaeology; the wall dates from about the 2nd century BC, but its upper sections were added at a later date.

Because the wall now forms part of a larger wall that surrounds the Muslim DOME OF THE ROCK and AL-AQSA MOSQUE, Jews and Arabs have fought over its control or for the right of access. This conflict was renewed when Israel occupied the Old City after the Six Day War of June 1967. As seen today, the Western Wall measures about 160 feet long and about 60 feet high but extends much deeper into the earth. Jewish devotions there, which date from the early Byzantine period, reaffirm the rabbinic belief that "the divine Presence never departs from the Western Wall." Jews lament the destruction of the Temple and pray for its restoration. Such terms as Wailing Wall were coined by Europeans who witnessed the mournful vigils of Jews before the relic of the Temple. Visitors to the wall have long placed small slips of paper, upon which prayers and petitions are written, into the cracks between the stones.

WESTMINSTER ABBEY \ˈwest-min-stər\, church, originally a BENEDICTINE monastery, refounded as the Collegiate Church of St. Peter in Westminster (one of the boroughs constituting Greater London) by Queen Elizabeth I in 1560.

St. Edward the Confessor (reigned 1042–66) built a new church on the site, which was consecrated in 1065. It was cruciform in plan, with a central and two western towers. In 1245 Henry III pulled down Edward's church (except the nave) and replaced it with the present abbey church in the Gothic style of the period. The chapel of Henry VII (begun c. 1503), in Perpendicular Gothic style, is famed for its fan vaulting. The western towers were the last addition to the building. Attributed to Sir Christopher Wren, they were built by Nicholas Hawksmoor and John James in 1745. The choir stalls in the body of the church date from 1848; the north transept facade was restored in 1880–90.

WESTMINSTER CONFESSION

Since William the Conqueror, every British sovereign has been crowned in the abbey except Edward V and Edward VIII (neither of whom was crowned). Many kings and queens are buried near the shrine of Edward the Confessor or in Henry VII's chapel. The last sovereign to be buried in the abbey was George II (died 1760).

Poets' Corner is in the south transept, while the north transept has memorials to British statesmen. The grave of the "Unknown Warrior," whose remains were brought from Flanders in 1920, is in the nave near the west door. The ten niches above the door of the imposing west front are dedicated to the theme of 20th-century Christian martyrdom; they contain statues of figures such as Dietrich Bonhoeffer, Martin Luther King, Jr., and Oscar Romero.

WESTMINSTER CONFESSION, CONFESSION OF FAITH of English-speaking PRESBYTERIANS. Produced by the Westminster Assembly during the English Civil Wars, it was completed in 1646 and approved by Parliament after revision in 1648. After the Restoration in 1660, the confession lost its official status in England. It was adopted by the Church of Scotland, by various American and English Presbyterians, and by some Congregationalists and BAPTISTS.

Declaring that the sole doctrinal authority is SCRIPTURE, the confession restates the early church doctrines of the TRINITY and of JESUS CHRIST and gives Reformed views of the SACRAMENTS, the ministry, and the COVENANTS of works and GRACE. It states that "some men and ANGELS are predestinated unto everlasting life, and others foreordained to everlasting death," and yet "neither is God the author of SIN, nor is violence offered to the will of creatures."

WHITE LOTUS, or Pai-lien chiao \ˈbiːˈliɛn-ˈtʃjɑʊ\, Chinese Buddhist millenarian movement founded by Mao Tzu-yüan in the 12th century. An offshoot of PURE LAND BUDDHISM, the White Lotus Society was an association of laymen and monks devoted to rebirth into the Pure Land via recitation of the name AMITĀBHA and other means. It appealed in particular to women and the poor. It is best known through its role in the White Lotus Rebellion (1786–1804), an uprising that contributed to the decline of the Ch'ing dynasty. The movement was banned in 1322.

WILAYAH \wi-ˈli-ə\ (Arabic: "divine friendship," "sainthood"), in ISLAM, a special friendship with God that is available to all believers and is specifically enjoyed by Muslim saints. The saints, generally Sufis, have been chosen as friends of ALLĀH (Arabic: "God") and have been granted miraculous powers. The saints were objects of devotion in their lifetimes, and their tombs were visited by devotees seeking blessings. The Sufis developed a hierarchy of friends of Allāh, culminating in the qutb, the "pole" or "axis," who is the spiritual center of the community. (See SUFISM.)

WILLIAMS, ROGER \ˈwil-yəmz\ (b. 1603?, London—d. Jan. 27/March 15, 1683, Providence, R.I.), English founder of the colony of Rhode Island and pioneer of religious liberty.

The son of a tailor, Williams was educated at Cambridge. In 1630 he left his post as CHAPLAIN, which had introduced him to the Puritan leaders Oliver Cromwell and Thomas Hooker, to pursue NONCONFORMIST religious ideals in New England. Arriving in Boston in 1631, Williams refused to associate with the Anglican Puritans, and in 1632 he moved to the separatist Plymouth colony. Invited by the church at Salem to become pastor in 1634, he was banished from Massachusetts Bay by the civil authorities, in part for his view that magistrates had no right to interfere in matters of religion.

In the spring of 1637 Williams founded the town of Providence and the colony of Rhode Island. Providence became a haven for ANABAPTISTS, QUAKERS, and other religious dissenters. Williams was briefly an Anabaptist but in 1639 declared himself a Seeker. He went to England in 1643 to obtain a charter for Rhode Island and again in 1651–54 to have it confirmed. He was the first president of Rhode Island under its charter.

WILLIAMS, ROWAN, in full Rowan Douglas Williams (b. June 14, 1950, Swansea, Wales), 104th archbishop of Canterbury (from 2002), a noted theologian, and the first archbishop of Canterbury in modern times chosen from outside the Church of England.

Williams earned bachelor's and master's degrees from Christ's Church, Cambridge and a doctoral degree in THEOLOGY from Wadham College, Oxford. He held academic appointments, including a professorship of divinity at Oxford (1986–92), and ecclesiastical offices in the Church in Wales. He became bishop of Monmouth in 1992 and archbishop of Wales in 2000. As archbishop of Canterbury, Williams sought to improve relations between Christians and Muslims and between his church and the Roman Catholic church, meeting early in his reign with Pope JOHN PAUL II in Rome. Although warmly welcomed by the pope, Williams was cautioned by Rome over the consecration of homosexuals as bishops (Williams himself once ordained an openly gay man). The ordination and consecration of homosexuals remained a controversial issue within the ANGLICAN COMMUNION. In 2003 Williams appointed a special commission to study the matter.

WISE, ISAAC MAYER \ˈwɪz\ (b. March 29, 1819, Steingrub, Bohemia [now Kamenný Dvůr, Czech Rep.]—d. March 26, 1900, Cincinnati, Ohio, U.S.), RABBI and leader of American REFORM JUDAISM.

After serving as a rabbi for two years in Bohemia, Wise immigrated in 1846 to Albany, N.Y., where he was a rabbi for eight years. He then accepted the pulpit of Bene Yeshurun in Cincinnati, a post he retained for the rest of his life.

Wise promoted centralized Reform institutions in his English-language weekly, the American Israelite; in his German-language paper, Die Deborah; and in rabbinical conferences. The fruits of his efforts were the Union of American Hebrew Congregations and the CENTRAL CONFERENCE OF AMERICAN RABBIS. Wise served as president of both institutions until his death.

Wise's efforts to compile a standard Reform prayer book resulted in the Minhag America ("American Usage"), published in 1857; this work was superseded in 1894 by the Union Prayer Book. A believer in the universal mission of JUDAISM, he opposed the establishment of a Jewish state in Palestine. Although Wise failed to unite all American Jews, he succeeded in adapting Reform Judaism to American life.

WISE, STEPHEN SAMUEL (b. March 17, 1874, Budapest, Hung., Austria-Hungary—d. April 19, 1949, New York, N.Y., U.S.), Reform RABBI and leader of the Zionist movement in the United States.

Wise earned his Ph.D. at Columbia University in 1901 and received his rabbinical training from private teachers. After serving as rabbi to congregations in New York City and Portland, Ore., he founded the influential Free SYNAGOGUE (1907) in New York City, which he led until his death. Wise subsequently became a noted civic reformer.

Wise was one of the first Jewish leaders in the United States to become active in the Zionist movement (see ZIONISM). He attended the Second Zionist Congress in Basel, Switz., in 1898, and that same year he helped found the Zionist Organization of America (ZOA), of which he served as president in 1936–38. He also helped found and led the permanent American Jewish Congress and the World Jewish Congress (1936). As a prominent member of the Democratic Party, Wise influenced the U.S. government toward approval of the Balfour Declaration, supporting the establishment of a Jewish homeland in Palestine. He was a leader in the struggle to marshal American public opinion against Adolf Hitler in the 1930s.

In 1922 Wise founded the Jewish Institute of Religion in New York City, a seminary that was especially designed to train liberal rabbis for the New York area; this school merged with Hebrew Union College in 1950.

WITCHCRAFT, term that functions in three very different and discrete spheres of meaning that are often confused one with the other. The first refers to the accusations made by the Christian church of “diabolical” witchcraft supposedly practiced by some people of the late medieval and early modern periods of Europe and the colonial period in America. The second usage is as a comparative category in anthropology and religious studies; here it refers to a phenomenon involving SORCERY and magic found in various historical periods and cultures. The third and most recent use of the term is as a label of self-identification for the practice of certain types of Neo-Pagans in the 20th century.

History. The first and oldest meaning of witchcraft refers to the exercise of supernatural power by persons supposedly in league with the devil and thus is a type of SATANISM. Individuals named as witches were identified with those the Christian church regarded as heretics, and both types of enemies of the orthodox were persecuted in waves beginning in the late Middle Ages.

The church accused suspected witches of having made a pact with devil, from whom their malevolent powers derived and with whom they would meet in secret, nocturnal gatherings called sabbats. The mostly female witches supposedly were able to fly to these meetings, where they desecrated Christian symbols, indulged in sacrificial infanticide and CANNIBALISM, and participated in sexual orgies with Satan. These and other lurid details of the witchcraft cult were codified in manuals produced during the INQUISITION, the most infamous of which is the MALLEUS MALEFICARUM (“The Hammer of Witches”) first published in the 15th century. Suspected witches were tortured until they admitted such practices, thereby confirming the existence of the witchcraft cult in the eyes of church officials. Between 1450 and 1700 it has been estimated that at least 100,000 people—predominantly women—were executed as witches, and perhaps overall millions suffered through what has been called one of the longest and most bizarre delusions in Western history.

There is, nonetheless, no historical evidence of any such organized witchcraft religion, let alone one with tentacles as wide-ranging as the church believed. The most important function of the witchcraft craze was scapegoating and the promotion of social cohesion at the expense of an enemy.

Various kinds of otherwise unexplained personal and social misfortunes could be blamed on individuals who were, in one way or another, marginal to the group or outright outcasts and pariahs. There was certainly a strong misogynist streak present as well, and women who were elderly, poor, or single were often accused. The authors of the Malleus maleficarum wrote that “all witchcraft comes from carnal lust, which is in women insatiable” and that women are “intellectually like children” and also subject to the devil’s temptations. The last major outbreak of witch-hunting occurred in Salem, Mass., at the end of the 17th century.

In contrast to this hostility, many societies distinguish between “good” magic or witchcraft and “bad.” The Azande of Sudan, for example, traditionally regarded witchcraft that involved oracles, DIVINATION, and AMULETS as benevolent, whereas sorcery aimed at nefariously and illicitly harming or even killing those one hated or resented was regarded as antisocial and malevolent. The roles witchcraft is seen to play in traditional societies are various, depending on whether it is the magical practitioner or the anthropologist who is evaluating the practice. The practitioners may see witchcraft as serving to heal sicknesses or foretell the future. Ethnologists tend to explain witchcraft as reducing social tensions and hostilities; reinforcing order, justice, and solidarity; or providing the weak with power and society with SCAPEGUATS. Indeed, one of the most important functions of witchcraft may be explanatory, for attributing all kinds of events, conditions, and misfortunes to the workings of witches provides those living in premodern society with a sense of understanding, or provides lived experience with a socially meaningful explanatory context. Witchcraft as identified in the second usage is found not only in certain tribal societies, but also in ancient Greece, Rome, China, India, and other civilizations.

Modern developments. Witchcraft has come to take on quite a different meaning in recent decades as it has been adopted as a label of self-identification (also called Wicca, from the Old English root of the term) among a segment of the so-called Neo-Pagan movement. A diverse and only minimally affiliated conglomeration of various groups, the Neo-Pagans consist not only of those calling themselves witches but also those practicing revived or reinvented forms of ancient EGYPTIAN RELIGION or GREEK RELIGION, Druidism, pre-Christian European folk religion, ceremonial magic, or any number of other traditions that worship the powers of nature or deities closely connected to the natural world (see NEW RELIGIOUS MOVEMENTS).

Some practitioners of Wicca claim an unbroken tradition stretching back in time for millennia. In 1921 Egyptologist and folklorist Margaret Murray published an influential work entitled The Witch-cult in Western Europe in which she argued that witchcraft was the ancient religion of pre-Christian Europe. This religion was comparable to other "fertility cults" around the world and was forced underground by the Christian church. While virtually no historians today accept this thesis, it has provided some Wiccans with a myth of antiquity for their new religion.

In fact, however, modern witchcraft arguably has much more recent origins. In 1939 an Englishman, Gerald B. Gardner, was, according to his own account, initiated into a COVEN of witches who practiced an ancient and hereditary form of the religion, although it is not certain such a group ever existed. In any event, Gardner and his partner Doreen Valiente went public after the last Witchcraft Act was repealed in Britain in 1951 and created the first modern cult of witchcraft out of beliefs and rituals eclectically borrowed from FOLKLORE and mythology, Masonic rites, the works of the occultist Aleister Crowley, Rosicrucianism, and Eastern MYSTICISM. Gardner's theology centered around a "Horned God" of fertility, sometimes identified with PAN, and a great Earth Goddess figure who gradually took on more and more importance. Gardner is also credited with the invention of the term Wicca; the three major branches of British Wicca, and their American extensions, all can be traced back to him.

In the United States during the 1960s and '70s another form of modern witchcraft arose and has now spread to Europe and elsewhere: feminist or "Dianic" Wicca. This type of witchcraft revolves around the Goddess conceived of as the supreme being and usually worshiped more or less exclusively. The majority of such groups exclude men, and Dianic Wicca has sometimes been called the spiritual arm of the feminist movement (see also WOMEN AND RELIGION).

Taken together, the members and practitioners of all forms of modern witchcraft are numbered at about 100,000, and Wicca has been called one of the fastest growing of the new religious movements of Western Europe and North America.

Most, if not all, modern witches share certain broadly conceived beliefs. Most would subscribe to the theological importance of the feminine principle, or Goddess, and the need to balance what many regard as the overly male (and often patriarchal) view of divinity in mainstream religions of the West. All modern witchcraft traditions share a deep respect for nature and tend to be both pantheistic and polytheistic. All witches practice some form of ritual magic, almost always considered "good," or constructive. Virtually all practitioners of modern witchcraft subscribe to what has been dubbed the "Wiccan Rede" or ethical code: "An' it harm none, do what thou wilt."

While there are many "solitary" witches, who practice their craft alone, witches are also organized into covens of as few as three and as many as several dozen. Covens meet at regular times, most frequently on the nights of the new and full moons and at the eight high festivals of the Neo-Pagan calendar: Yule (winter solstice), Imbolg (CANDLEMAS, February 2), the vernal equinox, BELTANE (May Day, May 1), Midsummer (summer solstice), Lammass (August 1), the autumnal equinox, and SAMHAIN (HALLOWEEN). The rituals usually include the casting of a circle, which sacralizes the place of meeting, the invoking of the gods and goddesses, the practice of ceremonial magic, and a sharing of food and drink as well as stories and songs. While some few traditions have occasions that call for the so-called "Great Rite," which involves ritual sex, most forms of Wicca do not include this in their ritual repertoire.

There has been a tendency toward increased institutionalization among Wiccan groups. Legally recognized religious organizations, churches, and seminaries have arisen and antifamation leagues have been formed. Representatives from Wiccan groups have joined in ecumenical initiatives and are especially active in environmental issues.

WITCH DOCTOR, healer or benevolent worker of magic in a nonliterate society. The term originated in England in the 18th century and is generally considered to be pejorative and anthropologically inaccurate. See also MEDICINE MAN; SHAMAN.

WITCHES' SABBATH, nocturnal gathering of witches, a colorful and intriguing part of the lore surrounding witchcraft in Christian European tradition. The concept dates only from c. 1400 CE, when the INQUISITION began investigating witchcraft seriously. It was believed that the sabbath, or sabbat might be held on any day of the week, though Saturday was considered rare as being sacred to the Virgin MARY.

Reports of attendance at sabbaths varied; one confessed witch reported a gathering of 10,000. Witches reputedly traveled to the sabbath by smearing themselves with special ointment that enabled them to fly through the air, or they rode on a goat, ram, or dog supplied by the devil. Favorite locations included the Brocken, in the Harz Mountains, Germany; the Bald Mountain, near Kiev, Russia; the Blocula, Sweden; and the Département du Puy-de-Dôme, Auvergne, France. Typical dates included the two traditional DRUID festivals, the eve of May Day (April 30) and All Hallows Eve (October 31), and the seasonal festivals of winter (February 2), spring (June 23), summer (August 1), and fall (December 21). Occurrences at the sabbath were represented by inquisitors as including obeisance to the devil by kissing him under his tail, dancing, feasting, and indiscriminate intercourse.

WOMEN AND RELIGION, study of women's roles within religious life, particularly in societies in which religion is regulated and controlled by men. In the early days of the history of religions the dominant approach to the study of women and religion began from the hypothesis that matriarchy and goddess-oriented religions preceded the patriarchal cultures of historical times. This approach began with Johann Jakob Bachofen's Das Mutterrecht (1861; "Mother Right"), and was further developed by Friedrich Engels in The Origin of the Family, Private Property and the State (1884), and revived by Elizabeth Gould Davis in The First Sex (1971).

The belief that in prehistoric times all, or most, religions were centered around a single, supreme Goddess has inspired many writers, including Jessie Weston (From Ritual to Romance, 1920), Carl Gustav Jung (Four Archetypes, 1969), Erich Neumann (The Great Mother, 1955), Robert Graves (The White Goddess, 1948), Adrienne Rich (Of Woman Born, 1976), and Mary Daly (Beyond God the Father, 1973, and Gyn/ecology, 1978).

One of the most influential books about the primeval Goddess was Marija Gimbutas' The Gods and Goddesses of Old Europe, 7000 to 3500 BC: Myths, Legends and Cult Images (1974). Gimbutas' archaeological research was both solid and original, but as her interpretations became increasingly ideological they were appropriated by the Goddess-worshipping wing of the women's movement known as feminist spirituality, or the "Goddess-feminists," whose characteristic style of interpretation too often trivialized and exaggerated Gimbutas' ideas. The reduction of all goddesses to one, a tendency that for a time was dominant, too easily led to the reduction of all aspects of women to what Mary Lefkowitz calls a "genital identity." In recent years several excellent collections of essays combated this trend by emphasizing the striking differences between goddesses in different cultures.

Women intersect with religion at two primary points: in the divine sphere as divinities and in the human sphere as members of a society. A common characteristic of Goddess-feminist interpretation has been to subsume the two by claiming that a Goddess-oriented religion can develop only within a culture in which women play an important and valued role. By contrast, what we know about cults of goddesses from historic texts and the evidence of contemporary society indicates that women may be treated quite poorly where goddesses are worshiped. For instance, the feminist historian of JUDAISM Tikva Frymer-Kensky argues that, although polytheistic systems did give females a certain separate status, they subordinated women, marginalized them, and limited them to roles of fertility, sexuality, nurturance, and wisdom. In contrast, she argues, women were actually regarded as more equal partners under patriarchal Judaism, despite their subordinate social position. As a rule, the more powerful, and hence dangerous, goddesses are perceived to be, the more intrinsically powerful, and hence dangerous, human women are perceived to be.

While Christian and Jewish scholars long revered their female saints and leaders (e.g., JOAN OF ARC, Judith), Hindus, Buddhists, and Muslims also revered their own great women. The history of religions, however, tended to neglect non-Western woman religious leaders. Only in the last decades of the 20th century did scholars begin to take seriously the construction of human women within the texts and the lives of actual women, as storytellers and ritualists, for example, in living religions. This period saw the early stirrings of studies of women who founded, transformed, or maintained religious movements in their own right.

WŎNHYO DAISA \ˈwɒn-ˈhyō-ˈta-sä, -ˈda-sä\, also called Wŏnhyo (b. 617, Korea—d. 686, Korea), Buddhist priest who is considered the greatest of the ancient Korean religious teachers and one of the Ten Sages of the Ancient Korean Kingdom.

A renowned theoretician, Wŏnhyo was the first to systematize Korean BUDDHISM, bringing the various Buddhist doctrines into a unity that was sensible to both the philosophers and the common people. Wŏnhyo's realization of the need to practice a life that maintained harmony between the ideal and the real is illustrated by an anecdote that tells how he, as a priest, assumed to be practicing ASCETICISM, one night slept with a beautiful princess. Rather than chastise himself the next morning, he merely admitted that true spirituality was obtained not by pursuing unreal ends but by admitting the limitations of one's person.

His works exerted a profound influence on the history of Korean Buddhism. Most famous are "A Commentary on the Awakening of Faith in the Mahāyāna," "A Commentary on the Avatamsaka Sūtra," "A Study on the Diamond Samādhi Sūtra," and "The Meaning of Two Desires."

WORKER-PRIEST, in the ROMAN CATHOLIC church, member of a movement, especially in France and Belgium after World War II, seeking to reach the working classes, who had become alienated from the church. The worker-priests took construction and factory jobs, sharing the living conditions and social and economic problems of their coworkers. The movement was supported by Cardinal Emmanuel Suhard of Paris. Some worker-priests became politically active, joining in demonstrations on such matters as housing, racial discrimination, and peace. The movement was ordered discontinued by PIUS XII in 1954 and by John XXIII in 1959. In 1965 Paul VI approved it in modified form.

WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (WCC), ecumenical organization founded in 1948 in Amsterdam. The WCC works for the unity and renewal of the Christian denominations and offers them a forum in which to work together in the spirit of tolerance and mutual understanding.

The WCC originated in the ecumenical movement after World War I. The Life and Work Movement had concentrated on the practical activities of the churches, and the Faith and Order Movement had focused on the beliefs and organization of the churches and the problems involved in reunion. Before long, the two movements began to work toward establishing a single organization. A conference of church leaders met in 1938 in Utrecht, Neth., to prepare a constitution, but World War II intervened, and the first assembly of the WCC was not held until 1948. In 1961 the International Missionary Council united with the WCC.

The WCC's members include most Protestant and Eastern Orthodox bodies but not the ROMAN CATHOLIC church or the Southern BAPTISTS of the United States. The controlling body of the WCC is the assembly, which meets at intervals of approximately six years at various locations. The assembly appoints a central committee that in turn chooses from its membership an executive committee of 26 members, which, along with specialized committees and 6 copresidents, carries on the work between assemblies. The headquarters of the council is in Geneva, Switz.

The work of the WCC is divided into three main areas: church relations, ecumenical study and promotion, and interchurch aid and service to refugees. Under these divisions are a number of groups and commissions, such as faith and order, the commission on the life and work of the laity in the church and on the cooperation of men and women in church and society.

WORLD FELLOWSHIP OF BUDDHISTS, THE, ecumenical organization that promotes the growth, strength, and unity of the world Buddhist community. The World Fellowship of Buddhists (WFB) was founded in May 1950 in Colombo, Sri Lanka, by G.P. Malalasekera (1899–1973), a noted Buddhist scholar. Its headquarters have been in Bangkok, Thai., for the past 30 years, although it was previously located in Sri Lanka and Myanmar (Burma), respectively, for eight years at each location.

WORLD RELIGIONS

The organization's aims and objectives are to promote the study and practice of BUDDHISM, in part by establishing regional branches of the WFB and founding DHARMA centers worldwide. The WFB holds biannual conferences devoted to discussing contemporary issues of importance for the maintenance and advancement of Buddhism worldwide, and it is involved in the development and maintenance of institutions for educational, social, economic, cultural, and humanitarian efforts. It also coordinates and promotes the exchange of MISSIONS and students of Buddhism between countries. Although the WFB has an apolitical aim in its charter, it nonetheless has also supported environmental and anti-nuclear causes.

WORLD RELIGIONS, classification made popular in the 19th century that referred to an exclusive set of religions that crossed national boundaries. At first only three religions met the requirement: BUDDHISM, CHRISTIANITY, and ISLAM. Later the set of religions was increased to seven: Buddhism, Christianity, CONFUCIANISM/TAOISM, HINDUISM, Islam, JUDAISM, and SHINTŌ. For most scholars of religion the typology is no longer useful.

WORLD TREE, also called cosmic tree, center of the world, a widespread motif in many myths and folktales among various peoples, especially in Asia, Australia, Meso-America, and North America. There are three main forms.

In the vertical tradition, the tree extends between earth, heaven, and underworld. It is the vital connection between the world of the gods and the human world. Oracles and judgments or other prophetic activities are performed at its base.

In the horizontal form, the tree is planted at the center of the world and is protected by supernatural guardians. It is the source of terrestrial fertility and life. Human life is descended from it; its fruit confers everlasting life; and if it were cut down, all fecundity would cease.

In some cultures, cosmic trees grow at the four quarters of the universe and, together with the tree at the axis, coordinate the emanation and collection of supernatural forces on a daily basis.

WORMS, CONCORDAT OF \kən-'kôr-dət . . . 'wɔrmz, German 'vörms\, compromise arranged in 1122 between Pope Calixtus II (1119–24) and the Holy Roman emperor Henry V (reigned 1106–25) settling the INVESTITURE CONTROVERSY, a struggle between the empire and the PAPACY over the control of church offices. The concordat marked the end of the first phase of the conflict between Emperor Henry IV (1056–1106) and POPE GREGORY VII (1073–85) and made a clear distinction between the spiritual side of a prelate's office and his position as a landed magnate and vassal of the crown. BISHOPS and ABBOTS were to be chosen by the clergy, but the emperor was authorized to decide contested elections. The man chosen was first to be invested with the powers, privileges, and lands pertaining to his office as vassal, for which he did homage to the emperor, and then with the ecclesiastical powers and lands, which he acquired from his ecclesiastical superior, who represented the authority of the church.

WORMS, DIET OF (1521), meeting of the Diet (assembly) of the Holy Roman Empire held at Worms, Ger., in 1521, that was made famous by the appearance before it of MARTIN LUTHER to defend his beliefs.

Pope Leo X had condemned 41 propositions of Luther's in June 1520 and excommunicated him on Jan. 21, 1521, but it was several months later before the condemnation was received in Germany. Frederick III, elector of Saxony, refused to take any action against Luther but agreed with the Holy Roman Emperor, Charles V, that Luther would appear for a hearing at the Diet under the emperor's safe-conduct.

On April 17–18, 1521, Luther went before the Diet. He admitted that the books displayed before the court were his, but he refused to repudiate his works unless convinced of error by SCRIPTURE or by reason. Otherwise, he stated, his conscience was bound by the Word of God. Disorder broke out at Luther's refusal to recant, and the emperor dismissed the Diet for the day.

A hero to the Germans but a heretic to others, Luther soon left Worms but spent the next nine months in hiding. In May the Diet passed the Edict of Worms, which declared that Luther was an outlaw and a heretic who should be captured and turned over to the emperor and whose writings were forbidden. The edict, never enforced, nevertheless inhibited Luther's travels throughout his lifetime and made him dependent on his prince for protection.

WOVOKA \wō-'vō-kə\, also called Jack Wilson (b. 1858?, Utah Territory [U.S.]—d. October 1932, Walker River Indian Reservation, Nev.), Native American religious leader who founded the second messianic GHOST DANCE cult, which peaked about 1890.

His father, Tävibo, had been an assistant to Wodziwob, the Paiute leader of the first Ghost Dance movement of the 1870s. By 1888, he had acquired a reputation as a MEDICINE MAN. In 1889 Wovoka claimed that God had informed him that in two years the ancestors of his people would rise from the dead, buffalo again would fill the Plains, and the white man would vanish. To bring this about, Indians must remain peaceful and profess their faith in the RESURRECTION of the dead by taking part in a ritual dance, the so-called Ghost Dance. The practice quickly spread to other tribes, notably the Sioux. Wovoka was revered as a new MESSIAH.

The ensuing religious fervor frightened white settlers, and the hostility between the two cultures culminated in the massacre by U.S. troops of about 200 Sioux men, women, and children at Wounded Knee, S.D., on Dec. 29, 1890. After this tragic incident the movement went into decline.

WU \ˈwü\, Pinyin wu, English “Not-Being,” fundamental Taoist philosophical concept. In the thought of LAO-TZU interpreted by Wang Pi, Not-Being (wu) and Being (yu), the Nameless (wu-ming) and the Named (yu-ming), are interdependent and “grow out of one another.” Wu and yu are two aspects of the permanent TAO: “In its mode of being Unseen, we will see its mysteries; in the mode of the Seen, we will see its boundaries.” Not-Being does not mean Nothingness but rather the absence of perceptible qualities; in Lao-tzu’s view it is superior to Being. It is the Void (that is, empty incipience) that holds all potentialities and without which even Being lacks its efficacy. According to the scholar Ho Yen, wu is beyond name and form, hence absolute and complete and capable of accomplishing anything.

WU-CHING, Pinyin Wujing; see FIVE CLASSICS.

WU-HSING \ˈwü-ʃhɪŋ\, Pinyin wuxing (Chinese: “five elements”), in ancient Chinese COSMOLOGY, the five basic dynamic components of the physical universe: earth, wood, metal, fire, and water. These elements were believed to destroy and succeed one another in an immutable cycle and were correlated with the cardinal directions, seasons, colors, musical tones, and bodily organs.

The WU-HSING cycle served as a broad explanatory principle in Chinese history, philosophy, and medicine; it was first linked to dynastic history by the sage-chemist Tsou Yen (3rd century BCE). The Neo-Confucian philosophers of the Sung dynasty (960–1279 CE) extended the wu-hsing to encompass the Five Virtues (benevolence, righteousness, reverence, wisdom, and sincerity).

WU-WEI \ˈwü-ˈwā\, Pinyin wuwei (Chinese: “nonaction”), in TAOISM, the principle of yielding to others as the most effective response to the problems of human existence. Wu-wei is nonaggressive behavior that compels others to desist voluntarily from violence or overly aggressive conduct. Ideally, Taoists do not argue or debate. They rely on proper timing to set forth what they believe to be true, and they speak out against unseemly conduct only when their words are likely to be heeded. Taoists view laws and controls as undesirable repressions of human nature. For them a society with the fewest controls governs itself best. Wu-wei is thus regarded as the secret to human happiness, for through “nonaction” all things can be accomplished.

WYCLIFFE, JOHN \ˈwi-klɪf, ˈwi-\ (b. c. 1330, Yorkshire, Eng.—d. Dec. 31, 1384, Lutterworth, Leicestershire), English theologian, church reformer, and promoter of the first complete translation of the BIBLE into English. He was one of the forerunners of the Protestant REFORMATION.

Wycliffe received his formal education at the University of Oxford. He became a bachelor of divinity about 1369 and a doctor of divinity in 1372. On April 7, 1374, Edward III appointed Wycliffe to the rectory of Lutterworth. He received a royal commission to the deputation sent to discuss with the papal representatives at Brugge the outstanding differences between England and Rome, such as papal taxes and appointments to church posts. He complemented this activity with his political treatises on divine and civil dominion (De dominio divino libri tres and Tractatus de civili dominio), in which he argued men exercised “dominion” (possession and authority) straight from God. The righteous alone could properly have dominion, even if they were not free to assert it. Therefore, as the church was in SIN, it should give up its possessions and return to evangelical poverty. Such disendowment was to be carried out by the state, and particularly by the king.

Wycliffe preached in London in support of moderate disendowment, but his political connections displeased his ecclesiastical superiors, and he was summoned to appear before them in February 1377. The proceedings broke up in disorder, and Wycliffe retired uncondemned. That year saw Wycliffe at the height of his popularity and influence. Parliament and the king consulted him as to whether it was lawful to keep back treasure of the kingdom from Rome, and Wycliffe replied that it was. In May Pope Gregory XI issued five bulls against him, denouncing his theories and calling for his arrest. The call went unanswered.

He began a systematic attack on the beliefs and practices of the church. Theologically, this was facilitated by a strong predestinarianism that led him to believe in the “invisible” church of the ELECT, rather than in the “visible” church of Rome—that is, in the organized, institutional church. But his chief target was the doctrine of transubstantiation—that the substance of the bread and wine used in the EUCHARIST is changed into the body and blood of JESUS CHRIST. As a Realist philosopher—believing that universal concepts have a real existence—he attacked it because, in the annihilation of the substance of bread and wine, the cessation of being was involved. He then proceeded on a broader front and condemned the doctrine as idolatrous and unscriptural. He sought to replace it with a doctrine of remanence (remaining)—“This is very bread after the consecration”—combined with an assertion of the Real Presence in a noncorporeal form.

Meanwhile, he pressed his attack ecclesiastically. The pope, the CARDINALS, the clergy in remunerative secular employment, the monks, and the FRIARS were all castigated in language that was bitter even for 14th-century religious controversy. His attack on the church was not simply born of anger. It carried the marks of moral earnestness and a genuine desire for reform.

From August 1380 until the summer of 1381, Wycliffe was busy with his plans for a translation of the Bible and an order of Poor Preachers who would take his message to the people. The Bible had become necessary to his theories to replace the discredited authority of the church and to make the law of God available to everyone who could read. This, allied to a belief in the effectiveness of preaching, led to the formation of the Lollards, though the precise extent to which Wycliffe was involved in their creation is uncertain.

In 1381 the discontent of the working classes erupted in the Peasants’ Revolt. Wycliffe’s social teaching was not a significant cause of the uprising because it was known only to the learned. The archbishop of Canterbury, Simon of Sudbury, was murdered in the revolt, and his successor, William Courtenay (1347–96), moved against Wycliffe. Many of his works were condemned at the SYNOD held at Blackfriars, London, in May 1382; and at Oxford his followers capitulated, and his writings were banned. He continued to write prolifically until his death in December 1384.

Most of Wycliffe’s post-Reformation, Protestant biographers see him as the first Reformer. There has now been a reaction to this view, which some modern scholars have attacked as the delusion of uncritical admirers.

XAVIER, SAINT FRANCIS \ˈzā-vē-ər, ˈzɑ-, Spanish San Francisco Javier (b. April 7, 1506, Xavier Castle, near Sangüesa, Navarre [Spain]—d. Dec. 3, 1552, Sancian Island, China; canonized March 12, 1622; feast day December 3), the greatest ROMAN CATHOLIC missionary of modern times, who was instrumental in the establishment of CHRISTIANITY in India, the Malay Archipelago, and Japan. In Paris in 1534 he pronounced vows as one of the first seven members of the Society of Jesus, or JESUITS, under the leadership of ST. IGNATIUS OF LOYOLA.

Xavier was born in Navarre (now in northern Spain), at the family castle of Xavier, where Basque was the native language. He was the third son of the president of the council of the king of Navarre, most of whose kingdom was soon to fall to Castile (1512). In 1525 Xavier journeyed to the University of Paris, the theological center of Europe, to begin his studies.

In 1529, Ignatius Loyola, another Basque student, was assigned to room with Xavier; Ignatius had undergone a conversion and gathered together a group who shared his ideals. Gradually, Ignatius won over the initially recalcitrant Xavier, and Xavier was among the band of seven who, in a chapel on Montmartre in Paris, on Aug. 15, 1534, vowed lives of poverty and CELIBACY and promised to devote themselves to the salvation of believers and unbelievers alike. Xavier then performed the Spiritual Exercises, a series of meditations lasting about 30 days that had been devised by Ignatius. They implanted in Xavier the motivation that carried him for the rest of his life and prepared the way for his recurrent mystical experiences.

Xavier was ordained a priest in Venice on June 24, 1537. The seven, along with fresh recruits, had become widely popular as a result of their preaching and care of the sick throughout central Italy. King John III of Portugal sought their services to minister to the Christians and to evangelize the peoples in his new Asian dominions. On March 15, 1540, Xavier left Rome for the Indies, traveling first to Lisbon, Portugal. In the following fall, Pope Paul III formally recognized the followers of Ignatius as a religious order, the Society of Jesus.

Beginning in 1542, Xavier spent almost three years on the southeastern coast of India among the pearl fishers, the Paravas. Using a small CATECHISM he had translated into Tamil with the help of interpreters, Xavier traveled from village to village instructing converts and confirming them in their faith. Shortly afterward the Macuans on the southwestern coast indicated their desire for BAPTISM, and, after brief instruction, in the last months of 1544 Xavier baptized 10,000 of them. He anticipated that the schools he planned and Portuguese pressure would keep them constant in their faith.

In the fall of 1545 Xavier moved on to the Malay Archipelago, where he founded MISSIONS among the Malays and in the Spice Islands (Moluccas). In 1548 he returned to India, where more Jesuits had since arrived to join him. In Goa the College of Holy Faith, founded several years previously, was turned over to the Jesuits, and Francis began to develop it into a center for the education of native priests and catechists for the DIOCESE of Goa, which stretched from the Cape of Good Hope, at the southern tip of Africa, to China.

On Aug. 15, 1549, a Portuguese ship bearing Xavier and several companions entered the Japanese port of Kagoshima. Xavier's first letter from Japan, which was to be printed more than 30 times before the end of the century, revealed his enthusiasm for the Japanese, "the best people yet discovered." He grew conscious of the need to adapt his methods. His poverty that had impressed the Paravas and Malays often repelled the Japanese, so he abandoned it for studied display. In late 1551, having received no mail since his arrival in Japan, Xavier decided to visit India, leaving to the care of his companions about 2,000 Christians in five communities.

Back in India, administrative affairs awaited him as the superior of the newly erected Jesuit Province of the Indies. On Dec. 3, 1552, Xavier died of fever on the island of Sancian (now Shang-ch'uan TAO, off the Chinese coast) as he attempted to secure entrance to the country, then closed to foreigners.

A modern estimate puts the figure of those baptized by Xavier at about 30,000. He is justly credited for his idea that the missionary must adapt to the customs and language of the people he evangelizes, and for his advocacy of an educated native clergy—initiatives not always followed by his successors. The areas he evangelized in India have remained Roman Catholic to the present day. Even before his death Francis Xavier was considered a saint, and he has been formally venerated as such by the Roman Catholic church since 1622. In 1927 he was named patron of all missions.

XIPE TOTEC \ˈshē-pā-ˈtō-tek, ˈhē-pā- (Nahuatl: "Our Lord the Flayed One"), in PRE-COLUMBIAN MESO-AMERICAN RELIGION, god of spring (the beginning of the rainy season) and new vegetation and the patron of precious metals.

Described as anavatl itec ("Lord of the Coastland"), Xipe Totec was originally a deity of the Zapotec and Yopi Indians in the present states of Oaxaca and Guerrero. Among the Zapotecs he was considered a vegetation god and was associated with the FEATHERED SERPENT (Quetzalcóatl). As a symbol of the new vegetation, his statues and stone masks always show him wearing a flayed skin—the "new skin" that covered the earth in the spring.

Representations of Xipe Totec first appeared at Xolalpan, near Teotihuacán, and at Texcoco, during the post-Classic Toltec phase (9th–12th century CE). The Aztecs officially adopted his cult under the reign of Axayacatl (1469–81). During the second ritual month of the Aztec year, Tlacaxipehualiztli ("Flaying of Men"), the priests killed human victims, flayed the bodies, and put on the skins, which were dyed yellow and designated teocuitlaquemtl ("golden clothes”). A hymn sung in honor of Xipe Totec called him Yoalli Tlauana (“Night Drinker”) because he carried “waters of jade on his back” and because beneficent rains fell during the night.

XIUHTECUHTLI \,shē-ü-’tā-küt-lē\ (Nahuatl: “Turquoise [Year] Lord”), also called Huehuetotl \,wā-wā-’tā-ō-təl\ (“Old God”), Aztec god of fire and creator of all life. “Old God” is a reflection of his age in the Aztec pantheon. With Chantico, his feminine counterpart, he was believed to be a representation of the divine creator, OME-TECUHTLI.

One of the important duties of an Aztec priest was the maintenance of the perpetually burning sacred fire. The two festivals of Xiuhtecuhtli coincide with the two extremes in the climatological cycle, the heat of August and the cold of January. Xiuhtecuhtli was also the center of a ceremonial fire transfer, first from temple to temple, and then from temples to homes, which occurred once every 52 years at the end of a complete cycle in the calendar of the Aztecs.

The god of fire appears in various guises, one of which represents him as a toothless old man with a stooped back, carrying an enormous brazier on his head. His insignia was the Xiuhcóatl, or serpent of fire, characterized by a nose of horn, decorated with seven stars.

Xochicalco was built primarily during the 8th and 9th centuries CE and became an important trading and religious center. It was apparently turned into a defensive stronghold before the Spanish conquest (c. 1520).

Excavations have revealed two separate building complexes, one centering on the La Malinche temple PYRAMID and ball court, the other built around the main temple pyramid, the principal monument at Xochicalco. Built on a four-sided base, the main pyramid is famous for its lower facing of perfectly fitted and intricately carved images. The reliefs, which show a strong Mayan influence, portray plumed serpents, priests with elaborate head-dresses, squatting warriors, calendar glyphs, and fire symbols.

XOCHIQUETZAL \,sō-chē-kāt-’säl, ,shō-, -’kāt-säl\ (Nahuatl: “Flower Quetzal Feather”), Aztec goddess of beauty, sexual love, and household arts. She is associated with flowers and plants and came from TAMOANCHÁN, the terrestrial paradise.

Her consort was Piltzintecuhtli, “Prince Lord,” who, weeping, loses her and searches for her. She is identified by two bunches of quetzal feathers on her headdress.

YAHRZEIT \ˈyär-tsit, ˈyör-\ (Yiddish yortsayt, from yor, “year,” and tsayt, “time,” “occasion”), also spelled yortzeit, or jahrzeit, in JUDAISM, anniversary of the death of a parent or close relative, commonly observed by burning a candle for an entire day. Yahrzeit apparently developed from an early Jewish custom of fasting on the anniversaries of the deaths of certain important leaders.

During the last centuries of the Second Temple period (c. 520 BCE–70 CE), Jews vowed never to partake of meat or wine on the anniversaries of their parents’ deaths. As observed today, yahrzeit probably began in Germany about the 14th century and gradually spread to other regions. On the anniversary, a male (or female, in Reform and Conservative congregations) usually recites the KADDISH (hymn of praise) in the SYNAGOGUE at all three services, and males may be called up (aliyah) for the public reading of the TORAH. If the anniversary falls on a day on which the Torah is not read, the calling up takes place before the anniversary, as near as possible to the actual date of death. On the SABBATH that precedes the anniversary, Sephardic Jews recite the HAFṬARAH (a passage from the prophets).

More scholarly or pious Jews may mark the anniversary by studying portions of the MISHNAH, choosing sections from the sixth division (laws of purity) that begin with letters from the name of the deceased. While some Jews observe a strict fast on yahrzeit, others abstain only from meat and drink.

YAHWEH \ˈyā-wā, -vā\, God of the Israelites, his name revealed to MOSES as four Hebrew consonants (YHWH) called the TETRAGRAMMATON. As JUDAISM became a world religion through its proselytizing in the Greco-Roman world, the more common noun ELOHIM, meaning “god,” tended to replace Yahweh to demonstrate the universal sovereignty of Israel’s God over all others. At the same time, the divine name was increasingly regarded as too sacred to be uttered; it was thus replaced in the SYNAGOGUE ritual by the Hebrew word Adonai (“My Lord”).

The meaning of Yahweh has been variously interpreted. Many scholars believe that the most proper meaning may be “He Brings Into Existence Whatever Exists” (Yahweh-Asher-Yahweh). In 1 Samuel, God is known by the name Yahweh Teva‘ot, or “He Brings the Hosts Into Existence,” the hosts possibly referring to the heavenly court or to Israel. The name of Moses’ mother was Jochebed (Yokheved), a word based on Yahweh. Thus, the tribe of Levi, to which Moses belonged, probably knew the name, which originally may have been (in its short form Yo, Yah, or Yahu) a religious invocation of no precise meaning. See also JEHOVAH.

YAHWIST SOURCE \ˈyā-wist, -vist\, abbreviated as J (labeled J after the German transliteration of YHWH), an early source that provides a strand of the Pentateuchal narrative. The basis for identifying a strand of the PENTATEUCH as the writing of the Yahwist—the Yahwist strands being specifically, GENESIS 2–11, 12–16, 18–22, 24–34, 38, and 49; EXODUS

1–24, 32, and 34; NUMBERS 11–12, 14, and 20–25; and JUDGES 1—is not only the use of the name YAHWEH for God. The identification is also based upon the use of Yahweh in association with other indications. For example, in the Yahwist source, the name given to Moses’s father is Reuel, the mountain is always named as Sinai, and the Palestinians are referred to as Canaanites. In the source known as E in which God is called ELOHIM, Moses’s father-in-law is JETHRO, the mountain is called Horeb, and the Palestinians are called Amorites.

One can see examples of these different sources when comparing similar biblical stories. For example, the creation-myth of Genesis 1:1 has God/Elohim create the world, then Genesis 2:5–25 has God/Yahweh make the world; these two creation myths differ from each other on both substantive and stylistic issues. There are other places in which the biblical narrative covers the same ground two or more times, e.g., in Genesis there are three stories in which a PATRIARCH fools a foreign king about the status of the patriarch’s wife, claiming her instead to be his sister. This event is reported between ABRAHAM and Pharaoh over SARAH (12:10–20), with Abraham and Abimelekh over Sarah (20:2–18), and with ISAAC and Abimelekh over Rebekah (26:1–11). Moreover, there are two flood stories: in the first only certain animals (e.g., seven pairs of clean animals, seven pairs of birds) are brought onto the Ark (Genesis 7:2–4); while in the second story all the animals living are brought in pairs to the ark (Genesis 7:11).

These and other indications have persuaded biblical scholars that there are four strands interwoven in the Pentateuch: the Yahwist, Elohist, DEUTERONOMIST, and PRIESTLY, hence J, E, D, and P. The Yahwist’s account, written in the time of DAVID and SOLOMON around 950 BCE, asks these questions about the Jewish empire: for what purpose was this empire created? For how long will it exist? Why was the gift of the empire granted to the Jews? J is a firm and final statement. At this point in history, the Jews looked backward in time to account for the period of greatness at hand. The Yahwist’s account, produced at the height of the glory of the Davidic monarchy, told the story of the federation of the tribes of Israel, now a single kingdom under Solomon—with a focus on ZION and Jerusalem, the metropolis of the federation.

YAHYĀ ŠOBḤ-E AZAL, MĪRZĀ \ˈyāh-yā-ˈsōb-he-a-ˈzal\ (b. 1831, Tehran—d. April 29, 1912, Famagusta, Cyprus), half brother of BAHĀ’ ULLĀH (the founder of the BAHĀ’Ī FAITH) and leader of his own Bābist movement in the mid-19th century Ottoman Empire.

Yahyā was the designated successor of Sayyid Alī Muḥammad, a SHĪ’TE sectarian leader known as THE BĀB. The Bāb was executed in 1850, and by the next year his followers regarded Yahyā Mirzā as the Bāb, in spite of his youth. To avoid persecution by Shī’ite authorities, he fled in 1853 to Baghdad, where he remained for a decade with his followers, called AZALĪS or Bābīs. In 1866, in Edirne, a schism erupted between Yahyā and Bahā' Ullāh, who now claimed to be divine. The Ottoman authorities exiled both, sending Yahyā to Cyprus in 1868. When Cyprus came under British rule in 1878 he became a pensioner of the crown.

Although reviled by the followers of Bahā' Ullāh, some, particularly in Iran, still regard Yahyā as the true spiritual leader. See also BĀBISM.

YAJÑA \ˈyæg-nə, -nyə\ (Sanskrit: "sacrifice," "offering"), in HINDUISM, worship based on rites prescribed in the VEDAS, in contrast to PŪJĀ, which may include image worship and devotional practices that are non-Vedic in origin.

Correct performance of the yajña and recitation of the MANTRAS is considered essential, and the performer and the objects employed must all be in a high state of purity. Such requirements are the domain of the Brahmins, who are still required to officiate at all important public yajñas. Many orthodox Hindus continue to perform the mahāyaj-ñas, the five daily domestic offerings.

YĀJÑĀVALKYA \ˈyäg-nə-ˈvəl-kyə\, sage and teacher who figures prominently in the earliest of the Hindu philosophical and mystical texts known as the UPANISHADS, the Bṛhadāraṇyaka Upaniṣhad. The teachings attributed to Yājñavalkya include many that are representative of the break with earlier Vedic ritualism and are distinctive to the new worldview of the Upanishads.

These include the first appearance in Sanskrit literature of the doctrine of KARMA and rebirth, which contends that the individual's future destiny is determined in accordance with one's past "knowledge and action": "According as one acts, according as one behaves, so does he become. The doer of good becomes good, the doer of evil becomes evil." Yājñavalkya also analyzes the nature and process of karma and identifies desire as the ultimate cause of all action and the source of continued rebirth.

Yājñavalkya is said to have taught that the true self, or ĀTMAN, is distinct from the individual ego and therefore not subject to karma and rebirth; the ātman is eternal, unchanging, and identified with the monistic principle underlying the universe, the BRAHMAN. Release from rebirth and the attainment of bliss comes from knowledge of this identity between the true self and the Cosmic One and is procured by "the man who does not desire, who is without desire, whose desire is satisfied, whose desire is the self."

Yājñavalkya is also reputed to be the author of one of the principal texts of DHARMA or religious duty, the Yājñavalkya Smṛiti, although it is unlikely that this is the same Yājñavalkya.

YAJUR VEDA \ˈyə-jūr-ˈvā-də\, collection of short formulas that forms part of the VEDAS of ancient India. There are two recensions of the YAJUR VEDA. The Kṛṣṇa, or "Black" Yajur Veda, is a mixture of prose and verse and is composed of three distinct books. The Śukla, or "White" Yajur Veda, is composed of a single book in verse.

YAKṢA \ˈyək-shə\, Sanskrit feminine singular yakṣī, or yakṣiṇī, in Indian religions, a class of generally benevolent nature spirits who are the custodians of treasures that are hidden in the earth and in the roots of trees. Principal among the YAKṢAS is KUBERA, who rules in the mythical Himalayan kingdom called Alakā.

Yakṣas were often given homage as tutelary deities of a city, district, lake, or well. In art, sculptures of yakṣas were among the earliest of deities, apparently preceding images of the BODHISATTVAS and of the deities of later HINDUISM, whose representation they influenced. They were also the prototypes for the attendants of later Hindu, Buddhist, and Jain art.

YAMA \ˈyə-mə\, in the mythology of India, the lord of death. The VEDAS describe him as the first man who died. The son of the sun god Sūrya, Yama presides over the resting place of the dead, which is located in the south under the earth. In the Vedas Yama was king of the departed ancestors, but in later mythology he became known as the just judge who weighs the good and evil deeds of the dead and determines their retribution.

YAMATO \yə-ˈmä-tō\, geographic and cultural center of the ancient Japanese state in the Nara region. It is a term that refers to the unique religious, social, and political culture of the early imperial, or tennō, tradition.

YAMATO TAKERU \yə-ˈmä-tō-tä-ˈke-rü\, in full Yamato Takeru no Mikoto (Japanese: "Prince Brave of Yamato"), Japanese folk hero who may have lived in the 2nd century CE. His tomb at Ise is the Mausoleum of the White Plover.

The son of the legendary 12th emperor Keikō, Yamato Takeru was supposedly responsible for expanding the territory of the Yamato court. His story appears in the chronicles KOJIKI (completed in 712) and NIHON SHOKI ("Japanese Chronicles"; completed in 720). In the stories, he subdued two uncouth Kumaso warriors by cleverly disguising himself as a woman and killing them while they were drunk. With the miraculous sword Kusanagi, he cut away the burning grass of a fire set by the Ainu tribesmen and escaped. His adventures ended on the plains of Tagi, where he was stricken with illness, changed into a white plover, and disappeared.

YAMAZAKI ANSAI \ˈyə-mä-zä-kē-ˈän-sī\ (b. Jan. 24, 1619, Kyōto, Japan—d. Oct. 16, 1682, Kyōto), propagator in Japan of the philosophy of the Chinese Neo-Confucian philosopher CHU HSI (1130–1200). An sai reduced NEO-CONFUCIANISM to a simple moral code, which he then blended with SHINTŌ doctrines. This amalgamation became known as Suika Shintō.

A Buddhist monk early in life, Ansai began to study CONFUCIANISM and gradually turned against BUDDHISM. By the time he was 29, he had become a Confucian teacher, gathering thousands of students, among whom were some of the greatest scholars of the day.

From the complex philosophic system of Chu Hsi, Ansai extracted the simple formula "Devotion within, righteousness without." By the former he meant the Neo-Confucian emphasis on sincerity and seriousness. As Ansai grew older, he came to equate Chinese speculations on the universe with Shintō creation legends and identified elements of the Neo-Confucian metaphysical principles with the Shintō gods. The Supreme Ultimate (T'ai Chi) of the Neo-Confucianists became identified with the first two divinities in the Shintō religious chronicles. His amalgamation of Confucian morality with the Shintō tradition of the divine origin of the imperial line was one philosophical root of the later extreme Japanese nationalism and emperor worship.

YAMIM NORA'IM \yā-'mēm-nō-rā-'ēm\ (Hebrew: "days of awe"), English High Holy Days, in JUDAISM, the holy days of ROSH HASHANAH (on Tishri 1 and 2) and YOM KIPPUR (on Tishri 10), in September or October. Yamim nora'im is sometimes used to designate the first 10 days of the religious year: the three High Holy Days, and also the days between.

YAMM \yām\, also spelled Yam (akin to Hebrew yam, "sea"), ancient West Semitic deity who ruled the oceans, rivers, lakes, and underground springs. Tablets at UGARIT say that at the beginning of time Yamm was awarded the divine kingship by EL, the head of the pantheon. One day, Yamm's messengers requested that the gods surrender BAAL to be a bond servant to Yamm. El agreed, but Baal instead engaged Yamm in battle. After a furious fight, in which the craftsman KOTHAR supplied Baal with special weapons, Yamm was slain and the kingship given to Baal. According to some scholars, Yamm was the same deity as Lotan (Hebrew: Leviathan), represented as a dragon or serpent.

YANG-HSING \yāŋ-'shīŋ\, Pinyin yangxing (Chinese: "nourishing life," or "nourishing nature"), term often associated with TAOISM that refers to various physiological and mental methods for self-cultivation and the attainment of longevity or immortality. One's "nature," or "life," is made up of the three principles of ching (organic/spermatic vitality), ch'i (aerial/respiratory vitality), and SHEN (spiritual/mental vitality).

YANTRA \yən-trə\ (Sanskrit: "instrument"), in TANTRIC HINDUISM and VAJRAYĀNA BUDDHISM, a linear diagram used as a support for meditation. In its more elaborate and pictorial form it is called a MANDALA. Yantras range from those traced on the ground or on paper and disposed of after the rite, to those etched in stone and metal, such as are found in temples. When used along with yogic practices, the component parts of the yantra diagram take the believer along the different steps leading to Enlightenment.

One characteristic yantra in the ritual worship of the goddess ŚAKTI is the śrīyantra. It is composed of nine triangles: five pointing downward, to represent the YONI, or vulva, and four pointing upward, to represent the LIŅGA, or phallus. The dynamic interplay is understood to be an expression of all the cosmic manifestations, beginning and ending with union at the center, visualized as a dot (bindu).

YAO \yäu\, formally (Wade-Giles romanization) T'ang Ti Yao, in Chinese mythology, along with SHUN and YU THE GREAT, one of the three legendary emperors (c. 24th century BCE) of the golden age of antiquity, exalted by CONFUCIUS as a model of virtue, righteousness, and unselfish devotion.

Two remarkable events marked Yao's reign: a rampaging flood was controlled by Ta Yü; and Hou I, the Lord Archer, saved the world from destruction by shooting down 9 of the 10 suns burning up the earth. After 70 years of Yao's rule, the sun and moon were as resplendent as jewels, the five planets shone like strung pearls, phoenixes nested in the palace courtyards, crystal springs flowed from the hills, pearl grass covered the countryside, rice crops were plentiful, two unicorns (OMENS of prosperity) appeared in the capital at P'ing-yang, and the wondrous calendar bean made its appearance, producing one pod each day for half a month before the 15 pods withered one by one on successive days.

Yao had special temples dedicated in his honor. He is said to have offered sacrifices and to have practiced DIVINATION. In choosing a successor, Yao bypassed his own less worthy son in favor of Shun and served as counselor to him.

YARIKH \yär-ēk\, also spelled Yareah, ancient West Semitic moon god whose marriage to the moon goddess Nikkal (Sumerian: Ningal, "Queen") was the subject of a poem from ancient UGARIT. Fertility was believed to be the principal result of the marriage.

YAZATA \yā-'zä-tə\, in ZOROASTRIANISM, member of an order of ANGELS created by AHURA MAZDĀ to help him maintain the flow of world order and quell the forces of AHRIMAN and his DEMONS. Yazatas gather the light of the sun and pour it on the earth. They teach humans to dispel demons and free themselves of the future torments of hell. Persons who remember the yazatas through ritual offerings receive their favor and prosper. Zoroaster prayed to them to grant him strength for his mission. The principal yazatas mostly are ancient Iranian deities reduced to auxiliary status: Ātar (Fire), MITHRA, ANĀHITI, RASHNU (The Righteous), SRAOSHA, and VERETHRAGHNA.

YAZĪDĪ \yā-'zi-dē\, also spelled Yezīdī, Azīdī, Zedī, or Izdī, religious movement, found primarily in the districts of Mosul, Iraq; Diyarbakır, Turkey; Aleppo, Syria; Armenia and the Caucasus region; and in parts of Iran. The Yazīdī religion is a syncretic combination of Zoroastrian, Manichaean, Jewish, Nestorian Christian, and Islamic elements. The Yazīdīs themselves are thought to be descended from supporters of the Umayyad CALIPH Yazīd I. They believe that they were created separately from the rest of mankind, and they have kept themselves strictly segregated from the people among whom they live. Although scattered and probably numbering fewer than 100,000, they have a well-organized society, with a chief SHAYKH as the supreme religious head and an emir, or prince, as the secular head.

The chief divine figure of the Yazīdīs is Malak Ṭā'ūs ("Peacock Angel"), who is worshiped in the form of a peacock. He rules the universe with six other ANGELS, but all seven are subordinate to the supreme God, who has had no direct interest in the universe since he created it. The seven angels are worshiped by the Yazīdī in the form of seven bronze or iron peacock figures called sanjaq.

Yazīdīs deny the existence of evil and thus also reject SIN, the devil, and hell. The breaking of divine laws is expiated by way of the transmigration of souls, which allows for the progressive purification of the spirit. Yazīdīs relate that, when the devil repented of his sin of pride before God, he was pardoned and replaced in his previous position as chief of the angels; this myth has earned the Yazīdīs an undeserved reputation as devil worshipers. Shaykh ‘Adī, the chief Yazīdī saint, was a 12th-century Muslim mystic whom the Yazīdīs believe to have achieved divinity.

The Yazīdī religious center and object of the annual PILGRIMAGE is the tomb of Shaykh ‘Adī, located at a former Christian monastery in the town of al-Shaykh ‘Adī, north of Mosul. Two short books written in Arabic, Kitāb al-jilwa (“Book of Revelation”) and Maṣḥaf rash (“Black Writing”), form the sacred SCRIPTURES of the Yazīdīs, and an Arabic hymn in praise of Shaykh ‘Adī is held in great esteem.

YELLOW TURBANS, Chinese Taoist movement whose members’ uprising (184–c. 204 CE) contributed to the fall of the Han dynasty (220 CE). Led by Chang Chüeh, a Taoist faith healer who gained many adherents during a pestilence, the rebellion was directed against the eunuchs who dominated the emperor. The rebels wore yellow headdresses to signify their association with the “earth” element, which they believed would succeed the red “fire” element that represented Han rule. Chang Chüeh was killed in 184 CE, but the rebellion continued for the next two decades.

YERUSHALMI, THE \yer-ü-‘shäl-mē\, also called the Talmud Yerushalmi, the Palestinian Talmud, or the Talmud of the Land of Israel, commentary from about 400 CE on the MISHNAH (c. 200 CE) that comments on only the first four divisions of the Mishnah—that is, ZERA’IM, MO’ED, NASHIM, and NEZIQUIN. It is broken up into brief discussions on the meanings of the phrases of the Mishnah. Indeed, perhaps 90 percent of the Yerushalmi addresses the meaning of the Mishnah. Thus, the traits of the Mishnah defined the problems confronting those authors responsible for the Mishnah’s redaction and formulation and those disciples who followed them. The disciples set the pattern of treating the Mishnah as TORAH, proposing both to receive and realize its revelation.

The Yerushalmi speaks about the Mishnah in essentially a single voice, about fundamentally few things. Its mode of speech as much as of thought is uniform throughout. The same sorts of questions phrased in the same rhetoric—a moving, or dialectical, argument composed of questions and answers—are used for every passage of the Mishnah. The Yerushalmi chooses from a limited selection of conventional forms of speech, and it repeatedly asks a few basic questions in reading any given passage of the Mishnah.

The consistent message of the Yerushalmi was derived from a collective of sages who were located in the Land of Israel in Galilee, Caesarea, Tiberias, and Beth Shearim. The document seems, in the main, to intend to provide notes, an abbreviated script that anyone may use to reconstruct and reenact formal discussions of problems: in a situation like this, one says that. Curt and often arcane, these notes can be translated only with immense bodies of inserted explanation. We must assume the sages took for granted that, out of the signs of speech, it would be possible for anyone to reconstruct speech, doing so in accurate and fully conventional ways.

The framers of the Yerushalmi had in hand a tripartite corpus of inherited materials awaiting their composition into a final, closed document. First, they took up materials, in various states and stages of completion, pertinent to the Mishnah or to the principles of laws that the Mishnah had brought to articulation. Second, they had in hand received materials, again in various conditions, pertinent to the SCRIPTURE, both as the Scripture related to the Mishnah and as it laid forth its own narratives. And, third, they occasionally pursued their own theoretical problems, formulated out of the principles implicit in the Mishnah’s law.

The TALMUD Yerushalmi did not compete successfully with the Talmud BAVLI, which became authoritative. The law of JUDAISM, therefore, emerged from ancient times in the form given to it in Babylonia. While circumstances may explain the priority of the latter (for example, superior means of communication with Jews throughout the world gave the Babylonian authorities greater influence), the quality of intellect in the Babylonian Talmud explains much as well. It is simply a better-conceived and more effectively executed document, spelled out with great clarity and argued with enormous force. Hence, over time, study of the Talmud Yerushalmi diminished. In modern times, however, interest in the Yerushalmi revived—important commentaries were written and philological studies were undertaken. Thus, the Talmud of the Land of Israel gained a prominence that it had not had for centuries.

YESHIVA \yə-‘shē-və\, also spelled yeshivah, or yeshibah, plural yeshivas, yeshivot \yə-shē-‘vōt\, yeshivoth, or yeshibot (Hebrew: “sitting”), academy of higher Talmudic study. In traditional JUDAISM, it is the setting for the training and ORDINATION of RABBIS, contrasted with the heder and TALMUD TORAH, where children and young adults are educated. The yeshiva has its origins in the bet MIDRASH (“house of study”) of the Talmudic period, the rabbinic center for study and prayer that was distinct from and, according to some authorities, holier than the communal SYNAGOGUE.

In the post-Talmudic period, the word yeshiva (and its Aramaic equivalent, metivta) increasingly was applied specifically to academies of higher rabbinic learning and ordination. The yeshiva also became distinguished from the bet midrash, which remained open to all men who wished to study.

YGGDRASILL \‘ig-drə-sil\, also called Mimameidr \‘mē-mə-mā-thər\, in Norse mythology, the WORLD TREE, a giant ash supporting the universe. One of its roots extended into NIFLHEIM, the Underworld; another into JÖTUNHEIM, land of the giants; and the third into ASGARD, home of the gods. At its base were three wells: Urdarbrunnr (Well of Fate), from which the tree was watered by the NORNS (the Fates); Hvergelmir (Roaring Kettle), in which dwelt Nidhogg, the monster that gnawed at the tree's roots; and Mímisbrunnr (Mimir's Well), source of wisdom, for the waters of which ODIN sacrificed an eye. According to some sources the world tree, though badly shaken, was to be the source of new life after RAGNARÖK.

YHWH, in Hebrew, the name of God as revealed to MOSES. Because of its four letters, it is also known as the Tetragrammaton. See YAHWEH.

YI CHEHYON \ˈē-ˈchē-ˈhyən\ (b. 1287—d. 1367), Korean poet, minister, and important Neo-Confucian scholar. He traveled in Yüan dynasty China, where he studied with several Chinese Neo-Confucians and successfully participated in the Chinese examination system, which focused on the Confucian canon of texts. Upon his return to Korea he stressed the pragmatic implications of Neo-Confucian thought and became a leading critic of BUDDHISM and other religious traditions he considered economically wasteful. He was honored as an exemplary Confucian scholar and supporter of the state system, and his spirit tablet was included among the 18 Korean tablets honored in the MUN-MYO, or Confucian “cultural shrines.”

YI-GI DEBATES \ˈē-ˈgē\, series of religious and philosophical arguments about the essential (yi; Chinese LI: “principle”) or existential/material (gi, or ki; Chinese CH’I: “matter-energy”) nature of reality conducted by two groups of Korean Neo-Confucians in the 16th and 17th centuries. They paralleled similar arguments in Chinese Neo-Confucian thought and, as in China, often had political implications. The difference between the two positions came down to a distinction between an essentialist, idealist, and conservative perspective favoring a priori and absolutist values and an empiricist, pragmatic, and liberal perspective favoring the adaptive relativity of all mental constructs.

YI HWANG \ˈē-ˈhwǎŋ\, or T’oegyē \ˈtō-ˈgye\ (b. 1501—d. 1570), single most important Korean Confucian, who helped shape the character of Yi CONFUCIANISM through his creative interpretation of Chu Hsi’s teaching. Critically aware of the philosophical turn engineered by WANG YANG-MING, Yi Hwang transmitted the CHU HSI legacy as a response to the advocates of the learning of the mind. His Discourse on the Ten Sagely Diagrams, an aid for educating the king, offered a depiction of all the major concepts in Sung learning. His exchange of letters with Ki Taesung (1527–72) in the famous FOUR-SEVEN DEBATE, which discussed the relationship between MENCIOUS’ four basic human feelings—commiseration, shame, modesty, and right and wrong—and seven emotions, such as anger and joy, raised the level of Confucian dialogue to a new height of intellectual sophistication.

YIMA \ya-ˈmä, ˈyē-mə\, in ancient Iranian religion, the first man, the progenitor of the human race, and son of the sun.

According to one legend, Yima declined God’s (AHURA MAZDĀ’S) offer to make him the vehicle of the religion and was instead given the task of establishing man’s life on earth. He became king in a golden age which ended, says one tale, when Ahura Mazdā told Yima of a terrible winter to come. He was instructed to build an excellent domain under the earth, lit by its own light, and take in it the best individuals from each species to preserve their seed. There they should dwell through the winter’s destruction, then emerge and repopulate the earth.

Zoroastrian tradition dislodged Yima as the first man, replacing him with GAYÖMART. In later Persian literature Yima, under the name Jamshīd, is the subject of many tales.

YIN-YANG \ˈyin-ˈyǎŋ, -ˈyaŋ\, Pinyin yinyang, Japanese in-yō, in East Asian thought, the two complementary forces, or principles, that make up all aspects and phenomena of life. Yin is conceived of as earth, female, dark, passive, and absorbing; it is present in even numbers, valleys, and streams and is represented by the tiger, the color orange, and a broken line. Yang is conceived of as heaven, male, light, active, and penetrating; it is present in odd numbers and mountains and is represented by the dragon, the color azure, and an unbroken line. They both proceed from the Supreme Ultimate (T’ai-chi). In harmony, the two are depicted as the light and dark halves of a circle.

The origins of the yin-yang idea are obscure but ancient. In the 3rd century BCE in China, it formed the basis of an entire school of COSMOLOGY (the Yin-Yang school), whose main representative was Tsou Yen. The concept of yin-yang is associated in Chinese thought with the idea of the five agents, phases, or elements (WU-HSING)—metal, wood, water, fire, and earth—both of these ideas lending substance to the belief in a cyclical theory of becoming and dissolution and an interdependence between the world of nature and human events. The concept entered Japan in early times as in-yō. In-yō notions permeated every level of Japanese society and are still evident in the belief in lucky and unlucky days and directions and in consideration of the ZODIAC signs when arranging marriages.

YI SAEK \ˈē-ˈsək\ (b. 1328—d. 1396), Korean literary figure and Neo-Confucian scholar. Patronized by kings during the Koryo period (918–1392), he promoted an educational system based on the Confucian texts and was responsible for establishing a Confucian tradition of public mourning. While favoring CONFUCIANISM in public matters, he was sympathetic to Ch’an (Son, see ZEN) Buddhist SCRIPTURES and practices. Toward the end of his life he was the revered head of the Confucian National Academy. He is remembered as one of the “Three Hermit Scholars” who were loyal to Confucian principles and were exiled by Yi Song-gye, the military leader who overthrew the Koryo regime.

YI YULGOK \ˈē-ˈyül-ˈgök\, also known as Yi Yi (b. 1536—d. 1584), Korean ministerial official and great Neo-Confucian scholar. Never a supporter of the orthodox CHU HSI school of NEO-CONFUCIANISM in Korea, Yi Yulgok had eclectic interests in Ch’an BUDDHISM, TAOISM, and Wang Yang-ming’s school of mind. His famous philosophical work on “The Way of Heaven” emphasized the practical priority of matter-energy (ki; Chinese CH’I) in relation to abstract principle (yi; Chinese LI). He also wrote important works on the moral theme of “sincerity” in the act of knowing. In this way, he influenced the emergence of the Korean school of Practical Learning and greatly contributed to the overall Neo-Confucian transformation of Korean society.

YMIR \ˈi-mir\, also called Aurgelmir \ˈaür-gəl-,mir\, in Norse mythology, the first being, a GIANT who was created from the drops of water that formed when the ice of NIFL-

HEIM met the heat of MUSPELHEIM. Ymir was the father of all the giants. A cow, Audumla, nourished him with her milk. She was herself nourished by licking salty, rime-covered stones. She licked the stones into the shape of a man; this was Buri, who became the grandfather of the great god ODIN and his brothers. These gods later killed Ymir, and the flow of his blood drowned all but one frost giant. The three gods put Ymir's body in the void, GINNUNGAGAP, and fashioned the earth from his flesh, the seas from his blood, mountains from his bones, stones from his teeth, the sky from his skull, and clouds from his brain. Four dwarfs held up his skull. His eyelashes (or eyebrows) became the fence surrounding MIDGARD, or Middle Earth, the home of mankind.

YOGA \yō-gə\ (Sanskrit: "Yoking," or "Discipline"), one of the six orthodox systems (darśanas) of Indian philosophy. Its influence has been widespread among many other schools of Indian thought. Its basic text is the Yoga sūtras by PATAÑJALI (c. 200 BCE?).

The practical aspects of Yoga play a more important part than does its intellectual content, which is largely based on the philosophy of SĀMĀKHYA. Yoga holds with Sāṃkhya that the achievement of spiritual liberation occurs when the self (puruṣa) is freed from the bondages of matter (prakṛti) that have resulted because of ignorance and illusion. The Sāṃkhya view of the evolution of the world through stages leads Yoga to an attempt to reverse this order, so that a person can undertake a regimen of "dephenomenalization" until the self reenters its original state of purity and consciousness. Once the aspirant has learned to control and suppress obscuring mental activities and has succeeded in ending attachments to material objects, he or she is able to enter SAMĀDHI, a state of deep concentration accompanied by a sense of blissful, ecstatic union with ultimate reality.

Generally the Yoga process is described in eight stages (aṣṭāṅga-yoga, "eight-membered Yoga"). The first two stages are ethical preparations. They are YAMA ("restraint"), which denotes abstinence from injury (AHIMŚĀ), falsehood, stealing, lust, and avarice; and niyama ("observance"), which denotes cleanliness of body, contentment, austerity, study, and devotion to God.

The next two stages are physical preparations. ĀSANA ("seat"), a series of exercises in physical posture, is intended to condition the aspirant's body and make it supple, flexible, and healthy. Prāṇāyāma ("breath control") is a series of exercises intended to stabilize the rhythm of breathing in order to encourage complete respiratory relaxation.

The fifth stage, pratyāhāra ("withdrawal"), involves control of the senses, or the ability to withdraw the attention of the senses from outward objects to the mind.

The first five stages are called external aids to Yoga; the remaining three are purely mental or internal aids. Dhāraṇā ("holding on") is the ability to hold and confine awareness of externals to one object for a long period of time. Dhyāna ("concentrated meditation") is the uninterrupted contemplation of the object, beyond any memory of ego. Samādhi ("self-collectedness") is the final stage. In this stage the meditator understands the underlying character of awareness itself, and that it obliterates the distinction between the meditator and the object.

YOGĀCĀRA \yō-gā-'chär-ə\ (Sanskrit: "Practice of Yoga [Union]"), also called Vijñānavāda ("Doctrine of Consciousness"), important idealistic school of MAHĀYĀNA Buddhism. Yogācāra attacked both the realism of THERĀVĀDA Buddhism and the provisional practical realism of the MĀDHYAMIKA school. The name is derived from the title of an important 4th- or 5th-century text, the Yogācārabhūmi-śāstra ("Science of the Stages of Yoga Practice").

The other name of the school, Vijñānavāda, is more descriptive of its philosophical position, which is that the reality a human being perceives does not exist. Only the consciousness that one has of the momentary interconnected events (DHARMAS) that make up the cosmic flux can be said to exist. Consciousness, however, also clearly discerns in these so-called unreal events consistent patterns of continuity and regularity; in order to explain this order in which only chaos really could prevail, the school developed the tenet of the ālaya-vijñāna, or "storage consciousness." Sense perceptions are ordered as coherent and regular by a store of consciousness. Sense impressions produce certain configurations (SAMSKĀRAS) in this unconscious that "perfume" later impressions so that they appear consistent and regular. Each being possesses this storage consciousness, which thus becomes a kind of collective consciousness that orders human perceptions of the world, though this world does not exist. This doctrine was attacked by the adherents of the Mādhyamika school, who pointed out the obvious logical difficulties of such a tenet.

Yogācāra emerged in India about the 2nd century CE but had its period of greatest productivity in the 4th century, during the time of AŚANGA and Vasubandha. Following them, the school divided into two branches, the Āgamānusariṇo Vijñānavādinah ("School of the Scriptural Tradition") and the Nyāyānusariṇo Vijñānavādinah ("School of the Logical Tradition").

The teachings of the Yogācāra school were introduced into China by the 7th-century monk-traveler HSÜAN-TSANG and formed the basis of the FA-HSIANG school founded by Hsüan-tsang's pupil K'uei-chi. Because of its idealistic content it is also called Wei-shih.

Transmitted to Japan, as Hossō, sometime after 654, the Yogācāra school split into two branches, the Northern and the Southern. In modern times the school retained the important temples of Horyū, Yakushi, and Kōfuku, all located in or near Nara and all treasure-houses of religious art.

YOM KIPPUR \yōm-kē-'pür, yōm-, yām-, -'ki-pər\, Hebrew Yom Ha-Kippurim, English Day of Atonement, Jewish holiday, observed on the 10th day of the lunar month of Tishri (in the course of September and October). Yom Kippur concludes the "10 days of repentance" that begin with ROSH HASHANAH on the first day of Tishri. The purpose of Yom Kippur is to effect individual and collective purification by the practice of forgiveness of the SINS of others and by sincere repentance for one's own sins against God.

Before the destruction of the Temple in Jerusalem, the HIGH PRIEST performed a sacrificial ceremony in the Temple, successively confessing his own sins, the sins of priests, and the sins of all Israel. Clothed in white linen, he then entered the HOLY OF HOLIES to sprinkle the blood of the sacrifice and to offer incense. The ceremony concluded when a goat (the SCAPEGOAT), symbolically carrying the sins of Israel, was driven to its death in the wilderness.

Today, Yom Kippur is marked by abstention from food, drink, and sexual relations. Among extremely Orthodox Jews the wearing of leather shoes and anointing oneself with oil are forbidden. The eve of Yom Kippur and the entire day is spent in prayer and meditation. The eve of Yom Kippur includes the recitation of the KOL NIDRE, a declaration annulling all vows made during the course of the year (obligations toward others are excluded). Friends also ask and accept forgiveness from one another for past offenses on this evening. God is believed to forgive the sins of those who sincerely repent and show their repentance by improved behavior and performance of good deeds.

The services on Yom Kippur itself last continuously from morning to evening and include readings from the TORAH and the reciting of penitential prayers. Yiskur, which are memorial prayers for the recently deceased, may also be recited by members of the congregation. The services end with closing prayers and the blowing of the SHOFAR.

YONI \ˈyō-nē\ (Sanskrit: “abode,” “source,” “womb,” “vagina”), in HINDUISM, aniconic representation of the female sexual organ and the symbol of the goddess ŚAKTI, feminine generative power and, as a goddess, consort of SHIVA. The yoni is often associated in the ICONOGRAPHY of ŚAIVISM together with the phallic LINGA, Shiva’s symbol. The liṅga is depicted in sculpture and paintings as resting in the yoni as a cylinder in a spouted dish. The two symbols together represent the eternal process of creation and regeneration.

YOUNG, BRIGHAM \ˈbri-gəm-ˈyʌŋ\ (b. June 1, 1801, Whitingham, Vt., U.S.—d. Aug. 29, 1877, Salt Lake City, Utah), American religious leader, second president of the MORMON church, and colonizer who significantly influenced the development of the American West.

A carpenter, joiner, painter, and glazier, Young was baptized into the CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS in 1832. In the spring of 1834 he joined in the march to Missouri to help dispossessed Mormons regain their lands. He was named third of the Quorum of the Twelve Apostles in 1835. In 1838, when the Mormons were driven out of Missouri, Young, who had become senior member of the Quorum, directed the move to Nauvoo, Ill. In 1839 he went to England, where he established a mission.

When JOSEPH SMITH was murdered (June 1844), Young returned to Nauvoo and took command of the church. In the face of mob pressure, he led the Mormons westward out of Illinois in 1846. He got no farther than the Missouri River that summer, but in 1847, after selecting the site of Salt Lake City as a gathering place for the Mormons, Young returned to Winter Quarters (Florence, Neb.) and in December 1847 became president of the church. He returned to Utah with the Mormon emigration of 1848 and remained there for the rest of his life.

In 1849 the Mormons established the provisional state of Deseret, with Young as governor. The next year this area became the territory of Utah, again with Young as governor. Friction between the Mormons and the federal judiciary led President James Buchanan to replace him in 1857, at which time an army was sent to establish the primacy of federal rule in Utah. He never again held political office, but as president of the Mormon church he effectively ruled the people of Utah until his death.

An eminently practical man, Young made few doctrinal contributions. He was an ironfisted administrator who stabilized Mormon society and gave it a cohesion made possible, in part, by its comparative isolation. Young encouraged education and the theater, always stressed self-sufficiency, and became a notably wealthy man. Having accepted the doctrine of plural marriage, he took more than 20 wives and fathered 47 children.

YOUNG MEN’S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION (YMCA), nonsectarian, nonpolitical Christian lay movement that aims to develop high standards of Christian character through group activities and citizenship training. It originated in London in 1844, when 12 young men, led by George Williams, an employee in a drapery house, formed a club for the “improvement of the spiritual condition of young men in the drapery and other trades.” Similar clubs spread rapidly in the United Kingdom and reached Australia in 1850 and North America in 1851, where the organization eventually reached its greatest development. At the centennial of the World Alliance of YMCAs in 1955, a series of conferences held in Paris was attended by 8,000 delegates representing more than 4,000,000 members in 76 countries and territories.

The YMCA programs include sports and physical education, camping, counseling, formal and informal education, public affairs, and citizenship activities. In addition to other activities, the YMCA sponsors hotels, residence halls, and cafeterias. In the United States it operates several degree-granting institutions as well as many other schools at all levels, including night classes for adults.

YMCA services to the armed forces began, in the United States, with the Civil War, and it continued giving service through all wars thereafter. By the Geneva Convention of 1929, it was charged with promoting educational and recreational facilities in many prisoner of war camps.

YOUNG WOMEN’S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION (YWCA), nonsectarian Christian organization that aims “to advance the physical, social, intellectual, moral, and spiritual interests of young women.” The YWCA and the Young Men’s Christian Association (YMCA) are completely independent organizations.

The first YWCA was established in England in 1855, when two groups met to aid women: one group formed a Prayer Union to pray for women, and the other founded Christian homes for young women. The two groups merged in 1877 and took the name Young Women’s Christian Association. In 1884 the organization adopted a constitution.

In the United States 35 women met in New York City and formed the first Ladies’ Christian Association to provide for the “temporal, moral, and religious welfare of young women who are dependent on their own exertions for support.” In 1866, in Boston, another group formed an organization with similar aims and wrote the constitution for the Young Women’s Christian Association. By 1900 hundreds of YWCAs were in existence in the United States; the national organization was formed in 1906. Local YWCA organizations are affiliated with their national associations, which in turn are members of the World YWCA, organized in London in 1894, with headquarters in Geneva. By the end of the 20th century YWCA programs reached more than 25 million women in more than 100 countries. The focus of their programs had broadened to include shelter, child care, employment training, racial justice, physical fitness, youth development, leadership training, and world relations.

YUGA \ˈyü-gə\, in Hindu COSMOLOGY, an age or eon. Each yuga is progressively shorter than the preceding one, corresponding to a decline in the moral and physical state of humanity. Four such yugas (called Kṛta, Tretā, Dvāpara, and Kali or Satya after throws of an Indian game of dice) make up a mahāyuga (“great yuga”), and 2,000 mahāyugas make up the basic cosmic cycle, the kalpa. The first yuga (Kṛta) was an age of perfection, lasting 1,728,000 years. The fourth and most degenerate yuga (Kali) began in 3102 BCE and will last 432,000 years. At the close of the Kali yuga, the world will be destroyed by fire and flood, to be re-created as the cycle resumes. In a partially competing vision of time, Vishnu’s 10th and final AVATAR, KALKĪ, is described as bringing the present cosmic cycle to a close by destroying the evil forces that rule the Kali yuga and ushering in an immediate return to the idyllic Kṛta yuga.

YÜN-KANG CAVES \ˈyüən-ˈgäŋ\, Pinyin Yungang, series of magnificent Chinese Buddhist cave temples, created in the 5th century CE (Six Dynasties period). They are located about 10 miles west of Ta-t’ung (Datong), near the northern border of Shansi province (and the Great Wall).

The caves are among the earliest remaining examples of the first major flowering of Buddhist art in China. A low ridge of soft sandstone was excavated to form about 20 major cave temples and many smaller niches and caves, stretching for over half a mile from east to west. Some of the caves served merely as cell-like enclosures for colossal figures of the Buddha (up to about 45 feet tall), while others contained chapels.

The earliest five temples were instituted by a leader of the Buddhist SANGHA, a monk named T’an-yao, about 460; their construction was among the first acts of propitiation sponsored by the foreign T’o-pa, or Northern Wei, rulers (386–535) for their persecution of BUDDHISM during the period 446–452. The Buddha images in each cave were equated with the first five emperors of the Northern Wei, thus emphasizing the political and economic role that the court imposed upon Buddhism.

The remaining temples were constructed in the succeeding decades until 494, when the Northern Wei court was moved to the city of Lo-yang (Honan province) and a new series of cave temples was instituted at the site of Lung-men (see LUNG-MEN CAVES).

The predominant sculptural style of the innumerable images is a synthesis of various foreign influences—including Persian, Byzantine, and Greek—with elements ultimately derived from the Buddhist art of India. Late in the period of major work at the site, a new “Chinese style” appeared, based on indigenous styles and forms; Yün-kang, however, is considered as the type site for the first style, and the later caves at Lung-men the type site for the second style.

YUNUS EMRE \yü-ˈnüs-em-ˈre\ (b. c. 1238, Turkey—d. c. 1320, Turkey), poet and mystic who exercised a powerful influence on Turkish literature.

He is known to have been a Sufi who sat for 40 years at the feet of his master, Tapduk Emre. Yunus Emre was well versed in mystical philosophy, especially that of the 13th-century poet and mystic JALĀL AL-DĪN AL-RŪMĪ. Like RŪMĪ, Yunus Emre became a leading representative of MYSTICISM in Anatolia but on a more popular level; he was venerated as a saint after his death.

His poems are devoted mainly to the themes of divine love and human destiny. He wrote in a straightforward, almost austere style and mainly in the traditional syllabic meter of Anatolian folk poetry. His verse had a decisive influence on later Turkish mystics and inspired the poets of the renaissance of Turkish national poetry after 1910.

YÜ THE GREAT \ˈyü\, Chinese Ta Yü \ˈdä-ˈyü\, Pinyin Da Yu, in Chinese mythology, Tamer of the Flood, one of China’s savior-heroes and reputed founder of China’s oldest dynasty, the Hsia. One legend recounts Yü’s extraordinary birth: a man called Kun was given charge of controlling a great deluge. To dam the water, he stole a piece of magic soil from heaven. Angered by the theft, the Lord on High ordered his execution. After three years, Kun’s miraculously preserved body was slit open and a son brought forth. This was Yü who, after years of strenuous labor, provided outlets to the sea through dredging, with the aid of dragons, thus making the world suitable for human habitation.

YÜ TI, Pinyin Yudi: see JADE EMPEROR.

ZADDIK \ˈtsā-dik, tsā-ˈdēk\ (Hebrew: “righteous man”), also spelled tzaddiq, tsaddik, or zaddik, plural zaddikim, tzaddiqim, tsaddikim, or zaddikim, one who embodies the religious ideals of JUDAISM. The TALMUD asserts that the continued existence of the world is due to the merits of 36 individuals, each of whom is gamur tzaddiq (“completely righteous”). While recognizing that zaddikim have special privileges, the Talmud also notes their special obligations. They are at least partially responsible for the SINS of their generation.

In HASIDISM, the religious leader (zaddik) was viewed as a mediator between human and divine. Because the zaddik’s life was expected to be a living expression of the TORAH, his behavior was even more important than his doctrine. In early Hasidism, the zaddik traveled widely and often engaged in such secular matters as idle talk and the consumption of wine. The Hasidic formula for such conduct was “descent on behalf of ascent” (aliyya tzrikha yerida)—a calculated risk to strengthen the spiritual life of the Jewish community. Toward the end of the 18th century the zaddikim ceased to travel. Thereafter, they were available at home for those who sought advice and instructions. This change gave rise to “practical zaddikism,” a development that included, among other things, the writing of a quittel (“prayer note”) to guarantee the success of petitions made by visitors who offered money for the service. Such developments contributed to the gradual deterioration of an institution that had earlier been a vital spiritual force within Jewish communities.

ZAGREUS \ˈzā-grē-əs, ˈzɑ-, in Orphic myth, divine child who was the son of ZEUS (as a snake) and his daughter PERSEPHONE. Zeus intended to make Zagreus his heir and bestow on him unlimited power, but HERA out of jealousy urged the TITANS to attack the child. The Titans tore Zagreus to pieces and consumed him except for his heart. ATHENA saved the child’s heart and brought it to Zeus, who swallowed it. Zeus blasted the Titans into soot with his thunderbolts and from these remains arose mortals, who were partly wicked and partly divine. Zeus then begot a son in the body of SEMELE, and this child, made from the heart of Zagreus, was called DIONYSUS.

ZĀHIRĪYA \zā-hi-ˈrē-ə\ (Arabic: “Literalists”), followers of an Islamic legal school that insisted on strict adherence to the literal text (zāhir) of the QUR’AN and HADITH as the only source of Muslim law. Founded in Iraq by Dāwūd Khalaf in the 9th century, it spread to Iran, North Africa, and Muslim Spain, where the philosopher IBN HAZM was its chief exponent. Although it was strongly attacked by most SUNNI theologians, the Zāhirī school nevertheless survived for about 500 years in various forms and seems finally to have merged with the HANBALĪ LEGAL SCHOOL.

ZAKĀT \zā-ˈkat, zə-ˈkāt\ (Arabic: “alms,” “charity”), obligatory tax required of Muslims, one of the FIVE PILLARS OF IS-

LAM. The zakāt is levied on five categories of property—food grains; fruit; camels, cattle, sheep, and goats; gold and silver; and movable goods—and is payable each year. The tax levy required by religious law varies with the category. Recipients of the zakāt include the poor and needy, the collectors themselves, and “those whose hearts it is necessary to conciliate”—e.g., discordant tribesmen, debtors, volunteers in JIHAD (HOLY WAR), and pilgrims.

Under the caliphates, the collection and expenditure of zakāt was a function of the state. In the modern Muslim world it has been left up to the individual, except in such countries as Saudi Arabia, where the Sharī’ah (Islamic law) is strictly maintained. Among Twelver SHĪTES, it is collected and disbursed by the ‘ULAMĀ, who act as representatives for the Hidden IMAM.

The QUR’AN and Hadith also stress ṣadaqa, or voluntary almsgiving, which, like zakāt, is intended for the needy. Twelver Shītes, moreover, require payment of an additional one-fifth tax, the KHUMS, to the Hidden Imam and his deputies. It is intended to be spent for the benefit of orphans, the poor, travelers, and, of course, the imams.

ŽALTYS \zhāl-ˈtʲēs\, in ancient BALTIC RELIGION, a snake highly respected as a symbol of fertility and wealth. To ensure the prosperity of family and field, a žaltys was kept in a special corner of the house, and the entire household gathered at specified times to recite prayers to it.

On special occasions the snake was asked to the table to share the family meal from their plates; should he refuse, misfortune was imminent. To encounter a snake accidentally was also considered auspicious and portended a marriage or a birth. Paralysis or great misfortune awaited anyone who dared kill a žaltys, the “sentinel of the gods” and a favorite of SAULE, the goddess of the sun.

ZAMAKHSHARĪ, ABU AL-QĀSIM MAḤMŪD IBN ‘UMAR AL- \zā-māk-shā-ˈrē\ (b. March 8, 1075, Khwārezm [now in Turkmenistan and Uzbekistan]—d. June 14, 1144, al-Jurjānīya, Khwārezm), Persian-born Arabic scholar whose chief work is his commentary on the QUR’AN.

As a theologian, he was one of the Mu’tazilite school. His commentary on the Qur’an, Al-Kashshāf ‘an Ḥaqā’iq at-tanzīl (“Discoverer of the Truths of Revelation”), was completed in 1134 (published at Calcutta in 1856 in 2 vol.) and, in spite of its Mu’tazilite bias, was widely read, especially in the East; in the western portions of the Islamic world, his dogmatic point of view was offensive to the Mālikī school. Of Zamakhsharī’s grammatical works, Al-Mufaṣṣal fī ‘ilm al-Arabīya (“Detailed Treatise on Arabic Linguistics,” written 1119–21, published 1859) is celebrated for its concise but exhaustive exposition. He was also the author of a collection of old proverbs, three collections of apothegms composed by himself, moral discourses, and poems. See also MU’TAZILĪ; TAFSĪR.

ZĀWIYA \zā-'wē-ə\ (Arabic), Persian Khānqāh \kān-'gāh, kā-nā-\, Turkish Tekke \tek-'ke\, in the Muslim world, a monastic complex, usually the center or a settlement of a Sufi brotherhood. In some Arabic countries the term zāwiya is also used for any small, private oratory not paid for by community funds. (See SUFISM.)

The first North African zāwiya, dating from about the 13th century, was akin to a hermitage (rābiṭa), housing an ascetic holy man and his disciples. Linked to the Sufi movement that was making its way westward across North Africa, the zāwiya seems to have proliferated rapidly. Eventually it became an extensive center of religious and paramilitary power. The essential structure of the medieval zāwiya has survived intact into the 20th century. It may include an area reserved for prayer, a shrine, a religious school, and residential quarters for students, guests, pilgrims, and travelers.

By the mid-19th century the Sānusiya, a religious brotherhood of Cyrenaica (modern Libya), had established a network of zāwiyas in areas remote from central authority and had attained political, as well as religious, control of the province. After World War I, the Italians wiped out most of the zāwiyas in that country.

ZAYDĪYA \zī-'dē-ə\, also spelled Zaidiya, or Zaidīs, English Zaydis \zī-'dēz\, subdivision of SHĪTE Muslims owing allegiance to Zayd ibn 'Alī (d. 740), grandson of ḤUSAYN IBN 'ALĪ. Zaydīs participated in a number of anti-caliphal revolts in the 8th and 9th centuries and succeeded in establishing control in northern Iran until the 11th century. They are credited with fostering the conversion of peoples in this region to ISLAM. Early in the 10th century the Zaydīya became dominant in Yemen, and thereafter Zaydī IMAMS were the spiritual rulers of that area. From the departure of the Turks in 1917 until 1962, they were also the temporal rulers of Yemen.

Zaydī doctrine on imams differs markedly from that of Twelver SHĪTES. Imams acquire position by their own abilities, rather than by designation by their father, and they do not possess any miraculous qualities. Indeed, anyone descended from 'ALĪ and FĀṬĪMA can become an imam. Zaydīs recognize the legitimacy of the first two CALIPHS, Abū Bakr and 'Umar. In theology Zaydīs follow the Mu'tazilites, and in law they are so close to the SUNNIS that they are sometimes called "the fifth school" (after the ḤANAFĪ, MĀLIKĪ, SHĀFĪ, and ḤANBALĪ schools).

ZEALOT, member of a Jewish sect noted for its uncompromising opposition to Rome. A census of Galilee ordered by Rome in 6 CE spurred the Zealots to rally the populace to noncompliance on the grounds that agreement was an implicit acknowledgment of the right of non-Jews to rule their nation. Extremists among the Zealots, known as Sicarii (Latin: "assassins" or "murderers"), frequented public places to assassinate persons friendly to Rome. In the first revolt against Rome (66–70 CE) the Zealots played a leading role, and at Masada in 73 they committed suicide rather than surrender the fortress.

ZEBULUN \ze-byə-lən\, one of the 12 tribes of ISRAEL that in biblical times constituted the people of Israel. The tribe was named for the sixth son born of JACOB and his first wife, LEAH. After the Israelites took possession of the Promised Land, the tribe of Zebulun settled northeast of the Plain of Jezreel. After the northern Kingdom of Israel was conquered by the Assyrians in 721 BCE, Zebulun and the other northern tribes dispersed; thus Zebulun became known as one of the legendary TEN LOST TRIBES OF ISRAEL.

ZEMES MĀTE \ze-mes-'mä-te\ (Latvian), Lithuanian Žemyna \zh'e-'m'ē-nā-g\, in BALTIC RELIGION, the female aspect of nature and the source of all life—human, animal, and plant. Interacting with DIEVS (the sky), Zemes māte stimulates and protects the power of life. LIBATIONS of beer were offered to her at the opening of every festival, and bread, ale, and herbs were buried in the ground or thrown into rivers and lakes or tied to trees in her honor. The birth of a child was also celebrated with an offering to her. The various functions of Zemes māte were eventually assumed by demigoddesses of forests, fields, stones, animals, water, and, in the Christian era, by the Blessed Virgin MARY.

The male counterpart of Zemes māte is Zemnieks (Latvian), known as Žemininkas, or Žemēpatis, among the Lithuanians. Žemēpatis, the brother of Žemyna, functioned as master of the earth and guardian of farms.

ZEN \zen\, Chinese Ch'an \'chän\, Korean Son \'sən\ (from Sanskrit dhyāna, "meditation"), important school of BUDDHISM in Japan that claims to transmit the spirit or essence of Buddhism—experience of the Enlightenment (BODHI) achieved by the BUDDHA GOTAMA. The school arose in the 6th century in China as Ch'an, but Zen did not fully develop in Japan until the 12th century.

Zen teaches that the potential to achieve enlightenment is inherent in everyone but lies dormant because of ignorance. It is best awakened not by the study of SCRIPTURES, the practice of good deeds, rites and ceremonies, or worship of images but by a sudden breaking through of the boundaries of common, everyday, logical thought. The differing sects have various methods for achieving this enlightenment. The RINZAI sect emphasizes sudden shock and meditation on the paradoxical statements called KOAN. The SŌTŌ sect prefers the method of sitting in meditation (zazen). A third sect, the Ōbaku, employs the methods of Rinzaï and also practices nembutsu, the continual invocation of Amida (the Japanese name for the Buddha AMITĀBHA), with the devotional formula namu Amida Butsu (Japanese: "homage to Amida Buddha").

During the 16th-century period of political unrest, Zen priests not only contributed their talents as diplomats and administrators but also preserved the cultural life; it was under their inspiration that art, literature, the tea cult, and the nō theatre, for example, developed and prospered.

In modern Japan, Zen sects and subsects claim some 9,600,000 adherents. Considerable interest in various aspects of Zen thought developed also in the West in the latter half of the 20th century, and a number of Zen groups have been formed in North America and Europe.

ZEPHANIAH \ze-fə-'nī-ə\, also spelled Sophonias \sə-fə-'nī-əs, sō-\ (fl. 7th century BCE), Israelite prophet who proclaimed the approaching divine judgment. The prophet's activity probably occurred during the early part of the reign of JOSIAH, king of JUDAH (reigned c. 640–609 BCE), for his criticism of the worship of certain gods in Jerusalem (BAAL, Milcom, and the host of the heavens) would have been meaningless after Josiah's reform, which took place about 623/622 BCE.

ZERA'IM \ze-rä-'ēm\ (Hebrew: "Seeds"), first of the six major divisions, or orders (SEDARIM), of the MISHNAH. Zera'im contains 11 tractates, the first of which (Berakhot, "Blessings") deals with public worship and private prayer. The other 10 all deal with laws regarding agriculture and are called: Pe'a ("Corner"), Demai ("Dubiously Tithed Produce"), Kilayim ("Mixed Kinds"), Shev'it ("Seventh Year"), Terumot ("Heave Offerings"), Ma'aserot ("Tithes"), Ma'aser sheni ("Second Tithe"), Halla ("Dough Offering"), Orla ("Uncircumcision"—applied to restricted fruit), and Bikkurim ("Firstfruits"). The Talmud YERUSHALMI has GEMARA on all 11 tractates of Zera'im, but the Talmud BAVLI has Gemara only on Berakhot.

ZERUBBABEL \zə-ˈrə-bə-bəl\, also spelled Zorobabel \zō-ˈrā-bə-bəl\ (fl. 6th century BCE), governor of Judaea under whom the rebuilding of the Jewish TEMPLE OF JERUSALEM took place (Ezra 3ff.). Zerubbabel is thought to have been a Babylonian Jew who returned to Jerusalem and became governor of Judaea under the Persians (Ezra 2:2). As a descendant of the House of David, Zerubbabel rekindled Jewish messianic hopes (Haggai 2:20–23; Sirach 49:11).

ZEUS \ˈzūs\, in ancient GREEK RELIGION, chief deity of the pantheon, a sky and weather god. Zeus was regarded as the sender of thunder and lightning, rain, and winds, and his traditional weapon was the thunderbolt. He was called the father (i.e., the ruler and protector) of both gods and men. His name, from the earlier unattested Diēus, is an elaboration of an Indo-European root that denoted day and the clear daytime sky as well as a deity of the heavens; the invocatory formula Zeus patēr, "Father Zeus," has exact counterparts in the Sanskrit Dyaus pitā and the Latin Iuppiter. No other Greek deity has such a clear Indo-European ancestry.

Hesiod's Theogony states that CRONUS, king of the TITANS, upon learning that one of his children was fated to dethrone him, swallowed his children as soon as they were born. But RHEA, his wife, saved the infant Zeus by substituting a stone wrapped in swaddling clothes for Cronus to swallow and hiding Zeus in a cave on Crete. There he was nursed by the NYMPH (or female goat) AMALTHAEA and guarded by the Curetes (young warriors), who clashed their weapons to disguise the baby's cries. After Zeus grew to manhood he led a revolt against the Titans and succeeded in dethroning Cronus, after which he divided dominion over the world with his brothers POSEIDON and HADES.

As ruler of heaven Zeus led the gods to victory against the GIANTS and successfully crushed several revolts against him by his fellow gods. From his exalted position atop Mount Olympus, Zeus was thought to omnisciently observe the affairs of men, seeing everything, governing all, and rewarding good conduct and punishing evil. Besides dispensing justice, Zeus was the protector of cities, the home, property, strangers, guests, and supplicants.

Zeus was well known for his amorousness—a source of perpetual discord with his wife, HERA—and he had many love affairs with both mortal and immortal women. Notable among his offspring were the twins APOLLO and ARTEMIS, by the Titaness Leto; HELEN and the DIOSCURI, by LEDA of Sparta; PERSEPHONE, by the goddess Demeter; ATHENA, born from his head after he had swallowed her mother Metis; DIONYSUS, by Semele; HE-PHAESTUS, HEBE, ARES, and EILEITHYIA, by Hera; and many others.

Zeus's very universality tended to reduce his importance compared to that of powerful local divinities like Athena and Hera. Although statues of Zeus Herkeios (Guardian of the House) and altars of Zeus Xenios (Hospitable) graced the forecourts of houses, and though his mountaintop shrines were visited by pilgrims, Zeus did not have a temple at Athens until the late 6th century BCE, and even his temple at OLYMPIA postdated that of Hera.

In art Zeus was represented as a bearded, dignified, and mature man of stalwart build; his most prominent symbols were the thunderbolt and the eagle.

ZIGGURAT \ˈzi-gə-ˈrət\ (Akkadian ziqurratu), pyramidal, stepped temple tower that is an architectural and religious structure characteristic of the major cities of Mesopotamia (now in Iraq) from about 2200 until 500 BCE. The ziggurat was always built with a core of mud brick and an exterior covered with baked brick. It had no internal chambers and was usually square or rectangular, averaging either 170 feet square or 125 × 170 feet at the base. Approximately 25 ziggurats are known, being equally divided in number among Sumer, Babylonia, and Assyria.

No ziggurat is preserved to its original height. Ascent was by an exterior triple stairway or by a spiral ramp, but for almost half of the known ziggurats, no means of ascent has been discovered. The sloping sides and terraces were often landscaped with trees and shrubs. The best-preserved ziggurat is at Ur (modern Tall al-Muqayyar). The largest, at Choghā Zābil in Elam, is 335 feet square and 80 feet high and stands at less than half its estimated original height. The legendary TOWER OF BABEL has been associated with the ziggurat of the great temple of MARDUK in Babylon.

ZION \ˈzi-ən\, in the OLD TESTAMENT, easternmost of the two hills of ancient Jerusalem. It was the site of the Jebusite city captured by DAVID, king of ISRAEL and JUDAH, in the 10th century BCE (2 Samuel 5:6–9) and established by him as his royal capital. Some scholars believe that the name also belonged to the "stronghold of Zion" taken by David (2 Samuel 5:7), which may have been the fortress of the city. The Jewish historian JOSEPHUS identified Zion with the western hill of Jerusalem; this incorrect identification of the site was retained until the late 19th or early 20th century, when the site of Zion was identified as the eastern hill (modern Ophel). The site was not included in the walls of Jerusalem's 16th-century fortifications. (The Old City Wall, erected 1538–40 by the Ottoman SULTAN Süleyman the Magnificent, was built largely on the foundations of earlier walls going back chiefly to the period of the Crusades but in some places dating to Byzantine, Herodian, and even Hasmonean times.)

The etymology and meaning of the name are obscure. It appears to be a pre-Israelite Canaanite name of the hill upon which Jerusalem was built; the name "mountain of Zion" is common. In biblical usage, however, "Mount Zion" often means the city rather than the hill itself. In the Old Testament, "Zion" is overwhelmingly a poetic and prophetic designation and is infrequently used in ordinary prose. Mount Zion is the place where YAHWEH, the God of Israel, dwells (ISAIAH 8:18; Psalms 74:2), the place where He is king (Isaiah 24:23) and where He has installed his king, David (Psalms 2:6). It is thus the seat of the action of Yahweh in history. After Jerusalem was destroyed by the Babylonians in 586 BCE, the Israelites could not forget Zion (Psalms 137), and, in the PROPHECY after the BABYLONIAN EXILE, Zion is the scene of Yahweh's messianic salvation. It is to Zion that the exiles will be restored (JEREMIAH 3:14), and there they will find Yahweh (Jeremiah 31). Bearing all these connotations, Zion came to mean the Jewish homeland, symbolic of JUDAISM or Jewish national aspirations (whence the name ZIONISM for the 19th–20th-century movement to establish a Jewish national center or state in Palestine).

ZIONISM \ˈzī-ə-ni-zəm\, Jewish nationalist movement whose goal has been the creation and support of a Jewish national state in Palestine, the ancient homeland of the Jews (Hebrew: Eretz Yisra'el, "the Land of Israel"). Though Zionism originated in eastern and central Europe in the latter part of the 19th century, it is in many ways a continuation of the ancient nationalist attachment of the Jews and of JUDAISM to the historical region of Palestine, where one of the hills of ancient Jerusalem was called ZION.

In the 16th and 17th centuries a number of "messiahs" tried to persuade Jews to return to Palestine. The Haskalah ("Enlightenment") movement of the late 18th century, however, urged Jews to assimilate into Western secular culture, and by the early 19th century interest in a return of the Jews to Palestine was kept alive mostly by Christian millenarians. Despite the Haskalah, eastern European Jews tended not to assimilate and in reaction to tsarist pogroms formed the Hovevei Ziyon ("Lovers of Zion") to promote the settlement of Jewish farmers and artisans in Palestine.

THEODOR HERZL, an Austrian journalist, convened the first Zionist Congress (1897) at Basel, Switz., which drew up the Basel program of the movement; this stated that "Zionism strives to create for the Jewish people a home in Palestine secured by public law." Prior to World War I Zionism represented only a minority of Jews, mostly from Russia but led by Austrians and Germans. It developed propaganda through orators and pamphlets, created its own newspapers, and gave an impetus to what was called a "Jewish renaissance" in letters and arts. The development of Modern Hebrew largely took place during this period.

The failure of the Russian Revolution of 1905 and the wave of pogroms and repressions that followed caused growing numbers of Russian Jewish youth to immigrate to Palestine as pioneer settlers. By 1914 there were about 90,000 Jews in Palestine. Upon the outbreak of World War I political Zionism reasserted itself, and its leadership passed to Russian Jews living in England. Chaim Weizmann and Nahum Sokolow were instrumental in obtaining the Balfour Declaration from Great Britain (Nov. 2, 1917), which promised British support for the creation of a Jewish national home in Palestine.

In the following years the Zionists built up the Jewish urban and rural settlements in Palestine, perfecting autonomous organizations and solidifying Jewish cultural life and Hebrew education. In March 1925 the Jewish population in Palestine was officially estimated at 108,000, and it had risen to about 238,000 by 1933. The Arab population feared Palestine eventually would become a Jewish state and bitterly resisted Zionism and the British policy supporting it. Several Arab revolts, especially in 1929 and 1936–39, caused the British to devise schemes to reconcile the Arab and Zionist demands. As tensions grew among Arabs and Zionists, Britain submitted the Palestine problem to the United Nations, which on Nov. 29, 1947, proposed partition of the country into separate Arab and Jewish states and the internationalization of Jerusalem. The creation of the State of Israel on May 14, 1948, brought about the Arab-Israeli war of 1948–49, in the course of which Israel obtained more land than had been provided by the UN resolution, and drove out 800,000 Arabs who became displaced persons known as Palestinians.

During the next two decades Zionist organizations in many countries continued to raise financial support for Israel and to encourage Jews to immigrate there. Most Jews, however, reject the view propagated by many very Orthodox Jews in Israel that the Jews outside Israel are living in "exile" and can live a full life only in Israel. See also JUDAISM: TWENTIETH-CENTURY JUDAISMS BEYOND THE RABBINIC FRAMEWORK: ZIONISM.

ZIONIST CHURCH, any of several prophet-healing groups in southern Africa, they correspond to the independent churches called Aladura in Nigeria, "spiritual" in Ghana, and "prophet-healing" in most other parts of Africa.

The use of the term ZION derives from the Christian Catholic Apostolic Church in Zion, founded in Chicago in 1896 and having missionaries in South Africa by 1904. That church emphasized divine healing, BAPTISM by three-fold immersion, and the imminent SECOND COMING of Christ. Its African members encountered U.S. missionaries of the Apostolic Faith pentecostal church in 1908 and learned that the Zion Church lacked the second Baptism of the Spirit (recognition of extra powers or character); they therefore founded their own pentecostal Zion Apostolic Church. The vast range of independent churches that stem from the original Zion Apostolic Church use in their names the words Zion (or Jerusalem), Apostolic, Pentecostal, Faith, or Holy Spirit to represent their biblical charter, as for example the Christian Catholic Apostolic Holy Spirit Church in Zion of South Africa. These are known in general as Zionists or Spirit Churches. The churches were introduced into Rhodesia (Zimbabwe) in the 1920s by migrant workers returning from South Africa; schisms and new foundations followed.

Zionist churches include the following features: (1) origination from a mandate received by a prophet in a dream, vision, or death-resurrection experience; (2) a chieflike head, often called a bishop, who is succeeded by his son and who is occasionally regarded as a MESSIAH. Women also figure as founders and leaders; (3) security received by the church's possession of its own holy place, such as a New Jerusalem, Zion, or Moriah City, as headquarters; organization of farms and other economic activities; (4) healing, through CONFESSION, repeated baptisms, purification rites and EXORCISMS, especially at "Bethesda pools" and "Jordan rivers"; (5) revelation and power from the Holy Spirit through prophetic utterances and pentecostal phenomena; (6) ritualistic and Africanized worship, with special garments and innovative festivals, characterized by singing, dancing, clapping, and drumming; (7) a legalistic and Sabbatarian ethic, which includes TABOOS against certain foods, beer, and tobacco and which does not admit Western medicines but tolerates polygamy; and (8) repudiation of traditional magic, medicines, DIVINATION, and ancestor cults; the Christian replacements for these traditional practices, however, are sometimes similarly used and interpreted.

ZIUSUDRA \zē-ü-'sü-drä\, in MESOPOTAMIAN RELIGION, rough counterpart to the biblical NOAH as survivor of a god-sent flood. When the gods had decided to destroy humanity with a flood, the god Enki (Akkadian EA), who did not agree with the decree, revealed it to Ziusudra, a man well known for his humility and obedience. Ziusudra did as Enki commanded him and built a huge boat, in which he successfully rode out the flood. Afterward, he prostrated himself before the gods An (ANU) and ENLIL (BEL), and, as a reward for living a godly life, Ziusudra was given immortality. See UT-NAPISHTIM.

ZIYĀRA \zē-'yār-ə\ (Arabic: "visit"), in ISLAM, a visit to the tomb of the Prophet MUHAMMAD in the mosque at MEDINA, Saudi Arabia; also a visit to the tomb of a saint or a holy person. The legitimacy of these latter visits has been questioned by Muslim religious authorities, particularly by the Wahhābiya, who consider ziyāra to be a BID'Ā ("innovation") that should be condemned by all true believers and maintain that such veneration of saints is a form of POLYTHEISM, for God alone can grant salvation to a troubled person. However, according to a popular HADITH, Muhammad promised his intercession to whoever visited his tomb.

Despite objections from some quarters, Muslims in great numbers continue to make such visits in hope of obtaining cures or the blessings of the saint, especially on that saint's feast day (known as MAWLID or, in India and Pakistan, 'urs). Millions include a visit to the Prophet's mosque in Medina with the performance of the HAJJ or 'UMRA in MECCA (about 250 miles to the south). Since most Muslims are unable to perform the required hajj, visiting regional shrines is popularly regarded to be a suitable alternative. Women, whose access to mosques is limited, are among the most common patrons of saint shrines, where they gather to engage in social as well as devotional activities. Visitors bring votive offerings with them, or slaughter animals as sacrifices to be fed to the poor. They often circumambulate the shrine, as is also done by pilgrims in Mecca.

Aside from the Prophet's mosque, among the most popular shrines are those of Aḥmad al-Badawī, Sayyida Zaynab, and HUSAYN in Egypt; 'ABD AL-QĀDIR AL-JĪLĀNĪ in Tunisia; Moulay Idrīs in Morocco; Aḥmadou Bamba in Senegal; al-Nabī Mūsā (MOSES) in Palestine; JALĀL AL-DĪN AL-RŪMĪ in Turkey; Bahā' al-Dīn Naqshband in Uzbekistan; and Mu'īn al-Dīn Chishtī in India. Shrines most favored in SHĪTE ziyāras include those of the IMAMS and their relatives in KARBALĀ', NAJAF, and Sāmarrā' in Iraq and in MASHHAD and QOM in Iran. Almost every Muslim community in North Africa, the Middle East, and Asia has its own saint, whose tomb is visited by the local inhabitants and by pilgrims from afar. During the 20th century some ziyāra sites were imbued with nationalist sentiments.

ZODIAC, in astronomy and ASTROLOGY, belt around the heavens extending 9° on either side of the ecliptic, the plane of the earth's orbit and of the sun's apparent annual path. Because most of the constellations through which the ecliptic passes represent animals, the ancient Greeks called its zone zodiakos kyklos, "circle of animals," or ta zodia, "the little animals." The 12 constellations of the zodiac include Aries (Ram), Taurus (Bull), Gemini (Twins), Cancer (Crab), Leo (Lion), Virgo (Virgin), Libra (Balance), Scorpius (Scorpion), Sagittarius (Archer), Capricornus (Goat), Aquarius (Water Bearer), and Pisces (Fish). In Chinese astrology the zodiac comprises a 12-year cycle with an animal attribute for each: Rat, Ox, Tiger, Rabbit, Dragon, Snake, Horse, Sheep, Monkey, Rooster, Dog, and Boar.

ZOROASTER \zōr-ə-,was-tər, 'zōr-\, Old Iranian Zarathushtra, or Zarathustra \za-ra-,tōsh-'trā; ,zar-ə-'tūsh-trə, -'thūs-\ (b. c. 628 BCE, probably Rhages, Iran—d. c. 551, site unknown), Iranian religious reformer and founder of ZOROASTRIANISM, or Parsiism, as it is known in India.

The dates of Zoroaster's life cannot be ascertained with any degree of certainty. His birthdate may have been 628 BCE. Zoroaster was born into a modestly situated family of knights, the Spitama, probably at Rhages (now Rayy, a suburb of Tehrān), a town in Media. The area in which he lived was not yet urban, its economy being based on animal husbandry and pastoral occupations. Nomads, who frequently raided those engaged in such occupations, were viewed by Zoroaster as aggressive violators of order, and he called them followers of the Lie.

Zoroaster probably was a priest. Having received a vision from AHURA MAZDĀ, the Wise Lord, who appointed him to preach the truth, Zoroaster apparently was opposed in his teachings by the civil and religious authorities in the area in which he preached. Confident in the truth revealed to him, Zoroaster apparently did not try to overthrow belief in the polytheistic Iranian religion, but he did place Ahura Mazdā at the center of a kingdom of justice that promised immortality and bliss.

Zoroaster's teachings centered on Ahura Mazdā, who is the highest god and alone is worthy of worship. According to the Gāthās, hymns thought to be the words of Zoroaster, he is the creator of heaven and earth. He is the source of the alternation of light and darkness, the sovereign lawgiver, and the very center of nature, as well as the originator of the moral order and judge of the entire world. He is surrounded by six or seven entities, which the later AVESTA calls AMESHA SPENTAS, "beneficent immortals." In the words of the Gāthās, Ahura Mazdā is the father of SPENTA MAINYU (Bounteous Spirit), of Asha Vahishta (Justice, Truth), of VOHU MANAH (Righteous Thinking), and of Armaiti (Spenta Armaiti, Devotion). The other three beings (entities) of this group are said to personify qualities attributed to Ahura Mazdā: they are Khshathra Vairya (Desirable Dominion), Haurvatāt (Wholeness), and Ameretāt (Immortality). The good qualities represented by these beings are also to be earned and possessed by Ahura Mazdā's followers.

The Wise Lord, though supreme, has an opponent, AHRIMAN, who embodies the principle of evil, and whose followers, having freely chosen him, also are evil. In the beginning there was a meeting of the two spirits, who were free to choose "life or not life." This choice gave birth to a good and an evil principle. Corresponding to the former is a Kingdom of Justice and Truth; to the latter, the Kingdom of the Lie (Druj), populated by the daevas, the evil spirits (originally old Indo-Iranian gods).

The Wise Lord, together with the amesha spentas, will at last vanquish the spirit of evil: this message, implying the end of the cosmic and ethical dualism, seems to constitute Zoroaster's main religious reform. His monotheistic solution resolves the old strict dualism. After his death, however, the dualist principle was strengthened by bringing Ahura Mazdā, by then called Ohrmazd, down to the level of his opponent, Ahriman.

The Gāthās are permeated by eschatological thinking. The earthly state is connected with a state beyond, in which the Wise Lord will reward the good act, speech, and thought and punish the bad. After death, the soul of man must pass over the Bridge of the Requirer (Činvat). After judgment is passed by Ahura Mazdā, the good enter the kingdom of everlasting joy and light, and the bad are consigned to the regions of horror and darkness. During an end phase for the visible world, "the last turn of creation," Ahriman will be destroyed and the world will be wonderfully renewed and be inhabited by the good, who will live in paradisiacal joy.

Zoroaster forbade all sacrifices in honor of Ahriman or of his adherents, the daevas, who from pre-Zoroastrian times had degenerated into hostile deities. In his reform, he did not abolish all animal sacrifice but simply the orgiastic and intoxicating rites that accompanied it. The HAOMA sacrifice, too, was to be thought of as a symbolic offering; it may have consisted of unfermented drink or an intoxicating beverage or plant. Zoroaster retained the ancient cult of fire. This cult and its various rites were later extended and given a definite order by the priestly class of the MAGI. Its center, the eternal flame in the Temple of Fire, was linked with the priestly service and with the haoma sacrifice.

After converting a king called Vishtāspa to such teachings, Zoroaster remained at the royal court. Other officials were converted, and a daughter of Zoroaster apparently married Jāmāsp, a minister of the king. According to tradition, Zoroaster died about 551 BCE. After his death, many legends arose about him—for example, that nature rejoiced at his birth. He was viewed as a model for priests, warriors, and agriculturalists, as well as a skilled craftsman and healer. The Greeks regarded him as a philosopher, mathematician, astrologer, or magician. Jews and Christians regarded him as an astrologer, magician, prophet, or arch heretic. Not until the 18th century did a more scholarly assessment of Zoroaster's career and influence emerge.

ZOROASTRIANISM AND PARSIISM \zōr-ə-'was-trē-ə-,ni-zəm, zōr-. . . 'pār-sē-,i-zəm \, ancient pre-Islamic religion of Iran that survives there in isolated areas and more prosperously in India, where the descendants of Zoroastrian Iranian (Persian) immigrants are known as Parsis, or Parsees. Founded by the Iranian prophet and reformer ZOROASTER in the 6th century BCE, this religion, containing both monotheistic and dualistic features, influenced the other major Western religions—JUDAISM, CHRISTIANITY, and ISLAM.

In the tradition into which Zoroaster was born and educated, society tended to be divided into three classes: chiefs and priests, warriors, and husbandmen and cattle breeders. This class structure is reflected in the religion, with particular gods or daevas ("heavenly ones") associated with each of the three classes. The ahuras ("lords"), which included MITRA and VARUNA, seem to have been connected only with the first class. Zoroaster rejected the cults of all the gods except one ahura, AHURA MAZDĀ, the "Wise Lord." At the beginning of creation, Zoroaster taught, the twin sons of Ahura Mazdā entered into an eternal rivalry. One, SPENTA MAINYU (Bounteous Spirit), chose good, thus acquiring the attributes of truth, justice, and life. The other, Angra Mainyu (Destructive Spirit), chose evil and its attendant forces of destruction, injustice, and death. According to Zoroaster the world was soon to be consumed in a mighty conflagration from which only the followers of the good would rise to share in a new creation. Until this came to pass, the souls of those who died would cross the Bridge of the Requirer from whence the good would be led to wait in heaven, the wicked in hell.

Later Zoroastrian COSMOLOGY conceives the history of the world as a drama divided into four periods of 3,000 years each. In Infinite Time there existed Ormazd, who dwelt in the light, and AHRIMAN, who dwelt below him in the darkness. At the end of the first 3,000 years Ahriman crossed the Void that separated them and attacked Ormazd, who, perceiving that their struggle would last forever unless realized in finite terms, made a pact with Ahriman limiting the duration of their struggle. Ormazd then recited the Ahuna Vairya, the most sacred prayer of the Zoroastrians, which is believed to contain the germ of their whole religion. Ahriman, aghast, fell back into the abyss where he lay for another 3,000 years. During this time Ormazd brought about, first, the spiritual creation including the "beneficent immortals," then a corresponding material creation—sky, water, earth, plants, the Primeval Ox, and Primeval Man (GAYŌMART). Next, to the FRAVASHIS (preexistent souls) of men Ormazd offered a choice between staying forever in their embryonic state and becoming incarnate in the physical world in order to secure his triumph over Ahriman; they chose birth and combat. Meanwhile Ahriman generated six DEMONS and an opposing material creation.

At the end of the second period of 3,000 years Ahriman, instigated by Primeval Woman, the Whore, burst through the sky. He killed Gayōmart, from whose body mankind and the metals were generated, and the Ox, from which arose animals and plants. In the third period Ahriman triumphed in the material world but was unable to escape from it; trapped by Ormazd, he was doomed to generate his own destruction. The beginning of the last period witnesses the birth of Zoroaster. The end of each of its millennia is to be marked by the coming of a new savior, successor and posthumous son of Zoroaster. The third and last savior, SAOSHYANT, will bring about the final judgment, dispense the drink of immortality, and usher in the new world.

The literature of Zoroastrianism falls into two distinct parts: the AVESTA, the original scriptural work, composed in a form of the ancient Iranian language called Avestan; and the much later texts written in Pahlavi, a dialect of Middle Persian, or in Persian.

After Zoroaster's death his religion slowly spread southward, through what is now Afghanistan, and westward into the territory of the Medes and Persians. As it did so, worship of the ancient gods and goddesses again entered the tradition. This development, which seems to have taken place in Achaemenid times (559–330 BCE), is reflected in the later part of the Avesta. For about four centuries after Alexander's conquest (330 BCE), it seems, Iran was more or less hellenized and the indigenous religion neglected; a revival did not come about until toward the end of the Arsacid, or Parthian, Empire (247 BCE–224 CE).

With the advent of a new and decidedly national Persian dynasty, the Sāsānian, in 224 CE, Zoroastrianism became the official religion. Its hierarchy possessed considerable political power, and other religions (Christianity, MANICHAISM, and BUDDHISM) were persecuted. The Avesta was compiled, edited, and provided with a translation and commentary in the vernacular, Pahlavi. The dualistic, or Mazdean, doctrine, which had gradually replaced the monotheistic system of the Gāthās during the Achaemenid period, became finally accepted as orthodox.

Under Muslim rule the bulk of the population was persuaded or forced to embrace Islam, but Zoroastrianism was tolerated to a certain extent. Between the 8th and 10th centuries, however, religious persecution and forced conversion to Islam led some of the remaining Zoroastrians to leave Iran and settle in India, most of them eventually in the region of Bombay. By the 19th century these Zoroastrians, called Parsis, were distinguished for their wealth, education, and beneficence. In the 19th century the Parsis renewed contact with the only remaining Zoroastrians in Iran, the GABARS. These two groups and their immigrants to other countries are today the only surviving practitioners of Zoroastrianism.

ZU \ˈzū\, also called Imdugud, in MESOPOTAMIAN RELIGION, bird god who steals the prophetic tables of fate that confer supreme power. Zu was slain and the tables recovered. Zu is identified with Anzu.

ZUHD \ˈzū-həd\ (Arabic: "renunciation," or "abstinence"), in ISLAM, ASCETICISM. Even though a Muslim is permitted to enjoy fully whatever unforbidden pleasure God bestows on him, Islam nevertheless praises those who shun luxury in favor of a simple and pious life. The QUR'AN holds in great esteem those "servants of God who pass the night prostrating themselves in the worship of their Lord" (25:63–65). There are students of Islam, however, who maintain that zuhd was influenced directly by the Christian HERMITS, with whom early Muslims had some familiarity. Some scholars also point to the pre-Islamic Arab HANĪFS, who practiced the ascetic life and who may have had considerable influence on the Prophet MUHAMMAD.

Zuhd developed in Islam as a result of the Muslim conquests, which brought with them material wealth and widespread indulgence in luxurious living. The growth of the Islamic state had also brought with it bitter political disputes that pitted Muslim against Muslim in fierce struggles for power. The resulting bloodshed spurred devout Muslims to seek peace of mind in abstinence from all that distracts from the worship of God.

The terms zuhd and zāhid ("ascetic") were not used by pre-Islamic Arabs or by early Muslims to describe the elaborate and systematic ascetic doctrines that became characteristic of later periods, from the 8th century on. Among the earliest zāhids was AL-ḤASAN AL-BAṢRĪ (d. 728), whose sayings remained for a long time the chief guide of the ascetics. But it was not until after his death that zuhd became a significant and forceful movement in the religious and political life of the Muslim community. Many scholars have referred to Ibrāhīm ibn Adham and to his student and disciple Shaqīq al-Balkhī (d. 810) as the real founders of zuhd, as it became known in later periods. Ibn Adham stressed poverty and self-denial; indeed, he abandoned the wealth of his father and became a poor wanderer.

Because of the close ties among these pietists, the zāhids are often regarded as being identical with the early Sufis, whose name, “wool-wearers,” points to the ascetic practice of wearing hair shirts. Later Sufis, however, dismiss the zāhids as men who worship God not out of love but for fear of hell or expectation of paradise. See also ASCETICISM; SUFISM.

ZURVANISM \ˈzər-və-,ni-zəm\, also spelled Zervanism, modified form of ZOROASTRIANISM that appeared in Persia during the Sāsānian period (3rd–7th century CE). It was opposed to orthodox Zoroastrianism, which by that time had become dualistic in doctrine. According to Zurvanism, time alone—limitless, eternal, and uncreated—is the source of all things.

Zurvān, god of time and fate, remotely influences human destinies, appearing under two aspects: Limitless Time (i.e., eternal lord; Zurvān Akarana) and Time of Long Dominion (i.e., lord of the existing world; Zurvān Dareghō-Chvadhāta). His worship was bound up with speculations about ASTROLOGY and the world-year.

In later writings Zurvān is seen as the father of Ormazd and AHRIMAN (see AHURA MAZDĀ), perhaps a result of contact between Zoroastrianism and Greco-Babylonian astrological speculations. (Zurvanism appears to have had its stronghold in western Persia, bordering Babylonia.) Some scholars seek an origin for Zurvanism outside Zoroastrianism, in the worship of an ancient Median or pre-Iranian god. It was in Zurvanite form that Zoroastrianism influenced MITHRAISM (in which Zurvān was an important deity) and MANICHAISM.

ZWINGLI, HULDRYCH \ˈzwɪŋ-lē, -glē, German ˈtʃwɪŋ-lē\, Huldrich also spelled Ulrich (b. Jan. 1, 1484, Wildhaus in the Toggenburg, Sankt Gallen, Switz.—d. Oct. 11, 1531, near Kappel), first important reformer in the Swiss Protestant REFORMATION and the only major reformer of the 16th century whose movement did not evolve into a church.

Zwingli was the son of a free peasant who was a village magistrate. Ordained to the PRIESTHOOD, he became a pastor in 1506. In 1518, despite much opposition, he was appointed people's priest at the Grossmünster (Great Minster) at Zürich. He commenced a series of expositions of the NEW TESTAMENT enlivened by topical application. Serious illness in 1519, followed by his brother's death in 1520, deepened the spiritual and theological elements in his thinking and teaching. That same year he delivered a series of sermons that helped to initiate the Swiss Reformation (1522).

In 1523 Zwingli published his 67 Artikel. His main contentions were adopted by most priests in the district and, in consequence, the CELIBACY of clergy came to be flouted and liturgical reform was begun, as was a plan for the reconstitution of the Grossmünster as both a grammar school and a theological seminary to train Reformed pastors. Successive steps taken during 1524 and 1525 included the removal of images from the church, the suppression of organs, the dissolution of religious houses, the replacement of the MASS by a simple Communion service, the reform of the baptismal office, the introduction of prophesyings or BIBLE readings, the reorganization of the ministry, and the preparation of a native Bible (the Zürcher Bibel appeared in 1529).

From the city of Zürich the movement spread to neighboring cantons, including important centers like Basel and Bern. In 1528 Zwingli took part in a disputation at Bern, putting forth the theses (1) that the church is born of the Word of God and has Christ alone as its head; (2) that its laws are binding only insofar as they agree with the Scripture; (3) that Christ alone is man's righteousness; (4) that the Holy SCRIPTURE does not teach Christ's corporeal presence in the bread and wine at the Lord's Supper; (5) that the mass is a gross affront to the sacrifice and death of Christ; (6) that there is no biblical foundation for the mediation or intercession of the dead, for PURGATORY, or for images and pictures; and (7) that marriage is lawful to all.

From 1525 Zwingli's work was hampered by disagreements, particularly with the ANABAPTISTS who desired the abolition of TITHES, a severance of the state connection, the creation of a pure or gathered church of true believers (those who have experienced a conversion according to the moral beliefs and precepts of the New Testament), and the consequent ending of infant BAPTISM. Meanwhile, his thinking and practice in relation to the mass had led to a sharp disagreement with MARTIN LUTHER. Luther taught the real presence of Christ's body and blood not in place of, but in, with, and under the bread and wine. Zwingli, on the other hand, did not maintain a “real” presence but simply the divine presence of Christ or his presence to the believer by the power of the HOLY SPIRIT, as signified by the elements. Luther and his supporters refused to see in the Swiss movement a true work of evangelical reformation. The Colloquy of Marburg (1529) was arranged with a view to reconciliation; Luther, Zwingli, and MARTIN BUCER all participated. Cordial agreement was reached on most issues, but the critical gulf remained in relation to the sacramental presence. In the Second War of Kappel (1531), Zwingli accompanied the Zürich forces as CHAPLAIN and was killed in the battle.

Zwingli's rejection of the SACRAMENTS as means of obtaining GRACE and as forms of intervention between the soul and God underlay the deepened conception of other Reformation leaders such as Heinrich Bullinger, Pietro Martire Vermigli, and JOHN CALVIN. Obvious defects of disjointedness and intellectualism mark his writings. Behind them, however, lay an open, warm, and friendly disposition, and they embody a bold attempt to rethink all Christian doctrine in consistently biblical terms.
